Je demande aux gens qui ont vécu si jamais le souvenir de quelque amour de jeunesse a valu pour eux la trace humide d'une liqueur sur le palais ; votre maîtresse ou votre Femme vieillit ; pour peu que vous soyez vertueux, vous n'en changez pas, vous la gardez, n'est-ce pas ? chaque jour elle s'épuise, vous n'avez plus que la lie de vos anciennes délices. Mais le vin, au contraire, s'améliore chaque jour ; c'est une saveur de plus, une volupté à une volupté, un anneau de plus à ce chaînon de bonheur, de tendres extases, de savoureuses sensations.

O bouteille silencieuse, si j'avais autant de génie que d'amour, je voudrais te faire un poème ou te bâtir une statue !

Mais hélas ! douce ivresse si méprisée et si commune, tu es comme la vertu, tu trouves ta satisfaction en toi-même.

Cependant, on t'élève des autels, où tes adorateurs viennent te puiser au fond des verres, comme la vérité au fond du puits ; et malheur au joyeux philosophe qui la fait sortir dans la rue ! La Foule des enfants crie après l'homme soûl.

La Foule des hommes s'acharne après la vérité, qu'ils mettent en pièces.

II

Eh bien, un jour que ces deux hommes se trouvèrent en présence, poussés par la vanité et la gloire, ils se portèrent le plus sanglant et le plus terrible défi que jamais paladin aux jours de tournoi eût jeté à son adversaire, mais un duel à mort, à outrance, une bataille à deux en champ clos, à armes égales, où le vaincu devait rester sur place pour proclamer le triomphe de son vainqueur ; c'était un défi inspiré par la rage, la lutte serait acharnée, longue, pleine de tumulte, de cris, sans trêve, sans repos ; on devait plutôt mourir sur place, et l'honneur et le plaisir de la victoire serait tout, car le triomphe à lui seul devrait couvrir d'honneur celui qui l'aurait remporté et l'illustrer d'une gloire immortelle.

Car il s'agissait de qui des deux boirait le plus !

III

C'était chez Hugues.

Dans une chambre basse au rez-de-chaussée, ouverte sur une cour plantée d'arbres ; au Fond, une haute cheminée avec des chenets de fer rouillés et une grande plaque de fonte, où les araignées tendaient leurs toiles agitées de temps en temps par le vent qui s'engouffrait sur elles et les déchirait en lambeaux ; une solive noircie et couverte de clous qui portaient un fusil, quelques bâtons et un pistolet ; puis, sur les murailles blanchies avec la chaux, se dressait un buffet de bois blanc, portant dans ses rangées des piles de vaisselle de couleur, c'était là l'appartement. En outre, un châssis carré de vitres vertes et épaisses, qui se glissait sur une vis en bois, jetait sur tout cela une teinte verdâtre de crépuscule et de mélancolie.

A côté de cette fenêtre à moitié baissée, se trouvait une petite table noire avec deux chaises de paille, où sir Hugues venait de déposer deux verres et une quantité de bouteilles de toutes les dimensions ; derrière, dans un coin, s'étendait encore une foule de bouts de bouteilles, avec leurs têtes blanches de liège.

Il les débouchait quand Rymbault arriva ; il était temps, la nuit allait venir, et cela durerait jusqu'au matin.

Les voilà donc réunis, ils s'asseyent tous deux en silence et sombres, ils se mettent à boire, à boire de longues heures.

De temps à autre, on voyait sortir de dessous leurs joues des bouffées grises, qu'ils aspiraient à pleine poitrine de leurs longues pipes en terre, elles partaient en s'élargissant, se repliant mollement sur elles — mêmes, et montaient vers le plafond en nuages vaporeux.

On entendait aussi le bruit de la bouteille froissant le verre en y faisant tomber son vin, et celui des verres frappant sur leurs dents déjà crispées par l'ivresse. Et au dehors une nuit d'été calme et silencieuse ; à l'horizon, derrière la colline couverte de taillis, s'élevait de terre comme un reflet de lumière qui illuminait la campagne et venait jeter ses rayons blafards et azurés à travers les grosses vitres vertes des fenêtres.

On n'entendait plus que ce murmure confus des nuits qui s'élève des champs, comme si la nature dormait et qu'elle laissât échapper des soupirs dans ses rêves : un cri lointain qui court, un pas éloigné et furtif, la haie d'épines qui tremble, une voix confuse qui appelle, le battement d'ailes des oiseaux sous la verdure, les aboiements répétés d'un chien pleurant au clair de lune, et puis les vaches dormant pesamment au pied des arbres sur l'herbe de la cour ou se retournant sur la litière de leurs étables.

Il y avait aussi comme un vent plein de fraîcheur qui passait sur les feuilles à travers la haie entre les pommiers, et qui apportait dans ses replis invisibles comme un parfum de foin coupé et de fleurs des bois.

Cependant l'orgueil sinistre des deux buveurs s'était abattu et avait fait place à une gaieté douce et paisible ; peu à peu leur front s'était déridé, leurs bouches s'étaient pliées pour un sourire ; ils se parlaient gaiement, les yeux à demi clos et la tête lourde et joyeuse, tout prêts à se laisser endormir dans des rêves d'ivresse.

Un flambeau en cuivre, placé au milieu d'eux, éclairait leur figure d'une clarté douce, et dessinait sur le plafond noirci des cercles lumineux et vacillants. Ils allaient donc s'endormir ; déjà leurs mains avaient abandonné les verres et étaient retombées sur leurs cuisses, leurs têtes s'étaient appuyées sur la muraille, le cou en avant ; ils avaient fermé les yeux.

Quelque chose de suave et tendre planait sur eux ; on voyait sur leurs visages épanouis transpirer une sensation voluptueuse et intime qui sortait de l'âme, le monde avait fui avec ses douleurs et ses amertumes, tout tournait devant eux en images fugitives et errantes, sans suite, comme une ronde de fées vêtues de toutes les couleurs et qui passaient en tourbillonnant devant eux, montaient vers le ciel en spirales, en cercles qui s'agrandissaient, se perdaient et s'évanouissaient, comme une poudre d'or qu'on jette aux vents.

Des clartés inconnues, des lueurs, des jours apparaissaient tout à coup sur les murailles, s'élargissaient sur la suie de la cheminée, montaient en réseaux et en gerbes de feu ; c'étaient des extases infinies, des sensations délicieuses par tous les sens, un sommeil qui se sentait des rêves confus qui commençaient et se nouaient à d'autres rêves interminables, comme le balancement d'un hamac quand on s'endort, comme des essences de roses qui vous font songer d'amour, comme une longue suite de paroles douces, enivrantes, embaumantes, comme des bonheurs renaissants, comme une campagne étoilée de toutes les fleurs, dont chacune aurait des parfums à elle et qui toutes vous enivreraient d'un même sommeil, d'un même bonheur.

Sentir qu'on quitte la vie avec un sourire, qu'on meurt sous des baisers, qu'on s'endort délicieusement en entrant dans le monde sans bornes de l'infini et des rêves, c'est là le bonheur, désir de tout, vague et confus, désir de la mort, désir du sommeil, désir des songes ; bonheur de la feuille roulant dans l'air, des nuages courant dans le vide, s'étalant et s'évanouissant dans l'espace, bonheur de l'oiseau volant jusqu'aux cieux et planant sur le monde, bonheur des fleurs jetant leurs parfums aux vents, bonheur du poète dans son délire, dont l'âme s'exhale avec la voix, et qui répand aussi comme la fleur ses parfums aux vents, à l'oubli, pour être emportés et évanouis.

Mais Hugues tout à coup s'est relevé d'un saut pour remplir les verres ; ses yeux brillent comme le feu, ses mains se crispent, il rit comme un fou, il veut boire, il a soif, il a du feu dans la gorge, et ce qu'il boit le brûle encore.

— Tu recules ? dit-il à Rymbaud, plein de colère.

Cette injure-là fut lavée par une bouteille de rhum.

Et puis voilà la colère qui les prend, ils s'animent de nouveau, se rapprochent de la table, se posent pour se voir ; et ils boivent avec délices, ils s'enivrent à longs flots ; les verres ne suffisent plus, chacun prend une bouteille de ses deux mains, étreint son cou sous ses lèvres, et ne s'arrête que pour se regarder l'un l'autre, pâles, muets, les yeux fixés l'un sur l'autre avec un regard stupide et étonné. On dirait que Satan les pousse et que le vice leur prodigue des forces plus qu'humaines ; puis le délire les prend ; après la passion, la frénésie, une frénésie cruelle, effrayante d'atrocité et de cynisme.

Les voilà rapprochés l'un de l'autre, s'échangeant des regards de défi et buvant des yeux ce qui leur reste à boire.

C'est une orgie, une orgie sombre, sans cris, sans femmes, sans clartés ; le vin y ruisselle à flots et l'ivresse s'y étale toute nue, ils s'y plongent jusqu'au cou.

Ainsi, dans un délire sans repos, ils boivent, poussés par un instinct infernal ; tout a disparu, l'ivresse dolente et ses demi-sommeils et ses prismes enchanteurs ; quelque chose de machinal les pousse par une force invincible.

Leur poitrine haletait pleine de feu, leur peau rougie semblait couverte de sang, leurs muscles de fer eussent broyé d'un coup la table qui les soutenait, une sueur froide coulait sur leurs cheveux, sur la peau livide du visage, sur leurs paupières de plomb, qu'ils soulevaient avec peine.

Maintenant c'est la rage, ils s'arrachent de Force les dernières bouteilles qui leur restent, et, rapprochées l'une de l'autre, les deux figures monstrueuses se lancent des grincements de dents, des grimaces, des regards de tigre, ivres, de la salive pleine de vin, des injures, des cris, des râles d'ivresse.

C'était quelque chose de terrible à voir que ces deux hommes, à la lueur mourante d'un flambeau, au clair de lune si limpide, par une nuit si douce et si pure, s'étreindre dans tous les sens, se déchirer avec les ongles, mettre en pièces leurs vêtements, voir leurs larges doigts s'entrelacer avec des peines inouïes, et tout cela pour s'arracher le dernier lambeau de l'orgie.

Enfin la bouteille se déchira dans leurs mains.

Hugues en tira une de derrière lui, c'était du kirschenwaser ; il la but d'un trait, puis se leva de toute sa hauteur, brisa la table d'un coup de pied, et jetant la carafe à la tête de Rymbaud :

— Mange, dit-il avec orgueil.

Le sang sortit et coula sur leurs vêtements comme le vin. Rymbaud tomba par terre avec des râles horribles, il se mourait.

— Bois, maintenant, continua Hugues.

Il s'approcha de lui, lui mit un genou sur la poitrine, et il lui desserrait les mâchoires avec les mains ; il força le moribond de boire encore, il se roula plusieurs fois par terre sur les verres brisés, au milieu du vin et du sang ; son corps se plia plusieurs fois comme un serpent ; puis tout à coup ses muscles se tendirent, il se releva encore une fois, chancela et tomba, poussa indistinctement quelques cris et retomba de nouveau dans son agonie, ivre et désespérée.

Hugues dormait.

Puis les râles plaintifs cessèrent, la lune s'évanouit sous les nuages, et quand l'aube vint à blanchir l'horizon, ses derniers rayons mourants éclairaient encore ces deux hommes qui dormaient tous deux, mais dont l'un avait passé de l'ivresse au sommeil et l'autre de l'ivresse à la tombe, autre sommeil aussi, mais plus tranquille et plus profond.

IV

Le lendemain, vers les quatre heures du soir, une pluie fine et serrée tombait sur la grande route et mouillait les feuilles poudreuses des arbres qui l'entouraient.

La maison de Hugues était une dernière du village ; elle était séparée de la grande route par une petite cour bordée d'une baie d'arbres qui laissait voir, à travers ses plis pleins d'ombrages, une maison blanche avec des auvents verts, une vigne tapissant la muraille de plâtre. C'était dans cette cour que dormait Hugues, transporté, par les soins de sa femme, sous un arbre touffu où il continua son rêve, tandis que les gens d'église étaient venus chercher le mort, l'avaient transporté tout couvert de ses haillons jusqu'au presbytère, l'avaient lavé, soigné, et bref lui avaient donné en dernier lieu un court office, afin qu'il pût passer légalement dans l'autre monde et être mort comme on doit mourir.

Cet homme avait des amis, on le suivit jusqu'à son lit de pierre.

Dans les villages il n'y a ni char ni chevaux, on porte la bière sur un brancard. Rymbaud fut porté sous un simple drap noir, qui cache toujours le corps qu'on porte, sa laideur, sa beauté, ce sourire qu'on achetait aux laquais et toutes les souillures enfin qui l'ornèrent.

Derrière, suivaient les hommes du pays, sur plusieurs rangs ; les premiers avaient la tête découverte parce qu'il faisait chaud, et les autres leurs chapeaux parce qu'ils n'avaient plus de cheveux, tous parlant à voix basse de leurs affaires, de leurs bestiaux, de leurs moissons, concluant des marchés, et le plus petit nombre était recueilli parce qu'il n'avait rien à dire.

Des deux côtés du cercueil, deux vieilles femmes en capuchon noir, avec des vêtements de deuil, portant sous un bras un gros pain et de l'autre main un cierge qui brûlait.

Devant marchait le prêtre, répétant les derniers adieux pour les morts, le sacristain en robe noire, avec sa latte de baleine aux bouts d'argent, chantant plus bas que son maître, puis quelques enfants de chœur avec leurs gros souliers, leurs bas rouges, leurs robes blanches, des cheveux blonds s'échappant de dessous leur calotte rouge.

Le plus grand d'eux portait un crucifix d'argent au bout d'un bâton teint en pourpre, et chantant à plaisir, tout fier de porter le bon Dieu et de marcher en tête. La pluie s'était apaisée et le convoi s'avancait doucement sur la poussière imbibée d'eau.

Quand une charrette passait, on baissait les chants, le paysan faisait prendre le débord à ses chevaux, se signait dévotement ; les enfants s'arrêtaient étonnés et regardaient, en se mettant à genoux, le cercueil et les cierges blancs qui brûlaient, les femmes noires, les couleurs de la fête ; ils écoutaient les chants monotones qui passaient dans la route et s'affaiblissaient avec le bruit des pas. Le cimetière était loin, le convoi marcha longtemps, on s'était arrêté deux fois, car les hommes sont si faibles qu'ils peuvent à peine mener un mort en terre.

Déjà on avait quitté la route, tourné à droite, passé derrière des haies fleuries, foulé bien des sentiers dans les champs ; on montait doucement, et les cailloux du chemin roulaient sous les pieds et allaient tomber dans le ravin et s'amortir sur les bruyères des fossés.

Tout à coup on entendit des cris, on s'arrêta, un homme courait ; c'était Hugues.

Réveillé quand on avait passé devant lui, il s'était levé. Comme il eut froid alors, il trembla, ses jambes fléchirent sous lui quand il voulut marcher, il sentait ses forces éteintes, sa vigueur partie avec le bouchon des bouteilles.

Ô raison humaine, immuable, constante, toi à qui on a dressé des temples, car c'était la seule divinité qu'on n'eût pas adorée, raison qui s'envole avec le bouchon d'une cruche, sans laisser même, comme celle-ci, une saveur au fond de toi-même !

L'ivresse l'avait tué ; pas de plaisir sans épuisement, ou a passé le feu sont les cendres.

Il s'était levé, il avait vu le cercueil, il entendit le nom de Rymbaud qu'un des assistants prononça. Il marcha sans savoir pourquoi, machinalement comme nous faisons tous, poursuivant vaguement des formes confuses qui allaient devant lui, sentant seulement qu'il sortait d'un rêve pénible, qu'il rêvait cependant encore et qu'il souffrait toujours.

Puis des sons vinrent sur ses lèvres, il balbutia et il appela avec des cris et des injures. Longtemps ainsi on vit cet homme presque nu, la chemise déchirée et rouge de vin, poursuivant le cercueil de ses sarcasmes cyniques, et chancelant dans la route où avaient passé tous ceux qui étaient morts.

On entendait la voix faible du prêtre qui montait la route pierreuse, et au fond, plus bas, le refrain joyeux d'une chanson de table et de débauche, un air sourd avec un rythme bruyant, des paroles indistinctes, mais d'un timbre qui faisait peur, comme si le mort se fût relevé et s'était mis à chanter aussi.

Après bien des efforts Hugues atteignit le convoi, il le fit arrêter encore une fois ; il avait fait fuir les enfants, s'était approché du cercueil.

— Dors-tu ? lui avait-il dit, dors-tu ?

Puis tâtant le drap noir qui le couvrait :

— Tu as froid, lâche ! et moi, continuait-il en frappant de grands coups sur sa poitrine nue, regarde !

Déjà il l'avait découvert et voulait casser le cercueil ; il répandait l'injure, le blasphème, le sarcasme sur le mort, sur le prêtre, sur la croix ; il crachait sur tout cela, il voulait se coucher à sa place dans la bière et continuer son sommeil.

Puis il tomba encore une fois épuisé et s'endormit sur une banque de gazon.

La procession se rallia et parvint enfin au cimetière entouré d'un mur blanc, avec ses jeunes cyprès verts et ses treillages noirs qui entouraient des pierres couvertes d'herbe.

On creusa la Fosse de Rymbaud près de celle du dernier maître d'école, et tandis qu'on l'y descendait et qu'on jetait sur lui l'eau bénite, on vit grimacer, à travers les barreaux noirs de la grille du cimetière, la figure de Hugues, pâle et effrayante sous ses cheveux rouges.

Il insultait encore le cadavre et accompagnait chaque pelletée de terre qu'on rejetait sur lui d'une injure et d'une Sombre raillerie ; il y resta longtemps et redescendit avec le cortège.

Rymbaud, comme vous voyez, fut enseveli en terre sainte, et Hugues, qui vécut encore de longues années, passa dès lors pour un démon et un Sorcier.

LES ARTS

ET LE COMMERCE .

La futilité des arts et l'utilité du commerce sont devenus mots banals dans le monde. Bien des gens n'estiment, en effet, une étoffe qu'à la longueur, une chose qu'à son poids et une couleur qu'à son éclat, et font plus de cas en eux-mêmes d'une balle de coton que de toutes les tragédies possibles ; ils diraient bien comme Malebranche en voyant Athalie : "Qu'est-ce que cela prouve ?"

Ceux-là ne voient, en effet, dans l'art qu'un passe-temps après dîner, une récréation qui égaie, un jeu qui délasse, et considèrent les spectacles comme la meilleure invention de la police pour pincer les masses en lieu sûr ; ces gens-là, sans doute, regardent la marchandise, la denrée, le bois, le cuivre comme les premières choses d'ici-bas, et quant à la pensée pure, libre, indépendante, quant au génie créateur et grandiose, quant à la poésie, à la morale, aux beaux-arts, chimères ! fantaisies ! futilité ! diront-ils. Honneur, selon eux, à la machine qui crie, au rouleau qui tourne, à la vapeur qui remue ! honneur à l'indigo, au savon, au sucre, au navire qui transporte tout cela, à celui qui l'exploite et calcule, s'enrichit, à celui qui achète et qui vend ! Mais Homère, mais Virgile, mais Shakespeare, qu'est-ce que cela prouve ? Corneille, Racine, qu'est-ce que cela prouve ? Se nourrit-on avec des vers, s'habille-t-on avec des peintures, mange-t-on des statues ? Raphaël et Michel-Ange, qu'est-ce que cela prouve ? Citez-moi des noms qui ont servi au genre humain, ceux de Pitt et de Jacquart, mais vos poètes, vos artistes, rêveurs vaniteux qui meurent de faim et demandent des statues !

Ah ! insensés ! est-ce que l'âme aussi n'a pas ses besoins et ses appétits ? et si vous ne sentez pas en vous-mêmes cet instinct, qui demande à se nourrir non pas de vos denrées, à se réchauffer non pas de vos forêts, à se vêtir non pas de vos étoffes soyeuses, mais à faire quelque chose de grand et à satisfaire cette âme qui a une soif immense de l'infini et à qui il faut des rêveries, des vers, des mélodies, des extases, qui a besoin de se réchauffer au feu du génie, et de s'entourer de mysticisme, de poésie, eh bien, si vous ne sentez pas cela en vous, de quel droit venez-vous me parler d'intelligence et de pensée ? il n'y a rien de commun entre vous et moi.

Pour un esprit qui bâtit et détruit, qui marchande et qui trompe, je vous l'accorde, mais pour une âme, je vous la refuse ; vous n'en avez point.

C'est vous qui ne voyez dans les lettres que la comédie qui vous fait rire malgré vous, comme les farces de la foire, dans un tableau que des couleurs broyées et étalées sur des toiles, et dans l'architecture quelque chose qui peut vous bâtir des douanes et des entrepôts.

Je vous abandonne de grand cœur le luxe, le commerce, l'industrie, les ports et les manufactures, les étoffes et les métaux, mais laissez-moi pleurer au théâtre, laissez-moi écouter Mozart, regarder Raphaël, contempler tout un jour les vagues de l'Océan ! laissez-moi mes rêveries, ma futilité, mes idées creuses ; votre bon sens m'assomme, votre positif me fait horreur.

Ce qu'on regarde maintenant comme d'une utilité fort secondaire passait autrefois pour de la plus urgente nécessité ; les arts semblaient si nobles à l'antiquité qu'ils en firent remonter l'origine aux Dieux, la poésie chez les Grecs était une hymne, les tragédies se jouaient dans les fêtes religieuses, et ce public de trente mille spectateurs écoutait à la fois ce qu'il y a de plus grand dans l'homme, la poésie, glorifiait ce qu'il y a de plus grand dans la nature, la divinité.

C'étaient alors les beaux temps de l'art, ceux où les prêtres de la pensée étaient rangés au même niveau que les prêtres de Dieu ; la poésie était une religion et le génie avait ses autels.

Quand la Grèce fut vaincue, n'imposa-t-elle pas son joug à Rome, sa maîtresse, par ses orateurs et ses artistes ? Caton prévoyait bien cette victoire des vaincus sur les vainqueurs, mais il ne put là prévenir, et lui-même, sur ses vieux jours, se mit à apprendre la langue de ses esclaves.

Athènes entra donc dans Rome, comme l'Étrurie déjà y était venue, avec ses mimes et ses bouffons. Cette ville, maîtresse du monde, était condamnée à redevenir successivement le germe de toutes les civilisations qu'elle avait combattues et qu'elle devait absorber. En effet, le conquérant peut détruire des ports, brûler des flottes, démolir les manufactures, détourner les fleuves, boucher les canaux et enchaîner les populations, mais l'esprit ? Où trouverez-vous des chaînes pour arrêter ce Protée qui parle avec les sons, qui se dresse avec la pierre, s'exprime et pense avec des mots ? Quelle sera la digue pour arrêter ce torrent ? Où sera la prison pour enfermer ce soleil ?

L'Italie n'a-t-elle pas été cent fois vaincue, et par tous les peuples : les Hérules, les Huns, les Goths, Les Franks, les Allemands, les Normands, les Espagnols, les Sarrazins ? Le monde entier est venu marcher sur elle et la fouler aux pieds ; mais comme chacun de ces peuples y est resté peu de temps ! comme ils mouraient vite sous ce soleil du Midi, sur cette terre libre et féconde que tant de grandes choses ont illustrée et qui montre avec plus d'orgueil les ruines de ses cités mortes que nos nations modernes ne montrent leurs cités vivantes ! Car sa poussière est grande, car ses cendres ont de la gloire ; tout ce qui a une âme de poète, de peintre, ne désire-t-il pas aller vers cette terre sainte de l'art, où les pierres ont de l'immortalité, où les débris ont de l'avenir encore ?

On cite toujours Carthage et Venise comme s'étant rendues puissantes par leur commerce ; ce furent, il est vrai, de grandes cités, et leurs richesses nous apparaissent maintenant à travers l'histoire comme quelque chose de colossal et de superbe. Mais ne sent-on pas dans de pareils gouvernements, en même temps qu'une vigueur et une force peu communes, quelque chose de monstrueux et de féroce ? Y a-t-il dans les temps modernes un trône plus triste, une gloire plus lugubre et plus sanglante que cette ville de Venise avec son peuple d'espions et de bourreaux, et le nom de Carthage n'est-il pas pour nous plein d'horreur et de cynisme ?

La Hollande aussi s'est élevée par son commerce, et ce petit peuple de marins et de commerçants, qui a d'abord eu à lutter contre l'Océan puis contre l'Europe entière, et qui s'est fait puissant en domptant les dangers du premier et en acquérant les richesses de la seconde, n'a-t-il pas maintenant une physionomie mesquine et rapetissée entre la noble France et la mystique Allemagne, ces deux pays qui ont le plus d'avenir ? Cette France, légère, folle, gaie, qui avait déjà conquis l'Europe par ses lettres avant que Napoléon la vainquît de son épée, et que reste-t-il de l'épée de notre empereur ? Chaque État en a pris un éclat, chaque roi a divisé la pourpre et l'a mise sur son trône. L'empereur et l'empire sont morts, mais nos poètes vivent, Corneille vit, Racine vit, Voltaire domine toujours, et sa langue, cette langue si pure et si limpide, telle qu'il l'a faite, on la parle dans toutes les cours. Ne sont-ce pas nos pièces traduites qu'on joue à Londres, à Vienne, à Berlin, à Saint-Pétersbourg ? Et cette Italie, patrie du Dante et de Virgile, si pauvre et si triste, ne nous paraît-elle pas plus grande et plus majestueuse que l'Angleterre, même avec ses flottes, ses Indes, ses millions d'hommes et son orgueil ? Et puis, que reste-t-il maintenant de Carthage ? Et de Venise ? où sont donc ses navires, ses trésors, sa puissance, ses richesses enviées du monde ?

Ne me demandez pas ce qui reste d'Athènes et de Rome, leur souvenir occupe le monde.

Certes, les relations de commerce furent un grand bien pour les nations modernes, et c'est un merveilleux fait de la Providence de faire servir l'intérêt des hommes à leur union ; l'industrie donne aux nations une source inépuisable de richesses que les sociétés anciennes, dans leur noble orgueil, ignorèrent ; chez nous les relations de commerce nouent les relations politiques, mais avant tout cela, il y a les rapports d'idées. N'a-t-il pas fallu deux siècles de combats entre l'Europe et l'Asie, entre le christianisme et l'islamisme, avant que l'Orient et l'Occident échangeassent leurs produits ? Il a fallu tout le XVI<sup>e</sup> et le XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle, la guerre de Trente ans et mille batailles, pour que le Nord et le Sud, les protestants et les catholiques s'alliassent ensemble. Et puis Shakespeare et Byron passent chez nous, tandis qu'on arrête les épingles et les étoffes d'Angleterre ; il n'y a point de contrôle pour le génie, parce qu'il est libre et immortel.

Les poètes sont comme ces statues qu'on retrouve dans les ruines ; on les oublie parfois longtemps, mais on les retrouve intactes au milieu d'une poussière qui n'a plus de nom ; tout a péri, eux seuls durent.

Et cependant n'entendez-vous pas dire : Ceci, c'est un poète, esprit creux ! cela, ce sont des vers, niaiseries ! Eh bien, ce poète et ces vers sont plus immortels que votre palais dont les pierres se disjoignent, que votre empire qui se démembre, que vos trésors qui se dispersent, et ce blasphème vient de ce que l'intérêt a tari le cœur, puis l'esprit. D'abord on a menti, maintenant bien des hommes croient qu'ils ont raison, et que l'industrie est plus utile que la poésie, que le corps vaut mieux que l'âme. Mais c'est l'âme qui fait agir le corps ; sans les arts, où serions-nous ? Allez ! Corneille et Racine ont plus fait pour la

France que Colbert et Louis XIV.

N'y a-t-il pas quelque chose d'ignoble et d'absurde à prétendre sans cesse qu'un ballot vaut mieux qu'un chef-d'œuvre, qu'un morceau de drap a plus de valeur qu'un poème ?

Que vous disent donc vos ballots et vos draps ? ils s'épuisent et s'usent ; Homère est-il vieux ?

Vos magasins regorgent de marchandises, mais faites-moi à la commande Tartufe, Othello, Cinna ?

La France, en un an, peut donner des milliards ; en un siècle, elle ne fait pas dix vers de Corneille.

Qu'on me mette donc face à face le duc de Northumberland, qui a 17 millions de rentes, ou l'homme qui possède le monopole de toutes les exploitations avec le baladin William Shakespeare. Que fera le premier ? Il me montrera ses palais de marbre, ses coupes d'or, ses tapis d'émeraude, ses terres, ses moissons, ses fabriques, ses valets qu'il paie, ses chiens, ses voitures ; que me fait cela ? Et le second me lit des vers, c'est-à-dire qu'il parle à mon âme, qu'il remue la corde de la lyre, en tire des mélodies, des extases ; c'est-à-dire qu'il me touche, qu'il me fait pleurer, qu'il me rend grand et fier, que je trépigne malgré moi, que l'enthousiasme m'enveloppe et que je suis heureux de l'avoir entendue, cette œuvre, que je l'envie, que je l'adore dans mon cœur, que je lui dresse des temples !

Je mangeais, il est vrai, les moissons du premier ; ses navires m'apportaient le sucre, ses bestiaux me donnaient la laine, ses fabriques le drap ; mais le poète ! Béni soit ton nom, fils du ciel ! car tu m'as fait goûter des joies que ne donnent ni le commerce, ni la puissance, ni les richesses, des joies que les rois ne peuvent donner ; tu as éveillé en moi toutes les voluptés de l'âme, tu m'as donné toutes les délices du cœur, tu m'as fait pleurer ; l'autre était mon tailleur et mon bottier ; toi, tu es mon ange et mon amour, merci, car tu es poète !

Ainsi donc rappelons-nous que l'esprit, dans l'histoire comme dans la vie, a toujours dirigé le corps.

Ce qu'il faut à l'enfant, n'est-ce pas les images, les tableaux, les rires, les contes de sa nourrice ? Ce n'est que plus tard, lorsque la chair parle en lui, que le corps souffre, qu'il devient gourmand, jaloux, sensuel, qu'il ruse et qu'il trompe ; son esprit jusqu'alors regardait et contemplait, mais maintenant il le fait servir, il tend des pièges et médite des larcins.

Il en est de même des peuples : ils sont d'abord poètes et prêtres, guerriers et législateurs, commerçants et industriels ; c'est à l'avenir qu'il appartient maintenant de féconder ces germes pour les civilisations futures.

Le commerce est donc le dispensateur des richesses, comme l'industrie est la lutte de l'homme contre la nature, la machine devenue intelligente et créatrice ; il y a là dedans la sève du bien-être matériel pour tout un peuple, c'est quelque chose. Nourrissez, habillez un homme, que son estomac soit chargé de vin, son corps couvert de diamants, il mourra triste, dégradé, avili, car il faut une pâture à l'âme, invisible comme Dieu, mais forte sur nous comme il l'est sur sa création. L'art est donc la manifestation la plus haute de l'âme, c'est là son œuvre.

Qu'on ne l'insulte pas, ce serait un blasphème !

SMARH .

L'archange Michel avait vaincu Satan lors de la venue du Christ.

Le Christ était venu sur la terre, comme une oasis dans le désert, comme une lueur dans l'ombre, et l'oasis s'était tarie, et la lueur n'était plus, et tout n'était que ténèbres.

L'humanité, qui, un moment, avait levé la tête vers le ciel, l'avait reportée sur la terre ; elle avait recommencé sa vieille vie, et les empires allaient toujours, avec leurs ruines qui tombent, troublant le silence du temps, dans le calme du néant et de l'éternité.

Les races s'étaient prises d'une lèpre à l'âme, tout s'était fait vil.

On riait, mais ce rire avait de l'angoisse, les hommes étaient faibles et méchants, le monde était fou, il bavait, il écumait, il courait comme un enfant dans les champs, il suait de fatigue, il allait se mourir.

Mais avant de rentrer dans le vide, il voulait vivre bien sa dernière minute ; il fallait finir l'orgie et tomber ensuite ivre, ignoble, désespéré, l'estomac plein, le cœur vide.

Satan n'avait plus qu'à donner un dernier coup, et cette roue du mal qui broyait les hommes depuis la création allait s'arrêter enfin, usée comme sa pâte.

Et voilà qu'une fois on entendit dans les airs comme un cri de triomphe, la bouche rouge de l'enfer semblait s'ouvrir et chanter ses victoires.

Le ciel en tressaillit. La terre demandai-elle un nouveau Messie ? tournait-elle, dans ses agonies, ses dernières espérances vers le Christ ? Non, la voix répéta plusieurs fois : "Michel à moi ! réponds ici !" Cette voix était triomphante, pleine de colère et de joie.

LA VOIX.

Ton pied me terrassa jadis, et je sentis ton talon me broyer la poitrine, car alors le Christ avait affermi cette terre où tu me foulais, elle était jeune et pure ; maintenant elle est vieille, usée, ton pied y entrerait dans les cendres.

Mon orgueil me dévora le cœur, mais le sang de ce cœur ulcéré je l'ai versé sur la terre, et cette rosée de malédiction a porté ses fruits.

Maintenant, pas une vertu que je n'aie sapée par le doute, pas une croyance que je n'aie terrassée par le rire, pas une idée usée qui ne soit un axiome, pas un fruit qui ne soit amer. La belle œuvre !

Oh ! Cette terre, terre d'amour et de bonheur, faite pour la félicité de l'homme, comme je l'ai maniée et pétrie, comme je l'ai battue, fatiguée, comme j'ai remué dans sa bouche le mors des douleurs !

Tout le sang que j'ai fait répandre (si la terre ne l'avait pas bu) ferait un Océan plus large que toutes les mers du Créateur. Toutes les malédictions sorties du cœur feraient un beau concert à la louange de Dieu.

Et puis je leur ai donné des chimères qu'ils n'avaient pas ; j'ai jeté en l'air des mots, ils ont pris cela pour des idées, ils ont couru, ils se sont évertués à les comprendre, ils ont creusé leurs petits cerveaux, ils ont voulu voir le fond de l'abîme sans fin, ils se sont approchés du bord et je les ai poussés dedans.

Merci, vous tous qui m'avez secondé ! Honneur à l'amitié qui s'appelle grandeur et qui m'a livré les poètes, les femmes, les rois ! Honneur à la colère ivre qui casse et qui tue ! Honneur à la jalousie, à la ruse, à la luxure qui s'appelle amour, à la chair qui s'appelle âme ! Honneur à cette belle chose qui tient un homme par ses organes et le fait pâmer d'aise, grandeur humaine !

Vive l'enfer ! À moi le monde jusqu'à sa dernière heure ! je l'ai élevé, j'ai été sa nourrice et sa mère, je l'ai bercé dans ses jeunes ans ; j'ai été sa compagne et son épouse. Comme il m'a aimé ! Comme il m'a pris !

Et moi, de quel ardent amour je lui ai imposé mes baisers de feu !

Je veillerai jusqu'à sa dernière heure sur ses jours chéris, je lui fermerai les yeux, je me pencherai sur sa bouche pour recueillir son dernier râle et pour voir si sa dernière pensée te bénira, Créateur.

Et maintenant, Archange, je t'ai vaincu à mon tour, chaque jour je t'insulte, chaque jour je prends l'empire du Christ, chaque jour des âmes entières se donnent à moi.

Et je sais un homme saint entre les saints, qui vit comme une relique ; cet homme-là, tu verras comme je vais le plonger dans le mal en peu d'heures, et puis tu me diras si la vertu est encore sur la terre, et si mon enfer n'a pas fondu depuis longtemps ce vieux glaçon qui la refroidissait.

Tu verras que de telles œuvres me rendraient bien digne de créer un monde et si elles ne me font pas l'égal de celui qui les enfante !

Le soir, en Orient, dans l'Asie Mineure, un vallon avec une cabane d'ermite ; non loin, une petite chapelle.

UN ERMITE.

Allez, mes chers enfants, rentrez chez vous avec la paix du seigneur ; l'homme de Dieu vient de vous bénir et de vous purifier, puisse sa bénédiction être éternelle et sa purification ne jamais s'effacer ! Allez, ne m'oubliez pas dans vos prières, je penserai à vous dans les miennes. (après avoir congédié ses fidèles.) je les aime tous, ces hommes, et mon cœur s'épanouit quand je leur parle de Dieu ; ces femmes me semblent des sœurs et des anges, et ces petits enfants, comme je les embrasse avec plaisir !

Oh ! Merci, mon Dieu, de m'avoir fait une âme douce comme la vôtre et capable d'aimer ! Heureux ceux qui aiment ! Quand j'ai jeûné longtemps, quand j'ai orné de fleurs cueillies sur les vallées ton autel, quand j'ai longtemps prié à genoux, longtemps regardé le ciel en pensant au paradis, que j'ai consolé ceux qui viennent à moi, il me semble que mon cœur est large, que cet amour est une force et qu'il créerait quelque chose.

Je suis content dans cette retraite, j'aime à voir la rivière serpenter au bas de la vallée, à voir l'oiseau étendre ses ailes et le soleil se coucher lentement avec ses teintes roses. Cette nuit sera belle, les étoiles sont de diamant, la lune resplendit sur l'azur ; j'admire cela avec amour, et quand je pense aux biens de l'autre vie, mon âme se fond en extases et en rêveries.

Merci, merci mon Dieu ! Je suis heureux, vous m'avez donné l'amour, que faut-il de plus ? Quand vous m'appellerez à vous, je mourrai en vous bénissant et je passerai de ce monde dans un autre meilleur encore. Bonheur, joie, amour, extases, tout est en vous ! (il s'agenouille et prie.)

SATAN, en costume de docteur.

Pardon, maître, de vous interrompre dans vos pieuses pensées.

SMARH.

L'homme de Dieu se doit à tous.

SATAN.

Maître, je suis un docteur grec, qui ai traversé les déserts pour venir recueillir les paroles de votre bouche et converser avec vous sur nos hautes destinées. Un homme comme vous en sait long ; nous sommes savants, nous autres, n'est-ce pas ?

SMARH.

Quelle est cette science ?

SATAN.

Plus grande que vous ne croyez. Cependant, frère, à force d'avoir réfléchi et creusé en nous-mêmes, nous sommes arrivés à résoudre d'étranges problèmes ; pour moi, rien n'est obscur. (à part.) tout est noir. Une femme mariée entre pour parler à Smarh.

YUK.

Que voulez-vous, douce mie ?

LA FEMME.

Consulter notre père en religion.

Yuk.

Il est maintenant occupé à réfléchir, à causer, à dissenter, à savantiser avec ce saint homme que vous voyez là, en habit de docteur, et on ne peut l'approcher.

LA FEMME.

Un docteur ! Est-ce un nonce du pape ? Ou quelque théologien de Grèce ?

Yuk.

C'est l'un et l'autre ; il est fort lié avec la papauté et les moines, auxquels il a conseillé d'excellents tours pour se divertir. Pour la théologie, il la connaît. Vous connaissez votre ménage, et, comme vous, il y jette de l'eau trouble et y fait pousser des cornes.

LA FEMME.

Que voulez-vous dire là ?

Yuk.

Que vous êtes bien gentille, ravissante, avec une gorgette à faire pâmer toute une classe d'écoliers.

LA FEMME.

Fi ! Les propos déshonnêtes ! Laissez-moi, je veux parler à l'ermite.
Yuk.

Ne craignez rien, vous dis-je, je suis un vieux sans vigueur dans les reins. Autrefois j'étais bon et j'aurais peuplé tout un désert, maintenant je me suis consacré au service de la religion et je suis en tout lieu mon saint maître, qui me laisse faire le gros de la besogne, comme d'allumer les cierges, d'apprêter le dîner, de confesser, de préparer les hosties, de nettoyer, de gratter, d'écurer ; je suis, en un mot, son serviteur indigne, vous voyez qu'il ne faut pas avoir peur de moi, je suis bien diable et gai en mes discours, mais sage comme une pierre en mes actions. Et vous, qui êtes-vous, la mère ? Vous m'avez l'air d'une bonne femme. Vous êtes mariée, j'en suis sûr, je vois ça à certaines choses, mariée à un brave homme. Oh ! Un bon, excellent homme, mais un peu benêt, entre nous soit dit ; je le connais, et la nuit de vos noces vous fûtes même obligée de lui apprendre certaines choses que les femmes ordinairement savent trop bien, mais qu'elles font semblant d'ignorer ; j'en ai connu qui se pâmaient ainsi de pudeur, et qui, tout en disant : “ que faites-vous là ? “, connaissaient le métier depuis l'âge de neuf ans. Mais vous, tout en étant mariée, vous êtes demeurée sage comme la vierge ; vous avez des enfants... charmants, qui ressemblent à leur mère.

LA FEMME.

Vous êtes donc du pays pour savoir cela ? Oui, je les aime bien, ces pauvres enfants !

Yuk.

Et vous êtes heureuse ainsi ?

LA FEMME.

Bien heureuse, mon seigneur, que me faut-il de plus ?

SMARH répond au docteur

À vous dire vrai, je n'ai jamais cherché le bonheur dans la science, je n'ai point travaillé, lu, compulsé.

SATAN.

Ni moi non plus, il y a là dedans plus de vanité que d'autre chose ; mais ce n'est point la science des livres dont je parle, maître, c'est celle du cœur et de la nature.

SMARH.

Sans doute ! Alors j'ai mûrement réfléchi, et bien des ans de ma vie.

SATAN.

J'avais donc raison de dire que vous étiez savant. Ce mot-là doit-il s'appliquer à un homme qui possède beaucoup de livres, comme à une bibliothèque, plutôt qu'à un autre qui est saint, qui possède Dieu, car la vraie science, c'est Dieu.

SMARH.

Oui, Dieu est l'unique objet de mon étude.

SATAN.

Vous êtes donc plus que savant, vous êtes un saint. Heureuse vie ! être ainsi au milieu de cette belle nature, prier Dieu tout le jour, être entouré du respect de la contrée, car à toute heure on vient vous consulter sur toute matière, sur la religion et sur la vie, sur la mort et l'éternité ; hommes, femmes, enfants, tout le monde accourt à vous ; vous êtes comme le bon ange du pays, pas une larme que vous n'essuyiez, pas une peine, pas un chagrin qui ne soit soulagé ; vous raccommodez les familles, vous mettez la paix dans les ménages, saint homme !

SMARH, humilié.

Oh ! Vous me flattez, frère !

SATAN.

Non, non, je me complais dans ce ravissant tableau. Vous dites aux femmes libertines : “ allez, rentrez dans vos ménages, aimez Dieu et vos enfants “ ; aux enfants, de pratiquer la religion ; aux valets : “ aimez, servez vos maîtres “ ; aux voleurs : “ soyez honnêtes gens “ ; quand un pauvre vient vous demander l'aumône, vous dites pour lui des prières.

SMARH, étonné.

Qu'ai-je donc ?

SATAN.

Et jamais, car vous êtes trop saint pour cela, en confessant dans votre cellule des jeunes femmes, quand vous êtes là seuls, enfermés tous les deux, et qu'on ne pourrait pas vous voir, jamais il ne vous est venu à l'idée de soulever un peu le voile qui cache des contours indécis et de retrousser doucement avec la main ce jupon qui cache un bas de jambe sur lequel la pensée monte toujours ? ... et quand vous dites à ces femmes d'aimer leurs maris, ne pensez-vous point qu'elles en aiment d'autres et que leurs maris vont forniquer avec les filles du démon ? Quand vous dites à ces hommes d'aimer leurs enfants, il ne vous vient pas à la pensée que ces enfants ne sont pas à eux, et que, lorsqu'ils voudront se coucher dans leur lit, la place sera prise et le trou bouché ?

SMARH.

Non, jamais ! Mais qui même vous a appris de telles choses ? Il me semble que ce n'est point ainsi que je pensais ; vous m'ouvrez un monde nouveau.

SATAN.

Vous ne pensez pas encore (car à quoi pensez-vous ?) que le voleur à qui vous conseillez l'honnêteté, perdrait son état en devenant honnête homme ; que les femmes perdues se sécheraient sur pied avec la vertu ; qu'un valet qui ne haïrait point son maître ne serait plus un valet, et que le maître qui ne battrait plus un valet ne serait plus son maître. Il est des choses plus surprenantes encore, car chaque jour vous dites sans scrupule : “ faites le bien, évitez le mal, aimez Dieu, nous avons une âme immortelle “ sans savoir ce que c'est que le bien et le mal, sans jamais avoir vu Dieu, sans savoir s'il existe, et vous en rapportant à la foi d'un vieux prêtre radoteur qui, comme vous, n'en savait rien ; pour l'âme, vous en êtes sûr, convaincu, persuadé, vous donneriez votre sang pour elle, et qui vous l'a démontrée ? Est-ce que vous sentez votre âme, comme votre estomac qui crie : j'ai faim, comme vos yeux qui, fatigués, demandent à être fermés, comme votre ventre qui vous chante : accouve-toi ou bien je vais faire quelque saleté ? Dis, ton âme a-t-elle faim, dort-elle, marche-t-elle, la sens-tu en toi ?

SMARH.

Questions embarrassantes ! Je n'y avais jamais songé.

SATAN.

Embarrassé pour si peu de chose ! Cela est clair comme le jour, car tu dépeins à tout le monde la nature de cette âme, ses besoins, ses douleurs, ses destinées, ses châtiments ; et tu te sens embarrassé pour si peu de choses ! Comment ? Mon ami, je te croyais plus d'intelligence pour un homme du seigneur. Heureux homme ! Tu es donc sans conscience, puisque tu enseignes et démontres des choses que tu ne sais pas.

YUK à la femme.

Heureuse avec un pareil homme ?

LA FEMME.

Mon dieu, oui, il le faut bien.

YUK.

Oui, il faut bien se résigner, n'est-ce pas ? Mais pour cela le cœur est lourd, tout en faisant le ménage on est triste, et de grosses larmes vous remplissent les yeux : “ si le sort avait voulu pourtant, je serais autre, mon mari serait beau, grand, joli cavalier, aux sourcils noirs et aux dents blanches, à la bouche fraîche ; pourquoi donc n'ai-je pas eu ce bonheur ? “, et l'on rêve longtemps, on s'ennuie, le mari revient, il sent le vin, l'ivrogne ! Quel homme ! Vous vous demandez si cela sera toujours ainsi, on se sent seule, isolée dans le monde, sans amour ; il fait bon en avoir pour vivre ! Jadis vous avez vu un beau jeune homme qui vous baisait la main, et souvent les soldats passent sous vos fenêtres ; aux bains vous avez aperçu (et vous avez rougi aussitôt) des hommes nus, la drôle de chose ! Et vous rêvez de tout cela, ma petite. Le soir, en vous couchant, vous vous trouvez bien malheureuse et vous vous endormez en pensant aux hommes des bains publics, à votre jeune amant, aux soldats, que sais-je ? Vous avez un bataillon de cuisses charnues dans la tête : “ si j'en avais seulement deux sur les miennes “, dites-vous, et vous faites les plus beaux rêves du monde.

LA FEMME.

Oh ! Le méchant homme !

YUK.

Longtemps vous vous êtes bornée aux rêveries, aux rêves, aux démangeaisons, mais l'aiguillon de la chair vous tient depuis longtemps, et chaque jour vous dites : “ quand cela arrivera-t-il ? Est-ce bientôt ? “

LA FEMME.

Hélas ! Il faut bien vous le dire ; mais je résiste, je combats, et je venais consulter même... que vous êtes simple ! Avez-vous besoin d'un ermite pour vous enseigner ce que vous avez à faire ? Si la vertu existe, chaque créature doit pouvoir d'elle-même la discerner et la mettre en pratique.

LA FEMME, à part.

Je n'y avais point songé. (haut.) oui, vous avez raison, je résisterai bien seule, d'ailleurs, je chasserai bien seule ces idées qui m'obsèdent.

YUK.

Vous obsèdent, dites-vous ? Au contraire, elles vous sont agréables. Qu'il est doux de penser à cela tout le jour, de se figurer ainsi quelque chose de beau qui vous accompagne et vous entoure de ses deux bras !

LA FEMME.

Chaque jour je me reproche ces pensées comme un crime, j'embrasse mes enfants pour me ramener à quelque chose de plus saint, mais hélas ! Je vois toujours passer devant moi cette image tendre, confuse, voilée.

YUK.

Et lorsque le soir vient, n'est-ce pas ? Et que les rayons du soleil meurent sur les dalles, que les fleurs d'oranger laissent passer leurs parfums, que les roses se referment, que tout s'endort, que la lune se lève dans ses nuages blancs, alors cette forme revient, elle entre, et cette bouche dit : " aime-moi ! Aime-moi ! Viens ! Si tu savais toutes les délices d'une nuit d'amour ! Si tu savais comme l'âme s'y élargit, comme au grand jour heureux, nos deux corps nus sur un tapis, nous embrassant, si tu savais comme je prendrai tes hanches, comme j'embrasserai tes seins, comme je reposerai ma tête sur ton cœur et comme nous serons heureux, comme nous nous étendrons dans nos voluptés ! " n'est-ce pas ? C'est à cela qu'on pense, c'est cela qu'on souhaite, c'est pour cela qu'on brûle de désir ?

LA FEMME.

Assez ! Vous me rappelez tout ce que je sens en traits de feu, ces pensées-là me font rougir, j'en ai honte.

YUK.

Pourquoi ? Ne sont-elles pas belles et douces et riantes comme les roses ? C'est une soif qu'on a, n'est-ce pas ? On a quelque chose au fond du cœur de vif et d'impétueux comme une force qui vous pousse ?

LA FEMME.

Je ne sais comment résister à cette force.

YUK.

Souvent, n'est-ce pas ? Vous aimez à vous regarder nue, vous vous trouvez jolie ? " quelle jolie cuisse ! Quel beau corps ! Quelle gorge ronde ! Et quel dommage ! “ dites-vous.

LA FEMME.

Oh ! Oui, souvent j’ai vu des yeux d’hommes s’arrêter longtemps sur les miens ; il y en a qui semblaient lancer des jets de flamme, d’autres laissaient découler une douceur amoureuse qui m’entraînait jusqu’au cœur.

SATAN, à Smarh.

C’est la science, mon maître, qui nous enseignera tout cela.

SMARH.

Quelle science ?

SATAN.

La science que je sais.

SMARH.

Laquelle ?

SATAN.

La science du monde.

SMARH.

Et vous me montreriez tout cela ? Qu’êtes-vous ? Un ange ou un démon ?

SATAN.

L’un et l’autre !

SMARH.

Et comment acquiert-on cette science ?

SATAN.

Tu le sauras ! Il disparaît.

YUK.

Eh bien, le premier de ces hommes que vous verrez, que ce soit un jeune homme de 16 ans environ, blond et rose, et qui rougira sous vos regards, prenez-le, cet enfant, amenez-le dans votre chambre, et là, dans la nuit, vous verrez comme il vous aimera et comme vous jouirez et vous vous repaîtrez de cet amour ; oui ce sera cette voix de vos songes et ce corps d’ange qui passait dans vos nuits.

LA FEMME, égarée.

Qu’il vienne donc ! Qu’il vienne ! J’aurai pour lui des baisers de feu et des voluptés sans nombre. J’étais bien folle, en effet, de vieillir sans amour. à moi, maintenant, les délices des nuits les plus ardentes ; que je m’abreuve de toutes mes passions, que je me rassasie de tous mes désirs ! De longues nuits et de longs jours passés dans les baisers !

Ah ! Toute ma vie passée à un soupir, tout ce que je rêvais à moi !
Oh ! Comme je vais être heureuse ! Je tremble cependant, et je sens que c'est là mon bonheur.

YUK.

Quel plaisir, n'est-ce pas ? De se créer ainsi, par la pensée, toutes ces jouissances désirées, et de se dire : “ si je l'avais là, si je le tenais dans mes bras, si je voyais ses yeux sur les miens et sa bouche sur mes lèvres ! “

LA FEMME.

Assez ! Assez ! J'ai quelque chose qui me brûle le cœur depuis que vous me parlez, j'ai du feu sous la poitrine, j'étouffe, je désire ardemment tout cela, je m'en vais, oh ! Oui, je m'en vais. (elle s'arrête et dit avec profondeur : ) oh ! Les belles choses ! Elle sort.

YUK, riant.

Voilà une commère qui, avant demain matin, se sera donnée à tous les gamins de la ville et à tous les valets de ferme.

La nuit ; la lune et les étoiles brillent ; silence des champs.

SMARH, seul. Il sort de sa cellule et marche.

Quelle est donc cette science qu'on m'a promise ? Où la trouve-ton ? De qui la recevrai-je ? Par quels chemins vient-elle et où mène-telle ? Et au terme de la route, où est-on ? Tout cela, hélas ! Est un chaos pour moi et je n'y vois rien que des ténèbres.

Où vais-je ? Je ne sais, mais j'ai un désir d'apprendre, d'aller, de voir. Tout ce que je sais me semble petit et mesquin ; des besoins inaccoutumés s'élèvent dans mon cœur. Si j'allais apprendre l'infini, si j'allais vous connaître, ô monde sur lequel je marche ! Si j'allais vous voir, ô Dieu que j'adore ! Qu'est-ce donc ? Ma pensée se perd dans cet abîme. Est-ce que je n'étais pas heureux à vivre ainsi saintement, à prier Dieu, à secourir les hommes ? Pourquoi me faut-il quelque chose de plus ? L'homme est donc fait pour apprendre, puisqu'il en a le désir ?

Je n'ai que faire de ce que tous les hommes savent, je méprise leurs livres, témoignage de leurs erreurs. C'est une science divine qu'il me faut, quelque chose qui m'élève au-dessus des hommes et me rapproche de Dieu.

Oh ! Mon cœur se gonfle, mon âme s'ouvre, ma tête se perd ; je sens que je vais changer ; je vais peut-être mourir, c'est peut-être là le commencement d'éternité bienheureuse promise aux saints.

Un siècle s'est écoulé depuis que je pense, et déjà, depuis que cet inconnu m'a parlé, je me sens plus grand ; mon âme s'élargit peu à peu, comme l'horizon quand on marche, je sens que la création entière peut y entrer.

Autrefois je dormais de longues nuits pleines de sommeil et de repos, je me livrais aux songes vagues et dorés ; souvent je m'endormais en rêvant aux extases célestes, les saints venaient m'encourager à continuer ma vie et me montraient de loin l'avenir bienheureux et le chemin par lequel on y monte ; mais à peine ai-je fermé l'œil que des ardeurs m'ont tourmenté, je me suis levé et je suis venu. Autrefois l'air des nuits me faisait du bien, je me plaisais à cette molle langueur des sens qu'il procure, je me plongeais dans l'harmonie dont elle se compose, j'écoutais avec ravissement le bruit des feuilles des arbres que le vent agitait, l'eau qui coulait dans les vallées, j'aimais la mousse des bois que les rayons de la lune argentaient ; ma tête se levait avec amour vers ce ciel si bleu, avec ses étoiles aux mille clartés, et je me disais que l'éternité devait être aussi quelque chose de suave, de doux, de silencieux et d'immense, et tout cela sans vallée, sans arbre, sans feuilles, quelque chose de plus beau même que cet infini où je perdais mon regard ; aussi loin que la pensée de l'homme pouvait aller j'y perdais la mienne, et je sentais bien que cette harmonie du ciel et de la terre était faite pour l'âme.

Mais, pourtant, cette nuit est aussi belle que toutes les autres, ces fleurs sont aussi fraîches, l'azur du ciel est aussi bleu, les étoiles sont bien d'argent ; c'est bien cette lune dont mon regard rencontrait les rayons se jouant sur les fleurs. Pourquoi mon âme ne s'ouvre-t-elle plus au parfum de toutes ces choses ? Je suis pris de pitié pour tout cela, j'ai pour elles une envie jalouse.

Me voilà monté à ce je ne sais quel point pour me lancer dans l'infini. Oh ! Qui viendra me retirer de cette angoisse et me dire ce que je ferai dans une heure, où je serai, ce que j'aurai appris !

Où est donc l'être inconnu qui m'a bouleversé l'âme ?

Satan paraît.

SATAN, SMARH.

SATAN.

Me voilà ! J'avais promis de revenir, et je reviens.

SMARH.

Pourquoi faire ?

SATAN.

Pour vous, mon maître !

SMARH.

Pour moi ! Et que voulez-vous faire de moi ?

SATAN.

Ne vouliez-vous pas connaître la science ?

SMARH.

Quelle science ?

SATAN.

Mais il n'y en a qu'une, c'est la science, la vraie science.

SMARH.

Comment l'appelle-t-on donc ?

SATAN.

C'est la science.

SMARH.

Je ne la connais pas ; où la trouve-t-on ?

SATAN.

Dans l'infini.

SMARH.

L'infini, c'est donc elle ?

SATAN.

Et celui qui le connaît sait tout.

SMARH.

Mais il n'y a que Dieu.

SATAN.

Dieu ? Qu'est-ce ?

SMARH.

Dieu, c'est Dieu.

SATAN.

Non, Dieu, c'est cet infini, c'est cette science.

SMARH.

Dieu, c'est donc tout ?

SATAN.

Arrête, tu déraisonnes, ton esprit encore borné ne peut monter plus haut ; tu es comme les autres hommes, le monde est plus haut que ton intelligence ; c'est ton front trop élevé pour ton bras d'enfant ; tu te tuerais en voulant l'atteindre, il te faut quelqu'un qui te monte à la hauteur de toutes ces choses, ce sera moi.

SMARH.

Et que m'enseigneras-tu donc ?

SATAN.

Tout !

SMARH.

Viens donc !

SATAN.

Dans les airs. Satan et Smarh planent dans l'infini.

SMARH.

Depuis longtemps nous montons, ma tête tourne, il me semble que je vais tomber.

SATAN.

Tu as donc peur ?

SMARH.

Aucun homme n'arriva jamais si haut ; mon corps n'en peut plus, le vertige me prend, soutiens-moi.

SATAN.

Rapproche-toi plus près de moi, viens, cramponne-toi à mes pieds, si tu as peur.

SMARH.

étrange spectacle ! Voilà le globe qui est là, devant moi, et je l'embrasse d'un coup d'œil ; la terre me p27 semble entourée d'une auréole bleue et les étoiles fixées sur un fond noir.

SATAN.

Avais-tu donc rêvé quelquefois quelque chose d'aussi vaste ?

SMARH.

Oh ! Non, je ne croyais pas l'infini si grand !

SATAN.

Et tu prétendais cependant l'embrasser dans ta pensée, car chaque jour tu disais : Dieu ! éternité ! Et tu te perdais dans la grandeur de l'un, dans l'immensité de l'autre.

SMARH.

Cela est vrai. Une telle vue surpasse les bornes de l'âme, il faudrait être un dieu pour se le figurer. Comme cela est grand ! Comme les océans noirs paraissent petits ! (ils montent toujours.) eh quoi ? Nous montons toujours ? Mais où allons-nous ?

SATAN.

Pourquoi cette question d'enfant ? As-tu besoin de savoir où tu vas pour aller ? Est-ce que tu agis pour une cause quelconque ? Pourquoi le monde marche-t-il, lui ? Pourquoi vois-tu ce petit globe tourner toujours sur lui-même, si vite, avec ses habitants étourdis ?

SMARH.

Comme la création est vaste ! Je vois les planètes monter, et les étoiles courir, emportées, avec leurs feux. Quelle est donc la main qui les pousse ? La voûte s'élargit à mesure que je monte avec elle, les mondes roulent autour de moi, je suis donc le centre de cette création qui s'agite ! p28

Oh ! Comme mon cœur est large ! Je me sens supérieur à ce misérable monde perdu à des distances incommensurables sous mes pieds ; les planètes jouent autour de moi, les comètes passent en lançant leur chevelure de feux, et dans des siècles elles reviendront en courant toujours comme des cavales dans le champ de l'espace. Comme je me berce dans cette immensité ! Oui, cela est bien fait pour moi, l'infini m'entoure de toutes parts, je le dévore à mon aise. Ils montent toujours.

SATAN.

Es-tu content de mes promesses ?

SMARH.

Elles surpassent les bornes de tout ; ma poitrine étouffe, l'air siffle autour de moi et m'étourdit, je suis perdu, je roule.

SATAN.

Tu te plains donc ?

SMARH.

Je ne sais si c'est de la douleur ou de la joie.

SATAN.

Regarde donc comme tout est beau ! Mais pourquoi cela est-il fait ?

SMARH.

N'est-ce pas pour moi ?

SATAN.

Pour toi seul, n'est-ce pas ?

SMARH.

L'éternité, l'infini, c'est donc tout cela ?

SATAN.

Monte encore. p29

SMARH.

ô Dieu ! Et où m'arrêterai-je ?

SATAN.

Jamais ! Monte toujours !

SMARH.

Grâce !

SATAN.

Grâce ? Et pourquoi ? N'es-tu pas le roi de cette création ? Cette éternité qui t'entoure a été créée pour ton âme.

SMARH.

Mais cette création roule sur moi et m'écrase, cette éternité m'étourdit et me tue.

SATAN.

Qui t'a donc troublé ainsi ?

SMARH.

Ma tête est faible.

SATAN.

Vraiment ? Grandeur de l'homme ! Si je voulais pourtant, je la lâcherais, et tu tomberais, et ton corps serait dissous avant de s'être brisé au coin de quelque monde, pauvre carcasse humaine !

SMARH.

Quand donc, maître, nous arrêterons-nous ? Je vais mourir, cette immensité me fatigue. Tu es donc déjà las de l'éternité, toi ? Si tu étais comme moi, tu verrais ! p30

SMARH.

Oh ! L'éternité ! C'est donc cela, c'est donc le bonheur promis ?

SATAN.

Grand bonheur, n'est-ce pas ? De durer toujours ! Et c'est là ce que tu souhaites ! Tu veux l'éternité, toi, et tu es déjà las de tout cela ! Tu veux l'éternité, et la vie te fatigue ? Est-ce que cent fois déjà tu n'as pas souhaité d'être néant, de rester tranquille dans le vide, d'être même quelque chose de moins que la poussière d'un tombeau, car le souffle d'un enfant peut la remuer. Orgueil de la nature, trop fatiguée de vivre quelques minutes, et qui voudrait durer toujours !

C'est pour nous, vois-tu, que l'éternité est faite, pour nous autres, pour ces planètes qui brillent, pour ces étoiles d'or, pour cette lune d'argent, pour tout cela qui remue, qui gémit, qui roule, pour moi qui mange et qui dévore toujours.

Oh ! Si tu étais assez grand pour tout voir, tu verrais que tout n'est qu'une larme ! Si tu pouvais tout entendre, tu n'entendrais qu'un seul cri de douleur : c'est la voix de la création qui bénit son dieu.

SMARH.

Qui donc a fait cela ? Est-ce lui qui mourait aux Oliviers ? Est-ce lui qui parlait aux armées d'Israël dans le désert, quand, le soir, les vents amenaient les bruits vagues de l'horizon avec les paroles du seigneur ? Quel est celui dont tout cela est sorti ? Et tous ces mondes sont-ils partis dans les vents, comme le sable de la mer quand on ouvre les mains ? Est-ce cette voix qui gronde dans la tempête, qui chante dans les feuilles ? Sont-ce des rayons de soleil qui dorent les nuages ? Et où est-il ? Dans quel coin de l'espace ?

SATAN.

Et si tu le voyais, que dirais-tu ? Qu'as-tu besoin p31 de le connaître ? Quelle est cette démence qui te ronge ?

Il faut donc que tu connaisses tout ! Et si tu arrivais à ne voir dans l'infini qu'un vaste néant ? Va, laisse celui qui a fait tous les grains de poussière brillants, il a maintenant pitié de son œuvre, il s'inquiète peu si le vermisseau mange et s'il meurt ; il est là-haut, bien haut sur nous tous, il s'étend sur l'immensité, il la couvre de sa robe comme un linceul de mort, et il regarde les mondes rouler dans le vide ; il est seul dans cette immobile éternité ; il était grand, il a créé, et sa création est le malheur.

SMARH.

Eh quoi ! Est-ce qu'il ne s'inquiète pas de sa création ? Est-ce qu'il ne travaille pas cette éternité ?

SATAN.

Oui, pour la troubler, comme un pied de géant qui se remue dans le sable.

SMARH.

Je croyais que sa volonté faisait marcher tout cela, et que les mondes allaient à sa parole, et que les astres s'abaissaient devant son regard.

SATAN.

Non ! Cela est, vois-tu, cela existe par des lois qui furent posées irrévocablement le jour maudit où tout fut créé, et le destin pèse et manie l'éternité, comme il manie et ploie l'existence des hommes ; lui-même ne saurait se soustraire à la fatalité de son œuvre.

SMARH.

Cependant, il fut un temps où tout cela n'était pas ! Qu'était-ce donc alors ?

SATAN.

Le vide ! p32

SMARH.

Le vide était donc plus vide encore ! Cet infini, dans lequel nous roulons, était plus large encore ! Cela était plus grand et plus beau, n'est-ce pas ?

SATAN.

Bien plus beau, car nous dormions, nous tous, dans la mort d'où nous devons naître.

SMARH.

Et ses bornes étaient encore plus loin ?

SATAN.

Je t'ai déjà dit qu'il n'y avait point de bornes à cela.

SMARH.

Mais le chaos qui existait, qui l'avait fait ? Il avait fallu un dieu pour le faire.

SATAN.

Il s'était fait de lui-même.

SMARH.

Quand donc ? Oh ! L'abîme ! Oh ! L'abîme ! J'aurais bien voulu vivre alors ! Comme j'aurais alors nagé là dedans, comme mon âme se serait déployée dans cette immense nuit éternelle !

SATAN.

Hélas ! Depuis, la machine est faite, elle roule, elle broie, elle tourne toujours.

SMARH.

Ne se lassera-t-elle jamais ?

SATAN.

Je l'espère, car l'éternité... p33

SMARH.

Oh ! Oui, ce mot-là est effrayant, n'est-ce pas ? Et il ferait trembler, quand même il ne serait que du vide.

SATAN.

Oh ! Oui, tous ces mondes se laisseront de tourner et de briller, et ils tomberont en poussière, usés comme des ossements ; oui, ce soleil, un soir, s'éteindra dans la nuit du néant ; oh ! Oui, alors les larmes seront taries, tout sera vieux, tout croulera, et lui peut-être...

SMARH.

Lui, l'être suprême, mourir comme son œuvre ?

SATAN.

Pourquoi non ?

SMARH.

Eh quoi ! L'éternité aurait une borne ?

SATAN.

Oh ! Quelle suprême joie de se dire que lui aussi périra et qu'un jour cette essence du mal, le souffle de vie et de mort, sera passé comme les autres ! De penser que cette voix qui fait trembler se taira ! Que cette lumière qui éblouit ne sera plus ! Oh ! Tu roulerais donc aussi comme nous, toi, comme de la poussière, et une parcelle de ma cendre rencontrerait la tienne à cette place où fument les débris de ton œuvre ! Tu serais notre égal dans le néant, toi qui nous en fais sortir ! Esprit puissant, né pour créer et pour tuer, pour faire naître, pour anéantir, tu serais anéanti aussi ! Quoi ! Ce nom qui agitait les océans, le monde, les astres, l'infini, néant aussi ! ô béatitude de la mort, quand viendras-tu donc ? ô délices de la poussière et du sépulcre, que je vous envie ! p34

SMARH.

Lui aussi est soumis à quelque chose ? Je croyais qu'il était maître.

SATAN.

Non, il n'est pas maître, car je le maudis tout à mon aise ; non, il n'est pas maître, car il ne pourrait se détruire.

SMARH.

Et nous sommes donc libres.

SATAN.

Tu penses que la liberté est pour nous ? Qu'est-ce que cette liberté ?
SMARH.

Oui, nous sommes libres, n'est-ce pas ? Car sur la terre je me sentais enchaîné à mille chaînes, retenu par mille entraves, tout m'arrêtait ; et tandis que mon esprit volait jusqu'à ces régions, mon corps ne pouvait s'élever à un pouce de cette terre que je foulais. Mais maintenant je me sens plus grand, plus libre ; je me sens respirer plus à l'aise, mon esprit s'ouvre à tous les mystères, nous voilà sur les limites de la création, je vais les franchir peut-être. Quelle grandeur autour de nous ! Tout cela brille et nous éclaire. Est-ce que nous ne pouvons errer à loisir dans cet infini ? Est-ce que nous ne marchons pas à plaisir sur cette éternité qui contient tout le passé et l'avenir, les germes et les débris ? Vois donc comme ces nuages se déploient mollement sous nos pieds, comme leurs replis sont moelleux et larges ! Vois comme ce firmament est bleu et profond, comme ces étoiles roulent et brillent, comme la lune est blanche et comme le soleil a des gerbes d'or sous nos pieds ! Et il me semble que cela est fait pour p35 moi, car pourquoi donc seraient-ils alors ? La création doit avoir un autre but que sa vie même.

SATAN.

Tu es libre ? Tu es grand ? Vraiment non, la liberté n'est ni pour ces astres qui roulent dans le sentier tracé dans l'espace et qu'ils gravissent chaque jour, ni pour toi qui es né et qui mourras, ni pour moi qui suis né un jour et qui ne mourrai jamais, peut-être. Quelle grandeur d'errer ainsi dans ce vide, d'être de la poussière au vent, du néant dans du néant, un homme dans l'infini !

SMARH.

Mais notre course s'avance, combien de choses nous avons déjà passées ! Si je redescends sur le monde, il me sera trop étroit, je serai gêné dans son atmosphère d'insectes, moi qui vis dans l'infini. Mais où allons-nous ? Qui nous emporte toujours vers là-haut sans que rien n'apparaisse ?

SATAN.

Eh bien, tu irais toujours ainsi des siècles, des éternités, et toujours ce vide s'élargirait devant toi. Oui, le néant est plus grand que l'esprit de l'homme, que la création tout entière ; il l'entoure de toutes parts, il le dévore, il s'avance devant lui ; le néant a l'infini, l'homme n'a que la vie d'un jour.

SMARH.

Hélas ! Tout n'est donc qu'abîme sans fin !

SATAN.

Et des dieux y perdraient leur existence à le sonder.

SMARH.

Jamais, c'est donc le seul mot qui soit vrai ? p36

SATAN.

Oui, le seul qui existe, jeté comme un défi éternel à la face de tout ce qui a vie ; oui, tu vois ces gouffres ouverts sous tes pieds, cette immensité pendue sous nous, celle qui nous entoure, celle qui s'élargit sur nos têtes, eh bien, entre dans ton cœur et tu y verras des abîmes plus profonds encore, des gouffres plus terribles.

SMARH.

Comment ? Dans mon propre cœur à moi ? Je n'y avais jamais songé. Je sais qu'il est des hommes que leur pensée a effrayés et qui ont eu peur d'eux-mêmes, comme j'ai peur de ces incommensurables précipices.

SATAN.

Oui, sonde ta pensée, chaque pensée te montrera des horizons qu'elle ne pourra atteindre, des hauteurs où elle ne pourra monter, et, plus que tout cela, des gouffres dont tu auras peur et que tu voudrais combler. Tu fuiras, mais en vain ; à chaque instant tu te sentiras le pied glisser et tu rouleras dans ton âme, brisé !

SMARH.

Hélas ! L'âme de l'homme et la nature de Dieu sont donc également obscures ?

SATAN.

Incomplètes et mauvaises l'une et l'autre.

SMARH.

Je les croyais toutes deux grandes et vraies.

SATAN.

Tu pensais donc que tu étais bien sur la terre ? p37

SMARH.

Oui !

SATAN.

En effet, tu étais un saint.

SMARH.

Qui plaçait tout en Dieu.

SATAN.

Ah ! Cela est vrai, je me rappelle ! Tu étais donc heureux, toi, tu jouissais d'une béatitude pure et éternelle, tandis que, tout autour de toi, tout ce qui vivait se tordait dans une angoisse infinie, éternelle. Quoi ! Tu n'avais jamais senti tout ce qu'il y avait de faux dans la vie, d'étroit, de mesquin, de manqué dans l'existence ; la nature te paraissait belle avec ses rides et ses blessures, ses mensonges ; le monde te semblait plein d'harmonie, de vérité, de grâce, lui, avec ses cris, son sang qui coule, sa bave de fou, ses entrailles pourries ; tout cela était grand, ce monceau de cendres ! Ce mensonge était vrai ! Cette dérision te semblait bonne !

SMARH.

Mais depuis que vous êtes avec moi, tout est changé, maître, je ne sais combien de choses sont sorties de moi, combien de choses y sont entrées ; il me semble, depuis, que l'infini s'est élargi, mais est devenu plus obscur.

SATAN.

C'est cela, vois-tu ; à mesure qu'on avance, l'horizon s'agrandit ; on marche, on avance, mais le désert court devant vous, le gouffre s'élargit. La vérité est une ombre, l'homme tend les bras pour la saisir, elle le fuit, il court toujours. p38

SMARH.

Je croyais l'avoir en entier, je croyais qu'il n'y avait que Dieu.

SATAN.

Tu n'avais donc jamais entendu parler du diable ?

SMARH.

Oui, par les pécheurs qui venaient vers moi, mais il s'était toujours écarté de mon cœur, tant j'étais pur.

SATAN.

Pur ? Mais il n'y a rien que le souffle du démon ne puisse flétrir. Tu ne savais pas qu'il remue tout dans ses mains armées de griffes, et que tout ce qu'il remuait il le déchirait, les âmes et les corps, l'infini et la terre ? Partout est la puissance du mal, elle s'étend sur tout cela, et l'homme s'y jette, avide de pâture et d'erreurs.

SMARH.

Le péché seul est pouvoir du démon, c'est lui qui l'enfante ; mais le bien ?

SATAN.

Où est-il ? Dis-moi donc quelque chose qui soit bien ? Pourquoi cela est bien ? Qui donc a établi les lois du bien et du mal ? Montre-moi dans la création quelque chose fait pour ton bonheur, quelque chose de vrai, de saint, d'heureux ? Dis-moi, n'as-tu jamais senti ta volonté s'arrêter à de certaines limites et ne pouvoir les franchir, tes larmes couler, la tristesse inonder ton âme, le mystère apparaître et t'envelopper ? N'as-tu jamais contemplé le regard creux d'une tête de mort et tout ce qu'il y avait d'inculte et de néant dans ces os vides ? Pourquoi donc les fleurs que tu portes à tes narines se flétrissent-elles le soir ? Pourquoi, quand p39 tu prends un serpent, il te pique ? Pourquoi, quand tu aimes un homme, te trahit-il ? Pourquoi, quand tu veux marcher, la terre s'abaisse-t-elle sous ton pied ? Pourquoi, quand tu veux marcher sur les flots, s'abaissent-ils sous toi pour t'engloutir ? Pourquoi faut-il te vêtir, te nourrir toi-même, avoir besoin de quelque chose, dormir, marcher, manger ? Pourquoi sens-tu le poignard entrer dans tes chairs ? Pourquoi tout ce qui est autour de toi s'est-il conjuré pour te faire souffrir ? Pourquoi vis-tu enfin pour mourir ?

SMARH.

Oui, le repos est dans la tombe.

SATAN.

Non ! Je trouble la paix des tombes, moi ! Non ! La mort donne la vie, et la création serait de la corruption, le fumier fertilise et le borbier féconde.

SMARH.

N'est-ce pas la perpétuité de l'existence, l'immortalité des choses ?

SATAN.

Oui, l'immortalité des vers de la tombe et des pourritures. Il faut que tout vive, que tout renaisse et souffre encore.

SMARH.

Pourquoi, comme tu le dis, cela est-il manqué ? Pourquoi le souffle du mal féconde-t-il la terre ? Pourquoi n'est-ce pas comme je le pensais ? Pourquoi es-tu venu me troubler dans ma béatitude, me réveiller de ce songe ? Placé sur cet infini, je sens mon âme défaillir de tristesse et d'amertume.

SATAN.

C'est le mystère du mensonge et de la vie ; le p40 vrai n'est que le vautour que tu as en toi et qui te ronge.

SMARH.

Dieu est donc méchant ? Moi qui le bénissais !

SATAN.

Tu ne peux savoir si son œuvre est bonne ou mauvaise, car tu n'as pas vécu, tu es à peine un enfant sorti de ses langes et de sa crédulité. Oui, celui qui a fait tout cela est peut-être le démon de quelque enfer perdu, plus grand que celui qui hurle maintenant, et la création elle-même n'est peut-être qu'un vaste enfer dont il est le dieu, et où tout est puni de vivre.

SMARH.

Oh ! Mon Dieu ! Mon Dieu ! J'aimais à croire, à rêver à ton paradis, aux joies promises ; j'aimais à te prier, j'aimais à t'aimer ; cette foi me remplissait l'âme, et maintenant j'ai l'âme vide, plus vide et plus déserte que les gouffres perdus dans l'immensité qui m'enveloppe. J'aimais à voir les roses où ta rosée déposait des larmes qui tombaient avec les parfums qu'elles contiennent, j'aimais à les cueillir, à me plonger dans le nuage d'encens... à répandre des fleurs sur ton autel.

SATAN.

Va, les fleurs les plus belles sont celles qui croissent sur les tombes ; elles rendent hommage à la majesté du néant, elles parfument les charognes sous les couvercles de leurs pierres.

SMARH.

Je pensais que tout était grand, insensé que j'étais ! Sot que j'étais dans mon cœur ! Ce bonheur était celui de la brute. Le bonheur est donc pour l'ignorance ; maintenant que je sais, je vois qu'il n'y a rien, et p41 cependant j'ai peur. C'est donc le mal qui a créé toutes ces beautés, c'est l'enfer qui a fait toutes ces choses ? Oh ! Non, non, j'aime encore, j'ai en moi l'amour qui gonfle ma poitrine. Cependant celui qui me conduit jusqu'ici est fort et vrai, sans cela l'aurait-il pu ?

SATAN.

Oui, celui qui te mène ici, celui qui se joue avec toi et qui fait trembler le monde, est fort car il brave tout, et vrai car il souffre. Ils montent encore.

SMARH.

Oh ! Grâce ! Grâce ! Assez ! Assez ! Je tremble, j'ai peur, il me semble que cette voûte va s'écrouler sur moi, que l'infini va me manger, que je vais m'anéantir aussitôt !

SATAN.

Et tout à l'heure tu te sentais grand ! à la stupeur première avait succédé l'enivrement de la science, tu te regardais déjà comme un dieu pour être monté si haut dans l'infini, et tu as peur de ce qui faisait ta gloire !

SMARH.

Plus on avance dans l'infini, plus on avance dans la terreur.

SATAN.

Quelle terreur peut assaillir la créature de Dieu ? Tu étais si grand, si haut, si heureux ! Et maintenant tu es si bas, si tremblant, si petit ! C'est donc cela, un homme ? De la grandeur et de la petitesse, de l'insolence et de la bêtise ! Orgueil et néant, c'est là ton existence.

SMARH.

Non ! Non ! Je ne sais rien, et c'est cela qui me fait mal ; je ne sais rien, l'angoisse me ronge, et tu sais, toi ! Mais pourquoi donc ces mondes ? ... pourquoi p42 tout ? ... pourquoi suis-je là ? ... oh ! Il y a deux infinis qui me perdent : l'un dans mon âme, il me ronge ; l'autre autour de moi, il va m'écraser.

SATAN.

Ah ! Ton ignorance te pèse et les ténèbres te font horreur ? Tu l'as voulu !

SMARH.

Qu'ai-je voulu ?

SATAN.

La science. Eh bien, la science, c'est le doute, c'est le néant, c'est le mensonge, c'est la vanité.

SMARH.

Mieux vaudrait le néant !

SATAN.

Il existe, le néant, car la science n'est pas. Veux-tu monter encore ?

Veux-tu avancer toujours ? Oh ! L'horrible mystère de tout cela, si tu le connaissais ! Ta peau deviendrait froide, et tes cheveux se dresseraient, et tu mourrais, épouvanté de tes pensées.

SMARH.

Oh ! Non, non, j'ai peur ! Cet infini me mange, me dévore ; je brûle, je tremble de m'y perdre, de rouler comme ces planches emportées par les vents et de brûler comme elles par des feux qui éclairent ; assez ! Grâce !

SATAN.

Cependant je t'aurais poussé bien loin dans le sombre infini.

SMARH.

Mais toujours dans le néant. Non, non, fais-moi redescendre sur ma terre, rends-moi ma cellule, ma p43 croix de bois, rends-moi ma vallée pleine de fleurs, rends-moi la paix, l'ignorance. (ils descendent.) merci ! Ou plutôt fais-moi connaître le monde, mène-moi dans la vie ; tu m'as montré Dieu, montre-moi les hommes.

SATAN.

Oui, viens, suis-moi, je te montrerai le monde et tu reculeras peut-être aussi épouvanté ; viens, viens, je vais te montrer l'enfer de la vie ; tu vois les tortures, les larmes, les cris, viens, je vais déployer le linceul, en secouer la poussière, je vais étendre la nappe de l'orgie pour le festin ; viens à moi, créature de Dieu, viens dans les bras du démon, qui te berce et t'endort. La mer, des prairies, de hautes falaises ; temps calme ; le soleil se couche sous les flots.

SMARH.

Me voilà enfin sur la terre ! L'homme naturellement s'y sent bien, il y est né.

SATAN.

Pourquoi la maudit-il toujours ?

SMARH.

Moi, je suis fait pour y vivre ; comme cette nature est belle !

SATAN.

Et comme tu la comprends bien, n'est-ce pas ? Comme ses mystères te sont dévoilés ?

SMARH.

Tu as beau m'entourer de tes subterfuges et de tes sophismes, je ne suis plus ici dans les régions du ciel, où tous ces mondes errants m'effrayaient ; p44 non, j'étais fait pour celui-ci, c'est sur lui qu'il faut vivre.

SATAN.

Et mourir aussi, n'est-ce pas ? Il y a longtemps que tu y respires, que tu y souffres, créature humaine ; explique-moi donc le mystère d'un de ces grains de sable que tu foules à tes pieds ou celui d'une goutte d'eau de l'océan ?

SMARH.

Mais regarde toi-même comme la mer est douce et comme les rayons du soleil lui donnent des teintes roses sous ces ondes vertes ! Sens-tu le parfum de la vague qui mouille le sable, comme les flots sont longs et forts, comme ils roulent, comme ils s'étendent ? Vois donc cette bande d'écume qui festonne le rivage avec des coquilles et des herbes ; regarde comme cela est loin et large, quelle beauté ! Nieras-tu que mon âme ne s'ouvre pas à un pareil spectacle, quand j'entends cette mer qui roule et meurt à mes pieds, quand je vois cette immensité que j'embrasse de l'œil ?

SATAN.

Aussi loin que ton œil peut voir, oui ; tu vois l'infini, jusqu'à l'endroit où ton esprit s'arrête, et tu crois l'avoir saisi quand tu as glissé dessus.

SMARH.

Mais non, tout cela est trop beau pour n'être pas fait pour l'homme, pour son bonheur, pour sa joie. Vois donc aussi ces hautes falaises blanches sur lesquelles plane la mouette aux cris sauvages, aux ailes noires ; vois plus loin ce pâturage touffu avec ses herbes tassées et ses fleurs ouvertes.

SATAN.

Et regarde aussi comme tu es petit au pied des rochers, comme tu es petit même auprès des brins d'herbe que foulent les bœufs et qui se redressent après. Oui, tu es plus faible que ces cailloux que la mer roule en criant, comme si elle avait des chaînes dans le ventre.

SMARH.

Mais le caillou est immobile et mon pied le pousse.

SATAN.

Et toi donc ? N'y a-t-il pas un pied aussi qui t'écrase sous son talon invisible ? écrase donc un grain de sable, homme fort !

SMARH.

Mais je marche sur l'océan, je me dirige sans sentier et sans chemin.

SATAN.

Traces-en un qui dure une seconde, avec la quille de mille flottes.

SMARH.

J'évite sa colère.

SATAN.

Fais-en une semblable.

SMARH.

J'échappe à ses coups.

SATAN.

Quand ils ne sont plus. Tout cela, te dis-je, m'a été donné par Dieu. N'ai-je pas une intelligence qui m'a fait le roi de la création, qui m'a placé au premier rang, qui dompte la nature, la maîtrise et la bâillonne ? N'est-ce pas moi qui remue p46 la terre, bâtis des villes, dirige le cours des fleuves ? Dis, nieras-tu la puissance de l'homme ?

SATAN.

Non ! Honneur à l'homme qui bâtit, bouleverse, remue, qui s'agite, qui construit, qui meurt ! Honneur aussi à la mort qui fait les poussières et les ruines, qui dévore le passé, qui abat les palais construits ! Honneur à la nature qui fait naître l'homme, qui le conduit avec des guides de bronze, qui le maîtrise par tous les sens, qui le tourmente sous toutes les formes, qui le fait mourir, le dissout et le reprend dans son sein ! Puissance et éternité pour l'homme qui vit et qui souffre, pour ses œuvres indestructibles, pour ses ouvrages sans fin, pour sa poussière immortelle !

SMARH.

Le peu de durée de nos œuvres n'en prouve pas moins la puissance.

SATAN.

C'est-à-dire que ta force prouve ta faiblesse ; tu es éternel et tu meurs, tu es fort et tout te dompte, tes œuvres sont durables et elles périment ; le palais que tu as habité dure moins que la tombe qui renferme ta poussière, et l'un et l'autre deviennent poussière aussi ;

puis rien, comme toi.

SMARH.

Les œuvres de l'homme ont changé la face du globe.

SATAN.

Oui, la terre avait des forêts et tu les as coupées, les prairies avaient de l'herbe et tes troupeaux l'ont mangée, elle renfermait un principe de création et tu l'as épuisée par la culture. Tu crois que tes moyens artificiels et le misérable fumier que tu répands feront p47 une création quelconque, une fécondité, non, non, te dis-je ; jeté sur le monde, tu as voulu, dans ton orgueil immense, dompter cette nature qui t'environne, tu as voulu être grand auprès de cette grandeur, tu as cru être immortel auprès de la vie, et tu n'as que la faiblesse et le néant.

SMARH.

Oh ! Tu mens ! Je me sens fort.

SATAN.

Vraiment ! Comment donc ?

SMARH.

Sur tout ; sur les animaux d'abord.

SATAN.

Par ta ruse, c'est-à-dire que tu as pris la pierre et tu l'as élevée unie, mais la pierre tombe et roule, et les champs sont maintenant où il y avait des tours, et les pyramides sont moins hautes que les herbes, sous la terre ; tu as resserré les fleuves, mais les fleuves se sont répandus dans tes campagnes ; tu as voulu arrêter la mer dans des quais, et tu t'es cru grand parce que chaque jour elle venait battre à la même place, mais peu à peu elle a mangé lentement la terre, chaque jour elle la dévore.

SMARH.

Est-ce que tout, au contraire, dans la création n'est pas ordonné sur une échelle de forces et d'intelligences successives ?

SATAN.

Oui, et de misères. Continue.

SMARH.

Est-ce que je ne suis pas supérieur au cheval, et le cheval à la fourmi, et la fourmi au caillou ? p48

SATAN.

Oui, puisque tu es sur le cheval et que tu l'accables, et que le cheval écrase la fourmi, et que la fourmi creuse la terre.

SMARH.

Est-ce que je n'ai pas une âme, une âme qui entend, qui sent, qui voit ?

SATAN.

Qui souffre aussi ! Oui, tu es plus grand par tes malheurs que tout ce qui t'entoure, grandeur digne d'envie ! Le géant souffre plus que les insectes ! Tu te crois le maître de l'océan, de la terre, tu fonds les métaux, tu cisèles la pierre, tu fends l'onde, eh bien, quand la fournaise bout et que l'airain ruisselle à flots rouges, quand la pierre crie sous ton marteau, quand la terre gémit sous tes coups, quand les vagues murmurent en battant la proue de tes navires, oui, tout cela souffre moins que toi seul, ici, sans travail, sans rien qui te déchire la peau, ni t'arrache les entrailles, ni te lime la chair, mais seulement les yeux levés vers le ciel, l'abîme, et demandant pourquoi cela ? Pourquoi ceci ?

SMARH.

C'est vrai, comment donc ?

SATAN.

C'est que le ciel te montre ses feux, mais ses feux te brûlent ; que la mer s'étend devant toi, ouvre sa surface, mais elle t'engloutit ; c'est que ton intelligence te sert, mais te trahit et te fait souffrir ; c'est que l'infini est ouvert devant toi, mais sans bornes et sans fin, et qu'il te perd. Les oiseaux de nuit, des vautours, des mouettes sortent des rochers et viennent planer alentour. De temps en temps ils s'abattent sur le rivage en troupes et vont tirer des varechs ou des débris dans la mer. Les vagues bondissent, et leur bruit retentit dans les cavernes. p49

SMARH.

Cette nature est sombre.

SATAN.

Tout à l'heure tu la trouvais si riante.

SMARH.

Il en est ainsi quand le soleil n'éclaire plus et que les ténèbres enveloppent la terre.

SATAN.

Comme des langes qui la couvrent. L'écume saute sur les rochers à fleur d'eau et, quand le flot s'est retiré, un silence se fait et l'on n'entend plus que le clapotement, toujours diminuant, des derniers battements de la vague entre les grosses pierres, puis, au loin, un bruit sourd. Les oiseaux de proie redoublent leurs cris déchirants.

SMARH.

ô puissance de Dieu, que vous êtes grande !

SATAN.

Et terrible, n'est-ce pas ? Ne sens-tu rien dans ton cœur qui fléchisse et qui te crie que tu es faible, humble et petit devant tout cela ?

SMARH.

Oui, la nature fait peur ; ici tout n'est donc que crainte, appréhension ?

SATAN.

Quand l'homme marche, son pied glisse, il tombe ; quand sa pensée travaille, il glisse aussi, il tombe encore, il roule toujours, tu sais. Les étoiles disparaissent au ciel, de gros nuages passent sur la lune, la lueur blanche de celle-ci perce à travers ; bientôt les ténèbres couvrent le ciel, et l'obscurité n'est interrompue que par les lignes blanches que font les vagues sur les brisants. On entend des cris sauvages, les vagues sont furieuses. p50

SMARH.

Comme la mer mugit ! Sa colère est terrible.

SATAN.

Ce sont les œuvres de Dieu, elles frappent, elles déracinent, elles dévorent. Vois comme les rochers sont frappés ; entends-tu l'océan qui les ébranle et qui voudrait les déraciner pour les rouler dans son sein avec les grains de sable ?

SMARH.

Comme les vagues sont hautes ! (il se rapproche de lui.) celle-ci monte, elle va me prendre dans son vaste filet d'écume pour me rouler avec elle... ah ! Elle tombe, elle meurt... au secours ! Au secours ! Il veut fuir. Satan l'arrête.

SATAN.

Que crains-tu donc, homme fort ? Tâche de donner un coup de pied à l'océan, ta colère ne fera pas seulement jaillir un peu d'eau. Smarh veut courir, il trébuche, il tombe sur les pierres ; Satan le traîne pour le relever. Les vautours battent des ailes contre les rochers et ne peuvent monter plus haut. De grosses vagues noires se gonflent en silence et s'abaissent, la mer semble lassée.

SMARH.

Grâce ! Grâce ! Satan le traîne sur les genoux. Debout ! Debout ! Homme fort, la tête haute devant la tempête ! Est-ce de cela que tu as peur ? Une vague, qu'est-ce donc ? N'as-tu pas une âme immortelle ? Que te fait la vie ?

SMARH.

Pitié ! Pitié ! p51

SATAN.

Allons donc, image de Dieu, sois aussi grand que la pierre qui résiste.

SMARH.

Tout me manque. Si cette mer allait avancer encore ! Si ces rochers allaient marcher vers le rivage ! ... la mer va m'entraîner ! Quels horribles cris ! Les herbes marines, déracinées, flottent sur la mousse des flots ; les vagues sont fortes et cadencées ; un bruit rauque se fait entendre quand le flot se retire. On dirait que la mer veut arracher le rivage, elle se cramponne aux galets, mais elle glisse dessus.

SMARH.

Comme la création est méchante ! Est-ce qu'il y a eu toujours autant de fureur dans l'existence, autant de cruauté dans ce qui est fort ? Pitié, mon maître ! Dis-moi donc si cela dure toujours, si cette colère est éternelle.

SATAN.

Voyons ! Toujours ! Smarh, ne t'ai-je pas dit que le mal était l'infini ?

SMARH.

Non, l'homme n'est point cela. Son corps tombe sous les coups, son cœur se ploie sous la douleur.

SATAN.

Car son corps n'est point d'acier, mais son cœur est de bronze au dehors et de boue au dedans. Oh ! Pauvre homme ! Tu es bien pétri de terre, l'eau et le soleil te soulagent et te nuisent.

SMARH.

Pourquoi donc tant de maux ? Pourquoi la vie est-elle ainsi pleine de douleurs ? p52

SATAN.

Pourquoi la vie elle-même ? Pourquoi la tempête ? Si ce n'est pour faire et pour briser l'une et l'autre.

SMARH.

Et cela est depuis des siècles, et la terre n'est pas usée !

SATAN.

Non, mais chaque pied qui a marché sur elle a creusé son pas ineffaçable ; celui du mal l'a percée jusque dans ses entrailles.

SMARH.

L'océan est ce qu'il y a de plus grand.

SATAN.

Oui, c'est ce qu'il y a de plus vide. Quelle colère, n'est-ce pas ? Il est jaloux de cette terre, depuis ce jour où il fut refoulé sur son lit de sable où il se tord, et comprimé dans ses abîmes qui engloutissent les flottes et les armées, car, avant, il allait, il battait sans rivages, et le choc de ses flots n'avait point de termes, les vagues ne couraient point vers la terre, elles ne mouraient jamais, et la même pouvait rouler, rouler, pendant des siècles sur la surface unie de l'onde ; un immense calme régnait sur cette immensité.

SMARH.

Ne parles-tu pas de ces époques inconnues aux mortels, où la création s'agitait dans ses germes, où la mer roulait des vallées, et où la terre avait des océans sur elle ?

SATAN.

Oui, alors que les vagues remuaient dans leurs plis la fange sur laquelle on a bâti des empires. p53

SMARH.

Il y avait donc du repos alors... est-ce que le chaos était bon ?

SATAN.

C'était l'autre éternité, une éternité qui dort et sans rien qu'elle broie.

SMARH.

Et pas un cri sur tant de surface ? Pas une torture dans toutes ces entrailles ?

SATAN.

Non, la terre et la mer étaient de plomb et semblaient mêlées l'une à l'autre, comme de la salive sur de la poussière.

SMARH.

Et quand la création apparut, la terre fut retirée, et l'océan refoulé dans ses fureurs ; depuis, il s'y roule toujours. Un jour cependant il en sortit.

SMARH.

Au déluge, on me l'a dit, quand tous les hommes furent maudits et que la corruption eut gagné tous les cœurs.

SATAN.

Alors les fleuves versaient leurs eaux dans les campagnes ; leur lit, ce fut les plaines ; la mer tira d'elle-même des océans entiers, elle monta d'abord plus haut que de coutume, elle gagna les cités et entra dans les palais, elle battit le pied des trônes et enleva le velours. Le trône croyait qu'elle s'arrêterait là, et elle monta plus haut, elle gagna les déserts et vint aux pyramides ; les pyramides croyaient qu'elle mourrait p54 à leurs pieds, et ses plus petites vagues surpassèrent leur sommet ; elle gagna les montagnes, et elle s'élevait toujours comme un voyageur qui monte, elle entraînait avec elle les villes et les tours, et les hommes pleurant. Alors on entendit des bruits étranges et des cris à bouleverser des mondes. Tu les eusses vus se cramponner à l'existence qui leur échappait ; ils gravissaient les montagnes, mais la mer montait derrière eux, les entraînait et les roulait avec la poussière des choses éteintes. Alors quand les pyramides, les forêts, les montagnes furent arrachées comme l'herbe, et qu'une grande plaine verte, avec des débris de tombeaux et de trônes, s'étendit de tous côtés, les vagues vinrent à battre, la tempête se fit, et l'immense joie de la mort s'étendit sur cette solitude.

SMARH.

Et cela, hélas ! Ne dura pas toujours ; la création n'est donc faite que pour renaître de sa propre mort et souffrir de sa propre vie. Horreur que ce déluge ! Pourquoi tant de malheurs ?

SATAN.

Mais le déluge dure encore.

SMARH.

Comment cela ?

SATAN.

L'océan des iniquités a baigné tous les cœurs, et l'immensité du mal ne s'étendit-elle pas sur la terre ? D'abord il emporta quelques hommes, puis il vint dans les villes, il monta sur les trônes, il emporta les palais, à lui les cités ! Il gagna les campagnes, les forêts, et chaque jour il s'étend comme un nouveau déluge, comme une mer qui monte.

p55

SMARH.

Cet océan dont tu parles est donc aussi fort que celui-ci ?

SATAN.

Plus vaste encore, et ses tempêtes font plus de ravages.

SMARH.

Et où donc chercher un refuge si tout n'est que néant, corruption, abîme sans fond ?

SATAN.

Ah ! Où donc ? Que sais-je ?

SMARH.

Le bonheur n'est donc qu'un mensonge ?

SATAN.

Non, il existe.

SMARH.

N'est-ce pas dans la joie, dans le bruit, dans l'ambition, dans les passions qui remuent le cœur et le font vivre ?

SATAN.

Oui, dans tout cela, joies ou peines, voluptés ou supplices, le cœur se gonfle et s'agite.

SMARH.

Mais je voudrais voir le monde, car je ne sais rien de la vie.

SATAN.

Il est facile de tout t'apprendre, je vais t'y conduire. Il appelle :
"Yuk ! Yuk !" Yuk paraît.

YUK.

Quoi, mon maître ? p56

SATAN.

On te demande ce que c'est que la vie.

YUK.

Qui cela ? Qui fait une pareille question ? (Satan lui désigne Smarh.) vraiment ! (riant.) la vie ? Ah ! Par Dieu ou par le diable, c'est fort drôle, fort amusant, fort réjouissant, fort vrai ; la farce est bonne, mais la comédie est longue. La vie, c'est un linceul taché de vin, c'est une orgie où chacun se soûle, chante et a des nausées ; c'est un verre brisé, c'est un tonneau de vin âcre, et celui qui le remue trop avant y trouve souvent bien de la lie et de la boue.

Tu veux connaître cela ? Pardieu ! C'est facile ; mais tu auras le mal de mer avant cinq minutes et une envie de dormir, car tout cela te fatiguera vite, car l'existence te paraîtra une mauvaise ratatouille d'auberge, qu'on jette à chacun et que chacun repousse, repu aux premières cuillerées ; car les femmes te paraîtront de maigres mauviettes, les hommes de singuliers moineaux, le trône une gelée bien tremblante, le pouvoir une crème peu faite, et les voluptés de tristes entremets.

Un digne cuisinier, c'est vous, mon maître, qui nous servez toujours ce qu'il y a de plus beau sous le ciel ; vous, qui donnez les jolies pécheresses, laissant aux anges du ciel les dévotes jaunies. à nous, dont la nappe est faite avec les linceuls des rois, qui nous asseyons au large festin de la mort sur les trônes et les pyramides, qui buvons le meilleur sang des batailles, qui rongeons les plus hautes têtes de rois et qui, bien repus des empires, des dynasties, des peuples, des passions, des larges crimes, revenons chaque jour regarder le monde se mouvoir, les marionnettes gesticuler aux fils que nous tenons dans la main, qui voyons passer, en riant, les siècles amoncelés, et p57 l'histoire avec ses haillons fougueux et sa figure triste, et le temps, vieux faucheur glouton, aux talons de fer et à la dent éternelle, tout cela, pour nous, tourne, remue, marche, s'agite et meurt ; nous voyons la farce commencer, les chandelles brûler et s'éteindre, et tout rentrer dans le repos et dans le vide, dans lequel nous courons comme des perdus, riant, nous mordant, hurlant, pleurant.

Ah ! Mon novice a la tête forte, tant mieux ! Nous avons beaucoup de choses à lui montrer. D'abord un peu d'histoire, puis un peu d'anatomie, et nous finirons par la gastronomie et la géographie. Que faut-il faire ? Monter sur la montagne pour voir la plaine et la cité ? Eh bien, oui, nous allons gravir sur quelque hauteur d'où nous aurons un beau coup d'œil. Je puis, pardieu ! Vous accompagner, car le dieu du grotesque est un bon interprète pour expliquer le monde. Sur la montagne, les forêts, le sauvage et sa famille. à l'horizon, une immense plaine, couverte de pyramides, arrosée par des fleuves. Au fond, une ville avec ses toits de marbre et d'or, un éclatant soleil. — la femme et l'homme sont entièrement nus, leurs enfants se jouent sur des nattes, le cheval est à côté ; le sauvage est triste, il regarde sa femme avec amour.

LE SAUVAGE.

Oh ! Que j'aime la mousse des bois, le bruissement des feuilles, le battement d'ailes des oiseaux, le galop de ma cavale, les rayons du soleil, et ton regard, ô Haïta ! Et tes cheveux noirs qui tombent jusqu'à ta croupe, et ton dos blanc, et ton cou qui se penche et se replie quand mes lèvres y impriment de longs baisers, je t'aime plein mon cœur. Quand ma bonne bête court et saute, je laisse aller ses crins qui bruissent, j'écoute le vent qui siffle et parle, j'écoute le bruit des branches que son pied casse, et je regarde la poussière p58 voler sur ses flancs et l'écume sauter alentour ; son jarret se tend et se replie, je prends mon arc et je le tends ; je le tends si fort que le bois se plie, prêt à rompre, que la corde en tremble, et, lorsque la flèche part et fend l'air, mon cheval hennit, son cou s'allonge, il s'étend sur l'herbe, et ses jambes frappent la terre et se jettent en avant.

La corde vibre en chantant et dit à la flèche : pars, ma longue fille, et déjà elle a frappé le léopard ou le lion, qui se débat sur le sable et répand son sang sur la poussière. J'aime à l'embrasser corps à corps, à l'étouffer, à sentir ses os craquer dans mes mains, et j'enlève sa belle peau, son corps fume et cette vapeur de sang me rend fier.

Il en est parmi mes frères qui mettent des écorces à la bouche de leurs juments pour les diriger, mais moi, je la laisse aller, elle bondit sur l'herbe, saute les fleuves, gravit les rochers, passe les torrents, l'eau mouille ses pieds, et les cailloux roulent sous ses pas.

Haïta.

Je me rappelle, moi, que, le jour où je t'ai vu, j'aimai tes grands yeux où le feu brillait, tes bras velus aux muscles durs, ta large poitrine où un duvet noir cache des veines bleues, et tes fortes cuisses qui se tendent comme du fer, et ta tête et ta belle chevelure, ton sourire, tes dents blanches. Tu es venu vers moi ; dès que j'ai senti tes lèvres sur mon épaule, un frisson s'est glissé dans ma chair, et j'ai senti mon cœur s'inonder d'un parfum inconnu. Et ce n'était point le plaisir de rester endormie sur des fleurs, auprès d'un ruisseau qui murmure, ni celui de voir dans les bois, la nuit, quelque étoile au ciel, avec la lune entourée des nuages blancs, et toute la robe bleue du ciel avec ses diamants parsemés, ni de danser en rond sur une pelouse, vêtue avec des chaînes de roses autour du corps, non ! C'était... je ne puis le dire.

p59

Et puis sentir dans mon ventre s'agiter quelque chose, et j'avais un espoir infini d'être heureuse, je rêvais, je ne sais à quoi. Et puis deux enfants sont venus, j'aimais à les porter à ma mamelle, et quand je les regardais dormir, couchés dans notre hamac de roseau, je pleurais, et pourtant j'étais heureuse.

LE SAUVAGE.

Mon cœur est triste pourtant, je le sens lourd en moi-même, comme une nacelle pesamment chargée qui traverse un lac, les vagues montent et le pont chancelle. Depuis longtemps déjà (car la douleur vieillit et blanchit les cheveux) un ennui m'a pris, je ne sais quelle flèche empoisonnée m'a percé l'âme et je me meurs.

Hier encore j'errais comme de coutume, mais je ne pressais point de mes genoux les flancs de ma cavale, je ne tendais pas la corde de mon arc ; je m'assis au milieu des bois et j'entendais vaguement la pluie tomber sur le feuillage.

à quoi pensais-je alors ? Je regardais les herbes avec leurs perles de rosée. En vain le tigre passait près de moi et venait boire au ruisseau, en vain l'aigle s'abattait sur le tronc des vieux chênes, je baissais la tête, et des larmes coulaient sur mes joues. Quand ce fut le milieu du jour et que les rayons de l'astre d'or percèrent en les branches, je vis cette lumière sans un seul sourire. Oh ! Non, j'étais triste. Et pourtant Haïta est belle, je n'aime point d'autre femme, mes enfants sont beaux, mon cheval court bien, mon arc lance la flèche, ma hutte est bonne et, quand j'y reviens, il y a toujours pour moi des fruits nouvellement cueillis et du lait tiré à la mamelle de ma vache blanche. Hélas ! J'ai pensé à des choses inconnues, je crois que des fées sont venues danser devant moi et m'ont montré des palais d'or dont p60 j'étais le maître ; elles étaient là avec des pieds d'argent qui foulaient le gazon, leur figure m'a souri, mais ce sourire était triste et leurs yeux pleuraient. Que m'ont-elles dit ? J'ai oublié toutes ces choses, qui m'ont ravi jusqu'au fond de l'âme ; et puis, quand la nuit est venue, et qu'on entendit les vautours sortir avec leurs cris féroces des antres de rocher, et que les chacals et les loups traînaient leurs pas sous les feuilles, et que les oiseaux avaient cessé de chanter sur les branches, tout fut noir ; les feuilles blanches du peuplier tremblaient au clair de lune. Alors j'eus peur, je me suis mis à trembler comme si j'allais mourir ou si la nuit allait m'ensevelir dans un monde de ténèbres, et pourtant mon carquois était garni, pourtant mon bras est fort, et ma cavale était là, marchant sur les feuilles sèches, elle qui fait des bonds comme une flèche sur un lac. Et cette nuit, quand je ne dormais pas et que ma femme tenait encore ma main sur son cœur, et que les enfants dormaient comme elle, des désirs immodérés sont venus m'assaillir ; j'ai souhaité des bonheurs inconnus, des ivresses qui ne sont pas, j'aurais voulu dormir et rêver en paradis ! Il m'a semblé que mon cœur était étroit, et pourtant Haïta m'aime, elle a de l'amour pour moi plein toute son âme ! Un jour, je ne sais si c'est un songe ou si c'est vrai, les feuilles des arbres se sont enveloppées tout à coup, et j'ai vu une immense plaine rouge. Au fond, il y avait des tas d'or, des hommes marchaient dessus, ils étaient couverts de vêtements ; mon corps est nu, je me sens faible, la neige est tombée sur moi, j'ai froid, je pourrais, en mettant sur moi quelque chose, avoir toujours chaud. Quand je me regarde, je rougis ; pourquoi cela ?

D'autres femmes m'aimeraient peut-être davantage que Haïta... comment peut-on mieux aimer qu'elle ? Elle m'embrasse toujours avec le même amour ! ... p61 mais pourquoi n'y aurait-il d'autres amours dans l'amour même ?

Et puis les bois, les lacs, les montagnes, les torrents, toutes ces voix qui me parlaient et me formaient une si vaste harmonie, me semblent maintenant déserts, vides. J'étouffe sous les nuages, mon cœur est étroit, il se gonfle, plein de larmes et prêt à crever d'angoisse.

Pourquoi donc n'y aurait-il pas des huttes plus belles que la mienne, des bois plus larges encore, avec des ombrages plus frais ? Je veux d'autres boissons, d'autres viandes, d'autres amours. Et puis j'ai envie de quitter ce qui m'entoure et de marcher en avant, de suivre la course du soleil, d'aller toujours et de gagner les grandes cités d'où tant de bruit s'échappe, d'où nous voyons d'ici sortir des armées, des chars, des peuples ; il y a chez elles quelque chose de magique et de surnaturel ; au seuil, il me semble que j'aurais peur d'y entrer, et pourtant quelque chose m'y pousse. Une main invisible me fait aller en avant, comme le sable du désert emporté par les vents ; en voyant les feuilles jaunies de l'automne rouler dans l'air, j'ai souhaité d'être feuille comme elles, pour courir dans l'espace. J'ai lutté avec une d'elles, j'ai pressé les bords de mon cheval, mais elles se sont perdues dans les nuages, et les autres sont tombées dans le torrent. Longtemps encore j'ai regardé le gouffre où elles s'étaient englouties et la mousse tourbillonner alentour, longtemps encore j'ai regardé les nuages avec lesquels elles montaient, et puis je ne les ai plus revues.

Est-ce que je serai comme la poussière du désert et comme les feuilles d'automne ? Si j'allais m'engloutir dans un gouffre où je tournerais toujours ! Si j'allais aller dans un ciel où je monteraï toujours ! Pourquoi donc ai-je en moi des voix qui m'appellent ? Quand je prête l'oreille, il me semble que j'entends au loin quelqu'un qui me dit : viens, viens ! p62

Est-ce qu'il va y avoir une bataille, et que la plaine va être couverte de mille guerriers avec leurs chevaux à la crinière flottante, avec l'arc tendu, et la mort au bout de chaque flèche ? Oh ! Comme il y aura des cris et des flots de sang !

Non ! C'est peut-être un long voyage, comme celui des oiseaux qui passent par bandes et traversent les océans ; et moi il faut partir seul ! ... mais où irai-je ? Je n'ai pas des ailes comme eux. Je dirai donc adieu à ma femme, à mes enfants, à ma hutte, à mon hamac, à mon chien, au foyer plein de bois pétillant, au lac où je me mirais souvent, aux bois où je respirais plein d'orgueil ; adieu à ces étoiles, car je vais voir d'autres cieux... et ma cavale ? Faudra-t-il la laisser ? Mais, si elle mourait en chemin, les vautours viendraient donc manger ses yeux ? ... et puis, quand mes enfants seront plus grands, ils monteront dessus comme moi et ils iront à la chasse pour leur vieille mère... mais la pauvre bête sera morte, la hutte sera détruite par l'ouragan, l'herbe sera flétrie, tout ce qui m'entoure ne sera plus et sera parti dans la mort !

Allons donc ! La nuit vient, la brise du soir me pousse, il faut partir, je pars. Adieu mes enfants, adieu Haïta, adieu ma cavale, adieu le vieux banc de gazon où ma mère m'étendait au soleil, adieu, je ne reviendrai plus.

SATAN.

Vite ! Vite donc ! N'entends-tu point dans l'air des voix qui te disent de partir ? Pars donc ! Tu crains de quitter Haïta ? Je te donnerai d'autres femmes ; tu crains de quitter ton cheval ? Je te donnerai des chars ; au lieu de la hutte tu auras des palais, au lieu des bois tu auras des villes... des villes, du bruit, de l'or, des bataillons entiers, une fournaise ardente, une frénésie, une ivresse folle ! p63

Oh ! Tu ne sais pas des joies, des voluptés, des raffinements de plaisir ! Ton âme sera élargie et sera doublée, des mondes y entreront et tourneront en toi. Entends-tu la danse des femmes nues qui sourient, qui t'appellent ? Oh ! Si tu savais comme elles sont belles, comme leurs corps ont de l'amour ! Elles te prendront, te berceront sur leur poitrine haletante. Entends-tu le bruit des armées, et les chars d'airain qui roulent sur le marbre des villes ? Entends-tu la longue clameur des peuples civilisés ? Le sang ruisselle, viens donc à la guerre !

Et ils t'élèveront sur un trône, c'est-à-dire que tu étais libre et tu seras roi ; tu verras sous toi, à tes pieds, des armées et des nations, et quand tu frapperas du pied tu broieras des hommes. Tu auras de larges festins, où l'ivresse s'étendra sur ton âme ; ce sera des nouveaux mets, des nouveaux vins, des frénésies inconnues.

Allons donc ! Entends-tu les coupes d'or qui bondissent, et les dents qui claquent sur le cristal ? Entends-tu la volupté, la puissance, l'ambition, toutes les délices du corps et de l'âme qui te parlent, qui t'attendent, qui te pressent, qui t'entourent ? La nuit vient, les étoiles montent au ciel, le vent s'élève, les feuilles roulent sur l'herbe, marche ! Et tu iras en avant, toujours, jusqu'à ce que tu tombes à la porte d'un palais d'or.

LE SAUVAGE.

Adieu donc, adieu ! Je pars pour le désert, le vent me pousse avec le sable.

Je vois déjà l'oasis, j'entends les chants du festin. Adieu Haïta, adieu mes enfants, adieu ma cavale, adieu les bois, adieu les torrents !

Une voix m'a dit : marche ! Et il y avait en elle quelque chose qui m'attirait et me charmait, adieu ! Adieu ! p64

Le Génie Du Sauvage.

Arrête ! Arrête !

Non ! Non ! Reste à te balancer dans le hamac de jonc, à courir sur ta jument, à dépouiller le léopard de sa robe ensanglantée. Eh quoi ! L'eau du lac est pure, les chênes sont hauts, et ta femme n'est-elle pas blanche ? Ne te rappelles-tu plus ces nuits de délices sur le gazon plein de fleurs, quand les arbres avaient des feuilles, que la lune éclairait le ruisseau, et que les vents de la nuit, pleins de parfums et de mystères, séchaient les sueurs de vos membres fatigués ? Eh quoi ! Vois donc le même soleil qui se couche dans l'horizon, il est plus rouge que de coutume, il y a du sang derrière, il y a du malheur dans l'avenir... comme la mousse est fraîche et verte, comme le torrent mugit, plein d'écume ! Te faut-il donc d'autres fleurs que celles des bois, d'autre musique que la cascade qui tombe, d'autre amour que les baisers d'Haïta, d'autre bonheur que ta vie ? Non ! Tu as en toi du plomb fondu qui te brûle, ton cœur est un incendie, prends garde ! Avant qu'il ne soit cendres ton corps tombera de pourriture et d'orgueil.

D'autres comme toi sont partis, hélas ! Vers la cité des hommes. Un soir ils ont dit un éternel adieu à leur femme, à leur foyer ; ils ont quitté la vallée et la montagne, le rivage que la vague chaque jour venait baiser de sa lèvre écumeuse ; leurs femmes pleuraient, le foyer ne brûlait plus, le chien aboyait sur le seuil et regardait la lune, la cavale hennissait sur l'herbe.

Et on ne les a plus revus ! Car un démon les a pris et les a perdus dans l'espoir qu'ils avaient, comme ces feux qui font tomber dans les fleuves. Ils sont allés longtemps. Mais qui pourra dire toute la terre qu'ils ont foulée ! Successivement ils ont passé à travers tout, et tout a passé derrière eux ; la route p65 s'allongeait toujours, le désert s'étendait comme l'infini, le bonheur fuyait devant eux comme une ombre. En vain ils regardaient souvent derrière, mais ils ne voyaient que la poussière remuée par les ouragans, et ils arrivèrent ainsi dans une satiété pleine d'amertume, dans une agonie lente, dans une mort désespérée.

Non ! Non ! Ne quitte ni les bois où bondit le tigre sous ta flèche acérée, ni le murmure du lac où les cerfs viennent boire la nuit et troublent avec leurs pieds les rayons d'argent de la lune, ni le torrent qui bondit sur les rocs, ni tes enfants qui dorment, ni ta femme qui te regarde les yeux pleins de larmes, le cœur gonflé d'angoisses. Mieux vaut la hutte de roseaux que leur palais de porphyre, ta liberté que leur pouvoir, ton innocence que leurs voluptés, car ils mentent, car leur bonheur est un rire, leur ivresse une grimace d'idiot, leur grandeur est orgueil et leur bonheur est mensonge.

Le sauvage n'écoula point la voix de l'ange, il partit ; et Satan se mit à rire en voyant l'humanité suivre sa marche fatale et la civilisation s'étendre sur les prairies.

— mais ce n'est pas tout, dit Yuk, entrons maintenant dans la ville, et ne nous amusons pas aux bagatelles de la porte.

Il était nuit, aucun bruit ne sortait de la cité endormie, on n'entendait qu'un vague bourdonnement comme des chants qui finissent ; ils entrèrent. Les rues étaient désertes, les navires se remuaient et battaient du flanc les quais de pierre, la brise se jouait dans les cordages, les eaux coulaient sous les ponts, la lune brillait sur les dômes des palais, les étoiles scintillaient. Les carrefours, les rues, longues promenades, places ouvertes, tout était vide, et de blanches lueurs éclairaient tout cela et faisaient remuer des ombres. Pas un nuage. p66

Yuk était avec eux.

Il faisait chaud, l'air était emprisonné entre les maisons, et souvent des vents chauds semblaient s'élancer des dômes de plomb et courir dans l'air comme une cendre invisible. Des hommes étendus, ivres, dormaient par terre, d'autres étaient morts ou semblaient dormir aussi. Il y avait quelque chose de sombre et d'amer jusque dans le sommeil de la ville. Yuk marchait devant eux, il guidait Smarh dans ce dédale impur, et, chemin faisant, il tirait de sa poche une certaine poudre, il la lançait en l'air ; on la voyait s'allonger en spirale, puis tomber par les cheminées, et bientôt on voyait les murailles se disjoindre et de volumineuses cornes s'étendre, comme l'envergure d'une aile, pendant qu'une femme tournait le dos à un homme et donnait son devant à un autre. Quand Yuk ouvrait la bouche, c'étaient des calomnies, des mensonges, des poésies, des chimères, des religions, des parodies qui sortaient, partaient, s'allongeaient, s'amalgamaient, s'enchevêtraient, se frisaient, ruisselaient, finissant toujours par entrer dans quelque oreille, par se planter sur quelque terrain pour germer dans quelque cerveau, par bâtir quelque chose, par en détruire une autre, enfouir ou déterrer, élever ou abattre.

Chacun des mouvements de sa figure était une grimace, grimace devant l'église, grimace devant le palais, grimace devant le cabaret, devant le bougre, devant le pauvre, devant le roi. S'il allongeait le pied, il faisait rouler une couronne, une croyance, une âme candide, une vertu, une conviction.

Et il riait, après cela, d'un rire de damné, mais un rire long, homérique, inextinguible, un rire indestructible comme le temps, un rire cruel comme la mort, un rire large comme l'infini, long comme l'éternité, car c'était l'éternité elle-même. Et dans ce rire-là p67 flottaient, par une nuit obscure sur un océan sans bornes, soulevés par une tempête éternelle, empires, peuples, mondes, âmes et corps, squelettes et cadavres vivants, ossements et chair, mensonge et vérité, grandeur et crapule, boue et or ; tout était là, oscillant dans la vague mobile et éternelle de l'infini. Il sembla alors à Smarh que le monde était dépouillé de son écorce et restait saignant et palpitant, sans vêtements et sans peau. Son œil plongeait plus loin dans les ténèbres, il crut un moment y voir des astres, les ténèbres étaient encore là. — entrons ici, dit Yuk.

Et la porte d'un palais s'ouvrit devant eux. Ils montèrent par un escalier de marbre, qui avait des taches de sang à chaque marche, le pied broyait des coupes d'or et des têtes humaines, et à chaque pas on sentait qu'on marchait sur de la chair, que quelque chose s'enfonçait sous vous et que des soupirs montaient.

Ils se trouvèrent dans une salle où il y avait un trône. Au pied de ce trône, un homme pâle, maigre, dans un manteau de pourpre. Il avait des nuits sans sommeil, celui-là, sa vie était une angoisse, passée à tenir un misérable morceau de bois doré qu'il avait dans les mains, et il marchait soucieux auprès de son trône, et, quand il le voyait prêt à pencher, il le soulevait et mettait dessous pour le soutenir de la corruption et de l'or, des têtes humaines qu'il allait chercher dans la foule.

Et tous les vices se traînaient à genoux à ses pieds, toutes les vertus s'inclinaient à son passage, toutes les convictions se fondaient comme du plomb devant son sourire, et tous les péchés capitaux le harcelaient et le tiraient par son linceul de pourpre, dont ils arrachaient quelques lambeaux.

Et l'ambition lui disait : “tiens, voilà des empires, voilà des hommes, des lauriers, de la gloire, de la poudre, des combats, des cités ; la poudre des combats p68 tourbillonne déjà ; en route, à la guerre !” et il sautait sur un cheval nu et le frappait à deux mains, il courait sur les hommes, brûlait les viles, le pied de son coursier cassait des crânes et des couronnes, le sang de la guerre fumait devant lui, il avait des vêtements pleins de sang et des mains rouges, et il appelait cela de la gloire.

Et la luxure lui disait : “tiens, voilà des femmes et des voluptés, tout est à toi, à toi, le roi. En est-il une qui résistera au maître ? Et si elle résistait tu pourrais l’étouffer dans tes bras et tu aurais son cadavre tout chaud et tout palpitant. N’as-tu pas des femmes qui s’épuisent en inventions pour te plaire ? N’as-tu pas des poètes qui cherchent pour toi les raffinements les plus inouïs ? Tiens, voilà des parfums qui fument, des femmes nues et étendues sur des roses, il est nuit, elles t’appellent de leurs voix douces comme des sons de la flûte. “ et il se ruait, comme une bête fauve, sur les gorges et sur les ventres des courtisanes et des dames de haut parage ; il rugissait de plaisir, il se traînait comme un porc dans sa fange ; avec toutes ses richesses il n’était qu’ignoble, avec toute sa gloire il était vil. Les nuits, les jours, les crépuscules et les aurores, tandis que les esclaves nues dansaient en chantant, que la fanfare retentissait sous les voûtes dorées, il était entouré d’une troupe de beautés ; toujours il avait quelque belle tête sur ses lèvres, de beaux bras blancs sur son cou ; et en foule venaient les pères, les époux, les frères, les fils, vendre leur fille, leurs femmes, leurs sœurs, leur mère. Des brunes, des blondes, andalouses à la peau cuivrée et aux cheveux noirs, femmes d’Asie aux mamelles pendantes, bondissantes et nues, filles de Grèce aux formes pures et aux yeux bleus, et celles du nord, blondes comme les soleils d’automne, blanches comme le lait des montagnes, toutes pour lui étaient là, prêtes, parées ou nues ; pour lui p69 toutes les fleurs, tous les parfums, toutes les voluptés, toutes les amours.

Il y nageait, il s’y plongeait, il en prenait tant que son cœur pouvait en contenir, il les jetait et en prenait d’autres. Il aimait la femme aux mots d’amour, et la bouche aux dents fraîches, et les épaules blanches, couvertes d’une onde de cheveux noirs, et, quand il sentait des genoux presser ses flancs et des bras le serrer sur des seins nus, il se pâmait, il se mourait. Il était fou, idiot, stupide ; il sentait avec un enivrement machinalement une sueur de femme couler sur son corps, il tombait en fermant les yeux et rêvant d’autres voluptés, d’autres fanges dans son sommeil.

Et l'avarice lui disait : "de l'or ! De l'or !" et il était pris d'une cupidité insatiable. De l'or ! Il y avait dans ce mot-là une frénésie satanique, et il amassait, il en amassait jusqu'au ciel, il en tirait de tout, des hommes et des choses ; il pressait tout dans ses mains et ses mains suaient l'or, il avait des machines qui lui en faisaient, et il en avait de quoi combler des océans, il s'y roulait dessus et disait qu'il était riche. D'autres fois, il était jaloux, par caprice, d'un haillon et il le volait ; s'il voyait une parcelle de quelque chose, il avait une soif de l'avoir, il avait du poison dans les veines. L'orgueil lui disait : "vois donc ! Regarde tes flottes, tes océans, tes empires, tes peuples esclaves ; tout à toi, à toi !" et il se trouvait grand, fort, beau, il se faisait dresser des autels, il était plein d'orgueil, et son orgueil l'étouffait de plus en plus, comme s'il avait eu une tempête dans l'âme, qui se fût gonflée toujours.

Il courait donc de ses trésors à ses maîtresses, de ses esclaves à ses maîtresses, esclave lui-même, captif de ses vices, esclave et gêné d'un pli de rose sous lui. Mais quelqu'un vint qu'on n'attendait pas, il frappa à la porte à grands coups de pieds et il l'enfonça. Tout p70 tomba, les lumières s'éteignirent, le trône fut emporté par le vent, le palais fut fauché, le roi et ses empires, ses voluptés, ses crimes, tout cela dans son linceul, tout cela poussière et néant. Oh ! Yuk se mit à rire, à rire toujours et longtemps ; Satan dit que cela l'ennuyait et qu'il en avait vu assez.

— de l'érotique, du burlesque, du pastoral, du sentimental, de l'élégiaque ! Voyons, Yuk, une littérature au lait pour un poitrinaire !
YUK.

Que voulez-vous que nous montrions au novice ? Des fiancés, des mariés ou des morts ? Un mensonge ou un serment ?

SATAN.

Oui.

YUK.

Ensemble, n'est-ce pas ? Car serment et mensonge sont synonymes, ainsi que mariés et cocus, ainsi que fiancés et morts.

Petite comédie bourgeoise.

Scène première.

Un salon confortable, une maman qui tricote avec des mitaines, une lampe avec un abat-jour, un jeune homme et une jeune fille s'entregardent.

LE JEUNE HOMME.

Eh bien ?

LA JEUNE FILLE.

Eh bien ?

LE JEUNE HOMME.

Mademoiselle ! p71

LA JEUNE FILLE.

Monsieur !

LE JEUNE HOMME.

Chère amie, je vous aime (ici un baiser), je vous aime de tout mon cœur ; si vous saviez...

la jeune fille lève un regard, le jeune homme pousse un soupir, la maman les regarde avec complaisance. La conversation continue, on parle des projets de mariage, d'une tenue de maison ; la jeune fille fait grande parade d'économie, le jeune homme grand étalage de magnificence.

On s'enhardit. Chaque matin le jeune homme arrive avec un gros bouquet, et en sortant de chez sa fiancée il va chez son médecin, qui finit de le purger d'une incommodité gênante un jour de noces et dangereuse pour l'épousée.

C'était un bon garçon, il avait fait son droit et avait fort bien usé de ses trois ans d'étudiant ; il avait débauché un régiment de modistes et les avait toutes laissées en disant : "tant pis ! Des femmes comme ça !" il ne savait plus que faire, il lui avait pris envie de se ranger, de payer ses dettes, de s'établir et de se marier.

Sa femme était gentille, une grande fille blonde de dix-huit ans, élevée sous l'aile d'une bonne mère, chaste, blanche, timide.

Il l'aimait, il le croyait, il avait fini par se le persuader, il en était convaincu. S'il avait eu plus d'imagination, il se serait posé comme un amoureux de drame ; cela lui semblait drôle tout de même. Mais le jour des noces arriva, la mariée était jolie comme un ange, le jeune homme était beau comme un gendarme ; l'une rêvait à mille instincts confus, pauvre colombe enfermée dans la cage et qui n'avait p72 entrevu, entre les barreaux de l'honnêteté et le voile obscur des convenances, qu'un coin de ce grand ciel qu'on appelle amour ; l'autre pensait en termes plus précis et en images plus distinctes à la nuit qui allait venir : “une vierge, se disait-il, une femme comme cela !” et il n’en revenait pas d’étonnement. Scène ii.

Une église, des conviés, des mendiants ; les prêtres rayonnent, les pièces d’argent tombent goutte à goutte dans l’offerte, beaucoup de cierges. Les mariés sont à genoux, la jeune fille frémit, palpitante d’une joie pure ; le jeune homme est frisé et a des gants blancs, il a été une heure à se laver les mains avec différents savons d’or, il embaume.

à l’hôtel de ville on prononce le “ oui “ d’une voix claire, tout est fini.

Yuk alors se met à rire, à rire de ce fameux rire que vous savez ; il a raison, car il a devant lui au moins un demi-siècle de ménage.

Nous sommes trop moraux pour nous appesantir sur la nuit de noces et dire tout ce qui s’y fit, ce serait cependant curieux, mais la décence, cette maquerelle impuissante, nous en empêche. Passons à la scène iii.

Lune de miel (voyez la physiologie du mariage, du sire De Balzac, pour les phases successives de la vie matrimoniale).

La femme s’aperçoit que son mari est beaucoup plus bête qu’elle ne le croyait ; il lui avait paru si spirituel, quand il n’était encore qu’un fiancé (suivant l’expression poétique), un parti (suivant l’expression sociale), un bon ami (comme disent les cuisinières), et une p... dans l’horizon (suivant nous) !

De plus elle aimait la poésie, les rêves, les pensées capricieuses, brumeuses et vagabondes ; et son mari p73

commence par lui dire que Lamartine est incompréhensible, que les rêveurs sont des fous, qu’il n’y a de vrai que l’argent et la géométrie. Elle avait dans le cœur toute une couronne de fleurs parfumées, fleurs de poésie, fleurs d’amour, elle avait, plein son âme, une joie sereine, pure et religieuse ; et feuille à feuille, jour à jour, il marche sur ses illusions, sur ses pensées d’enfant, avec le gros rire brute de l’homme qui triomphe, de la raison écrasant la poésie. Il fallait dire adieu à toutes ces diaphanes rêveries, où son esprit se berçait si mollement dans un ciel sans limites, dans un océan de délices et d’extases sans bord, sans rivage ! Quitter ses auteurs favoris qu’elle lisait les jours d’été, assise à l’ombre des ormes, ses chers poètes aux vaporeuses poésies, traités d’imbéciles par un homme de beaucoup d’esprit, disait-on !

Elle eut du dépit d'abord, puis elle finit par se persuader qu'elle avait tort, elle commença à aimer le monde, à vouloir aller au bal. Son mari y consentit, il était fier de faire briller sa femme et de montrer ses diamants ; il pouvait se dire, en regardant les hommes lui presser la taille demi-nue, en faisant le plus gracieux sourire qu'il leur était possible : "cette femme est à moi ; vous avez le sourire, moi j'ai le baiser ; vous avez la main gantée, le pied chaussé, le sein voilé, et moi j'ai la main nue, le pied nu, le sein découvert. à moi ces voluptés que vous rêvez sur elle, à moi cette beauté qui brille, ces yeux qui regardent, ces diamants qui reluisent ; à moi tous les trésors que vous convoitez ! Ainsi l'orgueil s'était placé dans cet amour et le remplissait tout entier.

Scène iv.

Elle eut un enfant, le plus joli du monde ; elle l'aimait, le caressait, le baisait à toute heure du jour ; c'était des joies sans fin, car c'était toute sa joie et son amour que cet enfant-là. p74

Son mari trouvait que ses couches l'avaient rendue laide, les cris de son fils l'ennuyaient, il ne l'aima que plus tard, lorsque la réputation du fils eut rejailli sur le père.

Cependant il retourna chez les filles et recommença sa vie de garçon. Sa femme restait le soir auprès du berceau, à prier Dieu et à pleurer. De temps en temps l'enfant ouvrait les bras et bégayait, ses petites mains potelées flattaient les joues de sa mère, rougies par de grosses larmes.

Scène v.

Ce fut donc, d'une part, une vie de dévouement, de sacrifices, de combats ; et, de l'autre, une vie d'orgueil, d'argent, de vice, une vie froide et dorée comme un vieil habit de valet tout galonné ; et ils restèrent ainsi étrangers l'un à l'autre, habitant sous le même toit, unis par la loi, désunis par le cœur.

Il y eut d'un côté des larmes, des nuits pleines d'ennui, d'angoisses, des veilles, des inquiétudes, de l'amour ; et de l'autre, des soucis, des sueurs, de l'envie, de la haine, des remords, des insomnies, des mensonges, une vie misérable et riche.

Tous deux allèrent où tout va, dans la mort. La femme mourut d'abord, seule avec un prêtre et son fils ; on vint dire à monsieur que madame était morte ; il s'habilla de noir et fit commander le cercueil.

La scène vi est toute remplie par un rire de Yuk, qui termina ici la comédie bourgeoise, en ajoutant qu'on eut beaucoup de peine à enterrer le mari, à cause de deux cornes effroyables qui s'élevaient en spirales. Comment diable les avait-il gagnées, avec une petite femme si vertueuse ?

Ils continuèrent ainsi à marcher de droite et de gauche, furetant dans chaque ruisseau pour y trouver p75 une vertu, dans chaque tas de boue pour y découvrir de l'or ; ils regardaient dans toutes les maisons, il en sortait des cris de deuil, des chants de joie, là c'était une bière, ici un tonneau défoncé.

Le jour vint et la ville commença à s'éveiller ; les hommes allaient par les rues, les uns revenaient d'une orgie, d'autres pleuraient, affamés ; il y en avait qui tombaient d'épuisement et d'autres, pleins de vin, qu'écrasaient les roues des chars.

On entendit le cheval qui piaffait sur les pavés, et les pas d'hommes pressés qui couraient sur les dalles ; déjà l'or roulait sur les tables, le fouet claquait sur les épaules de l'esclave, la prostitution ouvrait sa porte vénale, le vice se réveillait, le crime aiguisait son poignard et montait ses machines, la journée allait recommencer.

Il y avait un homme en haillons ; le souffle du matin refroidissait sa peau, et quand le soleil vint à paraître il grelotta de plaisir, remua les épaules et sourit bêtement, on eût dit qu'il eût voulu faire entrer en lui la chaleur du soleil. Son teint était jaune, ses cheveux et sa barbe noire étaient couverts de poussière et de brins de paille, son grand œil bleu était vide et avait faim, sa bouche, entr'ouverte, avait un froid rire de bête fauve affamée. Yuk, Satan, Smarh, en ouvriers.

YUK.

Qu'as-tu, mon camarade ?

LE PAUVRE.

Ce que j'ai ? Mais qu'êtes-vous, vous-même ? Personne jusqu'ici ne m'avait adressé une pareille question, ils passaient tous en me regardant. Mais n'êtes-vous p76 pas du pays ? Oui, je le vois à vos vêtements. Oh ! Si vous venez du beau pays d'Allemagne, dites-moi si le Rhin coule toujours, si la cathédrale de Cologne, avec ses saints de pierre, est toujours debout ; dites-moi si les arbres ont toujours des feuilles, car, pour moi, je crois que la nature est changée depuis que je suis dans cette ville hideuse.

YUK.

Voyons, contez-nous cela, à des compagnons de votre état, de votre pays.

LE PAUVRE.

Mon état ? Je n'en ai pas. Mon pays ? Je n'en ai plus. Est-ce qu'il y en a pour le malheureux ? Celui qui a un pays, c'est celui qui est heureux, mais le malheureux n'a pour patrie que son cœur plein d'angoisse. Que voulez-vous que je vous dise ? Je ne sais rien, si ce n'est que je hais les riches et que j'ai faim. Je suis parti de mon pays parce qu'on m'en a chassé avec des huées et des pierres, car mes guenilles étaient sanglantes, il y avait une infamie dans notre famille. Ah ! L'infamie, c'est de vivre comme je vis. J'ai donc été sans savoir où, à l'aventure, marchant dans les routes et les campagnes, vivant en volant une pomme, un fruit, un morceau de pain ; on me repoussait toujours, on disait que j'étais laid.

Yuk, riant.

Ah ! Ah ! Ah !

LE PAUVRE.

Je n'avais appris aucun métier, je ne savais que manger et je n'avais rien à manger ; parfois, j'étais pris d'une fureur immense, et il me semblait que j'aurais broyé le monde d'un coup de pied. Il me fallait, le soir, aller disputer aux chiens les immondices du coin de la borne et les haillons jetés dans la p77 boue ; il y en avait pourtant qui sont heureux, qui font de larges repas, et quand je me demande pourquoi cela, il y a là un abîme que je ne peux combler.

Yuk, riant.

Ah ! Ah ! Ah !

LE PAUVRE.

Ne ris pas, par dieu ! Mais écoute donc. Personne ne m'a aimé, ni homme, ni femme, ni chien, car, un jour, il y en a un qui est venu vers moi, mais, comme je ne pouvais le nourrir, il m'a mordu, et s'en est allé. Cependant, une fois, je ne sais dans quel village, j'étais parvenu à ramasser un sac d'argent en travaillant à la charpente de l'église, j'allais me marier, Marthe m'aimait ; elle vint deux fois seule, le soir, sur le rivage, me dire qu'elle m'aimerait toujours, elle avait des fleurs dans ses cheveux, elle chantait ; puis, je ne sais comment, elle n'a plus voulu de moi, un plus riche l'a prise.

YUK.

C'est ça, compère, les jeunes filles aiment les beaux cavaliers riches et les pourpoints de velours.

LE PAUVRE.

Ne me parlez pas des riches, encore une fois, -je les hais ! Moi qui meurs de faim à la porte de leurs palais, j'ai dans le cœur des trésors de haine pour eux, et quand il fait froid, que j'ai faim, que je suis malheureux et misérable, je me nourris de cette haine, et cela me fait du bien.

Satan, se logeant dans l'oreille du pauvre. Celui-là (désignant Yuk) a une bourse sur lui ; — tue-le, tu l'auras ; on ne te verra pas, et, d'ailleurs, quand on te verrait... tue-le, c'est un homme méchant. p78

Pourquoi, quand tu lui contais tes maux, s'est-il mis à rire ? C'est un riche au cœur dur. Yuk se découvre et laisse voir un magnifique costume ; une bourse garnie de diamants pend à sa ceinture. Le Pauvre, en lui-même.

ô mon dieu ! Voilà des pensées que je n'avais jamais eues. En effet, si j'allais être riche à mon tour, heureux, avoir des laquais, des chevaux, des tables somptueuses, me faire servir comme un prince ? ... mais tuer un homme !

Satan, en lui-même.

Bah ! Un homme ! On ne le saura pas. Dépêche-toi, personne ne passe dans la rue maintenant. Il lui glisse un poignard dans la main ; le pauvre, fasciné, se rue sur Yuk qui tombe par terre percé de coups.

SATAN.

Voilà la police ! ... un homme d'assassiné ! Prenez-moi ce gueux-là !

Le corps de l'ouvrier reste par terre, percé de coups, mais Yuk se relève.

YUK.

Vous croyiez vraiment que j'étais mort ? Oh ! Par dieu, il n'y aurait plus de monde, ni de création, du jour où je cesserais de vivre. Moi, mourir ! Ce serait drôle. Est-ce que je ne suis pas aussi éternel que l'éternité ? Moi, mourir ! Mais je renaiss de la mort même, je renaiss avec la vie, car je vis même dans les tombeaux, dans la poussière ; cela est impossible. Celui qui dira que je ne suis plus mentira comme l'évangile. Mourir ? Mais il n'y aurait plus ni gouvernement, ni religion, ni vertu, ni morale, ni lois. Qui donc alors tiendrait la couronne, l'épée, revêtirait la robe ? Qui donc serait médecin, poète, avocat, prêtre ? Est-ce qu'il y aurait quelque chose à faire ? La vie deviendrait p79 ennuyeuse et bête comme une vieille femme. Mourir ? Mais où en seraient les ménages qui sont garants de la foi conjugale ?

Ah ! Je me fâche à cette horrible idée d'anarchie sociale, la morale publique ; la morale publique, les mœurs, les institutions philanthropiques, les vertus, les systèmes, les théories, songez-y, si je mourais, tout cela mourrait aussi. Comment serait-on alors ? Comment concevez-vous l'idée d'un monde sans moi, sans que j'en occupe les trois quarts, sans que je le fasse vivre en entier ?

Les gens du guet prennent le pauvre.

SATAN.

Tant mieux ! Ce drôle-là m'assommait. Mais, au reste, il serait fâcheux de le faire mourir sitôt, réservons-le. Il faudra qu'il brûle sa prison, viole six religieuses et massacre une trentaine de personnes avant de rendre l'âme.

Le pauvre s'échappe des mains des soldats. Yuk se frotte les mains, s'étend au soleil, crache au nez d'un magistrat, et pisse sur l'église. C'était une haute église, avec son porche noirci, ses aiguilles et ses pyramides de pierre. Elle était vénérable tant elle était vieille ; ils y entrèrent. La nef était haute, vide, solitaire ; les minces et sveltes colonnes projetaient leurs ombres sur les dalles usées. Le jour se mourait, et cependant le soleil, passant à travers les vitraux rouges, jetait une lueur qui semblait s'étendre comme celle des lampes suspendues. Il y avait quelque chose de grand et de triste dans cette église ; elle était haute, si haute que les hommes paraissaient petits en bas, il n'y avait plus ni encens aux pieds de la vierge ni fleurs sur l'autel, l'orgue avait tu sa grande voix ; — seulement, tout au fond, un drap noir, un cercueil, la messe des morts. p80

Celui qui était étendu dans la bière n'avait jamais tué, ni pillé, ni violé ; il n'avait point été aux galères, ni repris de justice ; c'était un honnête homme. Quand il sortit de l'église et qu'il passa, traîné dans les rues, chacun se découvrit, -on salua la charogne.

Mais le prêtre s'était dépêché, il a vite renvoyé le mort en terre.

Pauvre prêtre ! Il avait déjà, dans la journée, béni six unions, fait trois baptêmes, enterré quatre chrétiens, et, quant aux communions, elles sont innombrables. Il se dépêcha, sa concubine l'attendait, elle était dans le bain chaud depuis longtemps, elle s'ennuyait. Il partit, il jeta vite la robe blanche, et rêva l'adultère.

L'église vide... oh ! Vide comme vous savez ; il n'y avait plus ni chants du peuple, ni voix du prêtre, ni prière de l'orgue.

Qu'elle devait être belle, pourtant, les jours d'hiver, avec ses mille cierges allumés, son peuple chantant en se promenant dans les galeries, quand tout chantait et vibrait d'amour, quand, depuis la voûte jusqu'aux tombeaux, depuis le vitrail jusqu'à la pierre, tout ne formait qu'un chant, qu'une allégresse ! Qu'elle était belle, pourtant, les jours d'été, quand les moissonneurs couverts de sueur entraient et faisaient bénir les gerbes de blé ; quand les dames de haut parage, avec leurs cours de pages, de chevaliers, rois, empereurs et papes, quand tous venaient là prier, pleurer, aimer ; quand les chevaliers, avant de partir pour le pays de Palestine, venaient prendre leur épée et qu'ils disaient un éternel adieu au grand portique noir où le soleil rayonne, au clocher d'ardoises où la voix d'airain chante, et prie dans sa cage de pierre ! ... plus rien ! Vide comme un squelette ! Quand des pas d'homme se font entendre, il semble que l'on entend un gémissement, comme un soupir. On y voit, assis sur leurs tombeaux de pierre, les évêques, les cardinaux, les ducs drapés dans leurs manteaux de granit, étendus la bouche béante ; ils semblent dormir comme des morts. Au bas de l'église circule une pluie ruisselante, froide et grasse, une pluie verte qui suinte des murs ; le sol usé est bourré de cadavres, la terre résonne, les morts sont tassés, et la génération vivante marche sur les générations éteintes. à mesure qu'elle avance, elle s'enfonce dans la terre des tombeaux, et la suivante lui marche sur la tête.

Tout est usé, flétri, fatigué ; le plâtre est tombé d'entre les pierres, les figures de saints sont grises et mangées par le temps ; la rosace, avec ses gerbes, se décolore ; la voûte elle-même s'éventre, surchargée et effrayée de l'abîme qu'elle a sous elle. Alors Smarh se mit à pleurer amèrement et il dit : — hélas ! Hélas ! Est-ce qu'il est venu quelque conquérant qui a emporté les vases d'or pour en ferrer ses chevaux ? Est-ce qu'on a enlevé les reliques des saints ! Les hosties sacrées ?

Pourquoi donc les chants ont-ils cessé ? Pourquoi l'encensoir est-il vide ? Pourquoi y a-t-il tant de vers qui se traînent sur les tombeaux ? Pourquoi tant d'herbes et de mousses sur les murs ? Les cierges sont éteints, les fleurs sont fanées.

Autrefois, les dimanches, les enfants venaient tout joyeux s'agenouiller aux pieds de la vierge, et ils chantaient en regardant la flamme remuer sur la robe étoilée de Marie ; mais il n'y a plus d'enfants ici, j'en ai vu qui détournaient la tête en passant. Quand la neige couvrait la terre, quand la pluie tombait, quand la grêle battait les vitraux, tous venaient se réfugier sous la voûte, qui s'étendait sur eux comme l'aile d'une colombe. Quand le malheur avait frappé quelqu'un, il venait là, auprès du drap de l'autel, sécher ses pleurs, guérir ses maux. J'en ai vu qui frappaient la terre de leur front et qui mouillaient de leurs larmes les pavés de marbre, et quand ils se relevaient, il y avait un sourire d'espérance dans leurs âmes ! Ils avaient entrevu le ciel dans le malheur, le bonheur dans la foi !

L'église.

On ne veut plus de moi ; demain, les maçons m'attaqueront par ma base, me renverseront, me démoliront pierre à pierre.

Le Bénitier.

Ils sont venus prendre mon eau, ils se sont lavé les mains. En vain j'ai écumé, bouillonné, ils ont craché dans mon onde et se sont amusés à voir les cercles que cela faisait.

La Nef.

Tout a passé sous moi : noces, funérailles, morts et vivants. J'étais l'écho des chants, je renvoyais les soupirs et les cris de douleurs ; c'était vers moi que volait l'encens, que montaient le parfum des fleurs, et la voix des prières, la fumée des cierges. Que de fois j'ai resplendi, j'ai vibré ! Mais je suis triste, j'ai envie de me coucher sur les dalles qui sont à mes pieds.

Les Colonnes.

Autrefois on nous entourait de guirlandes, maintenant nous sommes nues. Nous sommes, depuis six cents ans, séparées les unes des autres, nous nous enfonçons sous terre ; je crois que l'église tout entière s'affaisse dans un borborygme, on dirait d'un démon qui pèse sur son toit et l'écrase.

Les Vitraux.

Que de fois le soleil a illuminé nos couleurs, maintenant nos reflets n'éclairent plus rien. Les pierres de la rue viennent nous casser chaque jour, les vents nous p83 jettent par terre ; il faudra remporter toutes nos fleurs, toutes nos couleurs aux pieds du bon Dieu.

Les Dalles.

On nous a usées, nous sommes trouées en maints endroits, nous sommes lasses d'être foulées par des pieds impurs, les morts qui sont sous nous semblent nous repousser de dessus eux. Pourquoi nous a-t-on tirées des flancs de la montagne, où nous étions si paisibles, au sein de la terre ?

La Cloche.

Depuis longtemps je suis muette, personne ne vient plus prendre mon bourdon et faire aller ma bascule ; est-ce que les hommes sont tous morts ? Autrefois ma voix d'airain chantait à tue-tête, je faisais trembler mon clocher tout frêle, la tour remuait, ivre, et frémissait sous mon poids. Je chantais bien haut dans les airs, et je voyais arriver des campagnes hommes, femmes, vieillards et enfants, accourant, accourant vite et se pressant sous mon portail. Du jour où on me monta ici, j'ai toujours été fêtée, honorée comme la reine de l'édifice, comme la tête de la cathédrale. N'était-ce pas moi, en effet, qui portais la prière de tous dans mes spirales d'harmonie ? Aujourd'hui seulement je me tais, je m'ennuie toute seule, et, si haut, le vertige me prend ; je crois que je vais m'écrouler avec mon clocher, j'ai plutôt envie de me faire fondre en boulets et de courir dans la plaine.

Les Gargouilles.

Voilà assez longtemps que nous sommes là, droites, hérissées, suspendues ; on nous regarde en bas sans terreur. Autrefois nous crachions l'eau de l'orage, en grimaçant si bien qu'on avait peur ; maintenant ils nous regardent d'en bas en ricanant. Oh ! J'ai envie p84 de m'en aller, de me détacher de la pierre et de sauter ; je m'allonge tant que je peux, mais j'ai les pieds pris dans la cathédrale. En nous efforçant toutes à la fois, nous pourrions peut-être nous en déraciner, ou l'entraîner derrière nous ; faisons tous nos efforts, poussons en avant, tendons nos jarrets de granit, hérissons nos crinières de pierre. Nous avons envie de nous mettre à marcher sur la terre avec les serpents et de sauter par bonds, au lieu de rester suspendues dans l'infini, à regarder la foule s'agiter en bas et les hiboux battre des ailes autour de nos flancs. Et Satan aussitôt dit à l'église : — non, je ne veux plus de toi ! Il y a longtemps que tu me gênes dans ma marche et que tes aiguilles embarrassent mes pas ; je t'abattraï, car tu es belle quoique vieille, et je te hais de ma haine éternelle ; je t'abattraï, car tu obstrues mes rues, et les chars courront mieux quand tu n'y seras plus.

Tu n'as plus pour te défendre ni l'amour du croyant ni celui de l'artiste, mon esprit s'est infiltré dans tes veines depuis la base de ton plus profond pilier jusqu'à l'air qui surmonte ta plus haute aiguille, le vice suinte de tes pierres, et le doute te ronge à la face et te mange la figure. Que veux-tu faire ? Tu vas retomber sur la terre, où l'herbe te couvrira pour toujours.

Ainsi, mon bénitier, comme tu es de marbre blanc et solide, tu seras ma coupe où je bois du sang, ton eau servira à laver les pieds de quelque cheval de guerre. La nef va tomber par terre, la voûte va s'éventrer comme un ventre trop plein et qui crève.

Les colonnes frêles vont se casser comme un roseau sous le poids de leur cathédrale, qui s'abaissera tout à l'heure comme un flot de la mer qui s'est monté bien haut, et qui tombe ensuite sur la surface unie et vide. p85

Et vous, mes dalles, comme vous êtes vieilles, on pavera les rues avec vos faces plates et carrées ; et le pied de la courtisane, le pas du mulet, les roues des chars vous useront si bien que vous ne serez plus que de la poussière qu'enlèveront les vents. Et toi, ma grosse cloche, on va encore te fondre et te ronger ; tu vas hurler et bondir dans la plaine ; chaque fois que tu chanteras, ta voix tuera des hommes sur son passage.

Et mes vitraux bigarrés, vous allez tous vous casser, vous aurez le plaisir de vous voir sauter et rebondir, en vous brisant de nouveau sur la terre. Les gargouilles vont tomber pierre à pierre, vous assommerez toutes quelqu'un dans votre chute ; mais on vous ramassera avec soin, on vous grattera, on vous blanchira pour en bâtir quelque entrepôt, quelque lupanar immonde où je vous reverrai souvent. Il dit, et aussitôt l'église s'écroula tout entière, depuis son sommet jusqu'à sa base ; elle s'écroula d'un seul coup, ce fut un fracas horrible. Mais il y eut un immense rire qui accueillit cette chute, les philosophes battaient des mains ; mais un autre rire les domina tellement qu'ils disparurent tout à fait. Celui-là, vous le connaissez, c'était celui de Yuk. Et Smarh se trouva seul dans une plaine aride, avec de la cendre jusqu'au ventre ; il s'y enfonçait à mesure qu'il tâchait de s'élever. Tout était morne, mort et détruit autour de lui.

Il disait :

— où suis-je ? Où suis-je ? J'ai monté dans l'infini, et j'ai eu vite un dégoût de l'infini ; je suis redescendu sur la terre, et j'ai assez de la terre. Aussi que faire ? La nature et les hommes me sont odieux. Oh ! Quelle pitoyable création ! p86

Et il se mettait à rire aussi. — je suis las de tout ; il faut donc mourir. Quels sont ces esprits qui m'ont conduit où j'ai été ? Satan se présente à lui et lui dit : — c'est moi, c'est moi, je suis le diable ! Smarh fut tout épouvanté et faillit mourir.

SATAN.

D'où te vient cette horreur ? Pourquoi me craindre ? Si je voulais, je t'emmènerais déjà dans mon enfer, où ta chair repousserait toujours pour brûler toujours, car tu t'es donné à moi depuis longtemps. N'as-tu pas maudit la vie ? N'as-tu pas ri de la création ? N'es-tu pas plein de doute et d'ennui ? Il n'y a de bonheur que pour ceux qui espèrent dans la joie de leur foi. As-tu compris une seule des choses que tu as vues ? As-tu senti tout ce dont tu dis que tu as dégoût ? Que sais-tu de la vie ?

SMARH.

Je croyais l'avoir connue et, en effet, je vois qu'à peine je l'ai vue ; je crois toujours voir la lumière, et puis tu me replonges dans l'ombre. Non ! Je ne vois plus qu'un horizon noir, obscur et vague.

Tiens, regarde ! La cendre me vient jusqu'au ventre, le soleil s'est couché, il n'y a plus sur la plaine qu'une teinte morne et rouge, comme le reflet d'un incendie éteint. Dis-moi donc si l'horizon ne s'éclairera pas et si le soleil dormira toujours dans les ténèbres ? Où veux-tu que j'aille ? Et pour quoi faire ? Me donneras-tu des prairies pures, des océans sans tempête, une vie sans amertume et sans vanité ?

SATAN.

Non ! Je veux au contraire que les tempêtes et les vanités soufflent dans ton existence comme le vent dans la voile, t'entraînent vers quelque chose d'immense, d'inconnu, et que moi seul je sais. p87

SMARH.

Mais ne suis-je pas déjà assez ployé comme un roseau ? Tu veux donc que l'orage aille toujours jusqu'à ce qu'il m'ait brisé tout à fait ?

SATAN.

Oui ! Pour te laisser sur quelque grève déserte, où le désespoir, comme un vautour, viendra manger ton âme.

SMARH.

J'irai donc ainsi de dégoûts en dégoûts, repu et toujours traîné aux festins ! Tu vas me conduire ainsi par les mondes ! Oh ! J'en ai assez. Grâce ! Toujours de l'ennui morne et sombre ! Toujours le doute aux entrailles ! Pitié ! Pitié !

SATAN.

Non ! Non ! Je veux que tu n'aies plus de doute, et que ta pensée s'arrête et ne tournoie plus sur elle-même comme la terre dans sa course ivre et chancelante.

SMARH.

Et que vas-tu me faire ? Vas-tu me changer, me donner un autre corps ? Car le mien est déjà vieux ; j'ai en moi le souvenir de dix existences passées, et déjà je me suis heurté à tant de choses que si je vais ainsi je tomberai en poussière.

SATAN.

Ton sang est vieux, dis-tu ? J'y ferai couler du poison dedans, qui nourrira ta chair flétrie ; je te soutiendrai jusqu'au jour où tu pourras aller seul, jusqu'au jour où je te lâcherai de ma griffe. Maintenant va, cours, bondis dans les vices, les crimes et les passions. Oh ! Je vais animer ton existence, je vais te gonfler le cœur jusqu'à ce qu'il crève percé ; je vais t'en donner, t'en donner jusqu'à ce que tu n'en puisses plus ; tu vas courir sous un soleil de plomb, tu vas traverser des mares de sang et des océans de boue, tu vas vivre. N'as-tu pas un but ? N'es-tu pas destiné à accomplir une mission ? Mission de souffrance et d'angoisses ! Quand tes membres seront usés, que tes pieds eux-mêmes seront réduits en poudre, je te pousserai toujours, et tu iras ainsi dans cet infini des douleurs jusqu'à ce que tu ne sois plus rien, rien. Entends-tu cela ?

Tu croyais donc que tu pouvais regarder la vie, t'approcher du bord et puis t'en éloigner pour toujours ? Non ! Non ! Je vais t'y plonger longtemps, et tu vas en sonder toutes les fanges, en boire toute l'amertume.

Dis-moi, que veux-tu ? Forme un rêve, creuse une idée, désire quelque chose, et ton rêve aussitôt va devenir une réalité que tu palperas des mains ; je te ferai descendre jusqu'au fond du gouffre de ta pensée, j'accomplirai ton désir.

SMARH.

Que sais-je ? Car j'ai mille passions sans but, mille instincts confus ; j'ai comme, dans mon âme, les débris de vingt mondes, et je ne sens pas un souffle qui puisse ranimer toutes ces fleurs flétries de croyance et d'amour, d'illusions perdues ; mon cœur est sec comme un roc brûlé du soleil et battu de la tempête, je suis lassé comme si j'avais marché depuis des siècles sur une route de fer.

Et pourtant j'ai encore besoin de vivre ! Je sens, tout au fond de mon âme, quelque chose qui remue encore, et qui palpite, et qui veut vivre, quelque chose qui demande et qui appelle comme une voix d'enfant dans la nuit, cherchant sa mère. Parfois mon sang bouillonne comme si mes veines étaient d'airain rouge. p89

Oh ! Si quelque rosée du ciel, toute humide et toute fumeuse de parfums, venait baigner mon cœur et l'endormir ! Si le vent frais des nuits d'été pouvait ranimer mes yeux usés et fatigués de veilles et de fatigues !

SATAN.

Viens, viens, mon maître, ta course n'est pas finie ; tu te plaindras quand tu seras vieux ; sois ferme, aie le cœur dur pour vivre longtemps et ne désespère pas de l'avenir, si tu veux être heureux. Regarde le monde, il y a bien quelque six mille ans qu'il sue et qu'il travaille dans le cercle de l'infini, et il croit avancer parce qu'il tourne.

Allons ! Allons ! Tout est à toi, l'enfer va te servir ; le monde, pour te plaire, s'étale comme une nappe. Que veux-tu manger ? De quoi veux-tu te nourrir ? De gloire ? Des voluptés ? Des crimes ? Tout, tout est à toi !

Satan siffla, et deux chevaux ailés se présentèrent, leur dos était long et se pliait comme un serpent, leur large queue noire battait la terre, leur crinière flottait et sifflait au vent, leurs ailes se déployaient comme des ailes de chauves-souris, et, quand ils furent emportés par eux, on n'entendait que le bruit des vagues d'air que remuait leur vol, et celui de leurs naseaux qui lançaient la fumée. Ils couraient à pas de géant sur le monde ; sous eux étaient perdus les villes, les campagnes, les tours, les clochers, les mers ; ils allaient traversant les empires, et ce vol de l'enfer passait aussi vite que la poudre, ils semblaient eux-mêmes emportés par la tempête avec le sable du rivage. Satan se tenait immobile, droit, plein de majesté et d'orgueil, il regardait tout disparaître derrière lui, tout apparaître devant ; Smarh se tenait couché sur la crinière, à laquelle il se cramponnait pour se soutenir. Ils allaient côte à côte, dans cette course effrénée p90 du monde. Emportés par leurs chevaux, tout passait devant eux : pyramides, armées, tombeaux, ruisseaux, manteaux de pourpre, empires, tout cela passait comme l'espace qu'ils franchissaient. Leurs coursiers faisaient battre leurs ailes et baissaient la tête pour mieux bondir, mais Satan les pressait du flanc : — allons, disait-il, allons plus vite, ou je vous attacherai à la queue de quelque comète qui, dans sa course éternelle, vous fera mourir de fatigue. Plus vite ! Mangez donc l'air ! êtes-vous fatigués déjà pour quelques mille lieues que vous avez été toute une heure à faire ? Allons ! Plus vite, ou je vous casse la tête d'un coup de pied. Les nuages roulent, la neige tombe sur les montagnes, la mer se tord et mugit, l'air siffle, étendez-vous plus long, d'un bond franchissez-moi cette montagne, d'un coup d'aile passez-moi cet océan. Quand vous serez fatigués, vous irez vous reposer sur le coin de quelque nuée, et quand vous aurez faim, je vous donnerai à manger le marbre de quelque sépulcre.

Et la course recommençait, plus vive, plus longue, plus silencieuse, plus terrible. On les voyait de loin, dans les airs, marcher sur le vide et courir dans l'infini.

Quand les chevaux furent bien las, que leur crinière eut bien battu leur croupe, et que leurs flancs pressés furent couverts d'écume et de sang, ils finirent par tourner en planant dans les airs et s'abattirent sur la terre.

C'était le soir, le soleil se couchait, et ses teintes cuivrées illuminaient les coteaux ; c'était dans un cimetière de village, parmi les tombes grasses et les herbes. Les coursiers se traînaient sur le sol jonché de pierres brisées étendues, et leurs ailes raclaient sur la terre ; ils étaient haletants et se traînaient comme des lézards, couchés sur le ventre. p91

L'église était vieille, toute ridée, toute grise ; on voyait, à travers ses vitraux, quelques lampes s'allumer et s'éteindre ; des paysans jouaient et couraient devant le porche.

Smarh et Satan s'étaient assis au pied de l'if dont les rameaux allaient tout alentour, comme une large rose verte. Il se fit un silence, les hommes se turent, le vent cessa de souffler ; la nuit vint, Satan et Smarh se regardèrent longtemps l'un l'autre sans rien dire.

Satan était étendu sur l'herbe, il promenait son regard fauve sur l'horizon, et sa griffe entraînait machinalement dans une fente de tombeau et remuait sa cendre. Smarh le regardait, plein d'effroi, il tremblait comme la feuille, jamais il ne s'était senti si faible.

La nuit vint, une nuit toute splendide, pleine de clartés ; les feux rouges et bleus sortaient et rentraient de terre, la terre remuait et semblait s'agiter comme les vagues ; les hommes se mirent à fuir, mais la terre du cimetière montait sur les corps et les engloutissait. Les vitraux de l'église parurent s'agiter eux-mêmes et prendre vie, les lampes, allumées et vacillantes, les frappaient par derrière et semblaient les faire remuer, comme si les fleurs peintes eussent été des fleurs vertes et que quelque vent d'enfer les eût agitées.

Les personnages se mirent à marcher d'eux-mêmes, et Smarh vit le Christ dans le désert. Il était seul. Tout à coup le diable se présentait à lui, il avait une tête monstrueuse et ricanait horriblement, le Christ avait peur, Satan ouvrait la bouche, étendait les mains et faisait claquer ses ongles.

Smarh se détourna vivement vers lui, il lui semblait le voir ainsi, mais plus horrible ; il marchait dans le feu, et une sueur de sang coulait sur son corps. Les tombeaux semblaient s'agiter comme des débris de navire, sur les vagues vertes du gazon, qui ondulait mollement et laissait voir des quartiers de squelettes et p92 de cadavres, qu'allaient déterrer les coursiers ailés, et ils les mâchaient lentement.

Puis tout disparut, les ténèbres reparurent et l'on n'entendit qu'une pluie éternelle d'un sang bouillant et plein d'écume, qui brûlait la terre en tombant. Smarh tout à coup vit Yuk se berçant, en riant et en se tordant dans les convulsions d'un rire immense, à une longue corde qui partait du ciel et descendait jusqu'à l'enfer.

Ils reprirent leur route, et ils allaient par la nuit obscure, si loin qu'ils changèrent de monde et qu'ils arrivèrent au bord d'un beau fleuve.

On entendait le bruit de l'eau dans les bambous, dont les têtes ployaient sous le souffle du vent ; les ondes bleues roulaient, éclairées par la lune qui se reflétait sur elles ; au ciel les nuages l'entouraient et roulaient emportés en se déployant, et les eaux du fleuve aussi s'en allaient lentement, entre les prairies toutes pleines de silence, de fleurs. Les flots étaient si calmes qu'on eût pris le courant pour quelque serpent monstrueux qui s'allongeait lentement sur les herbes pour aller mordre au loin l'océan. Cependant on voyait glisser dessus les ombres scintillantes des étoiles et les masses noires des nuages ; souvent aussi les deux ailes blanches des cygnes disparaissaient dans les joncs verts. La nuit était chaude, limpide, toute vaporeuse de parfums, toute humide de la rosée des fleurs ; elle était transparente et bleue, comme si un grand feu d'étoiles l'eût éclairée par derrière. C'était un horizon large et grand, qui baisait au loin le ciel d'un baiser d'amour et de voluté.

Smarh se sentit revivre ; je ne sais quelle perception, jusque-là inconnue, de la nature entra dans son âme comme une faculté nouvelle, comme une jouissance p93 intime et transparente, au dedans de laquelle il voyait se mouvoir confusément des pensées riantes, des images tendres, vagues, indéceses. Il resta longtemps plongé dans la béatitude de l'extase et se laissant enivrer par tout cela, laissant son âme humer par tous ses pores l'harmonie et les délices de ce ciel diaphane, si large et si pur ; de cette campagne, avec ses herbes courbées par la brise embaumante, avec les fleurs balançant leurs calices et laissant échapper le parfum qui s'envole ; de cette onde de lait murmurante et douce dans les roseaux, avec ces cygnes dont le pied bat mollement les flots endormis, qui viennent mouiller d'un baiser tout fumant le sable doré et jonché de coquilles blanches.

Son âme se déployait et nageait à l'aise, elle étendait ses ailes et planait au milieu de cette création, toute ivre de parfums, toute dormeuse et nonchalante, comme une sultane sur des lits de roses. On sentait que la terre toute tiède grandissait en beauté dans son sommeil.

Voilà que les ondes s'arrêtent et semblent une lame d'argent qui est demeurée sur l'herbe, les joncs se taisent, les fleurs s'ouvrent, la nuit devient encore plus transparente, plus longue, plus voluptueuse ; et tandis que Smarh restait là, on voit s'élever, sortir, apparaître et s'enfuir, parmi la clarté douteuse, comme des ombres qui passent. De vagues formes de femmes nues, blanches, venaient autour de lui, marchant avec leurs pieds nus sur le tapis vert et frais ; elles l'entouraient, le regardaient, l'appelaient, puis elles s'en allaient bien vite, bien vite, en courant ; les unes se courbaient jusqu'à terre, et l'on voyait leur dos blanc, tout couvert de cheveux noirs, se plier avec un mouvement de fleur sous la brise ; les autres s'étendaient sur ses genoux, et leur tête retombait par terre et laissait voir leur gorge palpitante et brune ; elles étaient vives, folâtres, errantes, douteuses comme une suite d'images dans un songe d'amour. Elles venaient lui jeter des fleurs à la figure, en dansant autour de lui ; elles s'entrelaçaient avec leurs bras ronds et blancs sur leurs hanches de marbre, on voyait leur cou de cygne se ployer en arrière et leur gorge remuer comme si elles eussent chanté. Car elles chantaient, mais si bas, si confusément que Smarh n'entendait que des sons doux et faibles, comme ceux d'une flûte au dernier soupir d'une vibration mourante. Elles allaient dans le fleuve, et en ressortaient avec leurs beaux corps tout humides et leurs cheveux mouillés sur leurs seins ; souvent le flot d'azur les apportait devant lui, comme dans des bras invisibles et embaumés.

Smarh alors sentit en lui quelque chose qui montait comme une vague géante ; il avait devant lui je ne sais quelles illusions, qui éclairaient son cœur et le menaient déjà dans un avenir tout plein de délices, il voulait courir après, mais il lui échappait toujours et il courait toujours.

Elles étaient si belles ! Il y en avait qui descendaient de la nue grise, d'autres qu'apportaient les flots, d'autres qui sortaient de dessous terre, d'entre les herbes, les fleurs, et qui semblaient venir soit d'un rayon de la lune, soit du parfum d'une rose, oh ! Belles ! Belles ! Et si fines, si transparentes, qu'on les aurait prises pour les plus beaux rêves d'un poète ! Il y en avait de blanches avec des cheveux d'or, d'autres qui étaient brunes, ardentes, et qui avaient des yeux noirs qui semblaient lancer des jets de flammes.

C'était si beau de voir cette guirlande de femmes nues, entrelacées et remuant toutes, que Smarh courait dévoré par la rage. Elles lui échappaient des mains, et puis elles revenaient devant lui. Il avait un désir, un désir immense ; son âme était une chaudière rouge où se brûlait, toute torturée, une passion gigantesque ; p95 il y avait un démon en lui, qui le poussait en avant, lui disait cent choses infinies et lui chantait des chants sans mots, sans phrases, sans idées, mais quelque chose d'ardent, de dévorant, de large et de plein de colère, de frénésie, de plus rapide que la poudre, plus brûlant que le feu. Il allait, courait, venait ; tout son sang bouillonnait ; sa chair remuait et semblait se repêtrir dans cette passion, ses os étaient broyés, sa pensée malade courait dans un cercle de fer et se brisait la tête en voulant le franchir.

Enfin Satan en eut pitié, il frappa la terre avec son pied et il en sortit un palais.

Smarh se trouva dans une large salle, assis à une table toute couverte de mets ignorés ; il se précipitait dessus en savourant avec délices les premières bouchées, et buvait quelques gouttes des liqueurs les plus parfumées. Les lambris de marbre blanc, les pavés d'or étaient sculptés, ciselés ; il y avait de place en place des femmes nues et belles comme des statues, elles se confondaient avec elles ; des clartés ruisselantes illuminaient tout cela. C'étaient des chants sans fin, doux et purs comme celui de l'alouette dans les blés, comme la voix qui dit : je t'aime, dans un baiser ; c'était partout formes de rose, seins d'albâtre, beautés sans nombre, ivresses infinies.

Enfin, imaginez quelque chose de plus suave qu'un regard, de plus embaumant que les roses, de plus beau, de plus resplendissant que la nuit étoilée, la volupté sous toutes ses formes, sous toutes ses faces, avec ses ravissements, ses transports, ses battements de cœur, ses ivresses, son délire ; rêvez tout ce que vous voudrez de plus beau, de plus délirant ; songez aux formes les plus belles, aux mots les plus amoureux ; formez-vous dans votre esprit, avec l'imagination la plus délirante d'un poète et les souvenirs les p96

plus superbes et les plus titaniques de Rome, une fête de nuit, une orgie toute pleine de femmes nues, belles comme les Vénus, avec des chœurs de voix, avec des coupes d'or, avec les mets les plus exquis, les boissons les plus fumeuses ; dites-vous, si vous voulez : il y avait un palais fait avec du marbre et de l'or, des clartés sortaient des murs, les arbres portaient un feuillage rose, la mer roulait des flots de lait d'où sortaient des nymphes avec des couronnes et des guirlandes, il y avait des danses et des voluptés sans fin, des frénésies, des femmes sur des piédestaux, dans les poses les plus lubriques, les plus exquises ; croyez-vous donc qu'avec vos misérables mots, votre style qui boite et votre imagination qui bégaye, vous parviendrez à rendre une parcelle de ce qui arriva cette nuit-là ?

Avec votre langue châtrée par les grammairiens et déjà si pauvre, si châtrée d'elle-même, pouvez-vous exprimer tout le parfum d'une fleur, tout le verdoyant d'un pré d'herbe ? Me peindrez-vous seulement un tas de fumier ou une goutte d'eau ? Est-ce que le mot rend la pensée entière ? Est-ce que l'expression ne l'étreint pas dans elle-même ? Auparavant elle était libre, immense, impalpable, et vous la fixez, vous la collez, vous la clouez sur une misérable feuille de papier avec un mot bien pâle et bien sec. Voyons donc ! Avec des mots, des phrases et du style, faites-moi la description bien exacte d'un de vos souvenirs, d'un paysage, d'une mesure quelconque !

C'est là ce qui me désole. Savez-vous que j'ai rêvé longtemps à cette superbe orgie, et que je suis lassé de voir que je n'ai avancé à rien, et que je ne peux pas vous dire le moindre mot de cette pensée ou de cette chose qu'on nomme volupté, chose si transparente, si fine, si légère, une vapeur insaisissable et rose dans laquelle flottait l'âme toute oppressée et toute confuse. p97

Un jour que j'aurai de l'imagination, que j'aurai été penser à Néron sur les ruines de Rome, ou aux bayadères sur les bords du Gange, j'intercalerai la plus belle page qu'on ait faite ; mais je vous avertis d'avance qu'elle sera superbe, monstrueuse, épouvantablement impudique, qu'elle fera sur vous l'effet d'une tartine de cantharides, et que, si vous êtes vierge, vous apprendrez de drôles de choses, et que, si vous êtes vieillard, elle vous fera redevenir jeune ; ce sera une page qui passera en prodigalité la poésie de M Delille, en intérêt les tragédies de M Delavigne, en exubérance le style de J Janin, et en fioritures celles de P De Kock ; une page enfin, qui, si elle était affichée sur les murs, mettrait les murs en chaleur eux-mêmes, et ferait courir les populations dans les lupanars devenus désormais trop petits, et forcerait hommes et femmes à s'accoupler dans la rue, à la façon des chiens, des porcs, race fort inférieure à la race humaine, j'en conviens, qui est la plus douce et la plus inoffensive de toutes. En attendant, je m'arrête, car tout ce que j'ai de plus poétique à vous dire est de ne rien dire. Mais voilà Smarh qui s'est levé de dessus son lit de rose, les roses le fatiguaient, et il s'est assis par terre, sur le pavé de marbre blanc incrusté de diamant ; il est essoufflé, la sueur coule de son front, son grand œil, morne et vide, tout sec de larmes, se promène lentement et va se fermer ; sa paupière est de plomb, ses membres sont brisés de fatigue, son âme est navrée d'amertume et de dégoût. Pourquoi donc ? Les femmes viennent devant lui, elles l'appellent, elles retournent leurs croupes vermeilles et blanches, leurs hanches de satin se présentent à lui, leurs cheveux ondoient sur leurs épaules d'albâtre, leur sein palpite, leurs dents de perles laissent passer le sourire, leurs yeux, d'où découle une expression toute p98 tendre, toute ardente, noyés dans une amoureuse langueur, le regardent en face.

Tout à l'heure il courait après, il sautait, il bondissait, il rugissait de plaisir, il se pâmait, il se mourait ; et voilà qu'il les repousse, qu'il n'en veut plus, qu'il détourne la tête et veut dormir. On lui apporte, dans des plats d'or, un mets pour lequel ont travaillé pendant trois jours vingt esclaves ; des flottes sont parties dans tous les sens pour en rapporter ce qu'il faut ; ce n'est ni un fruit, ni une viande, ni un poisson, c'est de l'inouï, de l'inventé, quelque chose à mourir de plaisir ; à peine s'il l'a mis sous son palais qu'il l'a recraché. On lui présente, dans une coupe de diamant ciselé, un vin d'azur pilé avec des grappes du raisin d'Asie, tout embaumé des parfums les plus doux, un vin si délicieux qu'on n'en boira jamais de pareil ; à peine s'il en a mouillé sa lèvre que la nausée lui est venue et qu'il l'a jeté par terre.

Tout à l'heure il aimait les mots d'amour, l'alcôve fermée, la femme frémissante et évanouie la gorge étendue ; il aimait les soupirs, les baisers, les longues pâmoisons, les yeux noyés de larmes ; il aimait la danse ivre, folâtre, longue chaîne amoureuse ; il aimait les resplendissantes clartés, la lune argentant les pelouses vertes, il aimait le mystère des bois, le parfum des fleurs ; il aimait toutes ces choses qui navrent l'âme et la font fondre en délices. Qu'a-t-il donc ?

Tout cela était pourtant bien beau ! Et avec quelle ardeur il l'avait convoité ! Que de fois il avait appelé dans ses rêves ce quelque chose de surhumain et d'impossible !

Il s'ennuie, il a l'âme pleine et vide comme un ballon rempli d'air.

Non ! Tout cela, toutes ces beautés sans nombre, toutes ces délices inventées, il n'en veut plus ; il reste p99

là sur le flanc, ivre mort, le dégoût plein le cœur, le corps fatigué, l'œil morne et béant ; la volupté le lasse, elle l'a remué, chatouillé, irrité, puis elle l'a pris, l'a brisé comme un roseau, et l'a jeté ensuite dans la satiété et l'ennui, l'ennui brut et mort comme une chape de plomb qui couvre l'âme et l'écrase.

Et Yuk est encore là avec son ignoble figure ; il bave sur la pourpre, il casse le marbre et fond l'or ; il brise les statues, il boit les vins et crache sur les mets ; il prend les femmes, les épuise depuis la tête jusqu'aux pieds, depuis les larmes jusqu'au rire, le corps et l'âme ; il fait tout vil et laid, il vieillit la jeunesse, enlaidit la beauté, abaisse ce qui est grand, rend amer ce qui est doux, il dégrade la noblesse ; le voilà qui s'établit comme un roi dans la volupté et qui la rend vénale, ignoble, crapuleuse et vraie.

Smarh se met à rire lui-même et à mépriser la chair ; il se relève, dresse la tête et s'écrie : — Satan ! Satan ! Je ne veux pas de tes joies ; autre chose ! Allons, un cheval ! Une armée ! Des batailles ! Du sang ! J'en veux à y noyer des peuples ! Crois-tu donc que je suis fait pour m'endormir dans la mollesse et m'abrutir dans les voluptés ? Arrière tout cela ! Te dis-je, je veux être grand, immense ; je veux être un des souvenirs du monde, et le manier dans mes deux mains, et le battre longtemps avec les quatre pieds de mon cheval.

Et le voilà parti comme la flèche que l'arc tendu a lancée en avant, il traîne derrière lui toute une armée qui court pour le suivre, il passe les Alpes, l'Himalaya, traverse les océans, les déserts, il va. Un vautour plane sur sa tête et étend ses ailes noires ; quelquefois il vient s'abattre sur sa couronne et pousse des cris rauques, en voyant le sang rejaillir et la plaine, toute couverte d'hommes, se couvrir de cadavres comme des épis fauchés ; il va toujours. p100

Il va, et partout derrière lui il se fait une grande ruine, la terre est calcinée, l'herbe ne repousse plus, la cendre vole aux vents, les fleuves sont encombrés de morts, le sang rougit la neige des montagnes.

Les hommes meurent à ses côtés et tendent des bras suppliants vers lui, mais le poitrail de son cheval renverse les pyramides, et ses pas broient les villes ; il va.

Et l'on n'entend plus derrière lui qu'un grand soupir, qu'un dernier râle, on palpite encore, l'incendie n'a plus que sa fumée, les cadavres pourrissent, les os sont blanchis par les pluies d'orage ; il va. En vain il a rencontré le hameau où il naquit, la cabane où sa mère le mit au jour ; il a brûlé la moisson, il a renversé le toit de son père ; il a passé et l'on n'a plus vu qu'une longue trace de sang. Il a mis des chaînes aux peuples qu'il a vaincus ! Puis il a dit : "je reviendrai ", et il est parti, et ils sont tous morts dans la servitude, voilà les fers qui sont rouillés et les squelettes qui craquent aux vents.

Il a tout détruit, est-ce qu'il ne veut faire de la terre qu'un vaste tombeau pour y enfermer son nom ? Ne s'arrêtera-t-il jamais ? Il a usé vingt générations à le suivre, et il va toujours, il va si vite que les aigles ne le peuvent suivre et que les vautours n'ont pas le temps de finir leur large festin ; son manteau flotte au vent, son épée est cassée, il bat son cheval avec son sceptre, et il lui enfonce les talons dans le ventre ; la crinière de son coursier est hérissée, l'écume blanchit sa bouche, son sabot est tout usé, il lève la tête pour humer la vapeur du sang. Jamais il ne s'arrête, jamais un regard vers le passé, car la tête en avant et fronçant le sourcil, son œil dévore l'horizon, il marche à grands pas dans l'avenir et rêve les conquêtes d'un autre monde ; il a un démon ailé qui vole devant lui et lui crie, avec la voix des armes qui s'entrechoquent : "encore, encore p101 cela ! Il y a un océan que tu n'as pas traversé, un empire de plus ! Est-ce assez ? Marche donc !" il se sent poussé lui-même avec le vent qui remue ses drapeaux, il désire que le monde soit plus grand pour que sa conquête soit plus grande, il voudrait courir avec le canon pour porter plus vite la mort et le néant.

Son lit de lauriers est trop petit, il jette des flottes sur les océans et des armées sur les empires, il va toujours cassant, broyant, emportant dans ses deux bras les peuples éplorés et traînant le monde esclave à la croupe de son cheval.

Quand son navire fend les ondes, la carène remue les cadavres balancés par la vague et les débris des flottes. Quand son cheval galope, souvent le sang lui vient jusqu'au poitrail, souvent son pied entre dans le ventre des morts. S'il lève la tête, il voit un ciel rougi par la lueur de l'incendie.

Il marcha ainsi longtemps, si longtemps que la terre était déserte du sud au nord. Il passa par l'Asie et l'Europe, l'ancien et le nouveau monde ; il traversa les océans de la glace et les mers du sud où l'eau brûle et fume sur un sable de feu ; les déserts, les forêts, tout garda l'empreinte sanglante du talon du vainqueur qui avait broyé quelque chose à chacun de ses pas.

Il alla toujours. Il vit bien des frais ruisseaux, bien des bois pleins de mousse, de larges feuillages et des belles roses, et il ne désaltéra pas au ruisseau sa gorge séchée par la poussière, il n'y lava pas ses mains, il ne s'assit pas sous les feuilles vertes pour regarder les nues s'en aller et venir dans le ciel. Il n'aimait rien ; son âme était vide comme le désert et insatiable comme lui. à mesure qu'il avançait, son ambition se grossissait aussi, la montagne montait toujours plus vite que le voyageur. Enfin il arriva que tout fut fini, et qu'un jour son p102 cheval s'abattit au bout du monde, devant l'infini océan que l'homme ne peut franchir, au bord duquel il reste toujours, regardant s'il ne verra pas apparaître quelque cavale pour partir, quelque étoile pour l'éclairer ; il est là, s'amusant à ramasser des débris de coquilles et parcelles de grains de sable. Il avait donc tout fini. Que faire ? Où aller ? La terre était déserte, vide d'esclaves et d'armées. Il leva les yeux vers le ciel et fut pris d'une ardeur sans bornes :

— qu'est-ce que le monde ? Qu'il est petit ! J'y étouffe, s'écria-t-il, élargis-moi cette terre ! étends ses océans, recule-moi ces bornes-là, élargis-moi l'atmosphère où je vis. Est-ce tout ? Est-ce que la vie se bornera là ? J'ai dévoré le monde, je veux autre chose : l'éternité ! L'éternité !

Et il tâcha de faire un grand tas de toute la poussière qu'il avait faite, il fit une pyramide de têtes de morts séchées par les vents, il balaya avec des drapeaux déchirés tout le sang versé, et il le mit dans une fosse et répéta : gloire ! Gloire ! Mais tout croula vite, la poussière même s'envola, les ossements l'engloutirent, la terre but le sang, et il sentit une voix qui disait derrière lui :

— l'éternité, la gloire, l'immortalité, c'est moi ! Mais il se leva lentement, comme une ombre qui sort d'un tombeau, avec un long linceul tout pourri, qui enveloppait un squelette avec des lambeaux de chair aussi verts que l'herbe des cimetières. Il avait une tête toute jaunie, avec un vieux sourire froid de courtisane ; son bâton, c'était un sceptre doré qui portait un soc de charrue.

Il se leva plein de colère :

— qui ose dire qu'il y a de l'immortalité ?

YUK.

C'est moi qui l'ose.

— sais-tu qui je suis ? Vois donc mes pieds tout pleins de poussière des empires, et la frange de mon manteau toute mouillée par les larmes des générations.

Il secoua son linceul et il en tomba de la poussière rougie.

— C'est l'histoire, ajouta le spectre ; ose dire qu'il y a immortalité sinon pour moi ?

YUK.

Pour moi.

— Qui donc es-tu ?

YUK.

Et toi ?

LA MORT.

La mort ! et toi ?

YUK.

Vois donc ! Ma tête va jusqu'aux nues, mes pieds remuent la cendre des tombeaux ; quand je parle, c'est le monde qui dit quelque chose, c'est le créateur qui crée, c'est la création qui agit ; je suis le passé, le présent, le futur, le monde et l'éternité, cette vie et l'autre, le corps et l'âme ; tu peux abattre des pyramides et faire mourir des insectes, mais tu ne m'arracheras pas la moindre parcelle de quelque chose.

Je me moque de ton linceul et de tes joies de sépulcre, je me ris de ta face qui a toujours glissé sur moi comme l'eau sur le marbre. Ta tête jaune, ton ventre en lambeaux, toute la poussière qui t'entoure, les pleurs de sang, les sanglots, tout ce magnifique cortège dont tu te fais gloire, les ruines, le passé, l'histoire, tous ces grains de sable qui forment ton trône, le monde qui est la roue sur qui tu tournes dans le temps, tout cela, te dis-je, depuis les océans les plus larges jusqu'aux larmes d'un chien, l'Atlas jusqu'à un tas de fumier, depuis un tronc jusqu'à un brin d'herbe, tout cela qui est ton domaine, ta gloire, ton royaume, p104 que sais-je enfin ? Tout ce que tu manges, tout ce que tu dévores, tout ce qui vit et qui meurt, tout ce qui est commencé pour finir, tout cela me fait pitié, tu entends ? Tout cela me fait rire, moi, et d'un rire plus fort que le bruit de ton pied quand il broiera le monde d'un seul coup !

LA MORT.

Qui donc es-tu ?

YUK.

Eh quoi ! Ne m'as-tu donc jamais vu ? Aux funérailles des empereurs, n'était-ce pas moi qui étais couché sur le drap noir, qui conduisais les chevaux ? N'est-ce pas moi qui ai creusé les fosses, qui ai fait pourrir ensemble les cadavres des héros dans leurs mausolées de marbre et les charognes de loups sous les feuilles des bois ?

Quand tu es entrée dans l'église, et que tu t'es mise à faucher comme ailleurs, vieille vorace que tu es, toi qui manges de la terre et du bronze, n'as-tu pas vu ma main éternelle qui cassait le christ et souillait l'autel ?

Eh quoi ! Quand l'aurore blanchit les vitres au sortir de quelque orgie, quand tu viens boire le vin dans les coupes d'or et essuyer ta bouche aux dents usées avec la nappe de pourpre, n'as-tu pas entendu ma chanson, qui bourdonnait avec les verres qui se brisaient et les mouches à viande qui voltigeaient sur les lèvres bleues des morts ?

Quand tu te baisses jusqu'à terre et que tu te penches pour mieux faucher, n'as-tu rien entrevu à travers l'écroulement des monarchies ? Au milieu des ruines qui tombent, n'as-tu pas entendu le fracas des pyramides qui s'écroulent, une autre ruine au milieu de ces ruines, une voix au milieu de ces voix, une grimace parmi ces figures ?

N'as-tu pas vu quelque chose de plus fort que le p105 temps, quelque chose qui le mène, qui le pousse, le remplit et qui le soûle ? N'as-tu pas vu une autre éternité dans l'éternité ?

Tu crois que tout est fini quand tu as passé ? Tu te crois l'infini, et que tu donnes des bornes où ton pied se met ? Partout où ta charrue laboure, tu crois y semer le néant ? Comme si, après l'incendie, il n'y avait pas les cendres ! Après le cadavre, n'y a-t-il pas la pourriture ? Après le temps, n'y a-t-il pas l'éternité ?

LA MORT.

Qui donc es-tu ? Parle ! Parle !

YUK.

Ah ! Qui je suis ? Je suis le vrai, je suis l'éternel, je suis le bouffon, le grotesque, le laid, te dis-je ; je suis ce qui est, ce qui a été, ce qui sera ; je suis toute l'éternité à moi seul. Pardieu ! Tu me connais bien, plus d'une fois je t'ai baisée au visage et j'ai mordu tes os, nous avons eu de bonnes nuits, enveloppés tous deux dans ton linceul troué.

LA MORT.

C'est vrai ! Je t'avais oublié, ou du moins je voulais t'oublier, car tu me gênes, tu me tirailles, tu m'épuises, tu m'accables, tu veux avoir, à toi seul, tout ce que j'ai, et je crois qu'il ne me resterait plus qu'un seul fil de mon manteau que tu me l'arracherais.

YUK.

C'est vrai, je suis un époux quelque peu tyrannique, mais je t'apporte chaque jour tant de choses que tu ne devrais pas te plaindre.

LA MORT.

C'est vrai ! Faisons bon ménage, car nous ne pouvons vivre l'un sans l'autre. Après tout, tu manges encore p106 les miettes qui tombent de ma bouche et la poussière que font mes pieds.

Alors tout le passé de sa vie apparut à Smarh, rapidement, d'un seul jet, comme dans un éclair. Il revit passer d'abord sa chaumière d'ermite, avec son crucifix de bois, avec sa vie sainte, avec ses jours purs, avec ses nuits tranquilles ; il se rappela que quelqu'un était venu lui parler, qu'il y avait eu alors dans son âme une immense confusion, tout un chaos de pensées ; et qu'il était parti avec cet être, qu'il était monté, monté, il ne savait où ni comment, mais à des hauteurs si hautes, si immenses, que la pensée même ne peut y atteindre ; et il avait une grande peur, son âme s'était pliée comme un roseau et s'était brisée sous l'ouragan de l'infini.

Puis il y avait eu une tempête, et il avait été, devant la nature, plus faible que l'aile d'une mouche ; il avait encore là senti quelque chose qui pesait sur lui, comme si on avait mis un plomb sur cette aile, et il était resté, tombé, attaché à cette lourde chaîne invisible.

Il avait vu aussi la vie barbare s'acheminant vers les cités, et les cités elles-mêmes, mais en dedans, avec toutes ces choses qui tombent, le roi, l'église, la vertu, tout cela se fanant et se pourrissant. Il y avait là un vide dans son souvenir. Puis tout à coup il vit repasser, comme par une illumination magique, toutes les femmes l'appelant, lui souriant ; il se rappela ses voluptés et ses dégoûts, toute la vie ! Et ses courses effrénées à cheval, tout écumeuses et toutes sanglantes du sang des morts, des cris, des bruits d'armes ; et puis une grande plaine toute vide, avec de la cendre, et il tomba mourant, abîmé par ces souvenirs, corps, le déchirant, le faisant tourner, courir ; elle le harcèle, le poursuit sans qu'il puisse l'éviter. Cela dura jusqu'à ce qu'il fût tombé, étourdi, épuisé de fatigue.

Cette agonie-là dura longtemps, et plus longue et plus cruelle que celle du Christ, car elle était sans espoir, sans aucun horizon qui apparût au bout de ce long chemin vide et plein de douleurs, sans soleil qui perçât les nuages, sans aurore après cette nuit. Lui aussi sua une sueur de sang et de larmes, et on les entendait tomber sur la terre.

Ah ! Ce fut pire, car sa croix, c'était son âme qu'il avait peine à porter et qui le brisait. Il l'avait portée dans la vie, et arrivé au haut du calvaire, il la laissa tomber de lassitude.

Le séjour du tombeau pour lui ne fut pas de trois jours, et son tombeau n'était point un couvercle de pierre, mais c'était le cadavre vivant de la pensée qui se remuait et se tordait sous le sépulcre de la vie et du fini.

Mais dans sa lassitude, au milieu de ses larmes silencieuses, quand tout pesait si durement sur lui, il s'éleva cependant comme un dernier soupir, un dernier baiser, quelque chose d'immense, d'amoureux, d'impalpable. Il se ranima, ouvrit les yeux, chercha ce qu'il n'avait jamais vu, désira ce qui n'existait pas ; il tendit les bras vers un infini sans bornes, et il se prit à rêver de belles choses inconnues. Son âme, toute usée, comme une vieille voile que les ouragans ont crevée et qui est retombée sans souffle, commença à palpiter, comme si une brise du soir, courant sur une mer du sud et apportant des parfums et de doux et vagues échos, l'eût enflée ; il reprit à la vie, et son cœur se rouvrit à l'espérance comme les fleurs au soleil.

Quelle journée devait l'attendre ? Quel ouragan allait la casser sur sa tige ? Pauvre fleur ! Pauvre âme ! p108

C'était un enfant, tout jeune, tout rose encore, l'âme imprégnée d'amour, de rêveries, d'extases. Le matin, il partait, mais il n'allait ni vers les champs où son père labourait, ni sur le rivage où la barque de ses frères aînés était attachée, car il aimait à contempler les nues fugitives, les moissons qui se ploient et s'ondulent aux vents comme une mer ; il allait dans les bois et il écoutait la pluie tomber sur le feuillage, les oiseaux qui roucoulaient sur la haie fleurie, et les insectes qui bourdonnent dans les airs et qui se jouent dans les rayons du soleil ; il regardait la neige tomber, il écoutait le vent mugir. Il allait toujours vers la mer, c'étaient là tous ses amours. Il courait jusqu'à ce que ses pieds eussent touché le sable et que le vent des vagues vînt sécher ses cheveux blonds tout mouillés de sueur. Le soleil brûlait sa peau blanche, les rochers déchiraient ses pieds ; que lui faisait cela ? Lui qui écoutait les flots mourir sur la grève et qui regardait le soleil qui se baigne sous l'écume.

Il se mettait dans un ancre de rocher, comme l'aigle dans son aire, et là, comme lui, il contemplait le soleil et l'océan. Il regardait au loin toute la verte plaine sillonnée d'écume et parsemée des écorchures de la brise, il suivait l'ombre des rochers, qui s'allongeait et diminuait sur le rivage ; immobile, il contemplait la même vague pendant longtemps, le même brin d'herbe, le même rocher avec son varech d'où l'eau ruisselle en perles, le même flocon d'écume que roulait le vent sur le rivage.

Souvent il prenait du sable plein ses mains, il ouvrait les doigts, et il prenait plaisir à voir les rayons de sable partir de différents côtés et disparaître en tourbillonnant, en s'élevant. Le soir, il regardait le soleil s'abaisser dans l'horizon, et ses gerbes de feu s'élancer des vagues et former un immense réseau lumineux ; les mouettes rasaient les flots, le sable, emporté par p109 la brise qui s'élève, roulait et courait sur le rivage. La nuit, c'étaient les étoiles, la lune, les rayons argentés sur les vagues vertes.

Et toujours ainsi il vécut ses plus belles années, il grandit sans faire autre chose que de mener une vie contemplative, une vie de pleurs, d'extases, de rêveries, une vie molle et paresseuse ; il vécut comme les fleurs elles-mêmes, vivant au soleil et regardant le ciel. Tout ce qui chantait, volait, palpitait, rayonnait, les oiseaux dans les bois, les feuilles qui tremblent au vent, les fleuves qui coulent dans les prairies émaillées, rochers arides, tempêtes, orages, vagues écumeuses, sable embaumant, feuilles d'automne qui tombent, neiges sur les tombeaux, rayons de soleil, clairs de lune, tous les chants, toutes les voix, tous les parfums, toutes ces choses qui forment la vaste harmonie qu'on nomme nature, poésie, Dieu, résonnaient dans son âme, y vibraient en longs chants intérieurs qui s'exhalaient par des mots épars, arrachés. Mais ce qu'il y a de plus sublime, de meilleur, de plus beau, ne s'en échappe jamais ; cela, au fond, c'est la musique intérieure, celle des pensées ; les vers mêmes ne sont que l'écho affaibli qui vient de l'autre monde. Un soir, en revenant, c'était un crépuscule d'été, le soleil était rouge, et des fils blancs s'attachaient aux cheveux ; et ce jour-là il avait regardé, comme les autres jours, la mer se rouler sur son sable, les herbes frémir au vent, les nuages se déployer, partir et s'en aller, comme des pensées, dans l'infini du ciel bleu. Mais il avait regardé tout cela sans le voir, il y avait dans son âme bien d'autres tempêtes que celles de l'océan, bien d'autres nuages que ceux du ciel.

Pourquoi donc s'ennuyait-il déjà, le pauvre enfant ? Il avait voulu un horizon plus vaste que celui qui s'étendait sous ses yeux, quelque chose de plus resplendissant p110 que le soleil. Lorsqu'il voyait, dans les belles nuits d'été, les bouquets de roses et les jasmins secouer aux souffles des vents leurs têtes fleuries, que la brise agitait les feuilles vertes et qu'elle remuait, dans ses plis invisibles, des échos lointains d'amour et des parfums de fleur, que la lune brillait toute pure et toute sereine, avec ses lumières qui montent et brillent et coulent silencieusement là-haut, avec les nuages qui s'étendent comme des montagnes mouvantes ou les vagues géantes d'un autre océan, il avait senti qu'il y avait encore dans son âme quelque chose de plus doux que tous ces parfums, de plus suave que toutes ces clartés, comme s'il y avait en lui des sources intarissables de volupté et des mondes de lumières qui rayonnaient au dedans.

Ce n'était plus assez de rester dans le fond de la vieille barque grêle, de se laisser bercer par la marée montante, couché sur les filets aux mailles rompues, alors que le soleil brillait sur les flots et que la quille venait battre le sable et les cailloux qui erraient sous elle, ni de voir au crépuscule les flots s'avancer et les sauterelles de mer rebondir comme la pluie sur le rivage, ni de sentir dans ses cheveux le vent de l'automne qui roule les feuilles jaunies et les plumes de la colombe, et qui semble murmurer des pleurs dans les rameaux morts ; rien de tout cela ! Eh quoi ! Ni les baisers de cette belle fille brune, qui l'attend chaque soir à la chapelle de la vierge et qui est là chaque nuit dans les bruyères, regardant à travers la brume si elle ne verra pas apparaître son ombre, si elle n'entendra pas le souffle de sa voix ? Ni sa pauvre chaumière, avec son toit de paille pourri, couvert de neige dans l'hiver, mais tout blanc de fleurs dans l'été ? Sa mère file sous l'âtre de la cheminée, un banc de gazon est là devant ; tout jeune, il y dormait au soleil ; enfant, c'est sur le sabre de son grand-père qu'il montait à cheval, c'est son vieux casque p111 qu'il roulait sur l'herbe, c'est dans son bouclier qu'il dormait ; c'est dans ce vieux lit-là qu'il naquit.

De la fenêtre on ne voit point la mer, elle est là, derrière cette colline ; mais on entend le bruit des flots et, dans l'hiver, elle déborde à droite dans le marais.

Il s'en retournait ainsi, bercé par sa marche et écoutant lui-même le bruit de ses pas dans les herbes, regardant le soleil qui se retirait à l'horizon, et les bœufs couchés à l'ombre et remuant la tête pour chasser les moucheron.

Et tout à coup il sentit une forme passer près de lui, comme si une bouche eût effleuré sa joue ; et une fée lui apparut avec un diadème d'or, elle répandit devant lui des fleurs, des diamants, et je ne sais quels lauriers que les vents emportèrent. Elle-même disparut dans un tourbillon de poussière.

Il était venu dans la ville, le cœur tout gonflé d'espérance, joyeux, ivre de lui-même, marchant à grands pas dans la vie future qu'il comblait de félicités sans bornes et d'enthousiasmes immenses. Agité depuis longtemps par son âme, remué par toutes les choses qui y bourdonnaient, il avait voulu être poète.

Poète, c'est-à-dire avoir des cheveux blancs avant l'âge, marcher de dégoût en dégoût, s'avancer dans le monde et voir l'illusion vers laquelle on avance, fuir toujours sans la saisir, être là comme ce géant de la fable, avec une soif infinie, une faim qui ronge, et sentir échapper toujours ces fruits qu'on a rêvés, qu'on a sentis, et dont la saveur prématurée est venue jusqu'à nous. Être là, présent, avec sa jalousie, sa rage, son amour, son âme, devant ce monde si froid, si railleur ; s'épuiser, donner son sang, ce qui est plus que son sang, son cœur ; le verser à plein bord dans des vers qu'on a ciselés comme du marbre, et tout cela pour être mis sous les pieds de la foule, pour qu'on le casse, pour qu'on le broie, pour qu'on le pétrisse p112 dans le dédain, pour qu'on jette de la boue sur les ailes blanches de ces pauvres anges qui sont partis de votre cœur.

Poète, s'était-il dit, oh ! Poète ! Poète ! Il répétait ce mot-là comme une mélodie aimée qu'on a dans le souvenir et qui chante toujours dans notre oreille ses notes amoureuses.

Oh ! Poète ! Se sentir plus grand que les autres, avoir une âme si vaste qu'on y fait tout entrer, tout tourner, tout parler, comme la créature dans la main de Dieu ; exprimer toute l'échelle immense et continue qui va depuis le brin d'herbe jusqu'à l'éternité, depuis le grain de sable jusqu'au cœur de l'homme ; avoir tout ce qu'il y a de plus beau, de plus doux, de plus suave, les plus larges amours, les plus longs baisers, les longues rêveries la nuit, les triomphes, les bravos, l'or, le monde, l'immortalité ! N'est-ce pas pour lui, la mousse des bois fleuris, le battement d'ailes de la colombe, le sable embaumant de la rive, la brise toute parfumée des mers du sud, tous les concerts de l'âme, toutes les voix de la nature, les paroles de Dieu, à lui, le poète ?

Fais-moi des vers, dis-moi quelque chose, chante-moi un rayon de soleil ou un soupir de femme, mais que ta voix soit douce, qu'elle m'endorme comme sous des roses, qu'elle me navre, qu'elle me fasse mourir de volupté, d'extases.

Quand je te verrai, ô poète, quand tu m'auras dit toutes les choses de l'âme, que j'aurai recouvré tes accents, je me mettrai à tes genoux, tu seras mon dieu, je n'en ai point ; j'étalerai tous les manteaux royaux sous tes pieds, je fonderai toutes les couronnes pour te faire un marchepied.

Et il s'était mis un jour à prendre une plume, il l'avait saisie avec frénésie, il l'avait écrasée, en pleurant de joie et d'orgueil, sur un morceau de papier ; il était là, haletant, l'œil en feu, saisissant au vol les idées qui passaient dans son âme, épiant chaque chose de son cœur pour l'attirer au dehors, pour la déshabiller, pour la donner toute nue à la foule. Son âme tournait en lui comme un gouffre vivant, il voulait l'arrêter, mais ce gouffre-là l'entraînait lui-même ; il commençait à se sentir faiblir et il se disait :

— malheur ! Malheur ! Qu'ai-je donc ? Le feu brûle mon âme, mais ma tête est de glace ; autrefois j'avais des pensées, plus une seule ! Je sens seulement des passions sans but, qui roulent en moi, comme des vagues qui s'entrechoquent par une nuit sombre. Que dire ? Que faire ? Cela même.

Oh ! La misère ! Je ne pourrai donc pas pousser un seul soupir que tout craque, s'écroule, se brise en moi ! Mon âme se gonfle, elle m'étouffe, elle va crever le corps qui la recouvre comme une main gonflée qui déchire le gant. Pourquoi donc ? Quelle malédiction ! écris, écris donc, malheureux, puisque le démon t'y pousse !

Oui ! La pensée est en moi, je la sens qui se meut comme un immense serpent, je la vois comme un large horizon qui se déploie à l'aurore, le soleil brille, la brume s'envole, la voilà qui monte, elle grandit, elle approche, je la tiens... tu es à moi, à moi ! Comme cela est beau, sublime ! J'ai donc du génie, moi ? Non, non, hélas !

Voilà que tu t'envoles donc, chère illusion ? Et toi aussi, orgueil, tu me quittes ? Qu'aurai-je ? Et cependant... tout n'a pas été dit ! Voyons, creusons, remuons mon âme, dût-elle ensuite me tomber en poussière dans les mains.

L'amour ! L'amour ! Eh bien ? Ah ! Quelle misérable vanité ! Est-ce que jamais des vers diront tous les miracles d'un sourire ou toutes les voluptés d'un regard ? L'amour ! Quand j'aurai bien répété cela des fois, est-ce que j'aurai dit quelque chose de plus ? Non ! p114

La gloire, par exemple ? Voyons : des conquérants, Alexandre, César, Napoléon... eh bien ! Des chars, de la poudre, du sang. Ah ! Quelle stupidité ! De la gloire ? La convoitise me brûle, et je ne peux pas dire la meilleure partie de la rage que j'ai dans le cœur.

Si je parlais de la mort plutôt ? C'est du néant, cela, c'est du vrai ; mais ma pensée s'y perd, et plus je pense moins je parle. Si j'étais un cadavre ressuscité, je dirais bien quelque chose, et si les vers qui nous déchirent le ventre c'est une joie ou un supplice ; et si la tombe est si noire qu'on le dit. Mais que dire ? Est-ce que c'est là la limite de l'art ? Est-ce que la poésie est un monde tout aussi mensonger que l'autre ? N'ira-t-on jamais plus loin ?

Et cependant j'ai du génie, je le sens, j'en suis plein, il me semble qu'il déborde... non, c'est de l'orgueil ! L'orgueil, le sang des poètes !

Rien dire, rester là, muet, en présence de ce monde idiot qui vous regarde avec sa mine béante, paillasse déguenillé qui pleure et qui veut rire, et qui demande encore quelque chose de beau pour l'amuser ! Mais l'amour, la gloire, la mort, l'orgueil, tous ces néants-là qui m'entourent et m'assiègent, pas une lettre de tout cela à écrire !

Dieu ? Autrefois j'y croyais. Que je me reporte par la pensée au temps où je priais la vierge à genoux, et où ma mère m'apprenait des prières. Si j'allais redevenir dévot, j'aurais au moins quelque chaleur, quelque conviction, je pourrais remuer les autres ; mais je suis trop fier pour mentir, et puis je ne le pourrais pas, moi qui rit en passant devant l'église et qui ai craché sur la croix, un jour où j'avais faim. Mais comment aimer quelque chose, espérer, croire, puisque tout est si horrible ici, puisque le doute est là, à chaque mot, puisque chaque croyance est tombée sous le coup de dent du malheur et du désespoir ? Dans ce monde et dans la poésie, dans le fini et dans p115 l'infini, en dehors, dans mon âme, tout me ment, tout me trompe, tout fuit et tout se met à rire, et voilà que je suis resté dans un océan de fange où je tournoie, où je m'engloutis. Je ferais mieux de rire de tout cela, et d'aller me soûler à la taverne ou bien de courir chez la fille de joie me vautrer dans quelque ignoble et vénale volupté.

Tant mieux ! Je n'ai plus à descendre. Il y a encore peu, je craignais que mon malheur n'augmentât, que ma chute ne fût plus profonde, mais me voilà au fond du gouffre..., à moins qu'il n'y ait des enfers sous l'enfer et un désespoir encore après le désespoir. Et cependant, est-ce que je puis rester ainsi toujours ? Mais je ne suffirais pas aux malheurs qui me dévorent, et il faudrait que mon cœur se double pour que tout le dégoût que j'ai pût y contenir longtemps.

Et quand je pense, hélas ! Qu'autrefois je me contentais d'un rayon de soleil, d'une moisson dorée, d'un beau clair de lune dans les bois, et que j'en avais assez, et que cela m'emplissait, et que j'étais heureux quand j'avais mis tous ces échos dans mes strophes sonores et arrondies ! Oh ! Qu'il y a loin déjà de ce temps-là à maintenant ! J'étais si jeune ! Si enfant ! Si heureux !

Mais, après avoir pris la nature, j'ai voulu prendre le cœur, après le monde, l'infini, et je me suis perdu dans ces abîmes sans fond, voilà que j'y roule. J'ai voulu sonder les passions, les disséquer, en faire de superbes squelettes, mais c'est mon âme que la mort a prise, et ces passions, que je voudrais courber sous mon genou et les montrer façonnées de mes mains, ce sont elles qui m'ont entraîné dans leurs courants, dans leurs tempêtes. J'ai cru que rien n'était trop haut pour moi, rien de trop fort, et je suis au fond du néant, plus faible qu'un roseau brisé. Adieu donc, tous ces beaux rêves, ces belles journées que l'aurore menteur m'annonçait si resplendissantes et si pures ; j'aurai donc entrevu un monde d'enthousiasme, p116 de transports ; l'éclair aura brillé devant mes yeux et m'a laissé ensuite dans les ténèbres, sous ce paradis de pensées dont le large glaive froid de la réalité me sépare pour l'éternité.

Ah ! Prison de chair, je te maudis ! Pourquoi es-tu là ? Voyons ! Que fais-tu, misérable charogne vivante, qui traînes ta pourriture par les rues, qui bois, qui manges, qui dors et qui jouis ? Pourquoi suis-je attaché à ce cadavre qui me traîne sur la terre, moi qui veux voler dans les cieux et partir dans l'infini ? Qu'avais-tu donc fait, pauvre âme, pour venir là, dans la prison de ce corps, où tu bats en vain des ailes que tu brises aux parois qui t'entourent ? Je sens bien que tu veux partir, que tu y pleures, et lorsque je vois les étoiles tu t'élances vers elles, quand la mer est devant moi tu veux courir dessus plus vite que le regard ; et quand je vois les tombes, n'est-ce pas toi qui tends les bras vers elles tandis que le corps veut vivre ?

Tu es un chant, une note, un soupir... non, non, rien de tout cela ! Tu es le cœur gonflé, tu es cette voix qui parle et qui prie, qui sanglote et se tord en moi, tandis que mes lèvres sourient.

ô pauvre aigle, tu es là dans une cage ; à travers tes barreaux tu vois encore les hautes cimes perdues dans les nuages où tu naquis, tu vois le large ciel où tu planais ; mais tes barreaux te resserrent, tu n'as plus qu'à mettre ta tête sous ton aile et à mourir ; tu étouffes déjà, et bientôt tu ne seras plus qu'un cadavre encore tiède qu'on appelle désespoir. Alors Smarh s'éloigna, il sortit de la ville à l'heure où tout brille et crie, c'était le soir, la brume l'emplissait, il faisait froid, il marchait pieds nus dans la boue, tandis que derrière lui, à ses côtés, la matière resplendissait dans sa force, qu'elle agissait, qu'elle siégeait sur des trônes, qu'elle avait ses philosophes, p117 ses sectateurs. Aussi le poète sortit, chassé, méprisé, honni ; on ne voulait pas de lui, on le renvoya. Il partit donc, mais derrière lui tout s'écroula et il y eut un grand rire.

Il arriva dans les champs. Seul dans la campagne, au milieu des ténèbres, il se prit à pleurer ; un désespoir immense vint s'abattre sur lui comme un vautour sur un cadavre, il étendit ses larges ailes noires, se mit à manger et poussa des cris féroces. Il pleura amèrement pendant longtemps, et chacune de ses larmes était une malédiction pour la terre, c'était quelque chose du cœur qui tombait et s'en allait dans le néant ; c'était l'agonie de l'espérance, de la foi, de l'amour, du beau, tout cela mourait, fuyait, s'envolait pour l'éternité ; toute la sève, toute la vie, toutes les fraîcheurs, tous les parfums, toutes les lumières, tout ce qui navre, ce qui enchante, tout ce qui est volupté, croyances, ardeurs, avait été arraché par le vent d'éternité qui venait de la terre, rasait le sol, emportait les fleurs.

Tout allait donc finir ; le monde, épuisé, craquait en dedans, il se mourait, et l'âme, rendue folle par tant de douleurs, tournait encore, dans son agonie, au milieu d'un cercle de feu qu'elle ne pouvait franchir.

La nuit allait commencer, une nuit éternelle, sans astres, sans clarté ; Satan déjà s'étendait sur le monde palpitant, pour lui arracher son dernier mot. Smarh était resté enseveli dans son malheur, sa tête était dans ses mains, sa chevelure, couverte de poussière, venait battre sur ses yeux en pleurs. On n'entendait rien que le bruit de l'immense tempête du temps qui allait finir et jetait alors ses plus horribles sanglots. La terre déviait de sa course circulaire ; elle oscillait, ivre de fatigue et d'ennui, comme si un ouragan l'avait poussée pour la faire tomber. Le soleil s'était abaissé lentement et avait dit p118 un éternel adieu, un dernier et long baiser, à ce qu'il avait éclairé, aux bois, aux prairies, aux forêts, aux vallons déserts, à l'océan sur lequel il courait dans les longues journées ; il était parti, les astres n'étaient point venus, et ils étaient allés éclairer d'autres mondes, plus haut.

Pourquoi donc Smarh lève-t-il la tête ? Voilà une femme à ses côtés... non, c'est un ange, elle lui a essuyé ses larmes, avec le bout de ses ailes blanches ; elle l'a relevé, l'a porté sur son cœur, elle pleure aussi, elle a les pieds en sang, elle lui dit : “ô mon bien-aimé, viens à moi, ils m'ont chassée, ils m'ont bannie, aime-moi, je suis si belle. “ et Smarh poussa un cri de joie, il se rattachait à la branche de salut d'où l'ouragan l'avait entraîné. Il s'écria tout à coup :

— oui, je t'aime ! Je t'aime ! Tu vois bien que je renaiss, que je vis, tu vois que le soleil reparait, que l'herbe pousse sur les coteaux, que les fleuves coulent encore ; oui, je t'aime ! ô mon Dieu, mon Dieu, j'avais douté, j'avais pleuré, j'avais maudit, j'avais vu le monde passer comme une chaîne de squelettes dans une danse de l'enfer, et je n'avais pas compris ! Mais la providence se déroule à mes yeux, voilà l'aurore qui vient, l'horizon se déroule, s'avance, et laisse voir au fond quelque chose de resplendissant et d'éternel ; oui, je t'aime ! Si tu savais ! écoute donc ! Est-ce que c'est moi qui ai vécu si longtemps, qui ai marché sur tant de poussières, heurté tant de ruines ? Non, voilà la poussière qui monte au ciel, voilà les ruines qui se lèvent et se placent. Qu'étais-je donc ? Poète ? Oh ! Oui ! Je chanterai toujours, je chanterai encore. Oh ! Je t'aime !

Tout à l'heure j'étais dans le tombeau, je sentais un marbre lourd sur ma tête, et je me heurtais aux planches du cercueil, mais je suis au ciel ! Oh ! Je t'aime pour l'éternité ; pour l'éternité tu es à moi ! p119

Il allait étendre les bras vers elle, il allait la saisir, déjà leurs regards s'étaient confondus, leurs larmes s'étaient séchées, il y avait eu un immense espoir dans la création. Le monde s'était retourné sur son vieux lit de douleurs, il avait entr'ouvert son œil morne pour voir la dernière étoile, il avait aspiré la brise du ciel ; mais il se rendormit bientôt dans ses cendres.

Un éclair parut, Satan était là.

— arrête, dit-il, elle est à moi ! Smarh ! Arrête, te dis-je !

SMARH.

à toi ? Esprit de ténèbres, arrière !

SATAN.

Je te brise du pied, vermisseau plein d'orgueil, bulle de savon que mon souffle seul soutient.

SMARH.

Car tu es à moi ? à toi mon cœur !

SATAN.

Non ! à toi tout. La terre, usant ses dernières forces, s'écria : "aime-le, aime-le".

L'enfer, se levant sur ses charbons, s'écria plein de rage : "aime-le, aime-le".

Mais un rire perça l'air, Yuk parut et lui dit : — c'est pour moi, à toi l'éternité !

L'éternité en effet répéta : "c'est lui, c'est lui !" Smarh tournoya dans le néant, il y roule encore. Satan versa une larme.

Yuk se mit à rire et sauta sur elle, et l'étreignit d'un baiser si fort, si terrible, qu'elle étouffa dans les bras du monstre éternel. G F. p120 réflexion d'un homme désintéressé à l'affaire et qui a relu ça après un an de façon.

il est permis de faire des choses pitoyables, mais pas de cette trempe. Ce que tu admirais il y a un an est aujourd'hui fort mauvais ; j'en suis bien fâché, car je t'avais décerné le nom de grand homme futur, et tu te regardais comme un petit Goethe. L'illusion n'est pas mince, il faut commencer par avoir des idées, et ton fameux mystère en est veuf. Pauvre ami ! Tu iras ainsi enthousiasmé de ce que tu rêves, dégoûté de ce que tu as fait. Tout est ainsi, il ne faut pas s'en plaindre. Sais-tu ce qui me semble le mieux de ton œuvre ? C'est cette page qui, dans un an, me paraîtra aussi bête que le reste et qui suggérera encore une suite d'amères réflexions. Dans un an peut-être serai-je crevé, tant mieux ! Et pourtant tu as peur, pauvre brute, mon ami. Adieu, le meilleur conseil que je puisse te donner, c'est de ne plus écrire. Jasmin.

LES FUNÉRAILLES DU DOCTEUR MATHURIN

Pourquoi ne t'offrirais-je pas encore ces nouvelles pages, cher Alfred ?

De tels cadeaux sont plus chers à celui qui les fait qu'à celui qui les reçoit, quoique ton amitié leur donne un prix qu'ils n'ont pas. Prends-les donc comme venant de deux choses qui sont à toi, et l'esprit qui les a conçues et la main qui les a écrites.

Se sentant vieux, Mathurin voulut mourir, pensant bien que la grappe trop mûre n'a plus de saveur ! Mais pourquoi et comment cela ?

Il avait bien 70 ans environ et solide encore malgré ses cheveux blancs, son dos voûté et son nez rouge, en somme c'était une belle tête de vieillard. Son œil bleu était singulièrement pur et limpide et des dents blanches et fines sous de petites lèvres minces et bien ciselées annonçaient une vigueur gastronomique rare à cet âge où l'on pense plus souvent à dire des prières et à avoir peur qu'à bien vivre.

Le vrai motif de sa résolution c'est qu'il était malade et que tôt ou tard il fallait sortir d'ici-bas. Il aima mieux prévenir la mort que de se sentir arraché par elle. Ayant bien connu sa position, il n'en fut ni étonné ni effrayé, il ne pleura pas, il ne cria pas, il ne fit ni humbles prières ni exclamations ampoulées. — Il ne se montra ni stoïcien, ni catholique, ni psychologue, c'est-à-dire qu'il n'eut ni orgueil, ni crédulité, ni bêtise. Il fut grand dans sa mort et son héroïsme surpassa celui d'Epaminondas, d'Annibal, de Caton, de tous les Capitaines de l'antiquité et de tous les martyrs chrétiens, celui du chevalier d'Assas, celui de Louis XVI, celui de saint Louis, celui de M. de Talleyrand mourant dans sa robe de chambre verte, et même celui de Fieschi qui disait des pointes encore quand on lui coupa le cou, tous ceux enfin qui moururent par une conviction quelconque, par un dévouement quel qu'il soit et ceux qui se fardèrent à leur dernière heure encore pour être plus beaux, se drapant dans leur linceul comme dans un manteau de théâtre, capitaines sublimes ! républicains stupides ! martyrs héroïques et entêtés ! rois détrônés, héros du bagne, oui tous ces courages-là furent surpassés par un seul courage, ces morts-là furent éclipsés par un seul mort, par le docteur Mathurin qui ne mourut ni par conviction, ni par orgueil, ni pour jouer un rôle, ni par religion, ni par patriotisme mais qui mourut d'une pleurésie qu'il avait depuis huit jours et d'une indigestion qu'il se donna la veille, — la première de sa vie, car il savait manger.

Il se résigna donc, comme un héros, à franchir de plain-pied le seuil de la vie, à entrer dans le cercueil la tête haute. Je me trompe car il fut enterré dans un baril. Il ne dit pas comme Caton : Vertu, tu n'es qu'un nom, ni comme Grégoire VII : J'ai fait le bien et fui l'iniquité, voilà pourquoi je meurs en exil, ni comme Jésus-Christ : Mon père, pourquoi m'avez-vous délaissé. Il mourut en disant tout bonnement : Adieu amusez-vous bien.

Un poète romantique aurait acheté un banneton de charbon de terre et serait mort au bout d'une heure en faisant de mauvais vers et en avalant de la fumée ; un autre se serait donné l'onglée en se noyant dans la Seine au mois de janvier, les uns auraient bu une détestable liqueur qui les aurait fait vomir avant de se rendormir — pleurant déjà sur cette bêtise. — Un martyr se serait amusé à se faire couler du plomb dans la bouche et à gâter ainsi son palais, un républicain aurait tenté d'assassiner le roi, l'aurait manqué et se serait fait couper la tête. Voilà de singulières gens. Mathurin ne mourut pas ainsi. Sa philosophie lui défendait de se faire souffrir.

Vous me demanderez pourquoi on l'appelait Docteur. — Vous le saurez un jour car je peux bien vous le faire connaître plus au long, ceci n'étant que le dernier chapitre d'une longue œuvre qui doit me rendre immortel comme toutes celles qui sont inédites. Je vous raconterai ses voyages, j'analyserai tous les livres qu'il a faits, je ferai un volume de notes sur ses commentaires et un appendice de papier blanc et de points d'exclamation à ses ouvrages de science. Car c'était un savant des plus savants, en toutes les sciences possibles, sa modestie surpassait encore toutes ses connaissances. On ne croyait même pas qu'il sût lire, il faisait des fautes de français il est vrai, mais il savait l'hébreu... et bien d'autres choses.

Il connaissait la vie surtout, il savait à fond le cœur des hommes, et il n'y avait pas moyen d'échapper au critérium de son œil pénétrant et sagace, quand il levait la tête, abaissait sa paupière, et vous regardait de côté en souriant, vous sentiez qu'une sonde magnétique entraînait dans votre âme et en fouillait tous les recoins.

Cette lunette des contes arabes avec laquelle l'œil perçait les murailles, je crois qu'il l'avait dans sa tête, c'est-à-dire qu'il vous dépouillait de vos vêtements et de vos grimaces, de tout le fard de vertu qu'on met sur ses rides, de toutes les béquilles qui vous soutiennent, de tous les talons qui vous haussent, il arrachait aux hommes leur présomption, aux femmes leur pudeur, aux héros leur grandeur, au poète son enflure, aux mains sales leurs gants blancs. Quand un homme avait passé devant lui, avait dit deux mots, avancé deux pas, fait un moindre geste, il vous le rendait nu, déshabillé, et grelottant au vent.

Avez-vous quelquefois dans un spectacle à la lueur du lustre aux mille feux, quand le public s'agite tout palpitant, que les femmes parées battent des mains et qu'on voit partout sourires sur des lèvres rouges, diamants qui brillent, vêtements blancs, richesses, joie, éclat, vous êtes-vous figuré toute cette lumière changée en ombre, ce bruit devenu silence et toute cette vie rentrée au néant et à la place de tous ces êtres décolletés, aux poitrines palpitantes, aux cheveux noirs nattés sur des peaux blanches, mis de suite, des squelettes creux, jaunis, des squelettes qui seront longtemps sous la terre où ils ont marché et réunis ainsi tous dans un spectacle pour s'admirer encore, pour voir une comédie qui n'a pas de nom, qu'ils jouent eux-mêmes, dont ils sont les acteurs éternels et immobiles.

Mathurin faisait à peu près de même, car à travers le vêtement il voyait la peau, la chair sous l'épiderme, la moelle sous l'os et il exhumait de tout cela lambeaux sanglants, pourriture du cœur, et souvent sur des corps sains vous découvrait une horrible gangrène.

Cette perspicacité qui a fait les grands politiques, les grands moralistes, les grands poètes, n'avait servi qu'à le rendre heureux, c'est quelque chose quand on sait que Richelieu, Molière et Shakespeare ne le furent pas. — Il avait vécu poussé mollement par ses sens, sans malheur ni bonheur, sans effort, sans passion et sans vertu, ces deux meules qui usent la lame des tranchants. Son cœur était une cuve où rien de trop ardent n'avait fermenté et dès qu'il l'avait crue assez plein, il l'avait vite fermée laissant encore de la place pour du vide, pour la paix. Il n'était donc ni poète ni prêtre, il ne s'était pas marié, il avait le bonheur d'être bâtard, — ses amis étaient en petit nombre, et sa cave était bien garnie. Il n'avait ni maîtresses qui lui cherchaient querelle ni chien qui le mordît. Il avait une excellente santé et un palais extrêmement délicat. Mais je dois vous parler de sa mort.

Il fit donc venir ses disciples (il en avait deux) et il leur dit qu'il allait mourir, qu'il était las d'être malade et d'avoir été tout un jour à la diète.

C'était la saison dorée, où les blés sont mûrs, le jasmin déjà blanc embaume le feuillage de la tonnelle, on commence à courber la vigne, les raisins pendent en grappes sur les échelas, le rossignol chante sur la haie, on entend des rires d'enfants dans les bois, les foin sont enlevés. Oh jadis les nymphes venaient danser sur la prairie et se formaient des guirlandes avec les fleurs des prés, la fontaine murmurait un roucoulement frais et amoureux, les colombes allaient voler sur les tilleuls, le matin encore quand le soleil se lève l'horizon est toujours d'un bleu vaporeux et la vallée répand sur les coteaux un frais parfum humide des baisers de la nuit et de la rosée des fleurs.

Mathurin couché depuis plusieurs jours dormait sur sa couche. Quels étaient ses songes ? Sans doute comme sa vie, calmes et purs. La fenêtre ouverte laissait entrer à travers sa jalousie des rayons de soleil. La treille grimpant le long de la muraille grise nouait ses fruits mûrs aux branches mêlées de la clématite. Le coq chantait dans la basse-cour, les faneurs reposaient à l'ombre sous les grands noyers aux troncs tapissés de mousses. Non loin et sous les ormeaux il y avait un rond de gazon où ils allaient souvent faire la méridienne et dont la verdure touffue n'était seulement tachée que d'iris et de coquelicots. C'est là que couchés sur le ventre ou assis et causant ils buvaient ensemble pendant que la cigale chantait, que les insectes bourdonnaient dans les rayons du soleil. Les feuilles remuaient sous le souffle chaud des nuits d'été.

Tout était paix, calme et joie tranquille. C'est là que dans un oubli complet du monde, dans un égoïsme divin ils vivaient — inactifs, inutiles, heureux — Ainsi pendant que les hommes travaillaient, que la société vivait avec ses lois, avec son organisation multiple, tandis que les soldats se faisaient tuer, et que les intrigants s'agitaient, eux ils buvaient, ils dormaient. Accusez-les d'égoïsme, parlez de devoir, de morale, de dévouement. Dites encore une fois qu'on se doit au pays, à la société, rabâchez bien l'idée d'une œuvre commune, chantez toujours cette magnifique trouvaille du plan de l'univers, vous n'empêcherez pas qu'il y ait des gens sages et des égoïstes qui ont plus de bon sens avec leur ignoble vice que vous autres avec vos sublimes vertus.

Ô hommes, vous qui marchez dans les villes, faites les révolutions, abattez les trônes, remuez le monde, et qui pour faire regarder vos petits fronts, faites bien de la poussière sur la route battue du genre humain, je vous demande un peu si votre bruit, vos chars de triomphe et vos fers, si vos machines et votre charlatanisme et vos vertus, si tout cela vaut une vie calme et tranquille où l'on ne casse rien que des bouteilles vides, où il n'y a d'autre fumée que celle d'une pipe, d'autre dégoût que celui d'avoir trop mangé.

Ainsi vivaient-ils et pendant que le sang coulait dans les guerres civiles, que le gouvernail de l'état était disputé entre des pirates et des ineptes et qu'il se brisait dans la tempête, pendant que les empires s'écroulaient, qu'on s'assassinait et qu'on vivait, qu'on faisait des livres sur la vertu et que l'État ne vivait que de vices splendides, qu'on donnait des prix de morale et qu'il n'y avait de beau que les grands crimes, le soleil pour eux faisait toujours mûrir leurs raisins, les arbres avaient tout autant de feuilles vertes, ils dormaient toujours sur la mousse des bois, et faisaient rafraîchir leur vin dans l'eau des lacs.

Le monde vivait loin d'eux et le bruit même de ses cris n'arrivait pas jusqu'à leurs pieds, une parole rapportée des villes aurait troublé le calme de leurs cœurs. Aucune bouche profane ne venait boire à cette coupe de bonheur exceptionnel. Ils ne recevaient ni livres, ni journaux, ni lettres, la bibliothèque commune se composait d'Horace, de Rabelais. Ai-je besoin de dire qu'il y avait toutes les éditions de Brillat-Savarin et du Cuisinier ? Pas un bout de politique, pas un fragment de controverse, de philosophie ou d'histoire. Aucun des hochets sérieux dont s'amuse les hommes, n'avaient-ils pas toujours devant eux la nature et le vin, que fallait-il de plus ? Indiquez-moi donc quelque chose qui surpasse la beauté d'une belle campagne illuminée de soleil et la volupté d'une amphore pleine d'un vin limpide et pétillant, et d'abord, quelle qu'elle soit, la réponse que vous allez faire les aurait fait rire de pitié, je vous en préviens.

Cependant Mathurin se réveilla, ils étaient là au bout de son lit, il leur dit :

— À boire pour vous et pour moi, trois verres et plusieurs bouteilles. — Je suis malade, il n'y a plus de remède — Je veux mourir mais avant j'ai soif et très soif. Je n'ai aucune soif des secours de la religion ni aucune faim d'hostie. Buvons donc pour nous dire adieu.

On apporta des bouteilles, de toutes les espèces et des meilleures, le vin ruissela à flots pendant vingt heures et avant l'aurore ils étaient gris.

D'abord ce fut une ivresse calme et logique, une ivresse douce et prolongée à loisir. Mathurin sentait sa vie s'en aller et comme Sénèque qui se fit ouvrir les veines et mettre dans un bain il se plongea avant de mourir dans un bain d'excellent vin, baigna son cœur dans une béatitude qui n'a pas de nom et son âme s'en alla droit au Seigneur comme une outre pleine de bonheur et de liqueur.

Quand le soleil se fut baissé ils avaient déjà bu à trois, 15 bouteilles de Beaune (1re qualité 4) et fait tout un cours de théodicée et de métaphysique.

Car il résuma toute sa science dans ce dernier entretien.

Il vit l'astre s'abaisser pour toujours et fuir derrière les collines. Alors se levant et tournant les yeux vers le couchant il regarda la campagne s'endormir au crépuscule, les troupeaux descendaient, et les clochettes des vaches sonnaient dans les clairières, les fleurs allaient fermer leur corolle, et des rayons du soleil couchant dessinaient sur la terre des cercles lumineux et mobiles. La brise des nuits s'éleva et les feuilles des vignes à son souffle battirent sur leur treillage, elle pénétra jusqu'à eux et rafraîchit leurs joues enflammées.

— Adieu, dit Mathurin, adieu, demain je ne verrai plus ce soleil, dont les rayons éclaireront mon tombeau, éclaireront ses ruines, et sans jamais venir à moi.

Les ondes couleront toujours et je n'entendrai pas leur murmure. Après tout j'ai vécu pourquoi ne pas mourir ? La vie est un fleuve, — la mienne a coulé entre des prairies pleines de fleurs sous un ciel pur, loin des tempêtes et des nuages, je suis à l'embouchure ! je me jette dans l'océan, dans l'infini, tout à l'heure mêlé à tout, immense et sans borne, je n'aurai plus la conscience de mon néant. Est-ce que l'homme est quelque chose de plus qu'une simple goutte d'eau de l'océan ou qu'une bulle de mousse sur le tonneau de l'électeur ?

Adieu donc vents du soir qui soufflez sur les roses penchées, sur les feuilles palpitantes des bois endormis, quand les ténèbres viennent, elles palperont longtemps encore, les feuilles des orties qui croîtront sur les débris cassés de ma tombe. Naguère, quand je passais riant près des cimetières et qu'on entendait ma voix chanter le long du mur, quand le hibou battait de l'aile sur les clochers, que les cyprès murmuraient les soupirs des morts, je jetais un œil calme sur ces pierres qui recélaient l'éternité tout entière avec leurs débris de cadavres, c'était pour moi un autre monde, où ma pensée même pouvait à peine m'y transporter dans l'infini d'une vague rêverie.

Maintenant mes doigts tremblants y touchent aux portes de cet autre monde et elles vont s'ouvrir car j'en remue le marteau d'un bras de colère, d'un bras désespéré.

Que la mort vienne, qu'elle vienne, elle me prendra tout endormi dans son linceul et j'irai continuer le songe éternel sous l'herbe douce du printemps ou sous la neige des hivers qu'importe, qu'elle vienne et mon dernier sourire sera pour elle, je lui donnerai des baisers pleins de vin, un cœur plein de la vie et qui n'en veut plus. — Un cœur ivre et qui ne bat pas.

La souveraine beauté, le souverain bonheur, n'est-ce pas le sommeil, et je vais dormir — dormir sans réveil, longtemps, toujours. Les morts, à cette belle phrase graduée il s'interrompt pour boire et continua :

— La vie est un festin. Il y en a qui meurent gorgés de suite et qui tombent sous la table. D'autres rougissent la nappe de sang et de souillures sans nombre. Heureux ceux qui n'y versent que des taches de vin et pas de larmes. D'autres sont étourdis des lumières, du bruit, dégoûtés du fumet des mets, gênés par la cohue, qui baissent la tête et se mettent à pleurer. Heureux les sages qui mangent longuement, écartent leurs convives avides, les valets impudents qui les tiraillent et qui peuvent le dernier jour, au dessert quand les uns dorment, que les autres sont ivres dès le premier service, qu'un grand nombre sont partis malades, boire enfin les vins [les] plus exquis, savourer les fruits les plus mûrs, succulents, jouir lentement des dernières fins de l'orgie, vider le reste d'un grand coup, éteindre les flambeaux et mourir.

Comme l'eau limpide que la nymphe de marbre laisse tomber murmurante de sa conque d'albâtre il continua ainsi longtemps à parler d'une voix grave et voluptueuse à la fois, pleine de cette mélancolie gaie qu'on a dans les suprêmes moments et son âme s'épanchait de ses lèvres comme l'eau limpide.

La nuit était venue, pure, amoureuse, une nuit bleue éclairée d'étoiles, — pas un bruit que celui de la voix de Mathurin qui parla longtemps à ses amis. Ils l'écoutaient en le contemplant. Assis sur sa couche, son œil commençait à se fermer. La flamme blanche des bougies remuait au vent, l'ombre qu'elle rayait tremblait sur le lambris, le vin pétillait dans les verres et l'ivresse sur leurs figures. Assis sur le bord de la tombe Mathurin y avait posé sa gourde, elle ne se fermera que quand il l'aura bue.

Vienne donc cette molle langueur des sens qui enivre jusqu'à l'âme, qu'elle le balance dans une mollesse infinie, qu'il s'endorme en rêvant de joies sans nombre, en disant aussi nunc pulsanda tenus, que les nymphes antiques jettent leurs roses embaumées sur les draps rougis dont il fait son linceul, viennent danser devant lui dans une ronde gracieuse et pour adieu toutes [les] beautés que le cœur rêve, et le charme des premières amours, la volupté des plus longs baisers et des plus suaves regards, que le ciel se fasse plus étoilé et ait une nuit plus limpide, que les clartés d'azur viennent éclairer les joies de cette agonie, fassent le vent plus frais, plus embaumant, que des voix s'élèvent de dessous l'herbe et chantent pendant qu'il boit les dernières gouttes de la vie, les yeux fermés tressaillent comme sous le plus tendre embrass[ement], que tout soit pour cet homme bonheur jusqu'à la mort, paix jusqu'au néant, que l'éternité ne soit qu'un lit pour le bercer dans les siècles.

Mais regardez-les. Jacques s'est levé et a fermé la fenêtre. Le vent venait sur Mathurin, il commençait à claquer des dents. — Ils ont rapproché de plus près la table ronde du lit, la fumée de leurs pipes monte au plafond et se répand en nuages bleus qui montent, on entend leurs verres s'entrechoquer et leurs paroles, le vin tombe par terre, — ils jurent — ils ricanent, cela va devenir horrible, ils vont se mordre.

Ne craignez rien, ils mordent une poularde grasse et les truffes qui s'échappent de leurs lèvres rouges roulent sur le plancher.

Mathurin parle politique.

— La démocratie est une bonne chose pour gens pauvres et de mauvaise compagnie. On parviendra peut-être un jour hélas à ce que tous les hommes puissent boire de la piquette, de ce jour-là on ne boira plus de constance. Si les nobles dont la tyrannie (ils avaient de si bons cuisiniers), j'en étais donc à la Révolution, pauvres moines, ils cultivaient si bien la vigne. Ainsi Robespierre. Oh le drôle de corps qui mangeait de la vache chez un menuisier et qui est resté pur au pouvoir et qui a la plus exécration réputation bien méritée. S'il avait eu un peu plus d'esprit, qu'il eût ruiné l'état, entretenu dix maîtresses sur les fonds publics, bu du vin au lieu de répandre du sang, ce serait un homme justement, dignement vertueux, je disais donc que Fourier... un bien beau morceau sur l'art culinaire... Ce qui n'empêche que Washington ne fût un grand homme et Montyon quelque chose de surhumain, de divin, presque de sur-stupide. Il s'agirait de définir la vertu avant d'en décerner les prix. Celui qui en aurait donné une bonne classification, qui auparavant l'aurait bien établie avec des caractères tranchés, nettement exprimés, positifs en un mot, celui-là aurait mérité un prix extraordinaire, j'en conviens, il lui aurait fallu déterminer jusqu'à quel point l'orgueil entre dans la grandeur, la niaiserie dans la bienfaisance, marquer la limite précise de l'intérêt et de la vanité. Il aurait fallu citer des exemples et faire comprendre trois mots incompréhensibles : moralité, liberté, devoir — et montrer, ç'aurait été le sublime de la proposition et on aurait pu enfermer ça dans une période savante, comme les hommes sont libres tout en ayant des devoirs, comment ils peuvent avoir des devoirs puisqu'ils sont libres, s'étendre longuement aussi, par manière de hors-d'œuvre et de digression favorable sur la vertu récompensée et le vice puni, on soutiendrait historiquement que Nabuchodonosor, Alexandre, Sésostri, César, Tibère, Louis XI, Rabelais, Byron, Napoléon et le marquis de Sade étaient des imbéciles, et que Mardochee, Caton, Brutus, Vespasien, Edouard le Confesseur, Louis XII, Lafayette, Montyon l'homme au manteau bleu, et Parmentier, et Poivre, étaient des grands hommes, des grands génies, des dieux, des êtres... Mathurin se mit à rire en éternuant, sa face se dilatait, tous ses traits étaient plissés par un sourire diabolique, l'éclair jaillissait de ses yeux, le spasme saccadait ses épaules, il continua :

— Vive la philanthropie, un verre de frappé. — L'histoire est une science morale par-dessus tout à peu près comme la vue d'une maison de filles, et celle d'un échafaud plein de sang, les faits prouvent pourtant que tout est pour le mieux. Ainsi les Hébreux assassinés par leurs vainqueurs chantaient des psaumes que nous admirons comme poésie lyrique, les chrétiens qu'on égorgeait ne se doutaient pas qu'ils fondaient une poésie aussi, une société pure et sans tache. Jésus-Christ mort et descendant de sa croix fournit au bout de 16 siècles le sujet d'un beau tableau, les Croisades, la Réforme, 93, la philosophie, la philanthropie philanthropie qui nourrit les hommes avec des pommes de terre, et les vaches avec des betteraves, tout cela a été de mieux en mieux, la poudre à canon, la guillotine, les bateaux à vapeur et les tartes à la crème sont des inventions utiles vous l'avouerez à peu près comme le tonnerre, il y a des hommes réduits à l'état de terreneuviens et qui sont chargés de donner la vie à ceux qui veulent la perdre. Ils vous coupent la plante des pieds pour vous faire ouvrir les yeux et vous abîment de coups de poing pour vous rendre heureux. Ne pouvant plus marcher on vous conduit à l'hôpital, où vous mourez de faim et votre cadavre sert encore après vous à faire dire des bêtises sur chaque fibre de votre corps et à nourrir de jeunes chiens qu'on élève pour des expériences. Ayez la ferme conviction d'une providence éternelle, et du sens commun des nations. Combien y a-t-il d'hommes qui en aient ? Le bordeaux se chauffe toujours, l'ordre des comestibles est des plus substantiels aux plus légers, celui des boissons des plus tempérées aux plus fumeuses et aux plus parfumées. Si vous voulez qu'une alouette soit bonne, coupez par le milieu.

— Et la Providence maître ?

— Oui je crois que le soleil fait mûrir le raisin et qu'un gigot de chevreuil mariné est une bonne chose. Tout n'est pas fini et il y a deux sciences éternelles, la philosophie et la gastronomie. Il s'agit de savoir si l'âme va se réunir à l'essence universelle ou si elle reste à part comme individu et où elle va, dans quel pays et comment on peut conserver longtemps du Bourgogne. Je crois qu'il y a encore une meilleure manière d'arranger le homard et un plan nouveau d'éducation, mais l'éducation ne perfectionne guère que les chiens quant au côté moral. J'ai cru longtemps à l'eau de Seltz et à la perfectibilité humaine, je suis convaincu maintenant de l'absinthe. Elle est comme la vie, ceux qui ne savent pas la prendre, font la grimace.

— Nierez-vous donc l'immortalité de l'âme ?

— Un verre de vin.

— La récompense et le châtiment ?

— Quelle saveur, dit Mathurin après avoir bu et contractant ses lèvres sur ses dents.

— Le plan de l'univers ? Qu'en pensez-vous ?

— Et toi que penses-tu de l'étoile de Sirius ? penses-tu mieux connaître les hommes que les habitants de la lune ? l'histoire même est un mensonge réel.

— Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire ?

— Cela veut dire que les faits mentent, qu'ils sont et qu'ils ne sont plus, que les hommes vivent et meurent, que l'être et le néant sont deux faussetés qui n'en font qu'une, qui est le toujours — Je [ne] comprends pas maître.

— Et moi encore moins, répondit Mathurin.

— Cela est bien profond, dit Jacques aux trois quarts ivre, et il y a sous ce dernier mot une grande finesse.

— N'y a-t-il pas entre moi et vous deux, entre un homme et un grain de sable, entre aujourd'hui et hier, cette heure-ci et celle qui va venir, des espaces que la pensée ne peut mesurer et des mondes, des néants entiers qui les remplissent ? La pensée même peut-elle se résumer ? Te sens-tu dormir et lorsque ton esprit s'élève et s'en va de son enveloppe — ne crois-tu pas quelquefois, que tu n'es plus, que ton corps est tombé, que tu marches dans l'infini comme le soleil, que tu roules dans un gouffre comme l'Océan sur son lit de sable et ton corps n'est pas ton corps, que cette chose tourmentée qui est sur toi n'est qu'un voile rempli d'une tempête qui bat ? t'es-tu pris à douter de la matière, de la sensation elle-même ? Prends un grain de sable, il y a là un abîme à creuser pendant des siècles, palpe-toi bien pour voir si tu existes — et quand tu sauras que tu existes, il y a là un infini que tu ne sonderas pas. Ils étaient gris, ils ne comprenaient guère une tartine métaphysique aussi plate.

— Cela veut dire que l'homme voit aussi clair en lui et autour de lui que si tu étais tombé ivre mort au fond d'une barrique de vin plus grande que l'Atlantique.

Soutenir ensuite qu'il y a quelque chose de beau dans la création, vouloir faire un concert de louanges avec tous les cris de malédiction qui retentissent, de sanglots qui éclatent, de ruines qui croulent, c'est là la philosophie de l'histoire, disent-ils, quelle philosophie ! Élevez-moi une pyramide de têtes de morts et vantez la vie, chantez la beauté des fleurs assis sur un fumier, le calme et le murmure des ondes quand l'eau salée entre par les sabords et que le navire sombre et que les nations — ce que l'œil peut saisir c'est un horrible fracas d'une agonie éternelle. Regardez un peu la cataracte qui tombe de la montagne, comme son onde bouillonnante entraîne avec elle les débris de la prairie, le feuillage encore vert de la forêt cassé par les vents, la boue des ruisseaux, le sang répandu, les chars qui allaient, — cela est beau et superbe. Approchez, écoutez donc l'horrible râle de cette agonie sans nom, levez les yeux — quelle beauté, quelle horreur, quel abîme.

Allez encore, fouillez, déblayez les ruines sans nom, sous ces ruines-là d'autres encore et toujours, passez vingt générations de morts entassés les uns sur les autres, cherchez des empires perdus sous le sable du désert et des palais d'avant le déluge sous l'Océan, vous trouverez peut-être encore des temps inconnus, une autre histoire, un autre monde, d'autres siècles titaniques, d'autres calamités, d'autres désastres, des ruines fumantes, du sang figé sur la terre, des ossements broyés sous les pas.

Il s'arrêta essoufflé — et ôta son bonnet de coton, ses cheveux mouillés de sueur étaient collés en longues mèches sur son front pâle. Il se lève et regarde autour de lui. Son œil bleu est terne comme le plomb, aucun sentiment humain ne scintille de sa prunelle, c'est déjà quelque chose de l'impassibilité du tombeau. Ainsi placé sur son lit de mort et dans l'orgie jusqu'au cou, calme entre le tombeau et la débauche il semblait être la statue de la dérision, ayant pour piédestal une cuve et regardant la mort face à face.

Tout s'agite maintenant, tout tourne et vacille dans cette ivresse dernière — le monde danse au chevet de mort de Mathurin. Au calme heureux des premières libations succèdent la fièvre et ses chauds battements, elle va augmentant toujours, on la voit qui palpite sous leur peau, dans leurs veines bleues gonflées, leurs cœurs battent, — ils soufflent eux-mêmes — on entend le bruit de leur haleine et les craquements du lit qui ploie sous les soubresauts du mourant.

Il y a dans leur cœur une force qui vit, une colère qu'ils sentent monter graduellement du cœur à la tête, leurs mouvements sont saccadés, leur voix est stridente, leurs dents claquent sur les verres, ils boivent — ils boivent toujours, dissertant, philosophant, cherchant la vérité au fond du verre, le bonheur dans l'ivresse et l'éternité dans la mort. Mathurin seul trouva la dernière.

Cette dernière nuit-là — entre ces trois hommes, il se passa quelque chose de monstrueux et de magnifique. Si vous les aviez vus ainsi épuiser tout, tarir tout, exprimer les saveurs des plus pures voluptés, les parfums de la vertu et l'enivrement de toutes les chimères du cœur, et la politique, et la morale, la religion, tout passa devant eux et fut salué d'un rire grotesque et d'une grimace qui leur fit peur. La métaphysique fut traitée à fond dans l'intervalle d'un quart d'heure et la morale en se soûlant d'un douzième petit verre. Et pourquoi pas ? si cela vous scandalise n'allez pas plus loin. Je rapporte les faits, je continue, je vais aller vite, dans le dénombrement épique de toutes les bouteilles bues. C'est le punch maintenant qui flamboie et qui bout. Comme la main qui le remue est tremblante, les flammes qui s'échappent de la cuillère tombent sur les draps, sur la table, par terre, et font autant de feux follets qui s'éteignent et qui se rallument. Il n'y eut pas de sang avec le punch comme il arrive dans les romans de dernier ordre et dans les cabarets où l'on ne vend que de mauvais vin et où le bon peuple va s'enivrer avec de l'eau-de-vie de cidre.

Elle fut bruyante — car ils vocifèrent horriblement, ils ne chantent pas, ils causent —, ils parlent haut, ils crient fort, ils rient sans savoir pourquoi, le vin les fait rire et leur âme cède à l'excitation des nerfs excités. Voilà le tourbillon qui l'enlève, l'orgie écume, les flambeaux sont éteints, le punch brûle partout. Mathurin bondit haletant sur sa couche tachée de vin.

— Allons, poussons toujours, encore oui encore cela, du kirsch, du rhum, de l'eau et du kirsch encore — Faites brûler, que cela flambe et que cela soit chaud, bouillant. Casse la bouteille, buvons à même.

Et quand il eut fini, il releva la tête tout fier et regarda les deux autres, les yeux fixes, le cou [tendu], la bouche souriante. Sa chemise était trempée d'eau-de-vie. Il suait à grosses gouttes, l'agonie venait, une fumée lourde montait sur le plafond, une heure sonna, — le temps était beau, la lune luisait au ciel entre le brouillard, la colline verte, argentée par ses clartés, était calme et dormeuse, tout dormait — Ils se remirent à boire et ce fut pis encore, c'était de la frénésie, c'était une fureur de démons ivres.

Plus de verres — ni de coupes larges — à même, maintenant — leurs doigts pressent la bouteille à la casser sous leurs efforts — étendus sur leurs chaises, les jambes raides et dans une raideur convulsive, la tête arrière, le cou penché, les yeux au ciel, le goulot sur la [bouche], le [vin] coule toujours et passe sur leur palais, l'ivresse vient à plein courant, ils y boivent à même, elle les emplît, le vin entre dans leur sang et le fait battre à pleine veine. Ils en sont immobiles, ils se regardent avec des yeux ouverts et ne se voient pas. Mathurin veut se retourner et soupire, les draps ployés sous lui lui entrent dans la chair, il a les jambes lourdes et les reins fatigués — il se meurt, il boit encore — il ne perd pas un instant, pas une minute. Entré dans le cynisme il y marche de toute sa force il s'y plonge — et il y meurt dans le dernier spasme de son orgie [deux mots ill.] sublime.

Sa tête est penchée de côté — son corps alangui — il remue les lèvres machinalement et vivement sans articuler aucune parole. S'il avait les yeux fermés on le croirait mort. Il ne distingue rien, on entend le râle de sa poitrine et il se met [à] frapper dessus avec les deux poings — et prend encore un carafon et veut le boire.

Le prêtre entre, il le lui jette à la tête, salit le surplis blanc, renverse le calice, effraie l'enfant de chœur, en prend un autre et se le verse dans la bouche en poussant un hurlement de bête fauve, il tord son corps comme un serpent, il se remue, il crie, il mord ses draps, ses ongles s'accrochent sur le bois de son lit, puis tout s'apaise, il s'étend encore, parle bas à l'oreille de ses disciples et il meurt doucement heureux après leur avoir fait connaître ses suprêmes volontés et ses caprices de par delà le tombeau.

Ils obéirent. Dès le lendemain soir ils le prennent à eux. Ils le retirent de son lit, le roulent dans ses draps rouges, le prennent à eux deux, à Jacques la tête, à André les deux pieds et ils s'en vont.

Ils descendent l'escalier, traversent la cour, la masure plantée de pommiers et les voilà sur la grande route portant leur ami à un cimetière désigné.

C'était un dimanche soir, un jour de fête, une belle soirée, tout le monde était sorti, les femmes en rubans roses et bleus, les hommes en pantalon blanc, il fallut se garer aux approches de la ville des charrettes qui allaient, des voitures, des chevaux, de la foule, de la cohue de canailles et d'honnêtes gens qui formaient le convoi de Mathurin — car aucun roi n'eut jamais tant de monde à ses funérailles. On se pressait sur les pieds, on se coudoyait et on jurait, on voulait voir, voir à toutes forces... bien peu savaient quoi. — Les uns par curiosité, d'autres poussés par leurs voisins — les uns étaient scandalisés, rouges de colère, furieux, il y en avait aussi qui riaient.

Un moment — et on ne sut pourquoi, la foule s'arrêta. — Comme vous la voyez dans les processions lorsque le prêtre stationne à un reposoir. Ils venaient d'entrer dans un cabaret. Est-ce que le mort par hasard venait de ressusciter et qu'on lui faisait prendre un verre d'eau sucrée ? Les philosophes buvaient un petit verre, et un troisième fut répandu sur la tête de Mathurin. Il sembla alors ouvrir les yeux, — non il était mort. Ce fut pis une fois entré dans le faubourg. À tous les bouchons, cabarets, cafés, ils entrent. La foule s'ameute. Les voitures ne peuvent plus circuler, on marche sur les pieds des chiens qui mordent et sur les cors des citoyens qui font la moue. On se porte, on se soulève vous dis-je, on court de cabaret en cabaret, on fait place à Mathurin porté par ses deux disciples, on l'admire, pourquoi pas ? On les voit ouvrir ses lèvres et passer du liquide dans sa bouche. Sa mâchoire se referme, les dents tombent les unes sur les autres et claquent à vide, le gosier avale et ils continuent.

Avait-il été écrasé ? s'était-il suicidé ? était-ce un martyr du gouvernement ? la victime d'un assassinat ? s'était-il noyé ? asphyxié ? était-il mort d'amour ou d'indigestion ? Un homme tendre ouvrit de suite une souscription, et garda l'argent. Un mora[liste] fit une dissertation sur les funérailles et prouva qu'on devait s'enterrer puisque les taupes elles-mêmes s'enterraient. Il parla au nom de la morale outragée, on l'avait d'abord écouté car son discours commençait par des injures, on lui tourna bientôt le dos, un seul homme le regardait attentivement, c'était un sourd. Même un républicain proposa d'ameuter le peuple contre le roi, parce que le pain était trop cher et que cet homme venait de mourir de faim, il le proposa si bas que personne ne l'entendit.

Dans la ville ce fut pis et la cohue fut telle qu'ils entrèrent dans un café pour se dérober à l'enthousiasme populaire. Grand fut l'étonnement des amateurs de voir arriver un mort au milieu d'eux. On le coucha sur une table de marbre, avec des dominos. Jacques et André s'assirent à une autre et remplirent les intentions du bon docteur. On se presse autour d'eux et on les interroge : d'où viennent-ils ? qu'est-ce donc ? pourquoi ? point de réponse.

Alors c'est un pari — Ce sont des prêtres indiens et c'est comme cela qu'ils enterrent leurs gens. — Vous vous trompez ce sont des Turcs. Mais ils boivent du vin. — Quel est donc ce rite-là ? dit un historien.

— Mais c'est abominable, c'est horrible, cria-t-on, hurla-t-on, quelle profanation, quelle horreur, dit un athée. — Un valet de bourreau trouva que c'était dégoûtant et un voleur soutint que c'était immoral.

Le jeu de billard fut interrompu et la politique de café en fut interrompue. Un cordonnier interrompt sa dissertation sur l'éducation et un poète élégiaque abîmé de vin blanc et plein d'huîtres osa hasarder le mot ignoble.

Ce fut un brouhaha — un oh d'indignation, beaucoup furent furieux car les garçons tardaient à apporter leurs plateaux, les hommes de lettres qui lisaient leurs œuvres dans les revues levèrent la tête et jurèrent sans même parler français. Et les journalistes, quelle colère, quelle sainte indignation que celle de ces pailles littéraires. Vingt journaux s'en emparèrent et chacun fit là-dessus quinze articles à 8 colonnes avec des suppléments. On en placarda sur les murs, ils les applaudissaient, ils les critiquaient, faisaient la critique de leur critique et des louanges de leur louange. On en revint à l'Évangile, à la morale et à la religion, sans voir lu le premier, pratiqué la seconde ni cru à la dernière. Ce fut pour eux une bonne fortune car ils avaient eu le courage de dire à douze des sottises à deux et un d'eux même alla jusqu'à donner un soufflet à un mort. Quel dithyrambe sur la littérature, sur la corruption des romans, la décadence du goût, l'immoralité des pauvres poètes qui ont du succès. Quel bonheur pour tout le monde qu'une aventure pareille, puisqu'on en tira tant de belles choses, et de plus un vaudeville et un mélodrame, un conte moral et un roman fantastique.

Cependant ils étaient sortis et avaient bientôt traversé la ville au milieu de la foule scandalisée et réjouie. À la nuit venue, ils étaient hors barrière. Ils s'endormirent tous les trois au pied d'un mulon de foin dans la campagne.

Les nuits sont courtes en été. Le jour vint et ses premières blancheurs saillirent à l'horizon de place en place. La lune devint toute pâle et disparut dans le brouillard gris. Cette fraîcheur du matin pleine de rosée et du parfum des foin les réveilla. Ils se remirent en route, car ils avaient bien encore une bonne lieue à faire le long de la rivière, dans les herbes par un sentier serpentant comme l'eau. À gauche il y avait le bois, dont les feuilles toutes mouillées brillaient sous les rayons du soleil qui passaient entre les pieds des arbres, sur la mousse, dans les bouleaux. Le tremble agitait son feuillage d'argent, les peupliers remuaient lentement leur tête droite. Les oiseaux gazouillaient déjà, chantaient, laissaient s'envoler leurs notes perlées. Le fleuve [coulait] de l'autre côté au pied des mesures de chaume, le long des murailles, et on voyait les arbres laisser tomber les massifs de leurs feuilles et leurs fruits mûrs de celui-ci.

C'était la prairie et le bois. On entendait un vague bruit de chariot dans les chemins creux, et celui que les pas faisaient faire aux herbes foulées.

Et çà et là comme des corbeilles de verdure, des îles jetées dans le courant, leurs bords tapissés de vignobles descendaient jusqu'au rivage que les flots verts venaient baiser avec cette lenteur harmonieuse des ondes qui coulent !

Ah c'est bien là que Mathurin voulut dormir entre la forêt et le courant, dans la prairie. Ils l'y portèrent et lui creusèrent là son lit sous l'herbe non loin de la treille qui jaunissait au soleil et de l'onde qui murmurait sur le sable caillouteux de la rive.

Des pêcheurs s'en allaient avec leurs filets et penchés sur leurs rames ils tiraient la barque qui glissait vite. Ils chantaient et leur voix allait portée le long de l'eau et l'écho en frappait les coteaux boisés. Eux aussi quand tout fut prêt ils se mirent à chanter un hymne aux sons harmonieux et lents qui s'en alla comme le chant des pêcheurs, comme le courant de la rivière se perdre à l'horizon, un hymne au vin, à la nature, au bonheur, à la mort. Le vent emportait leurs paroles, les feuilles venaient tomber sur le cadavre de Mathurin, ou sur les cheveux de ses amis. La fosse ne fut pas creuse et le gazon le recouvrit sans pierre ciselée, sans marbre doré. Quelques planches d'une barrique cassée qui se trouvaient là par hasard furent mises sur son corps afin que les pas ne l'écrasent pas.

Et alors ils tirèrent chacun deux bouteilles, en burent deux et cassèrent les deux autres, le vin tomba en bouillons rouges sur la terre, la terre le but vite et alla porter jusqu'à Mathurin le souvenir des dernières saveurs de son existence et réchauffer sa tête couchée sur la terre !

On ne vit plus que les restes de deux bouteilles, ruines comme les autres ; elles rappelaient des joies, et montraient un vide.

Vendredi, 30 août 1839.

RABELAIS.

Jamais nom ne fut plus généralement cité que celui de Rabelais, et jamais peut-être avec plus d'injustice et d'ignorance. Ainsi, aux uns il apparaît comme un moine ivre et cynique, esprit désordonné et fantastique, aussi obscène qu'ingénieux, dangereux par l'idée, révoltant par l'expression. Pour les autres, c'est toute une philosophie pratique, douce, modérée, sceptique il est vrai, mais qui conduit après tout à bien vivre et à être honnête homme. Tour à tour il a donc été aimé, méprisé, méconnu, réhabilité ; et depuis que son prodigieux génie a jeté à la face du monde sa satire mordante et universelle qui s'échappe si franchement par le rire colossal de ses géants, chaque siècle a tourné sous tous les sens, interprété de mille façons cette longue énigme si triviale, si grossière, si joyeuse, mais au fond peut-être si profonde et si vraie.

Son œuvre est un fait historique ; elle a par elle-même une telle importance qu'elle se lie à chaque âge et en explique la pensée. Ainsi, d'abord au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, lorsqu'elle apparaît, c'est une révolte ouverte, c'est un pamphlet moral. Elle a toute l'importance de l'actualité, elle est dans le sens du mouvement, elle le dirige. Rabelais alors est un Luther dans son genre. Sa sphère, c'est le rire. Mais il le pousse si fort, qu'avec ce rire il démolit tout autant de choses que la colère du bonhomme de Witternberg. Il le manie si bien, il le cisèle tellement dans sa vaste épopée, que ce rire-là est devenu terrible. C'est la statue du grotesque. Elle est éternelle comme le monde.

Au xvii<sup>e</sup> siècle, Rabelais est le père de cette littérature naïve et franche de Molière et de Lafontaine. Tous trois immortels et bons génies, les plus vraiment français que nous ayons, jetant sur la pauvre nature humaine un demi-sourire de bonhomie et d'analyse, francs, libres, dégagés d'allures, hommes s'il en fut dans tout le sens du mot, tous trois insoucians des philosophes, des sectes, des religions, ils sont de la religion de l'homme, et celle-là, ils la connaissent. Ils l'ont retournée et analysée, disséquée, l'un dans des romans, avec de grosses obscénités, des rires, des blasphèmes ; l'autre au théâtre, dans ce dialogue si habilement coupé, si savamment vrai, si naïvement sublime, plus philosophe avec son simple nrc de Mascarille, avec Je bon sens de Philinte ou la bilc d'Alceste, que tous les philosophes depuis qu'il y en a ; et l'autre, enfin, avec ses fabLes pour les enfants, sa morale pour Les hommes, avec son vers tout bonhomme et qui retombe sur l'autre vers, avec son mot, sa phrase, ce je ne sais quoi qui est le sublime, avec son sonnet cristallin, avec toutes ces perles de poésie qui lui fint un si large et si resplendissant collier.

Mais déjà Rabelais est devenu le sujet d'étude, l'auteur favori de quelques rares esprits en dehors du mouvement général. Outre ceux que nous avons cités, La Bruyère le goûte et l'apprécie avec impartialité. Il n'est pas assez correct pour le goût scrupuleux de Boileau, pour la réserve et la pureté de Racine. Ce siècle prude, gouverné par de Maintenon et si bien représenté dans l'angtileux et plat jardin de Versailles, avait déjà honte de cette littérature débraillée, bruyant*, nue. Ce géant-là lui faisait peur. Il sentait bien qu'il se trouvait entre deux choses terribles pour lui : le xvr siècle, qui avait donné Luther et Rabelais, et la Révolution, qui devait donner Mirabeau et Robespierre. Les démolisseurs de croyances avant, les démolisseurs de têtes après, deux abîmes au milieu desquels il se tenait guindé dans L'adoration de lui-même.

Au xviii<sup>e</sup> siècle c'est encore pis. Les philosophes sont de bon ton et ils ne veulent pas de Rabelais. Le pauvre curé de Meudon se serait trouvé déplacé dans le salon des marquises belles esprits et dans les bureaux d'esprit de M du Deffand ou de M Geoff'rin. On ne comprenait pas cette verve de saillies, cet entrain, ce tourbillon, cette veine poétique palpitante d'inventions, d'aventures, de voyages, d'extravagances. Le petit goût musqué, réglé et froid du siècle avait horreur de ce qu'il nommait le dévergondage d'esprit. Il aimait mieux celui des mœurs. Voltaire, en effet,, n'excuse Rabelais que parce qu'il s'est moqué de l'Eglise. Quant à son style, quant au roman, il ne l'entend guère, quoiqu'il prétende cependant en donner une clef. En résumé, il appelle son livre : "Un amas des plus grossières ordires qu'un moine ivre puisse vomir."

Il devait en être ainsi. La gloire de Rabelais, sa valeur même, comme celle de tous les grands hommes, de tous les noms illustres, a été vivement et pendant longtemps disputée. Son génie est unique, exceptionnel, c'est peut-être Je seul dans l'histoire des Littératures du monde. Où lui trouverons-nous un rival ? Et d'abord, dans l'antiquité, est-ce Pétrone, Apulée, avec Leur art prémédité, mesuré, leurs contours purs, leur savante conception ? Dans tout le moyen âge, sera-ce dans les cycles épiques du xz<sup>e</sup> siècle, dans les soties, les moralités, les farces ? Non, certes ! et quoique cependant toute la partie matériellement comique de Rabelais appartienne à l'élément grotesque du moyen âge, nous ne lui trouvons de prédécesseur dans aucun document littéraire ; et dans les temps modernes son imitateur le plus exact, Béroald de Verville, l'auteur de l'Art de parvenir, en est si loin, qu'on ne peut le comparer à son modèle. Sterne a voulu le reproduire, mais l'affectation qui perce si souvent et la sensibilité raffinée détruisent tout parallèle.

Non, Rabelais est unique parce qu'il est à lui seul l'expression d'un siècle, d'une époque. Il a tout à la fois la signification littéraire, politique, morale et religieuse. Ces génies-là, qui créent des littératures ou qui en ferment de vieilles, apparaissent de loin en loin, ils disent chacun leur mot, le mot de leur temps et puis s'en vont. Homère chante la vie guerrière, la jeunesse vaillante et belliqueuse du monde, la verte saison où les arbres poussent. A Virgile la civilisation est déjà vieille ; il est plein de Larmes, de nuances, de sentiment, de délicatesses. Dante est sombre et rayonnant tout à la fois ; c'est le poète chrétien, le poète de la mort et de l'enfer, plein de mélancolie et d'espérances. Ailleurs, dans les sociétés vieilles, quand la satiété est venue à tous, que le doute a gagné tous les cœurs et que toutes les belles choses rêvées, toutes les illusions, toutes les utopies sont tombées feuille à feuille, arrachées par la réalité, la science, le raisonnement, l'analyse, que fait le poète ? Il se recueille en lui-même ; il a de sublimes élans d'orgueil et des moments de poignant désespoir ; il chante toutes les agonies du cœur et tous les néants de la pensée. Alors, toutes les douleurs qui l'entourent, tous les sanglots qui éclatent, toutes les malédictions qui hurlent résonnent dans son âme que Dieu a faite vaste, sonore, immense, et en sortent par la voix du génie pour marquer éternellement dans l'histoire la place d'une société, d'une époque, pour écrire ses larmes, pour ciseler la mémoire de ses infortunes (de nos jours c'est Byron). C'est pour cela que le vrai poétique est plus vrai que le vrai historique et que les poètes enfin mentent moins que les historiens. Les grands écrivains sont donc dans le cercle des idées comme les capitales dans les royaumes. Ils reçoivent l'esprit de chaque province, de chaque individualité, y mêlent ce qui leur est personnel, original ; ils l'amalgament, ils l'arrangent, puis ils le rendent transformé dans l'art.

Quand Rabelais vint à naître, c'était l'année 1483, l'année de la mort de Louis XI. Luther allait venir. Le roi avait abattu la féodalité, le moine allait abattre la papauté, c'est-à-dire tout le moyen âge, le guerrier et le prêtre. Mais le peuple lassé de l'un et de l'autre n'en voulait plus. Il s'était aperçu que l'homme d'armes le mangeait, que le prêtre l'exploitait et le trompait de son côté. Longtemps il s'était contenté d'inscrire ses railleries sur la pierre des cathédrales, de faire des chansons contre le seigneur, de lâcher, comme dans Le Roman de la Rose, quelque mot mordant sur le pouvoir ou la noblesse. Mais il fallait quelque chose de plus : une révolte, une réforme. Le symbole était vieux, et même dans le symbole le mystère, la poésie ; et c'était - un besoin général de sortir des entraves, d'entrer dans une autre voie. Besoin de la science, même besoin dans la poésie, dans la philosophie. Dès 1473, une caricature représentant l'Eglise avec un corps de femme, des jambes de poule, des griffes de vautour, une queue de serpent, avait couru l'Europe entière. C'était l'époque de Commines, de Machiavel, de l'Arétin. La papauté avait eu Alexandre VI, elle avait Léon X qui ne valait guère mieux. L'orgie intellectuelle allait venir. Elle sera longue et finira avec du sang. Au XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle elle s'est renouvelée et a fini de même.

C'était donc au milieu de tels événements, dans une telle époque que vivait Rabelais. Ne nous étonnons plus alors si en présence de cette société toute chancelante sur ses bases, toute haletante de ses débauches, devant tant de choses démolies et devant tant de ruines, il se soit élevé un immense sarcasme sur ce passé hideux du moyen âge qui palpitait encore au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, et dont le XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle avait horreur lui-même.

Qu'est-ce donc que Rabelais ? (1)

Essayons de le dire.

La mère de Gargantua le met au monde dans une indigestion qu'elle eut pour avoir mangé trop de fouace, car les héros sont de terribles mangeurs ; ils mangent, ils mangent si bien qu'ils affament le monde ; provinces, duchés, royaumes sont ravagés par leur vorace appétit. Voilà donc Gargantua qui vient au monde, et dès qu'il voit le jour il demande : ((A boire ! à boire !)) Son enfance est robuste, une enfance de géant. A un an, il chante des rondeaux, ses gouvernantes Le corrompent, il est tout couvert d'habits de cour, c'est un vrai gentilhomme. On lui apprend la philosophie, il controve avec Les sophistes, lit Pline, Athénée, Dioscoride, Galien, Aristote, Ehen ; il apprend La géométrie, la musique, La médecine ; il joue à tous les jeux, s'amuse de toutes les façons, boit vigoureusement. Après La guerre qu'il soutint pour son père Grangousier contre PicrochoLe, quand il vint à se peigner il faisait tomber de ses cheveux des boulets d'artillerie, et il avala dans une salade six pèlerins qu'il retira avec son cure-dents.

Mais ce qu'il y a de plus beau dans le roman, ce ne sont point les inventions, les aventures, ni ce style si naïf, à l'expression si pittoresque, à la phrase si bien ciselée en relief, c'est le dialogue, le comique des caractères, les longues causeries philosophiques de Gargantua et du moine, qui lui explique pourquoi les moines sont exclus du monde, pourquoi les demoiselles ont les cuisses fraîches, pourquoi les uns ont le nez plus plat que les autres, etc. Après tout, Gargantua est un bon diable, il fait grâce à ces ennemis, et sur ses vieux jours il se retire dans le manoir des Thélémites.

Dans Je roman de Gargantua le caractère du héros domine presque exclusivement, les autres sont accessoires et vaguement définis. C'est surtout la force et la vigueur qui prédominent : ce sont de joyeux buveurs aux propos libertins, à la saillie franche, avec moins de malice sceptique et de satire mordante que dans Pantagruel ; Gargantua, c'est tout entier l'homme de guerre tel qu'il pouvait L'être vers 1520, il commence à abandonner l'épée pour la plume, la cuirasse pour Le bonnet.

Pantagruel a une généalogie avouée, inscrite, il est fils de tous les rois : tous les géants, tous les grands hommes mèdes, persans, juifs, romains, grecs, héros antiques, paladins du moyen âge, tous sont ses pères ; son propre père, Gargantua, avait, lors de sa naissance, quatre cent quatre-vingt-quatre et quarantequatre ans. Sa femme mourut en mal d'enfant ; pour baptiser Pantagruel on employa l'eau de tout le pays, qui fut 36 mois 7 semaines 4. jours 13 heures et queLque peu davantage sans pluie.

Gargantua ne sait s'il doit se réjouir de la naissance de son fils ou se désoler de la mort de sa femme ; tour à tour il rit, il pleure, il s'écrie : "Ah pauvre Panta "gruel ! tu as perdu ta bonne mère, ta douce nour "rice, ta dame très aimée. Ha faulse mort ! tant tu "me es malivole, tant tu me es outrageuse de me "tolLir celle à laquelle immortalité appartenait de "droit" ; et ce disant pleurait comme une vache, mais tout souldain riait comme ung veau quand Pantagruel lui venait en mémoyre. "Oh ! mon petit-fils, disait-il, "mon couillon, mon peton, que tu es joly, tant je suis "tenu à Dieu de ce qu'il m'a donné ong si beau fils ((tant joyeux, tant riant, tant joly ! Ho ! ho ! ho ! que "je suis ayse, buvons, ho ! laissons toute méLancholye, "apporte du meilleur, rince Les verres, boutte la "nappe, chasse Les chiens, souffle ce feu, allume La "chandelle, ferme cette porte, taille ces soupes, envoie "ces pauvres, baille-leur ce qu'ils demandent ; tiens "ma robe, que je me mette en pourpoint pour mieux "festoyer les commères.)) Puis il ajoute : ((Ma femme "est morte, je ne la ressusciterai pas par mes pleurs, "il faut mieux pleurer moins et boire davantage.))

Pantagruel, dans son enfance, humait chaque jour le lait de 4,600 vaches ; on lui donnait sa bouillie dans un poeslon auquel furent occupés tous les pesliers de Saulmur en Anjou, Villedieu en Normandie, Bramont en Lorraine ; il le brisa avec ses dents et mangea du cuivre.

Il part à Paris, lit tous Les livres de l'abbaye de Saint-Victor, devient docteur ; il prononce des jugements, se lie d'amitié avec Panurge, Lequel "estait malfaisant, pipeur, buveur, batteur de pavé, riMeur s'il en estait à Paris". Au demeurant le meilleur fils du monde.

"Et toujours machinait quelque chose contre les sergents et contre le guet". Il obtient des pardons, marie les vieilles femmes, guérit les vaches ; il aime les grandes dames et fait le haut seigneur ; il accompagne Pantagruel et Lui dit mille choses inconnues, il tromphe pour lui sur un clerc d'Angleterre venu exprès de son pays pour arguer. Panurge va à la guerre contre les Dipsodes ; après la victoire on lui accorde un évêché, mais il s'y conduit en laïque, mange son bled en herbe, puis il veut se remarier, mais il a peur. Il se conseilLe à Pantagruel, il interprète Les songes, les vers de Virgile, va consulter la Sibylle de Panzout, PUIS Un poète nommé Raminagrobis, se consulte à tous ceux qui l'entourent, ses amis, les passants, tout le monde ; il rencontre frère Jean des Entommeures qui J'en détourne, il demande des avis Lt Hippotadée, théologien, à Rondibihis, médecin, à un philosophe platonicien, à un philosophe pyrrhonien, il finit par en demander à Triboulet, et, ne sachant que faire, il s'embarque pour aller consulter l'oracle de la Dive Bouteille. Il se munit de force provisions de bouche et part ; mais survient une tempête et il a peur, il se recommande à Dieu et à tous les saints, il pleure, sanglote, gémit, fait des vœux ; les nauchiers eux-mêmes se démontent et abandonnent le navire au fort de la tempête. Après l'ouragan Panurge fait le bon compagnon et soutient qu'il n'a pas eu peur, il se raille de Dieu et se moque de L'Océan.

Ils visitent toutes les nations, et nulle part ils ne rencontrent ce qui est bon. D'abord ils voient le pays de Chicanous, de là celui de Quaresme prenant, puis ils arrivent dans la contrée des Arlequins commandées par Riffandouille et Tailleboudin, ensuite ils vont dans l'île des Papefigues, puis dans celle des Papimanes ; ils vont toujours et jamais ils ne s'arrêtent.

Pantagruel descend au manoir de Messire Guaster, premier maître ès arts du monde ; celui-là est le tyran universel, et nos héros lui obéissent encore plus qu'à d'autres.

Ils passent successivement dans l'île Sonante, où l'usage du carême déplaît souverainement à Panurge et où les Papigots règnent absolument. Ils restent quelque temps, mais comme à toute heure, jour et nuit, on venait les réveiller pour boire, Pantagruel lui-même en est ennuyé. Ils s'enfuient des terres de Rome, arrivent dans le pays de Quinte essence, et ce n'est enfin qu'après avoir passé dans le pays de Satin, où ils virent Oïdire, qu'ils arrivent enfin à la Dive Bouteille, terme du voyage.

Et dans toute cette longue course effrénée à travers le monde, ce qui domine, ce qui brille, ce qui retentit, c'est un éternel rire, immense, confus, un rire de géant, qui assourdit les oreilles et donne le vertige ; moines, soldats, capitaines, évêques, empereurs, papes, nobles et manants, prêtres et laïques, tous passent devant ce sarcasme colossal de Rabelais, qui les flagelle et les stigmatise, et ils ressortent de dessous sa plume tous mutilés et tous saignants.

Il y avait derrière Rabelais tout un moyen âge sombre et terrible ; les longues douleurs du peuple, ses haines contre le seigneur et contre le prêtre étaient vieilles, depuis longtemps les croyances et les servitudes pesaient également ; mais La vieille société vivait encore avec ses tyrannies pour Le corps, ses entraves pour la pensée, le seigneur était encore dans son donjon, le prêtre dans sa riche et grasse abbaye, le pape dans sa monstrueuse ville de Rome. Mais tout à coup il survient un homme (et pour que la raillerie soit plus forte, un moine !) qui se met à écrire un livre, un livre sans suite, sans formes, à la pensée vague, peut-être sans plan prémédité, sans idée fixe, mais plein de railleries mordantes et cruelles contre le seigneur malgré son armée, contre le prêtre malgré sa sainteté, contre le pape malgré ses bulles ; la vieille cathédrale gothique est toute dègradée, toute salie, toute souillée ; tout ce qu'on a jusqu'alors respecté depuis des siècles, philosophie, science, magie, gloire, renommée, pouvoir, idées, croyances, tout cela est abattu de son piédestal, l'humanité est dépouillée de ses robes de parade et de ses galons mensongers ; elle frémit toute nue sous le souffle impur du grotesque qui la serre depuis longtemps, elle est laide et repoussante, Panurge lui jette à la tête ses brocs de vin, et se met à rire. Et au milieu de tout cela, Les aperçus les plus fins sur la nature de l'homme, les nuances les plus délicates du cœur, les analyses les plus vraies, des scènes qu'eût avouées MoLière et qui ont fait pâmer de rire nos aïeux, qui avaient plus d'esprit que nous et qui lisaient les bons auteurs du bon vieux temps. Ce n'est ni la pointe acérée et aiguisée de Voltaire, avec son rire perçant, sa bile recuite, sa morsure envenimée, ni la colère naïve et déclamatoire de Jean-Jacques, ni les sanglots étouffés de Byron, ni la douleur réfléchie de Goethe, c'est le rire vrai, fort, brutal, le rire qui brise et qui casse, ce rire-là qui, avec Luther et 93, a abattu le moyen âge.

Ceux qui ont prétendu donner de Rabelais des clefs, voire des allégories à chaque mot, et traduire chaque lazzi, n'ont point, selon moi, compris Je livre. La satire est générale, universelle, et non point personnelle ni Locale. Une attention suivie dément vite cette vaine tentative.

Citerai-je tout ce que Je xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle a fait dans ce sens-là et toute la boue qu'il a jetée sur le moyen âge dont il était sorti ? Ainsi, sans même parler de l'Arioste, Falstaff, Sancho, Gargantua ne forment-ils pas une trilogie grotesque qui couronne amèrement la vieille société ?

Falstaff est à lui seul l'homme de l'Angleterre, le John Bull bouffi de bière forte et de jambon, gros, sensuel, se relevant d'entre les cadavres, tirant de sa gibecière un flacon de vieux vin d'Espagne. Ce n'est point le grotesque terrible d'Iago, ni l'immoralité raisonnée du Maure Hassan de Schiller. Sa seule passion c'est de s'aimer. Il la porte au plus haut degré ; elle est sublime. C'est l'égoïsme personnifié avec un certain fonds d'analyse et de scepticisme qu'il fait tourner à son profit.

Quant au pacifique Sancho Pança, monté sur son baudet, avec sa figure basanée et paresseuse, soufflant la nuit, dormant le jour, l'homme poltron, l'homme qui ne conçoit pas l'héroïsme, l'homme des proverbes, l'homme prosaïque par excellence, n'est-ce pas la raison criant de toutes ses forces à don Quichotte d'arrêter et de ne pas courir après les moulins à vent qu'il prend pour des géants ? Le gentilhomme y court, mais il s'y casse le bras, s'y meurtrit la tête. Son casque est un plat à barbe, son cheval, Rossinante. Et l'âne du laboureur se met à braire devant son blason. Placée entre ces deux figures, celle de Gargantua est plus vague, moins précise. Les formes en sont plus amples, plus lâchées, plus grandioses. Gargantua est moins glouton, moins sensuel que Falstaff, moins paresseux que Sancho, mais il est plus buveur, plus rieur, plus criard. Il est terrible et monstrueux dans sa gaieté.

(*)Au reste, Rabelais est une longue étude à faire, il faut le connaître tout en entier pour l'apprécier, des analyses et des extraits le mutilent et le gâtent ; c'est en l'approfondissant que l'on verra tout ce qu'il y a de sève, de vigueur, d'imagination, de génie sous cette forme triviale et grossière, on s'étonnera de tant de diamants ensevelis, des forces de l'Hercule sous l'habit du bouffon.

Une dernière réflexion qui termine. Rabelais n'a sondé que la société telle qu'elle pouvait être de son temps. Il a dénoncé des abus, des ridicules, des crimes, et, que sais-je, entrevu peut-être un monde politique meilleur, une société tout autre. Ce qui existait de lui faisait pitié, et, pour employer une expression triviale, le monde était farce. Et il l'a tourné en farce.

Depuis lui, qu'est-ce qu'on a fait ? Tout est changé. La réforme est venue. Indépendance de la pensée. La Révolution est venue.

Indépendance matérielle.

Et encore ?

Mille questions ont été retournées, sciences, arts, philosophies, théories, que de cho....s seulement depuis vingt ans ! Quel tourbillon ! Où nous mènera-t-il ?

Voyez donc : où êtes-vous ? Est-ce le crépuscule ? est-ce l'aurore ? Vous n'avez plus de christianisme. Qu'avez vous donc ? des chemins de fer, des fabriques, des chimistes, des mathématiciens. Oui, le corps est mieux, la chair souffre moins, mais le cœur saigne toujours. L'âme, h'âme, la sentez-vous se déchirer, quoique l'enveloppe qui la renferme soit calme et bienheureuse ? Voyez comme elle s'abtme dans le septicisme universel, dans cet ennui morne qui a pris notre race au berceau, tandis que la politique bégaye, que les poètes à peine ont le temps de cadencer leur pensée et qu'ils la jettent à demi écrite sur une feuille éphémère, et que la balle homicide éclate dans chaque grenier ou dans chaque palais qu'habitent la misère, l'orgueil, la satiété !

Les questions matérielles sont résolues. Les autres le sont-elles ? Je vous Je demande. Dites-Je-moi. Et tant que vous n'aurez pas comblé cet éternel gouffre béant que l'homme a en lui, je me moque de vos efforts, et je ris à mon aise de vos misérables sciences qui ne valent pas un brin d'herbe.

Vienne donc maintenant un homme comme Rabelais ! Qu'il pUiSSe SC dépouiller de toute colère, de toute haine, de toute douleur ! De quoi rira-t-il ? Ce ne sera ni des rois, il n'y en a plus ; ni de Dieu, quoiqu'on n'y croie pas, cela fait peur ; ni des jésuites, c'est déjà vieux.

Mais de quoi donc ?

Le monde matériel est pour le mieux, ou du moins il est sur la voie.

Mais L'autre ? Il aurait beau jeu. Et si le poète pouvait cacher ses larmes et se mettre à rire, je vous assure que son Livre serait Je plus terrible et le plus sublime qu'on ait fait.

MADemoiselle RACHEL.

M<sup>lle</sup> Rachel, hélas ! a pris congé de nous, hier soir. L'adieu que nous lui avons donné (est-ce bien vraiment le dernier adieu ? espérons que non et qu'elle consentira à reparaître au moins dans Bajazet, où nous avons encore tant envie de l'applaudir), cet adieu, triste pour nous, était plein d'enthousiasme et de regrets. On l'a rappelée comme de coutume, on lui a jeté des couronnes, Les plus rustres se sont sentis émus, les plus grossiers étaient touchés, les femmes applaudissaient dans les loges, le parterre battait de ses mains sans gants, la salle trépignait ; et à l'heure où j'écris ceci à la hâte j'en suis encore tout troublé, tout ravi, j'ai encore la voix de la grande tragédienne dans les oreilles et son geste devant les yeux.

Je me la rappellerai longtemps, ainsi qu'une statue grecque largement drapée qui eût ouvert les lèvres et dit des vers d'Euripide, car c'est là de l'art grec, et du plus pur et du plus simple ; en l'écoutant on se prend à rêver à je ne sais quel profil idéal et classique, c'est en effet ce qui d'abord saillit dans son jeu. Mais il n'y a pas seulement la pose forte de la Muse antique, le geste accablant, le mot bien dit, il n'y a pas seulement profil pur et ligne découpée, il y a avant tout Je cœur qui anime chaque mot, fait part bis d'un vers toute une scène, toutes les qualités de diction et de jeu, en un mot, également et habilement menées, sous une inspiration toujours conduite et retenue, inspiration intime et qui palpète bien plus dans le cœur de l'artiste qu'elle ne s'étale complaisamment aux yeux du spectateur ; et de ce jeu si varié, si nuancé, où tant de qualités éclatantes font trait, saillissent à l'œil et nous prennent d'admiration, de cette poésie dramatique où chaque hémistiche a son accent particulier, il en résulte néanmoins quelque chose d'harmonieux, de complexe et d'exquis ; on se laisse aller à un étonnement mêlé d'extase, qui va droit au cœur, sans fracas et sans éblouissement, et vous êtes captivé, charmé, même aux gestes les plus simples, même aux mots les plus ordinaires.

C'est que M<sup>lle</sup> Rachel, quoi qu'on en dise, étudie son rôle comme une création à elle, en synthèse d'abord, puis chez le poète, dans chaque vers, et qu'elle en est pénétrée et nourrie ; elle a cette Large vue de l'ensemble qui seule fait le grand artiste et qui manque quelquefois aux natures les plus inspirées et les plus remarquables. Il ne suffit pas en effet d'avoir certains vers bien dits, du pathétique pour le cinquième acte, de la mélancolie à telle place, de la terreur à telle autre ; si vous n'avez pas cette intuition pratique qui saisit à la fois l'ensemble et les détails, ce sentiment délicat et vivace de l'unité et de la correction continue, vous aurez de beaux éclats, des situations heureuses, des étincelles, c'est possible, mais jamais ce feu sacré qui brûle, cette correction exquise qui à elle seule est déjà du génie, et qui pour M<sup>lle</sup> Rachel est bien ce qu'en disait Vauvenargues, le Vernis des maîtres.

L'avons-nous vue, dans tous les rôles qu'elle nous a joués, descendre un seul instant de sa majesté poétique ? l'avons-nous vue quelquefois se rabaisser à la vie commune et quitter sa sphère idéale ? Jamais ! jamais ! parce qu'elle ne joue pas pour nous, mais parce qu'elle vit réellement, parce que son cœur souffre vraiment et que la colère fait trembler ses membres, et que les pleurs emplissent ses yeux, et que l'inspiration la torture et la fait parler, comme la Pythonisse possédée !

On a beaucoup plaint les gladiateurs qui donnaient leur sang pour amuser le peuple ; est-ce donc beaucoup moins que de dépenser chaque jour tant de forces et de sève, de verser à flots sur la multitude tous les riches trésors de poésie que recèle un grand cœur d'artiste, et de rester ensuite brisé, épuisé de cette lutte sans nom, n'ayant pour tout salaire que les fleurs des enthousiastes, des vaniteux et l'or des riches ? tandis que vous, vous rentrez abreuvé de poésie pour tout un lendemain, l'âme pleine de hautes pensées et brûlante de sentiments généreux (car l'art fait bon et grand parce qu'il transporte et ravit). Oh ! non, Rachel, votre salaire à vous c'est de vous faire aimer comme on aime les esprits, c'est de transporter et de navrer le cœur de cette foule qui trépigne et qui bat des mains, c'est de réjouir délicieusement quelque artiste caché dans la foule, quelque frêle génie ignoré, assez grand seulement pour vous comprendre ; vous avez une vie à rendre jaloux les rois, et qui fait votre couronne de carton plus solide que la leur, votre royauté plus durable. Quel est celui d'entre eux qui n'échangerait sa vie contre une heure de la vôtre, de votre vie éblouissante et adorée, alors que vous entrez chaque soir au bruit des applaudissements et ressortez accompagnée des mêmes triomphes, pour rentrer dans votre solitude, avec vos poètes chéris, comme ces dieux indiens qui se cachent à la foule quand ils en ont reçu les offrandes et l'encens, pour communiquer avec les esprits supérieurs ? Ô fille des grands poètes, ta voix leur eût réjoui l'âme à tous. Corneille fût resté stupéfait devant son Émilie, qu'il n'avait pas taillée plus haute ; Racine eût aimé d'amour cette Hermione, qu'il n'avait pas rêvée plus superbe ; Voltaire eût fait bien des vers à cette Amenaïde que vous lui rendez plus belle.

Dites-moi s'il n'a pas fallu quelque chose d'un peu plus que ce que vous appelez du talent pour rendre de la verdure à ces vieilles et bonnes choses, plus admirées qu'aimées, plus respectées que lues, et pour faire de Corneille et de Racine des génies contemporains et pleins d'actualité ? Manie-t-on ainsi les réputations de cette taille sans être quelquefois soi-même de leur famille ? les nains ou les médiocres tracent-ils dans le cœur des hommes des sillons aussi longs ? et quand, à 19 ans, sans tradition et spontanément, vous occupez ainsi le monde littéraire, que votre nom égale les plus beaux et en surpasse tant d'illustres, c'est qu'à coup sûr cela vaut bien la peine qu'on fasse diversion pour un jour à la politique et aux indigos, et qu'on aille un peu se désaltérer à cette large source de poésie, d'où découle ce quelque chose d'exquis et d'infiniment grand que vous savez ; cela rafraîchit, soutient, et console de la vie, et fait rêver au beau.

Autrefois, les peuples de la Grèce barbare attendaient, l'hiver, sous leurs cabanes de roseaux, que la saison des pluies fût passée, et quand la colombe apparaissait dans les orangers et que le passereau sifflait dans les champs verts, ils voyaient revenir, accourant, le vieux rapsode qui leur chantait les chants d'Homère, et ils lui tendaient les bras, ils allaient à sa rencontre avec des fleurs et des fruits, et quand il les quittait c'était une douleur pour tous les cœurs, on le reconduisait jusqu'à la fontaine, on bénissait sa lyre, son voyage et son retour surtout, que l'on souhaitait si prochain. Et toi ! fille du plus pur rayon de poésie grecque, toi qui nous as fait entendre la large voix des temps antiques, que tes heures soient sacrées, et que ton retour soit prompt ! Songe de là-bas à nous autres, qui songeons à toi, veufs que nous sommes de toutes les joies de la poésie que tu emmènes avec toi, loin de nous ! Sculpteur, je te ferais une statue ; poète, je te ferais des vers, mais indigne, hélas ! je te loue dans cette langue des cochers et des banquiers, que tu dédaignes de parler tant elle est molle, pâle et vile auprès des vers que tu dis.

NOVEMBRE

Flaubert écrit Novembre à Paris durant l'automne 1842. Un jeune homme tourmenté est initié à l'amour par Marie, une prostituée qui vit dans une maison isolée. Malgré la passion qui naît entre eux, il n'a pas le courage de partager sa vie et la fuit.

FRAGMENTS DE STYLE QUELCONQUE.

“Pour... niaiser et fantastiquer.”

Montaigne.

J'aime l'automne, cette triste saison va bien aux souvenirs. Quand les arbres n'ont plus de feuilles, quand le ciel conserve encore au crépuscule la teinte rousse qui dore l'herbe fanée, il est doux de regarder s'éteindre tout ce qui naguère encore brûlait en vous.

Je viens de rentrer de ma promenade dans les prairies vides, au bord des fossés froids où les saules se mirent ; le vent faisait siffler leurs branches dépouillées, quelquefois il se taisait, et puis recommençait tout à coup ; alors les petites feuilles qui restent attachées aux broussailles tremblaient de nouveau, l'herbe frissonnait en se penchant sur terre, tout semblait devenir plus pâle et plus glacé ; à l'horizon le disque du soleil se perdait dans la couleur blanche du ciel, et le pénétrait alentour d'un peu de vie expirante. J'avais froid et presque peur.

Je me suis mis à l'abri derrière un monticule de gazon, le vent avait cessé. Je ne sais pourquoi, comme j'étais là, assis par terre, ne pensant à rien et regardant au loin la fumée qui sortait des chaumes, ma vie entière s'est placée devant moi comme un fantôme, et l'amer parfum des jours qui ne sont plus m'est revenu avec l'odeur de l'herbe séchée et des bois morts ; mes pauvres années ont repassé devant moi, comme emportées par l'hiver dans une tourmente lamentable ; quelque chose de terrible les roulait dans mon souvenir, avec plus de furie que la brise ne faisait courir les feuilles dans les sentiers paisibles ; une ironie étrange les frôlait et les retournait pour mon spectacle, et puis toutes s'envolaient ensemble et se perdaient dans un ciel morne.

Elle est triste, la saison où nous sommes : on dirait que la vie va s'en aller avec le soleil, le frisson vous court dans le cœur comme sur la peau, tous les bruits s'éteignent, les horizons pâlisent, tout va dormir ou mourir. Je voyais tantôt les vaches rentrer, elles beuglaient en se tournant vers le couchant, le petit garçon qui les chassait devant lui avec une ronce grelottait sous ses habits de toile, elles glissaient sur la boue en redescendant la côte, et écrasaient quelques pommes restées dans l'herbe. Le soleil jetait un dernier adieu derrière les collines confondues, les lumières des maisons s'allumaient dans la vallée, et la lune, l'astre de la rosée, l'astre des pleurs, commençait à se découvrir dans les nuages et à montrer sa pâle figure.

J'ai savouré longuement ma vie perdue ; je me suis dit avec joie que ma jeunesse était passée, car c'est une joie de sentir le froid vous venir au cœur, et de pouvoir dire, le tâtant de la main comme un foyer qui fume encore : il ne brûle plus. J'ai repassé lentement dans toutes les choses de ma vie, idées, passions, jours d'emportement, jours de deuil, battements d'espoir, déchirements d'angoisse. J'ai tout revu, comme un homme qui visite les catacombes et qui regarde lentement, des deux côtés, des morts rangés après des morts. À compter les années cependant, il n'y a pas longtemps que je suis né, mais j'ai à moi des souvenirs nombreux dont je me sens accablé, comme le sont les vieillards de tous les jours qu'ils ont vécus ; il me semble quelquefois que j'ai duré pendant des siècles et que mon être renferme les débris de mille existences passées. Pourquoi cela ? Ai-je aimé ? ai-je haï ? ai-je cherché quelque chose ? j'en doute encore ; j'ai vécu en dehors de tout mouvement, de toute action, sans me remuer, ni pour la gloire, ni pour le plaisir, ni pour la science, ni pour l'argent.

De tout ce qui va suivre personne n'a rien su, et ceux qui me voyaient chaque jour, pas plus que les autres ; ils étaient, par rapport à moi, comme le lit sur lequel je dors et qui ne sait rien de mes songes. Et d'ailleurs, le cœur de l'homme n'est-il pas une énorme solitude où nul ne pénètre ? les passions qui y viennent sont comme les voyageurs dans le désert du Sahara, elles y meurent étouffées, et leurs cris ne sont point entendus au-delà.

Dès le collège, j'étais triste, je m'y ennuyais, je m'y cuisais de désirs, j'avais d'ardentes aspirations vers une existence insensée et agitée, je rêvais les passions, j'aurais voulu toutes les avoir. Derrière la vingtième année, il y avait pour moi tout un monde de lumières, de parfums ; la vie m'apparaissait de loin avec des splendeurs et des bruits triomphaux ; c'étaient, comme dans les contes de fées, des galeries les unes après les autres, où les diamants ruissellent sous le feu des lustres d'or ; un nom magique fait rouler sur leurs gonds les portes enchantées, et à mesure qu'on avance, l'œil plonge dans des perspectives magnifiques dont l'éblouissement fait sourire et fermer les yeux.

Vaguement je convoitais quelque chose de splendide que je n'aurais su formuler par aucun mot, ni préciser dans ma pensée sous aucune forme, mais dont j'avais néanmoins le désir positif, incessant. J'ai toujours aimé les choses brillantes. Enfant, je me poussais dans la foule, à la portière des charlatans, pour voir les galons rouges de leurs domestiques et les rubans de la bride de leurs chevaux ; je restais longtemps devant la tente des bateleurs, à regarder leurs pantalons bouffants et leurs collerettes brodées. Oh ! comme j'aimais surtout la danseuse de corde, avec ses longs pendants d'oreilles qui allaient et venaient autour de sa tête, son gros collier de pierres qui battait sur sa poitrine ! avec quelle avidité inquiète je la contemplais, quand elle s'élançait jusqu'à la hauteur des lampes suspendues entre les arbres, et que sa robe, bordée de paillettes d'or, claquait en sautant et se bouffait dans l'air ! ce sont là les premières femmes que j'ai aimées. Mon esprit se tourmentait en songeant à ces cuisses de formes étranges, si bien serrées dans des pantalons roses, à ces bras souples, entourés d'anneaux qu'elles faisaient craquer sur leur dos en se renversant en arrière, quand elles touchaient jusqu'à terre avec les plumes de leur turban. La femme, que je tâchais déjà de deviner (il n'est pas d'âge où l'on n'y songe : enfant, nous palpons avec une sensualité naïve la gorge des grandes filles qui nous embrassent et qui nous tiennent dans leurs bras ; à dix ans, on rêve à l'amour ; à quinze, il vous arrive ; à soixante, on le garde encore, et si les morts songent à quelque chose dans leur tombeau, c'est à gagner sous terre la tombe qui est proche, pour soulever le suaire de la trépassée et se mêler à son sommeil) ; la femme était donc pour moi un mystère attrayant, qui troublait ma pauvre tête d'enfant. À ce que j'éprouvais, lorsqu'une de celles-ci venait à fixer ses yeux sur moi, je sentais déjà qu'il y avait quelque chose de fatal dans ce regard émouvant, qui fait fondre les volontés humaines, et j'en étais à la fois charmé et épouvanté.

À quoi rêvais-je durant les longues soirées d'études, quand je restais, le coude appuyé sur mon pupitre, à regarder la mèche du quinquet s'allonger dans la flamme et chaque goutte d'huile tomber dans le godet, pendant que mes camarades faisaient crier leurs plumes sur le papier et qu'on entendait, de temps à autre, le bruit d'un livre qu'on feuilletait ou qu'on refermait ? Je me dépêchais bien vite de faire mes devoirs, pour pouvoir me livrer à l'aise à ces pensées chéries. En effet, je me le promettais d'avance avec tout l'attrait d'un plaisir réel, je commençais par me forcer à y songer, comme un poète qui veut créer quelque chose et provoquer l'inspiration ; j'entrais le plus avant possible dans ma pensée, je la retournais sous toutes ses faces, j'allais jusqu'au fond, je revenais et je recommençais ; bientôt c'était une course effrénée de l'imagination, un élan prodigieux hors du réel, je me faisais des aventures, je m'arrangeais des histoires, je me bâtissais des palais, je m'y logeais comme un empereur, je creusais toutes les mines de diamant et je me les jetais à seaux sur le chemin que je devais parcourir.

Et quand le soir était venu, que nous étions tous couchés dans nos lits blancs, avec nos rideaux blancs, et que le maître d'étude seul se promenait de long en large dans le dortoir, comme je me renfermais bien plus en moi-même, cachant avec délices dans mon sein cet oiseau qui battait des ailes et dont je sentais la chaleur ! J'étais toujours longtemps à m'endormir, j'écoutais les heures sonner, plus elles étaient longues plus j'étais heureux ; il me semblaient qu'elles me poussaient dans le monde en chantant, et saluaient chaque moment de ma vie en me disant : Aux autres ! aux autres ! à venir ! adieu ! adieu ! Et quand la dernière vibration s'était éteinte, quand mon oreille ne bourdonnait plus à l'entendre, je me disais : "À demain, la même heure sonnera, mais demain ce sera un jour de moins, un jour de plus vers là-bas, vers ce but qui brille, vers mon avenir, vers ce soleil dont les rayons m'inondent et que je toucherai alors des mains", et je me disais que c'était bien long à venir, et je m'endormais presque en pleurant.

Certains mots me bouleversaient, celui de femme, de maîtresse surtout ; je cherchais l'explication du premier dans les livres, dans les gravures, dans les tableaux, dont j'aurais voulu pouvoir arracher les draperies pour y découvrir quelque chose. Le jour enfin que je devinai tout, cela m'étourdit d'abord avec délices, comme une harmonie suprême, mais bientôt je devins calme et vécus dès lors avec plus de joie, je sentis un mouvement d'orgueil à me dire que j'étais un homme, un être organisé pour avoir un jour une femme à moi ; le mot de la vie m'était connu, c'était presque y entrer et déjà en goûter quelque chose, mon désir n'alla pas plus loin, et je demeurai satisfait de savoir ce que je savais. Quant à une maîtresse, c'était pour moi un être satanique, dont la magie du nom seul me jetait en de longues extases : c'était pour leurs maîtresses que les rois ruinaient et gagnaient des provinces ; pour elles on tissait les tapis de l'Inde, on tournait l'or, on ciselait le marbre, on remuait le monde ; une maîtresse a des esclaves, avec des éventails de plume pour chasser les moucheron, quand elle dort sur des sofas de satin ; des éléphants chargés de présents attendent qu'elle s'éveille, des palanquins la portent mollement au bord des fontaines, elle siège sur des trônes, dans une atmosphère rayonnante et embaumée, bien loin de la foule, dont elle est l'exécration et l'idole.

Ce mystère de la femme en dehors du mariage, et plus femme encore à cause de cela même, m'irritait et me tentait du double appât de l'amour et de la richesse. Je n'aimais rien tant que le théâtre, j'en aimais jusqu'aux bourdonnements des entractes, jusqu'aux couloirs, que je parcourais le cœur ému pour trouver une place. Quand la représentation était déjà commencée, je montais l'escalier en courant, j'entendais le bruit des instruments, des voix, des bravos, et quand j'entrais, que je m'asseyais, tout l'air était embaumé d'une chaude odeur de femme bien habillée, quelque chose qui sentait le bouquet de violettes, les gants blancs, le mouchoir brodé ; les galeries couvertes de monde, comme autant de couronnes de fleurs et de diamants, semblaient se tenir suspendues à entendre chanter ; l'actrice seule était sur le devant de la scène, et sa poitrine, d'où sortait des notes précipitées, se baissait et montait en palpitant, le rythme poussait sa voix au galop et l'emportait dans un tourbillon mélodieux, les roulades faisaient onduler son cou gonflé, comme celui d'un cygne, sous le poids de baisers aériens ; elle tendait les bras, criait, pleurait, lançait des éclairs, appelait quelque chose avec un inconcevable amour, et, quand elle reprenait le motif, il me semblait qu'elle arrachait mon cœur avec le son de sa voix pour le mêler à elle dans une vibration amoureuse.

On l'applaudissait, on lui jetait des fleurs, et, dans mon transport, je savourais sur sa tête les adorations de la foule, l'amour de tous ces hommes et le désir de chacun d'eux. C'est de celle-là que j'aurais voulu être aimé, aimé d'un amour dévorant et qui fait peur, un amour de princesse ou d'actrice, qui nous remplit d'orgueil et vous fait de suite l'égal des riches et des puissants ! Qu'elle est belle la femme que tous applaudissent et que tous envient, celle qui donne à la foule, pour les rêves de chaque nuit, la fièvre du désir, celle qui n'apparaît jamais qu'aux flambeaux, brillante et chantante, et marchant dans l'idéal d'un poète comme dans une vie faite pour elle ! elle doit avoir pour celui qu'elle aime un autre amour, bien plus beau encore que celui qu'elle verse à flot sur tous les cœurs béants qui s'en abreuvent, des chants bien plus doux, des notes bien plus basses, plus amoureuses, plus tremblantes ! Si j'avais pu être près de ces lèvres d'où elles sortaient si pures, toucher à ces cheveux luisants qui brillaient sous des perles ! Mais la rampe du théâtre me semblait la barrière de l'illusion ; au-delà il y avait pour moi l'univers de l'amour et de la poésie, les passions y étaient plus belles et plus sonores, les forêts et les palais s'y dissipaient comme de la fumée, les sylphides descendait des cieux, tout chantait, tout aimait. C'est à tout cela que je songeais seul, le soir, quand le vent sifflait dans les corridors, ou dans les récréations, pendant qu'on jouait aux barres ou à la balle, et que je me promenais le long du mur, marchant sur les feuilles tombées des tilleuls pour m'amuser à entendre le bruit de mes pieds qui les soulevaient et les poussaient.

Je fus bientôt pris du désir d'aimer, je souhaitai l'amour avec une convoitise infinie, j'en rêvais les tourments, je m'attendais chaque instant à un déchirement qui m'eût comblé de joie. Plusieurs fois je crus y être, je prenais dans ma pensée la première femme venue qui m'avait semblé belle, et je me disais : "C'est celle-là que j'aime", mais le souvenir que j'aurais voulu en garder s'appâlissait et s'effaçait au lieu de grandir ; je sentais, d'ailleurs, que je me forçais à aimer, que je jouais, vis-à-vis de mon cœur, une comédie qui ne le dupait point, et cette chute me donnait une longue tristesse ; je regrettais presque des amours que je n'avais pas eues, et puis j'en rêvais d'autres dont j'aurais voulu pouvoir me combler l'âme.

C'était surtout le lendemain de bal ou de comédie, à la rentrée d'une vacance de deux ou trois jours, que je me rêvais une passion. Je me représentais celle que j'avais choisie, telle que je l'avais vue, en robe blanche, enlevée dans une valse aux bras d'un cavalier qui la soutient et qui lui sourit, ou appuyée sur la rampe de velours d'une loge et montrant tranquillement un profil royal ; le bruit des contredanses, l'éclat des lumières résonnait et m'éblouissait quelques temps encore, puis tout finissait par se fondre dans la monotonie d'une rêverie douloureuse. J'ai eu ainsi mille petits amours, qui ont duré huit jours ou un mois et que j'ai souhaité prolonger des siècles ; je ne sais en quoi je les faisais consister, ni quel était le but où ces vagues désirs convergeaient ; c'était, je crois, le besoin d'un sentiment nouveau et comme une aspiration vers quelque chose d'élevé dont je ne voyais pas le faite. La puberté du cœur précède celle du corps ; or j'avais plus besoin d'aimer que de jouir, plus envie de l'amour que de la volupté. Je n'ai même plus maintenant l'idée de cet amour de la première adolescence, où les sens ne sont rien et que l'infini seul remplit ; placé entre l'enfance et la jeunesse, il en est la transition et passe si vite qu'on l'oublie.

J'avais tant lu chez les poètes le mot amour, et si souvent je me le redisais pour me charmer de sa douceur, qu'à chaque étoile qui brillait dans un ciel bleu par une nuit douce, qu'à chaque murmure du flot sur la rive, qu'à chaque rayon de soleil dans les gouttes de la rosée, je me disais : "J'aime ! oh ! j'aime !" et j'en étais heureux, j'en étais fier, déjà prêt aux dévouements les plus beaux, et surtout quand une femme m'effleurait en passant ou me regardait en face, j'aurais voulu l'aimer mille fois plus, pâtir encore davantage, et que mon petit battement de cœur pût me casser la poitrine.

Il y a un âge, vous le rappelez-vous, lecteur, où l'on sourit vaguement, comme s'il y avait des baisers dans l'air ; on a le cœur tout gonflé d'une brise odorante, le sang bat chaudement dans les veines, il y pétille, comme le vin bouillonnant dans la coupe de cristal. Vous vous réveillez plus heureux et plus riche que la veille, plus palpitant, plus ému ; de doux fluides montent et descendent en vous et vous parcourent divinement de leur chaleur enivrante, les arbres tordent leur tête sous le vent en de molles courbures, les feuilles frémissent les unes sur les autres, comme si elles se parlaient, les nuages glissent et ouvrent le ciel, où la lune sourit et se mire d'en haut sur la rivière. Quand vous marchez le soir, respirant l'odeur des foin coupés, écoutant le coucou dans les bois, regardant les étoiles qui filent, votre cœur, n'est-ce-pas, votre cœur est plus pur, plus pénétré d'air, de lumière et d'azur que l'horizon paisible, où la terre touche le ciel dans un calme baiser. Oh ! comme les cheveux de femmes embaument !

Mais déjà ce n'était plus les premiers éblouissements de l'enfance, souvenirs agitants des rêves de la nuit passée ; j'entraais, au contraire, dans une vie réelle où j'avais ma place, dans une harmonie immense où mon cœur chantait un hymne et vibrait magnifiquement ; je goûtais avec joie cet épanouissement charmant, et mes sens s'éveillant ajoutaient à mon orgueil. Comme le premier homme crée, je me réveillais enfin d'un long sommeil, et je voyais près de moi un être semblable à moi, mais muni des différences qui plaçaient entre nous deux une attraction vertigineuse, et en même temps je sentais pour cette forme nouvelle un sentiment nouveau dont ma tête était fière, tandis que le soleil brillait plus pur, que les fleurs embaumaient mieux que jamais, que l'ombre était plus douce et plus aimante.

Simultanément à cela, je sentais chaque jour le développement de mon intelligence, elle vivait avec mon cœur d'une vie commune. Je ne sais pas si mes idées étaient des sentiments, car elles avaient toutes la chaleur des passions, la joie intime que j'avais dans le profond de mon être débordait sur le monde et l'embaumait pour moi du surplus de mon bonheur, j'allais toucher à la connaissance des voluptés suprêmes, et, comme un homme à la porte de sa maîtresse, je restais longtemps à me faire languir exprès, pour savourer un espoir certain et me dire : tout à l'heure je vais la tenir dans mes bras, elle sera à moi, bien à moi, ce n'est pas un rêve.

Étrange contradiction ! je fuyais la société des femmes, et j'éprouvais devant elles un plaisir délicieux ; je prétendais ne point les aimer, tandis que je vivais dans toutes et que j'aurais voulu pénétrer l'essence de chacune pour me mêler à sa beauté. Leurs lèvres déjà m'invitaient à d'autres baisers que ceux des mères, par la pensée je m'enveloppais de leurs cheveux, et je me plaçais entre leurs seins pour m'y écraser sous un étouffement divin ; j'aurais voulu être le collier qui baisait leur cou, l'agraphe qui mordait leur épaule, le vêtement qui couvrait de tout le reste du corps. Au-delà du vêtement je ne voyais plus rien, sous lui était un infini d'amour, je m'y perdais à y penser.

Ces passions que j'aurais voulu avoir, je les étudiais dans les livres. La vie humaine roulait, pour moi, sur deux ou trois idées, sur deux ou trois mots, autour desquels tout le reste tournait comme des satellites autour de leur astre. J'avais ainsi peuplé mon infini d'une quantité de soleils d'or, les contes d'amour se plaçaient dans ma tête à côté des belles révolutions, les belles passions face à face des grands crimes ; je songeais à la fois aux nuits étoilées des pays chauds et à l'embrasement des villes incendiées, aux lianes des forêts vierges et à la pompe des monarchies perdues, aux tombeaux et aux berceaux ; murmure du flot dans les joncs, roucoulement des tourterelles sur les colombiers, bois de myrte et senteur d'aloës, cliquetis des épées contre les cuirasses, chevaux qui piaffent, or qui reluit, étincellements de la vie, agonies des désespérés, je contemplais tout du même regard béant, comme une fourmière qui se fût agitée à mes pieds. Mais, par-dessus cette vie si mouvante à la surface, si résonnante de tant de cris différents, surgissait une immense amertume qui en était la synthèse et l'ironie.

Le soir, dans l'hiver, je m'arrêtais devant les maisons éclairées où l'on dansait, et je regardais des ombres passer derrière des rideaux rouges, j'entendais des bruits chargés de luxe, des verres qui claquaient sur des plateaux, de l'argenterie qui tintait dans des plats, et je me disais qu'il ne dépendait que de moi de prendre part à cette fête où l'on se ruait, à ce banquet où tous mangeaient ; un orgueil sauvage m'en écartait, car je trouvais que ma solitude me faisait beau, et que mon cœur était plus large à le tenir éloigné de tout ce qui faisait la joie des hommes. Alors je continuais ma route à travers les rues désertes, où les réverbères se balançaient tristement en faisant crier leurs poulies.

Je rêvais la douleur des poètes, je pleurais avec eux leurs larmes les plus belles, je les sentais jusqu'au fond du cœur, j'en étais pénétré, navré, il me semblait parfois que l'enthousiasme qu'ils me donnaient me faisait leur égal et me montait jusqu'à eux ; des pages, où d'autres restaient froids, me transportaient, me donnaient une fureur de pythonisse, je m'en ravageais l'esprit à plaisir, je me les récitais au bord de la mer, ou bien j'allais, la tête baissée, marchant dans l'herbe, me les disant de la voix la plus amoureuse et la plus tendre.

Malheur à qui n'a pas désiré des colères de tragédie, à qui ne sait pas par cœur des strophes amoureuses pour se les répéter au clair de lune ! il est beau de vivre ainsi dans la beauté éternelle, de se draper avec les rois, d'avoir les passions à leur expression la plus haute, d'aimer les amours que le génie a rendus immortels.

Dès lors, je ne vécus plus que dans un idéal sans bornes, où, libre et volant à l'aise, j'allais comme une abeille cueillir sur toutes choses de quoi me nourrir et vivre ; je tâchais de découvrir, dans les bruits des forêts et des flots, des mots que les autres hommes n'entendaient point, et j'ouvrais l'oreille pour écouter la révélation de leur harmonie ; je composais avec les nuages et le soleil des tableaux énormes, que nul langage n'eût pu rendre, et, dans les actions humaines également, j'y percevais tout à coup des rapports et des antithèses dont la précision lumineuse m'éblouissait moi-même. Quelquefois l'art et la poésie semblaient ouvrir leurs horizons infinis et s'illuminer l'un l'autre de leur propre éclat, je bâtissais des palais de cuivre rouge, je montais éternellement dans un ciel radieux, sur un escalier de nuages plus mous que des édredons.

L'aigle est un oiseau fier, qui perche sur les hautes cimes ; sous lui il voit les nuages qui roulent dans les vallées, emportant avec eux les hirondelles ; il voit la pluie tomber sur les sapins, les pierres de marbre rouler dans le gave, le pâtre qui siffle ses chèvres, les chamois qui sautent les précipices. En vain la pluie ruisselle, l'orage casse les arbres, les torrents roulent avec des sanglots, la cascade fume et bondit, le tonnerre éclate et brise la cime des monts, paisible il vole au-dessus et bat des ailes ; le bruit de la montagne l'amuse, il pousse des cris de joie, lutte avec les nuées qui courent vite, et monte encore plus haut dans son ciel immense.

Moi aussi, je me suis amusé du bruit des tempêtes et du bourdonnement vague des hommes qui montait jusqu'à moi ; j'ai vécu dans une aire élevée, où mon cœur se gonflait d'air pur, où je poussais des cris de triomphe pour me désennuyer de ma solitude.

Il me vint bien vite un invincible dégoût pour les choses d'ici-bas. Un matin, je me sentis vieux et plein d'expériences sur mille choses inéprouvées, j'avais de l'indifférence pour les plus tentantes et du dédain pour les plus belles ; tout ce qui faisait l'envie des autres me faisait pitié, je ne voyais rien qui valût même la peine d'un désir, peut-être ma vanité faisait-elle que j'étais au-dessus de la vanité commune et mon désintéressement n'était-il que l'excès d'une cupidité sans bornes. J'étais comme ces édifices neufs, sur lesquels la mousse se met déjà à pousser avant qu'ils ne soient achevés d'être bâtis ; les joies turbulentes de mes camarades m'ennuyaient, et je haussais les épaules à leurs niaiseries sentimentales : les uns gardaient tout un an un vieux gant blanc, ou un camélia fané, pour le couvrir de baisers et de soupirs ; d'autres écrivaient à des modistes, donnaient rendez-vous à des cuisinières ; les premiers me semblaient sots, les seconds grotesques. Et puis la bonne et la mauvaise société m'ennuyaient également, j'étais cynique avec les dévots et mystique avec les libertins, de sorte que tous ne m'aimaient guère.

À cette époque où j'étais vierge, je prenais plaisir à contempler les prostituées, je passais dans les rues qu'elles habitent, je hantais les lieux où elles se promènent ; quelquefois je leur parlais pour me tenter moi-même, je suivais leurs pas, je les touchais, j'entrais dans l'air qu'elles jettent autour d'elles ; et comme j'avais de l'impudence, je croyais être calme ; je me sentais le cœur vide, mais ce vide-là était un gouffre.

J'aimais à me perdre dans le tourbillon des rues ; souvent je prenais des distractions stupides, comme de regarder fixement chaque passant pour découvrir sur sa figure un vice ou une passion saillante. Toutes ces têtes passaient vite devant moi : les unes souriaient, sifflaient en partant, les cheveux au vent ; d'autres étaient pâles, d'autres rouges, d'autres livides ; elles disparaissaient rapidement à mes côtés, elles glissaient les unes après les autres comme les enseignes lorsqu'on est en voiture. Ou bien je ne regardais seulement que les pieds qui allaient dans tous les sens, et je tâchais de rattacher chaque pied à un corps, un corps à une idée, tous ces mouvements à des buts, et je me demandais où tous ces pas allaient, et pourquoi marchaient tous ces gens. Je regardais les équipages s'enfoncer sous les péristyles sonores et le lourd marchepied se déployer avec fracas ; la foule s'engouffrait à la porte des théâtres, je regardais les lumières briller dans le brouillard et, au-dessus, le ciel tout noir sans étoiles ; au coin d'une rue, un joueur d'orgue jouait, des enfants en guenilles chantaient, un marchand de fruits poussait sa charrette, éclairée d'un falot rouge ; les cafés étaient pleins de bruit, les glaces étincelaient sous le feu des becs de gaz, les couteaux retentissaient sur les tables de marbre ; à la porte les pauvres, en grelottant, se haussaient pour voir les riches manger, je me mêlais à eux et, d'un regard pareil, je contemplais les heureux de la vie ; je jalousais leur joies banales, car il y a des jours où l'on est si triste qu'on voudrait se faire plus triste encore, on s'enfonce à plaisir dans le désespoir comme dans une route facile, on a le cœur tout gonflé de larmes et l'on s'excite à pleurer. J'ai souvent souhaité d'être misérable et de porter des haillons, d'être tourmenté de la faim, de sentir le sang couler d'une blessure, d'avoir une haine et de chercher à me venger.

Quelle est donc cette douleur inquiète, dont on est fier comme du génie et que l'on cache comme un amour ? vous ne la dites à personne, vous la gardez pour vous seul, vous l'étreignez sur votre poitrine avec des baisers pleins de larmes. De quoi se plaindre pourtant ? et qui vous rend si sombre à l'âge où tout sourit ? n'avez-vous pas des amis tout dévoués ? une famille dont vous faites l'orgueil, des bottes vernies, un paletot ouaté, etc ? Rhapsodies poétiques, souvenirs de mauvaises lectures, hyperboles de rhétorique, que toutes ces grandes douleurs sans nom, mais le bonheur aussi ne serait-il pas une métaphore inventée un jour d'ennui ? J'en ai longtemps douté, aujourd'hui je n'en doute plus.

Je n'ai rien aimé et j'aurais voulu tant aimer ! il me faudra mourir sans avoir rien goûté de bon. À l'heure qu'il est, même la vie humaine m'offre encore mille aspects que j'ai à peine entrevus : jamais, seulement, au bord d'une source vive et sur un cheval haletant, je n'ai entendu le son du cor au fond des bois ; jamais non plus, par une nuit douce et respirant l'odeur des roses, je n'ai senti une main frémir dans la mienne et la saisir en silence. Ah ! je suis plus vide, plus creux, plus triste qu'un tonneau défoncé dont on a tout bu, et où les araignées jettent leurs toiles dans l'ombre.

Ce n'était point la douleur de René ni l'immensité céleste de ses ennuis, plus beaux et plus argentés que les rayons de la lune ; je n'étais point chaste comme Werther ni débauché comme Don Juan ; je n'étais, pour tout, ni assez pur, ni assez fort.

J'étais donc, ce que vous êtes tous, un certain homme, qui vit, qui dort, qui mange, qui boit, qui pleure, qui rit, bien renfermé en lui-même, et retrouvant en lui, partout où il se transporte, les mêmes ruines d'espérances sitôt abattues qu'élevées, la même poussière de choses broyées, les mêmes sentiers mille fois parcourus, les mêmes profondeurs inexplorées, épouvantables et ennuyeuses. N'êtes-vous pas las comme moi de vous réveiller tous les matins et de revoir le soleil ? las de vivre de la même vie et de souffrir la même douleur ? las de désirer et las d'être dégoûté ? las d'attendre et las d'avoir ?

À quoi bon écrire ceci ? pourquoi continuer, de la même voix dolente, le même récit funèbre ? Quand je l'ai commencé, je le savais beau, mais à mesure que j'avance, mes larmes me tombent sur le cœur et m'éteignent la voix.

Oh ! le pâle soleil d'hiver ! il est triste comme un souvenir heureux. Nous sommes entourés d'ombre, regardons notre foyer brûler ; les chardons étalés sont couverts de grandes lignes noires entrecroisées, qui semblent battre comme des veines animées d'une autre vie ; attendons la nuit venir.

Rappelons-nous nos beaux jours, les jours où nous étions gais, où nous étions plusieurs, où le soleil brillait, où les oiseaux cachés chantaient après la pluie, les jours où nous étions promenés dans le jardin ; le sable des allées était mouillé, les corolles des roses étaient tombées dans les plates-bandes, l'air embaumait. Pourquoi n'avons-nous pas assez senti notre bonheur quand il nous a passé par les mains ? il eût fallu, ces jours-là, ne penser qu'à le goûter et savourer longuement chaque minute, afin qu'elle s'écoulât plus lente ; il y même des jours qui ont passé comme d'autres, et dont je me ressouviens délicieusement. Une fois, par exemple, c'était l'hiver, il faisait très froid, nous sommes rentrés de promenade, et comme nous étions peu, on nous a laissés nous mettre à l'aise autour du poêle ; nous nous sommes chauffés à l'aise, nous faisons rôtir nos morceaux de pain avec nos règles, le tuyau bourdonnait ; nous causions de mille choses : des pièces que nous avions vues, des femmes que nous aimions, de notre sortie du collège, de ce que nous ferions quand nous serions grands, etc. Une autre fois, j'ai passé tout l'après-midi couché sur le dos, dans un champ où il y avait des petites marguerites qui sortaient de l'herbe ; elles étaient, jaunes, rouges, elles disparaissaient dans la verdure du pré, c'était un tapis de nuances infinies ; le ciel pur était couvert de petits nuages blancs qui ondulaient comme des vagues rondes ; j'ai regardé le soleil à travers mes mains appuyées sur ma figure, il dorait le bord de mes doigts et rendait ma chair rose, je fermais exprès les yeux pour voir sous mes paupières de grandes taches vertes avec des franges d'or. Et un soir, je ne sais plus quand, je m'étais endormi au pied d'un mulon ; quand je me suis réveillé, il faisait nuit, les étoiles brillaient, palpitaient, les meules de foin avançaient leur ombre derrière elles, la lune avait une belle figure d'argent.

Comme tout cela est bien loin ! est-ce que je vivais dans ce temps-là ? était-ce bien moi ? est-ce moi maintenant ? Chaque minute de ma vie se trouve tout à coup séparée de l'autre par un abîme, entre hier et aujourd'hui il y a pour moi une éternité qui m'épouvante, chaque jour il me semble que je n'étais pas si misérable la veille et, sans pouvoir dire ce que j'avais de plus, je sens bien que je m'appauvris et que l'heure qui arrive m'emporte quelque chose, étonné seulement d'avoir encore dans le cœur place pour la souffrance ; mais le cœur de l'homme est inépuisable pour la tristesse : un ou deux bonheurs le remplissent, toutes les misères de l'humanité peuvent s'y donner rendez-vous et vivre comme des hôtes.

Si vous m'aviez demandé ce qu'il me fallait, je n'aurais su que répondre, mes désirs n'avaient point d'objet, ma tristesse n'avait pas de cause immédiate ; ou plutôt, il y avait tant de buts et tant de causes que je n'aurais su en dire aucun. Toutes les passions entraient en moi et ne pouvaient en sortir, s'y trouvaient à l'étroit ; elles s'enflammaient les unes les autres, comme par des miroirs concentriques : modeste, j'étais plein d'orgueil ; vivant dans la solitude, je rêvais la gloire ; retiré du monde, je brûlais d'y paraître, d'y briller ; chaste, je m'abandonnais, dans mes rêves du jour et de la nuit, aux luxures les plus effrénées, aux voluptés les plus féroces. La vie que je refoulais en moi-même se contractait au cœur et le serrait à l'étouffer.

Quelquefois, n'en pouvant plus, dévoré de passions sans bornes, plein de la lave ardente qui coulait de mon âme, aimant d'un amour furieux des choses sans nom, regrettant des rêves magnifiques, tenté par toutes les voluptés de la pensée, aspirant à moi toutes les poésies, toutes les harmonies, et écrasé sous le poids de mon cœur et de mon orgueil, je tombais anéanti dans un abîme de douleurs, le sang me fouettait la figure, mes artères s'étourdissaient, ma poitrine semblait rompre, je ne voyais plus rien, je ne sentais plus rien, j'étais ivre, j'étais fou, je m'imaginais être grand, je m'imaginais contenir une incarnation suprême, dont la révélation eût émerveillé le monde, et ses déchirements, c'était la vie même du dieu que je portais dans mes entrailles. À ce dieu magnifique j'ai immolé toutes les heures de ma jeunesse ; j'avais fait de moi-même un temple pour contenir quelque chose de divin, le temple est resté vide, l'ortie a poussé entre les pierres, les piliers s'écroulent, voilà les hiboux qui y font leur nids. N'usant pas de l'existence, l'existence m'usait, mes rêves me fatiguaient encore plus que de grands travaux ; une création entière, immobile, irrévélée à elle-même, vivait sourdement sous ma vie ; j'étais un chaos dormant de mille précipices féconds qui ne savaient comment se manifester ni que faire d'eux-mêmes, ils cherchaient leurs formes et attendaient leur moule.

J'étais, dans la variété de mon être, comme une immense forêt de l'Inde, où la vie palpite dans chaque atome et apparaît, monstrueuse ou adorable, sous chaque rayon de soleil ; l'azur est rempli de parfums et de poisons, les tigres bondissent, les éléphants marchent fièrement comme des pagodes vivantes, les dieux, mystérieux et difformes, sont cachés dans le creux des cavernes parmi de grands monceaux d'or ; et au milieu, coule le large fleuve, avec des crocodiles béants qui font claquer leurs écailles dans le lotus du rivage, et ses îles de fleurs que le courant entraîne avec des troncs d'arbre et des cadavres verdissant par la peste. J'aimais pourtant la vie, mais la vie expansive, radieuse, rayonnante ; je l'aimais dans le galop furieux des coursiers, dans le scintillement des étoiles, dans le mouvement des vagues qui courent vers le rivage ; je l'aimais dans le battement des belles poitrines nues, dans le tremblement des regards amoureux, dans la vibration des cordes du violon, dans le frémissement des chênes, dans le soleil couchant, qui dore les vitres et fait penser aux balcons de Babylone où les reines se tenaient accoudées en regardant l'Asie.

Et au milieu de tout je restais sans mouvement ; entre tant d'actions que je voyais, que j'excitais même, je restais inactif, aussi inerte qu'une statue entourée d'un essaim de mouches qui bourdonnent à ses oreilles et qui courent sur son marbre.

Oh ! comme j'aurais aimé si j'avais aimé, si j'avais pu concentrer sur un seul point toutes ces forces divergentes qui retombaient sur moi ! Quelquefois, à tout prix je voulais trouver une femme, je voulais l'aimer, elle contenait tout pour moi, j'attendais tout d'elle, c'était mon soleil de poésie, qui devait faire éclore toute fleur et resplendir toute beauté ; je me promettais un amour divin, je lui donnais d'avance une auréole à m'éblouir, et la première qui venait à ma rencontre, au hasard, dans la foule, je lui vouais mon âme, et je la regardais de manière à ce qu'elle me comprît bien, à ce qu'elle pût lire dans ce seul regard tout ce que j'étais, et m'aimer. Je plaçais ma destinée dans ce hasard, mais elle passait comme les autres, comme les précédentes, comme les suivantes, et ensuite je retombais, plus délabré qu'une voile déchirée trempée par l'orage.

Après de tels accès, la vie se rouvrait pour moi dans l'éternelle mélancolie de ses heures qui coulent et de ses jours qui reviennent, j'attendais le soir avec impatience, je comptais combien il m'en restait encore pour atteindre la fin du mois, je souhaitais d'être à la saison prochaine, j'y voyais sourire une existence plus douce. Quelquefois, pour secouer ce manteau de plomb qui me pesait sur les épaules, je voulais travailler, lire ; j'ouvrais un livre, et puis deux, et puis dix, et, sans avoir lu deux lignes d'un seul, je les rejetais avec dégoût et je me remettais à dormir dans le même ennui.

Que faire ici-bas ? qu'y rêver ? qu'y bâtir ? dites-le moi donc, vous que la vie amuse, qui marchez vers un but et vous tourmentez pour quelque chose !

Je ne trouvais rien qui fût digne de moi, je me trouvais également propre à rien. Travailler, tout sacrifier à une idée, à une ambition, ambition misérable et triviale, avoir une place, un nom ? après ? à quoi bon ? Et puis je n'aimais pas la gloire, la plus retentissante ne m'eût point satisfait parce qu'elle n'eût jamais atteint à l'unisson de mon cœur.

Je suis né avec le désir de mourir. Rien ne me paraissait plus sot que la vie et plus honteux que d'y tenir. Elevé sans religion, comme les hommes de mon âge, je n'avais pas le bonheur sec des athées ni l'insouciance ironique des sceptiques. Par caprice sans doute, si je suis entré quelquefois dans une église, c'était pour écouter l'orgue, pour admirer les statuettes de pierre dans leurs niches ; mais quand au dogme, je n'allais pas jusqu'à lui ; je me sentais bien le fils de Voltaire.

Je voyais les autres gens vivre, mais d'une autre vie que la mienne : les uns croyaient, les autres niaient, d'autres doutaient, d'autres enfin ne s'occupaient pas du tout de tout ça et faisaient leurs affaires, c'est-à-dire vendaient dans leurs boutiques, écrivaient leurs livres ou criaient dans leur chaire ; c'était là ce qu'on appelle l'humanité, surface mouvante des méchants, de lâches, d'idiots et de laids. Et moi j'étais dans la foule, comme une algue arrachée sur l'Océan, perdue au milieu des flots sans nombre qui roulaient, qui m'entouraient et qui bruissaient.

J'aurais voulu être empereur pour la puissance absolue, pour le nombre des esclaves, pour les armées éperdues d'enthousiasme ; j'aurais voulu être femme pour la beauté, pour pouvoir m'admirer moi-même, me mettre nue, laisser retomber ma chevelure sur mes talons et me mirer dans les ruisseaux. Je me perdais à plaisir dans des songeries sans limites, je m'imaginais assister à de belles fêtes antiques, être roi des Indes et aller à la chasse sur un éléphant blanc, voir des danses ioniennes, écouter le flot grec sur les marches d'un temple, entendre les brises des nuits dans les lauriers-roses de mes jardins, fuir avec Cléopâtre sur ma galère antique. Ah ! folies que tout cela ! malheur à la glaneuse qui laisse là sa besogne et lève la tête pour voir les berlines passer sur la grand route ! En se remettant à l'ouvrage, elle rêvera de cachemires et d'amours de princes, ne trouvera plus d'épis et rentrera sans avoir fait sa gerbe.

Il eût mieux valu faire comme tout le monde, ne prendre la vie ni trop au sérieux ni trop au grotesque, choisir un métier et l'exercer, saisir sa part du gâteau commun et le manger en disant qu'il est bon, que de suivre le triste chemin où j'ai marché tout seul ; je ne serais pas à écrire ceci ou c'eût été une autre histoire. À mesure que j'avance, elle se confond même pour moi, comme les perspectives que l'on voit de trop loin, car tout passe, même le souvenir de nos larmes les plus brûlantes, de nos rires les plus sonores ; bien vite l'oeil se sèche et la bouche reprend son pli ; je n'ai plus maintenant que la réminiscence d'un long ennui qui a duré plusieurs hivers, passés à bailler, à désirer ne plus vivre.

C'est peut-être pour tout cela que je me suis cru poète ; aucune des misères ne m'a manqué, hélas ! comme vous voyez. Oui, il m'a semblé autrefois que j'avais du génie, je marchais le front rempli de pensées magnifiques, le style coulait sous ma plume comme le sang dans mes veines ; au moindre froissement du beau, une mélodie pure montait en moi, ainsi que ces voix aériennes, sons formés par le vent, qui sortent des montagnes ; les passions humaines auraient vibré merveilleusement si je les avais touchées, j'avais dans la tête des drames tout faits, remplis de scènes furieuses et d'angoisses non révélées ; depuis l'enfant dans son berceau jusqu'au mort dans sa bière, l'humanité résonnait en moi avec tous ses échos ; parfois des idées gigantesques me traversaient tout à coup l'esprit, comme, l'été, ces grands éclairs muets qui illuminent une ville entière, avec tous les détails de ses édifices et les carrefours de ses rues. J'en étais ébranlé, ébloui ; mais quand je retrouvais chez d'autres les pensées et jusqu'aux formes mêmes que j'avais conçues, je tombais, sans transition, dans un découragement sans fond ; je m'étais cru leur égal et je n'étais plus que leur copiste ! Je passais alors de l'enivrement du génie au sentiment désolant de la médiocrité, avec toute la rage des rois détrônés et tous les supplices de la honte. Dans de certains jours, j'aurais juré être né pour la Muse, d'autres fois je me trouvais presque idiot ; et toujours passant ainsi de tant de grandeur à tant de bassesse, j'ai fini, comme les gens souvent riches et souvent pauvres dans leur vie, par être et rester misérable.

Dans ce temps-là, chaque matin en m'éveillant, il me semblait qu'il allait s'accomplir, ce jour-là, quelque grand événement ; j'avais le cœur gonflé d'espérance, comme si j'eusse attendu d'un pays lointain une cargaison de bonheur ; mais, la journée avançant, je perdais tout courage ; au crépuscule surtout, je voyais bien qu'il ne viendrait rien. Enfin la nuit arrivait et je me couchais.

De lamentables harmonies s'établissaient entre la nature physique et moi. Comme mon cœur se serrait quand le vent sifflait dans les serrures, quand les réverbères jetaient leur lueur sur la neige, quand j'entendais les chiens aboyer après la lune !

Je ne voyais rien à quoi me raccrocher, ni le monde, ni la solitude, ni la poésie, ni la science, ni l'impiété, ni la religion ; j'errais en tout cela comme les âmes dont l'enfer ne veut pas et que le paradis repousse. Alors je me croisais les bras, me regardant comme un homme mort, je n'étais plus qu'une momie embaumée dans ma douleur ; la fatalité, qui m'avait courbé dès ma jeunesse, s'étendait pour moi sur le monde entier, je la regardais se manifester dans toutes les actions des hommes aussi universellement que le soleil sur la surface de la terre, elle me devint une atroce divinité, que j'adorais comme les Indiens adorent le colosse ambulant qui leur passe sur le ventre ; je me complaisais dans mon chagrin, je ne faisais plus d'effort pour en sortir, je le savourais même, avec la joie désespérée du malade qui gratte sa plaie et se met à rire quand il a du sang aux ongles.

Il me prit contre la vie, contre les hommes, contre tout, une rage sans nom. J'avais dans le cœur des trésors de tendresse, et je devins plus féroce que les tigres ; j'aurais voulu anéantir la création et m'endormir avec elle dans l'infini du néant ; que ne me réveillais-je à la lueur des villes incendiées ! J'aurais voulu entendre le frémissement des ossements que la flamme fait pétiller, traverser des fleuves chargés de cadavres, galoper sur des peuples courbés et les écraser des quatre fers de mon cheval, être Genghis Khan, Tamerlan, Néron, effrayer le monde au froncement de mes sourcils.

Autant j'avais eu d'exaltations et de rayonnements, autant je me renfermai et roulai sur moi-même. Depuis longtemps déjà j'ai séché mon cœur, rien de nouveau n'y entre plus, il est vide comme les tombeaux où les morts sont pourris. J'avais pris le soleil en haine, j'étais excédé du bruit des fleuves, de la vue des bois, rien ne me semblait sot comme la campagne ; tout s'assombrit et se rapetissa, je vécus dans un crépuscule perpétuel.

Quelquefois je me demandais si je ne me trompais pas ; j'alignais ma jeunesse, mon avenir, mais quelle pitoyable jeunesse, quel avenir vide !

Quand je voulais sortir du spectacle de ma misère et regarder le monde, ce que j'en pouvais voir, c'étaient des hurlements, des cris, des larmes, des convulsions, la même comédie revenant perpétuellement avec les mêmes acteurs ; et il y a des gens, me disais-je, qui étudient tout cela et se remettent à la tâche tous les matins ! Il n'y avait plus qu'un grand amour qui eût pu me tirer de là, mais je regardais cela comme quelque chose qui n'est pas de ce monde, et je regrettais amèrement tout le bonheur que j'avais rêvé.

Alors, la mort m'apparut belle. Je l'ai toujours aimée ; enfant, je la désirais seulement pour la connaître, pour savoir qu'est-ce qu'il y a dans le tombeau et quels songes a ce sommeil ; je me souviens avoir souvent gratté le vert-de-gris de vieux sous pour m'empoisonner, essayé d'avaler des épingles, m'être approché de la lucarne d'un grenier pour me jeter dans la rue... Quand je pense que presque tous les enfants font de même, qu'ils cherchent à se suicider dans leurs jeux, ne dois-je pas conclure que l'homme, quoi qu'il en dise, aime la mort d'un amour dévorant ? Il lui donne tout ce qu'il crée, il en sort et il y retourne, il ne fait qu'y songer tant qu'il vit, il en a le germe dans le corps, le désir dans le cœur.

Il est si doux de se figurer qu'on n'est plus ! il fait calme dans tous les cimetières ! là, tout étendu et roulé dans le linceul et les bras en croix sur la poitrine, les siècles passent sans plus vous éveiller que le vent qui passe sur l'herbe. Que de fois j'ai contemplé, dans les chapelles des cathédrales, ces longues statues de pierre couchées sur les tombeaux ! leur calme est si profond que la vie ici-bas n'offre rien de pareil ; ils ont, sur leur lèvres froides, comme un sourire monté du fond du tombeau, on dirait qu'ils dorment, qu'ils savourent la mort. N'avoir plus besoin de pleurer, ne plus sentir de ces défaillances où il semble que tout se rompt, comme des échafaudages pourris, c'est là le bonheur au-dessus de tous les bonheurs, la joie sans lendemain, le rêve sans éveil. Et puis on va peut-être dans un monde plus beau, par delà les étoiles, où l'on vit de la vie de la lumière et des parfums ; l'on est peut-être quelque chose de l'odeur des roses et de la fraîcheur des prés ! Oh, non, non, j'aime mieux croire que l'on est bien mort tout à fait, que rien ne sort du cercueil ; et s'il faut encore sentir quelque chose, que ce soit son propre néant, que la mort se repaisse d'elle-même et s'admire ; assez de vie juste pour sentir que l'on n'est plus.

Et je montais au haut des tours, je me penchais sur l'abîme, j'attendais le vertige venir, j'avais une inconcevable envie de m'élancer, de voler dans l'air, de me dissiper avec les vents ; je regardais la pointe des poignards, la gueule des pistolets, je les appuyais sur mon front, je m'habituais au contact de leur froid et de leur pointe ; d'autres fois, je regardais les rouliers tournant à l'angle des rues et l'énorme largeur de leurs roues broyer la poussière sur le pavé ; je pensais que ma tête serait ainsi bien écrasée, pendant que les chevaux iraient au pas. Mais je n'aurais pas voulu être enterré, la bière m'épouvante ; j'aimerais plutôt être déposé sur un lit de feuilles sèches, au fond des bois, et que mon corps s'en allât petit à petit au bec des oiseaux et aux pluies d'orage.

Un jour, à Paris, je me suis arrêté longtemps sur le Pont-Neuf ; c'était l'hiver, la Seine charriait, de gros glaçons ronds descendaient lentement le courant et se fracassaient sous les arches, le fleuve était verdâtre ; j'ai songé à tous ceux qui étaient venus là pour en finir. Combien de gens avaient passé à la place où je me tenais alors, courant la tête levée à leurs amours ou à leurs affaires, et qui y étaient revenus, un jour, marchant à petits pas, palpitant à l'approche de mourir ! Ils se sont approché du parapet, ils ont monté dessus, ils ont sauté. Oh ! que de misères ont fini là, que de bonheurs y ont commencé ! Quel tombeau froid et humide ! comme il s'élargit pour nous ! comme il y en a dedans ! ils sont tous là, au fond, roulant lentement avec leurs faces crispées et leurs membres bleus, chacun de ces flots glacés les emporte dans leur sommeil et les traîne doucement à la mer.

Quelquefois les vieillards me regardaient avec envie, ils me disaient que j'étais heureux d'être jeune, que c'était là le bel âge, leurs yeux caves admiraient mon front blanc, ils se rappelaient leurs amours et me les contaient ; mais je me suis souvent demandé si, dans leur temps, la vie était plus belle, et comme je ne voyais rien en moi que l'on pût envier, j'étais jaloux de leurs regrets, parce qu'ils cachaient des bonheurs que je n'avais pas eus. Et puis c'étaient des faiblesses d'hommes en enfance à faire pitié ! je riais doucement et pour presque rien comme les convalescents. Quelquefois je me sentais pris de tendresse pour mon chien, et je l'embrassais avec ardeur ; ou bien j'allais dans une armoire revoir quelque vieil habit de collègue, et je songeais à la journée où je l'avais étreint, aux lieux où il avait été avec moi, et je me perdais en souvenirs sur tous mes jours vécus. Car les souvenirs sont doux, tristes ou gais, n'importe ! et les plus tristes sont encore les plus délectables pour nous, ne résument-ils pas l'infini ? l'on épuise quelquefois des siècles à songer à une certaine heure qui ne reviendra plus, qui a passé, qui est au néant pour toujours, et que l'on rachèterait par tout l'avenir.

Mais ces souvenirs-là sont des flambeaux clairsemés dans une grande salle obscure, ils brillent au milieu des ténèbres ; il n'y a que dans leur rayonnement que l'on y voit, ce qui est plus près d'eux resplendit, tandis que tout le reste est plus noir, plus couvert d'ombres et d'ennui.

Avant d'aller plus loin, il faut que je vous raconte ceci :

Je ne me rappelle plus bien l'année, c'était pendant une vacance, je me suis réveillé de bonne humeur et j'ai regardé par la fenêtre. Le jour venait, la lune toute blanche remontait dans le ciel ; entre les gorges des collines, des vapeurs grises et rosées fumaient doucement et se perdaient dans l'air ; les poules de la basse-cour chantaient. J'ai entendu derrière la maison, dans le chemin qui conduit aux champs, une charrette passer, dont les roues claquaient dans les ornières, les faneurs allaient à l'ouvrage ; il y avait de la rosée sur la haie, le soleil brillait dessus, on sentait l'eau et l'herbe.

Je suis sorti et je m'en suis allé à X... ; j'avais trois lieues à faire, je me suis mis en route, seul, sans bâton, sans chien. J'ai d'abord marché dans les sentiers qui serpentent entre les blés, j'ai passé sous des pommiers, au bord des haies ; je ne songeais plus à rien, j'écoutais le bruit de mes pas, la cadence de mes mouvements me berçait la pensée. J'étais libre, silencieux et calme, il faisait chaud ; de temps à autre je m'arrêtais, mes tempes battaient, le cri-cri chantait dans les chaumes, et je me remettais à marcher. J'ai passé dans un hameau où il n'y avait personne, les cours étaient silencieuses, c'était, je crois, un dimanche ; les vaches, assises dans l'herbe, à l'ombre des arbres, rumaient tranquillement, remuant leurs oreilles pour chasser les moucheron. Je me souviens que j'ai marché dans un chemin où un ruisseau coulait sur les cailloux, des lézards verts et des insectes aux ailes d'or montaient lentement le long des rebords de la route, qui était enfoncée et toute couverte par le feuillage.

Puis je me suis trouvé sur un plateau, dans un champ fauché ; j'avais la mer devant moi, elle était toute bleue, le soleil répandait dessus une profusion de perles lumineuses, des sillons de feu s'étendaient sur les flots ; entre le ciel azuré et la mer plus foncée, l'horizon rayonnait, flamboyait ; la voûte commençait sur ma tête et s'abaissait derrière les flots, qui remontaient vers elle, faisant comme le cercle d'un infini invisible. Je me suis couché dans un sillon et j'ai regardé le ciel, perdu dans la contemplation de sa beauté.

Le champ où j'étais était un champ de blé, j'entendais les cailles, qui voltigeaient autour de moi et venaient s'abattre sur des mottes de terre ; la mer était douce, et murmurait plutôt comme un soupir que comme une voix ; le soleil lui-même semblait avoir son bruit, il inondait tout, ses rayons me brûlaient les membres, la terre me renvoyait sa chaleur, j'étais noyé dans sa lumière, je fermais les yeux et je la voyais encore. L'odeur des vagues montait jusqu'à moi, avec la senteur du varech et des plantes marines ; quelquefois elles paraissaient s'arrêter ou venaient mourir sans bruit sur le rivage festonné d'écume, comme une lèvres dont le baiser ne sonne point. Alors, dans le silence de deux vagues, pendant que l'Océan gonflé se taisait, j'écoutais le chant des cailles, et après, celui des oiseaux.

Je suis descendu en courant au bord de la mer, à travers les terrains éboulés que je sautais d'un pied sûr, je levais la tête avec orgueil, je respirais fièrement la brise fraîche, qui séchait mes cheveux en sueur ; l'esprit de Dieu me remplissait, je me sentais le cœur grand, j'adorais quelque chose d'un étrange mouvement, j'aurais voulu m'absorber dans la lumière du soleil et me perdre dans cette immensité d'azur, avec l'odeur qui s'élevait de la surface des flots ; et je fus pris alors d'une joie insensée, et je me mis à marcher comme si tout le bonheur des cieux m'était entré dans l'âme. Comme la falaise s'avavançait en cet endroit là, toute la côte disparut et je ne vis plus rien que la mer : les lames montaient sur le galet jusqu'à mes pieds, elles écumaient sur les rochers à fleur d'eau, les battaient en cadence, les enlaçaient comme des bras liquides et des nappes limpides, en retombant illuminées d'une couleur bleue ; le vent soulevait les mousses autour de moi et ridait les flaques d'eau restées dans le creux des pierres, les varechs pleuraient et se berçaient, encore agités du mouvement de la vague qui les avait quittés ; de temps à autre une mouette passait avec de grands battements d'ailes, et montait jusqu'au haut de la falaise. À mesure que la mer se retirait, et que son bruit s'éloignait ainsi qu'un refrain qui expire, le rivage s'avavançait vers moi, laissant à découvert sur le sable les sillons que la vague avait tracés. Et je compris alors tout le bonheur de la création et toute la joie que Dieu y a placée pour l'homme ; la nature m'apparut belle comme une harmonie complète, que l'extase seule doit entendre ; quelque chose de tendre comme un amour et de pur comme la prière s'éleva pour moi du fond de l'horizon, s'abattit de la cime des rocs déchirés, du haut des cieux ; il se forma, du bruit de l'Océan, de la lumière du jour, quelque chose d'exquis que je m'appropriai comme d'un domaine céleste, je m'y sentis vivre heureux et grand, comme l'aigle qui regarde le soleil et monte dans ses rayons.

Alors tout me sembla beau sur la terre, je n'y vis plus de disparate ni de mauvais ; j'aimai tout, jusqu'aux pierres qui me fatiguaient les pieds, jusqu'aux rochers durs où j'appuyais les mains, jusqu'à cette nature insensible que je supposais m'entendre et m'aimer, et je songeai alors combien il était doux de chanter, le soir, à genoux, des cantiques au pied d'une madone qui brille aux candélabres, et d'aimer la Vierge

Marie, qui apparaît aux marins, dans un coin du ciel, tenant le doux Enfant Jésus dans ses bras.

Puis ce fut tout ; bien vite je me rappelai que je vivais, je revins à moi, je me mis en marche, sentant que la malédiction me reprenait, que je rentrais dans l'humanité ; la vie m'était revenue, comme aux membres gelés, par le sentiment de la souffrance, et de même que j'avais un inconcevable bonheur, je tombai dans un découragement sans nom, et j'allai à X...

Je revins le soir chez nous, je repassai par les mêmes chemins, je revis sur le sable la trace de mes pieds et dans l'herbe la place où je m'étais couché, il me sembla que j'avais rêvé. Il y a des jours où l'on a vécu deux existences, la seconde n'est déjà plus que le souvenir de la première, et je m'arrêtais souvent dans mon chemin devant un buisson, devant un arbre, au coin d'une route, comme si là, le matin, il s'était passé quelque événement de ma vie.

Quand j'arrivais à la maison, il faisait presque nuit, on avait fermé les portes, et les chiens se mirent à aboyer.

Les idées de volupté et d'amour qui m'avaient assailli à 15 ans vinrent me retrouver à 18. Si vous avez compris quelque chose à ce qui précède, vous devez vous rappeler qu'à cet âge-là j'étais encore vierge et n'avais point aimé : pour ce qui était de la beauté des passions et de leurs bruits sonores, les poètes me fournissaient des thèmes à ma rêverie ; quant au plaisir des sens, à ces joies du corps que les adolescents convoitent, j'en entretenais dans mon cœur le désir incessant, par toutes les excitations volontaires de l'esprit ; de même que les amoureux envient de venir au bout de leur amour en s'y livrant sans cesse, et de s'en débarrasser à force d'y songer, il me semblait que ma pensée seule finirait par tarir ce sujet-là, d'elle-même, et par vider la tentation à force d'y boire. Mais, revenant toujours au point d'où j'étais parti, je tournais dans un cercle infranchissable, je m'y heurtai en vain la tête, désireux d'être plus au large ; la nuit, sans doute, je rêvais des plus belles choses qu'on rêve, car, le matin, j'avais le cœur plein de sourires et de serrements délicieux, le réveil me chagrinait et j'attendais avec impatience le retour du sommeil pour qu'il me donnât de nouveau ces frémissements auxquels je pensais toute la journée, qu'il n'eût tenu qu'à moi d'avoir à l'instant, et dont j'éprouvais comme une épouvante religieuse.

C'est alors que je sentis bien le démon de la chair vivre dans tous les muscles de mon corps, courir dans tout mon sang ; je pris en pitié l'époque ingénue où je tremblais sous le regard des femmes, où je me pâmais devant des tableaux ou des statues ; je voulais vivre, jouir, aimer, je sentais vaguement ma saison chaude arriver, de même qu'aux premiers jours de soleil une ardeur d'été vous est apportée par les vents tièdes, quoiqu'il n'y ait encore ni herbes, ni feuilles, ni roses. Comment faire ? qui aimer ? qui vous aimera ? quelle sera la grande dame qui voudra de vous ? la beauté surhumaine qui vous tendra les bras ? Qui dira toutes les promenades tristes que l'on fait seul au bord des ruisseaux, tous les soupirs des cœurs gonflés partis vers les étoiles, pendant les chaudes nuits où la poitrine étouffe !

Rêver l'amour, c'est tout rêver, c'est l'infini dans le bonheur, c'est le mystère dans la joie. Avec quelle ardeur le regard vous dévore, avec quelle intensité il se darde sur vos têtes, ô belles femmes triomphantes ! La grâce et la corruption respirent dans chacun de vos mouvements, les plis de vos robes ont des bruits qui nous remuent jusqu'au fond de nous, et il émane de la surface de tout votre corps quelque chose qui nous tue et qui nous enchante.

Il y eut dès lors pour moi un mot qui sembla beau entre les mots humains : adultère, une douceur exquise plane vaguement sur lui, une magie singulière l'embaume ; toutes les histoires qu'on raconte, tous les livres qu'on lit, tous les gestes qu'on fait nous le disent et le commentent éternellement pour le cœur du jeune homme, il s'en abreuve à plaisir, il y trouve une poésie suprême, mêlée de malédiction et de volupté.

C'était surtout aux approches du printemps, quand les lilas commencent à fleurir et les oiseaux à chanter sous les premières feuilles, que je me sentais pris du besoin d'aimer, de se fondre tout entier dans l'amour, de s'absorber dans quelque doux et grand sentiment, et comme de se recréer même dans la lumière et les parfums. Chaque année encore, pendant quelques heures, je me retrouve ainsi dans une virginité qui me pousse avec les bourgeons ; mais les joies ne refleurissent pas avec les roses, et il n'y a pas maintenant plus de verdure dans mon cœur que sur la grande route, où le hâle fatigue les yeux, où la poussière s'élève en tourbillons.

Cependant, prêt à vous raconter ce qui va suivre, au moment de descendre dans ce souvenir, je tremble et j'hésite ; c'est comme si j'allais revoir une maîtresse d'autrefois : le cœur oppressé, on s'arrête à chaque marche de son escalier, on craint de la retrouver, et on a peur qu'elle soit absente. Il en est de même de certaines idées avec lesquelles on a trop vécu ; on voudrait s'en débarrasser pour toujours, et pourtant elles coulent dans vous comme la vie même, le cœur y respire dans son atmosphère naturelle.

Je vous ai dit que j'aimais le soleil ; dans les jours où il brille, mon âme naguère avait quelque chose de la sérénité des horizons rayonnants et de la hauteur du ciel. C'était donc l'été... ah ! la plume ne devrait pas écrire tout cela... il faisait chaud, je sortis, personne chez moi ne s'aperçut que je sortais ; il y avait peu de monde dans les rues, le pavé était sec, de temps à autre des bouffées chaudes s'exhalaient de dessous terre et vous montaient à la tête, les murs des maisons envoyaient des réflexions embrasées, l'ombre elle-même semblait plus brûlante que la lumière. Au coin des rues, près des tas d'ordures, des essaims de mouche bourdonnaient dans les rayons du soleil, en tournoyant comme une grande roue d'or ; l'angle des toits se détachait vivement en ligne droite sur le bleu du ciel, les pierres étaient noires, il n'y avait pas d'oiseaux autour des clochers.

Je marchais, cherchant du repos, désirant une brise, quelque chose qui pût m'enlever de dessus terre, m'emporter dans un tourbillon. Je sortis des faubourgs, je me trouvais derrière des jardins, dans des chemins moitié rue moitié sentier ; des jours vifs sortaient çà et là à travers les feuilles des arbres, dans les masses d'ombre les brins d'herbe se tenaient droits, la pointe des cailloux envoyait des rayons, la poussière craquait sous les pieds, toute la nature mordait et enfin le soleil se cacha ; il parut un gros nuage, comme si orage allait venir ; la tourmente, que j'avais sentie jusque-là, changea de nature, je n'étais plus si irrité, mais enlacé ; ce n'était plus une déchirure, mais un étouffement.

Je me couchai à terre, sur le ventre, à l'endroit où il me semblait qu'il devait y avoir le plus d'ombre, de silence et de nuit, à l'endroit qui devait me cacher le mieux, et, haletant, je m'y abîmais le cœur dans un désir effréné. Les nuées étaient chargées de mollesse, elles pesaient sur moi et m'écrasaient comme une poitrine sur une autre poitrine ; je sentais un besoin de volupté, plus chargé d'odeurs que le parfum des clématites et plus cuisant que le soleil sur le mur des jardins. Oh ! que ne pouvais-je presser quelque chose dans mes bras, l'y étouffer sous ma chaleur, ou bien me dédoubler moi-même, aimer cet autre être et nous fondre ensemble. Ce n'était plus le désir d'un vague idéal ni la convoitise d'un beau rêve évanoui, mais, comme aux fleuves sans lit, ma passion débordait de tous côtés en ravins furieux, elle m'inondait le cœur et le faisait retentir partout de plus de tumultes et de vertiges que les torrents dans les montagnes.

J'allai au bord de la rivière, j'ai toujours aimé l'eau et le doux mouvement des vagues qui se poussent ; elle était paisible, les nénuphars blancs tremblaient au bruit du courant, les flots se déroulaient lentement, se déployant les uns sur les autres ; au milieu, les îles laissaient retomber dans l'eau leurs touffes de verdure, la rive semblait sourire, on n'entendait rien que la voix des ondes. En cet endroit-là il y avait quelques grands arbres, la fraîcheur du voisinage de l'eau et celle de l'ombre me délecta, je me sentis sourire. De même que la Muse qui est en nous, quand elle écoute l'harmonie, ouvre les narines et aspire les beaux sons, je ne sais quoi se dilata en moi-même pour aspirer une joie universelle ; regardant les nuages qui roulaient au ciel, la pelouse de la rive veloutée et jaunie par les rayons du soleil, écoutant le bruit de l'eau et le frémissement de la cime des arbres, qui remuait quoiqu'il n'y eût pas de vent, seul, agité et calme à la fois, je me sentis défaillir de volupté sous le poids de cette nature aimante, et j'appelai l'amour ! mes lèvres tremblaient, s'avançaient comme si j'eusse senti l'haleine d'une autre bouche, mes mains cherchaient quelque chose à palper, mes regards tâchaient de découvrir, dans le pli de chaque vague, dans le contour des nuages enflés, une forme quelconque, une jouissance, une révélation ; le désir sortait de tous mes pores, mon cœur était tendre et rempli d'une harmonie contenue, et je remuais les cheveux autour de ma tête, je m'en caressais le visage, j'avais du plaisir à en respirer l'odeur, je m'étais sur la mousse, au pied des arbres, je souhaitais des langueurs plus grandes ; j'aurais voulu être brisé sous les baisers, être la fleur que le vent secoue, la rive que le fleuve humecte, la terre que le soleil féconde.

L'herbe était douce à marcher, je marchai ; chaque pas me procurait un plaisir nouveau, et je jouissais par la plante des pieds de la douceur du gazon. Les prairies, au loin, étaient couvertes d'animaux, de chevaux, de poulains ; l'horizon retentissait du bruit des hennissements et de galops, les terrains s'abaissaient et s'élevaient doucement en de larges ondulations qui dérivait des collines, le fleuve serpentait, disparaissait derrière les îles, apparaissait ensuite entre les herbes et les roseaux. Tout cela était beau, semblait heureux, suivait sa loi, son cours ; moi seul j'étais malade et j'agonisais, plein de désir.

Tout à coup je me mis à fuir, je rentrai dans la ville, je traversai les ponts ; j'allais dans les rues, sur les places ; les femmes passaient près de moi, il y en avait beaucoup, elles marchaient vite, elles étaient toutes merveilleusement belles ; jamais je n'avais tant regardé en face leurs yeux qui brillent, ni leur démarche légère comme celle des chèvres ; les duchesses, penchées sur les portières blasonnées, semblaient me sourire, m'inviter à des amours sur la soie ; du haut de leur balcons, les dames en écharpe s'avançaient pour me voir et me regardaient en disant : aime-nous ! aime-nous ! Toutes m'aimaient dans leur pose, dans leurs yeux, dans leur immobilité même, je le voyais bien. Et puis la femme était partout, je la coudoyais, je l'effleurais, je la respirais, l'air était plein de son odeur ; je voyais son cou en sueur entre le châle qui les entourait, et les plumes du chapeau ondulait à son pas ; son talon relevait sa robe en marchant devant moi. Quand je passais près d'elle, sa main gantée remuait. Ni celle-ci, ni celle-là, pas plus l'une que l'autre, mais toutes, mais chacune, dans la variété infinie de leurs formes et du désir qui y correspondait, elles avaient beau être vêtues, je les décorais sur-le-champ d'une nudité magnifique, que je m'étalais sous les yeux, et, bien vite, en passant aussi près d'elles, j'emportais le plus que je pouvais d'idées voluptueuses, d'odeurs qui font tout aimer, de frôlements qui irritent, de formes qui attirent.

Je savais bien où j'allais, c'était à une maison, dans une rue où souvent j'avais passé pour sentir mon cœur battre ; elle avait des jalousies vertes, on montait trois marches, oh ! je savais cela par cœur, je l'avais regardée bien souvent, m'étant détourné de ma route rien que pour voir les fenêtres fermées. Enfin, après une course qui dura un siècle, j'entrai dans cette rue, je crus suffoquer ; personne ne passait, je m'avançai, je m'avançai ; je sens encore le contact de la porte que je poussai de mon épaule, elle céda ; j'avais eu peur qu'elle ne fût scellée dans la muraille, mais non, elle tourna sur un gond, doucement, sans faire de bruit.

Je montai un escalier, l'escalier était noir, les marches usées, elles s'agitaient sous mes pieds ; je montais toujours, on n'y voyait pas, j'étais étourdi, personne ne me parlait, je ne respirais plus. Enfin j'entrai dans une chambre, elle me parut grande, cela tenait à l'obscurité qu'il y faisait ; les fenêtres étaient ouvertes, mais de grands rideaux jaunes, tombant jusqu'à terre, arrêtaient le jour, l'appartement était coloré d'un reflet d'or blafard ; au fond et à côté de la fenêtre de droite, une femme était assise. Il fallait qu'elle ne m'eût pas entendu, car elle ne se détourna pas quand j'entrai ; je restai debout sans avancer, occupé à la regarder.

Elle avait une robe blanche, à manches courtes, elle se tenait le coude appuyé sur le rebord de la fenêtre, une main près de la bouche, et semblait regarder par terre quelque chose de vague et d'indécis ; ses cheveux noirs, lissés et nattés sur les tempes, reluisaient comme l'aile d'un corbeau, sa tête était un peu penchée, quelques petits cheveux de derrière s'échappaient des autres et frisottaient sur son cou, son grand peigne d'or recourbé était couronné de grains de corail rouge.

Elle jeta un cri quand elle m'aperçut et se leva par un bond. Je me sentis d'abord frappé du regard brillant de ses deux grands yeux ; quand je pus relever mon front, affaissé sous le poids de ce regard, je vis une figure d'une adorable beauté : une même ligne droite partait du sommet de sa tête dans la raie de ses cheveux, passait entre ses grands sourcils arqués, sur son nez aquilin, aux narines palpitantes et relevées comme celles des camées antiques, fendait par le milieu sa lèvre chaude, ombragée d'un duvet bleu, et puis là, le cou, le cou gras, blanc, rond ; à travers son vêtement mince, je voyais la forme de ses seins aller et venir au mouvement de sa respiration, elle se tenait ainsi debout, en face de moi, entourée de la lumière du soleil qui passait à travers le rideau jaune et faisait ressortir davantage ce vêtement blanc et cette tête brune.

À la fin elle se mit à sourire, presque de pitié et de douceur, et je m'approchai. Je ne sais ce qu'elle s'était mis aux cheveux, mais elle embaumait, et je me sentis le cœur plus mou et plus faible qu'une pêche qui se fond sous la langue. Elle me dit :

— Qu'avez-vous donc ? venez !

Et elle alla s'asseoir sur un long canapé recouvert de toile grise, adossé à la muraille ; je m'assis près d'elle, elle me prit la main, la sienne était chaude, nous restâmes longtemps nous regardant sans rien dire.

Jamais je n'avais vu une femme de si près, toute sa beauté m'entourait, son bras touchait le mien, les plis de sa robe retombaient sur mes jambes, la chaleur de sa hanche m'embrassait, je sentais par ce contact les ondulations de son corps, je contemplais la rondeur de ses épaules et les veines bleues de ses tempes. Elle me dit :

— Eh bien ?

— Eh bien, repris-je d'un air gai, voulant secouer cette fascination qui m'endormait.

Mais je m'arrêtai là, j'étais tout entier à la parcourir des yeux. Sans rien dire, elle me passa un bras autour du corps et m'attira sur elle, dans une muette étreinte. Alors je l'entourai de mes deux bras et je collai ma bouche sur son épaule, j'y bus avec délices mon premier baiser d'amour, j'y savourais le long désir de ma jeunesse et la volupté trouvée de tous mes rêves, et puis je me renversais le cou en arrière, pour mieux voir sa figure ; ses yeux brillaient, m'enflammaient, son regard m'enveloppait plus que ses bras, j'étais perdu dans son oeil, et nos doigts se mêlèrent ensemble ; les siens étaient longs, délicats, ils se tournaient dans ma main avec des mouvements vifs et subtils, j'aurais pu les broyer au moindre effort, je les serrais exprès pour les sentir davantage.

Je ne me souviens plus maintenant de ce qu'elle me dit ni de ce que je lui répondis, je suis resté ainsi longtemps, perdu, suspendu, balancé dans ce battement de mon cœur ; chaque minute augmentait mon ivresse, à chaque moment quelque chose de plus m'entraînait dans l'âme, tout mon corps frissonnait d'impatience, de désir, de joie ; j'étais grave, pourtant, plutôt sombre que gai, sérieux, absorbé comme dans quelque chose de divin et de suprême. Avec sa main elle me serrait la tête sur son cœur, mais légèrement, comme si elle eût eu peur de me l'écraser sur elle.

Elle ôta sa manche par un mouvement d'épaules, sa robe se décrocha ; elle n'avait pas de corset, sa chemise baillait. C'était une de ces gorges splendides où l'on voudrait mourir étouffé dans l'amour. Assise sur mes genoux, elle avait une pose naïve d'enfant qui rêve, son beau profil se découpait en lignes pures ; un pli d'une courbe adorable, sous l'aisselle, faisait comme le sourire de son épaule ; son dos blanc se courbait un peu, d'une manière fatiguée, et sa robe affaissée retombait par le bas en larges plis sur le plancher ; elle levait les yeux au ciel et chantonait dans ses dents un refrain triste et langoureux.

Je touchai à son peigne, je l'ôtai, ses cheveux se déroulèrent comme une onde, et les longues mèches noires tressaillirent en tombant sur ses hanches. Je passai d'abord ma main dessus, et dedans, et dessous ; j'y plongeais le bras, je m'y baignais le visage, j'étais navré. Quelquefois, je prenais plaisir à les séparer en deux par derrière, et à les ramener par devant de manière à lui cacher les seins ; d'autres fois je les réunissais tous en réseau et je les tirais, pour voir sa tête renversée en arrière et son cou tendre en avant, elle se laissait faire comme une morte.

Tout à coup elle se dégagea de moi, dépassa ses pieds de dedans sa robe, et sauta sur le lit avec la prestesse d'une chatte, le matelas s'enfonça sous ses pieds, le lit craqua, elle rejeta brusquement en arrière les rideaux et se coucha, elle me tendit les bras, elle me prit. Oh ! les draps même semblaient tout échauffés encore des caresses qui avaient passé là.

Sa main douce et humide me parcourait le corps, elle me donnait des baisers sur la figure, sur la bouche, sur les yeux, chacune de ces caresses précipitées me faisait pâmer, elle s'étendait sur le dos et soupirait ; tantôt elle fermait les yeux à demi et me regardait avec une ironie voluptueuse, puis, s'appuyant sur le coude, se tournant sur le ventre, relevant ses talons en l'air, elle était pleine de mignardises charmantes, de mouvements raffinés et ingénus ; enfin, se livrant à moi avec abandon, elle leva les yeux au ciel et poussa un grand soupir qui lui souleva tout le corps... Sa peau chaude, frémissante, s'étendait sous moi et frissonnait ; des pieds à la tête je me sentais tout recouvert de volupté ; ma bouche collée à la sienne, nos doigts mêlés ensemble, bercés dans le même frisson, enlacés dans la même étreinte, respirant l'odeur de sa chevelure et le souffle de ses lèvres, je me sentis délicieusement mourir. Quelque temps encore je restai, béant, à savourer le battement de mon cœur et le dernier tressaillement de mes nerfs agités, puis il me sembla que tout s'éteignait et disparaissait.

Mais elle, elle ne disait rien non plus ; immobile comme une statue de chair, ses cheveux noirs et abondants entouraient sa tête pâle, et ses bras dénoués reposaient étendus avec mollesse ; de temps à autre un mouvement compulsif lui secouait les genoux et les hanches ; sur sa poitrine, la place de mes baisers était rouge encore, un son rauque et lamentable sortait de sa gorge, comme lorsqu'on s'endort après avoir longtemps pleuré et sangloté. Tout à coup je l'entendis qui disait ceci : "Dans l'oubli de tes sens, si tu devenais mère", et puis je ne me souviens plus de ce qui suivit, elle croisa les jambes les unes sur les autres et se berça de côté et d'autre, comme si elle eût été dans un hamac.

Elle me passa sa main dans les cheveux, en se jouant, comme avec un enfant, et me demanda si j'avais eu une maîtresse ; je lui répondis que oui, et comme elle continuait, j'ajoutai qu'elle était belle et mariée. Elle me fit encore d'autres questions sur mon nom, sur ma vie, sur ma famille.

— Et toi, lui dis-je, as-tu aimé ?

— Aimer ! non !

Et elle fit un éclat de rire forcé qui me décontenança.

Elle me demanda encore si la maîtresse que j'avais était belle, et après un silence, elle reprit :

— Oh ! comme elle doit t'aimer ! Dis-moi ton nom, hein ! ton nom.

À mon tour je voulus savoir le sien.

— Marie, répondit-elle, mais j'en avais un autre, ce n'est pas comme cela qu'on m'appelait chez nous.

Et puis, je ne sais plus, tout cela est parti c'est déjà si vieux ! Cependant, il y a certaines choses que je revois comme si c'était hier, sa chambre par exemple ; je revois le tapis du lit, usé au milieu, la couche d'acajou avec des ornements en cuivre et des rideaux de soie rouge moirés ; ils craquaient sous les doigts, les franges en étaient usées. Sur la cheminée, deux vases de fleurs artificielles ; au milieu, la pendule, dont le cadran était suspendu entre quatre colonnes d'albâtre. Ça et là, accrochée à la muraille, une vieille gravure entourée d'un cadre de bois noir et représentant des femmes au bain, des vendangeurs, des pêcheurs.

Et elle ! elle ! quelquefois son souvenir me revient, si vif, si précis que tous les détails de sa figure m'apparaissent de nouveau, avec cette étonnante fidélité de mémoire que les rêves seuls nous donnent, quand nous revoyons avec leurs mêmes habits, leur même son de voix, nos vieux amis morts depuis des années, et que nous nous en épouvantons.

Je me souviens bien qu'elle avait sur la lèvre inférieure, du côté gauche, un grain de beauté, qui paraissait dans un pli de la peau quand elle souriait ; elle n'était plus fraîche même, et le coin de sa bouche était serré d'une façon amère et fatiguée.

Quand je fus prêt à m'en aller, elle me dit adieu.

— Adieu !

— Vous reverra-t-on ?

— Peut-être !

Et je sortis, l'air me ranima, je me trouvais tout changé, il me semblait qu'on devait s'apercevoir, sur mon visage, que je n'étais plus le même homme, je marchais légèrement, fièrement, content, libre, je n'avais plus rien à apprendre, plus rien à sentir, rien à désirer dans la vie. Je rentrai chez moi, une éternité était passée depuis que j'en étais sorti ; je montai à ma chambre et je m'assis sur mon lit, accablé de toute ma journée, qui pesait sur moi avec un poids incroyable. Il était peut-être 7 heures du soir, le soleil se couchait, le ciel était en feu, et l'horizon tout rouge flamboyait par-dessus les toits des maisons ; le jardin, déjà dans l'ombre, était plein de tristesse, des cercles jaunes et oranges tournaient dans le coin des murs, s'abaissaient et montaient dans les buissons, la terre était sèche et grise ; dans la rue quelques gens du peuple, aux bras de leurs femmes, chantaient en passant et allaient aux barrières. Je repensais toujours à ce que j'avais fait, et je fus pris d'une indéfinissable tristesse, j'étais plein de dégoût, j'étais repu, j'étais las. "Mais ce matin même, me disais-je, ce n'était pas comme cela, j'étais plus frais, plus heureux, à quoi cela tient-il ?" et par l'esprit je repassais dans toutes les rues où j'avais marché, je revis les femmes que j'avais rencontrées, tous les sentiers que j'avais parcourus, je retournai chez Marie et je m'arrêtai sur chaque détail de mon souvenir, je pressurai ma mémoire pour qu'elle m'en fournît le plus possible. Toute ma soirée se passa à cela ; la nuit vint et je demeurai fixé comme un vieillard à cette pensée charmante, je sentais que je n'en ressaisirais rien, que d'autres amours pourraient venir, mais qu'ils ne ressembleraient plus à celui-là, ce premier parfum était senti, ce son était envolé, je désirais mon désir et je regrettais ma joie.

Quand je considérais ma vie passée et ma vie présente, c'est-à-dire l'attente des jours écoulés et la lassitude qui m'accablait, alors je ne savais plus dans quel coin de mon existence mon cœur se trouvait placé, si je rêvais ou si j'agissais, si j'étais plein de dégoût ou plein de désir, car j'avais à la fois les nausées de la satiété et l'ardeur des espérances.

Ce n'était donc que cela, aimer ! ce n'était donc que cela, une femme ! Pourquoi, ô mon Dieu, avons-nous encore faim alors que nous sommes repus ? pourquoi tant d'aspirations et tant de déceptions ? pourquoi le cœur de l'homme est-il si grand, et la vie si petite ? il y a des jours où l'amour des anges même ne lui suffirait pas, et il se fatigue en une heure de toutes les caresses de la terre.

Mais l'illusion évanouie laisse en nous son odeur de fée, et nous en cherchons la trace par tous les sentiers où elle a fui ; on se plaît à dire que tout n'est pas fini de sitôt, que la vie ne fait que commencer, qu'un monde s'ouvre devant nous. Aura-t-on, en effet, dépensé tant de rêves sublimes, tant de désirs bouillants pour aboutir là ? Or je ne voulais pas renoncer à toutes les belles choses que je m'étais forgées, j'avais créé pour moi, en deçà de ma virginité perdue, d'autres formes plus vagues, mais plus belles, d'autres voluptés moins précises comme le désir que j'en avais, mais célestes et infinies. Aux imaginations que je m'étais faites naguère, et que je m'efforçais d'évoquer, se mêlait le souvenir intense de mes dernières sensations, et le tout se confondant, fantôme et corps, rêve et réalité, la femme que je venais de quitter prit pour moi une proportion synthétique, où tout se résuma dans le passé et d'où tout s'élança pour l'avenir. Seul et pensant à elle, je la retournai encore en tous sens, pour y découvrir quelque chose de plus ; quelque chose d'inaperçu, d'inexploré la première fois ; l'envie de la revoir me prit, m'obséda, c'était comme une fatalité qui m'attirait, une pente où je glissais.

Oh ! la belle nuit ! il faisait chaud ! j'arrivais à sa porte tout en sueur, il y avait de la lumière à sa fenêtre ; elle veillait sans doute ; je m'arrêtai, j'eus peur, je restais longtemps ne sachant que faire, plein de mille angoisses confuses. Encore une fois j'entraî, ma main, une seconde fois, glissa sur la rampe de son escalier et tourna la clef.

Elle était seule, comme le matin ; elle se tenait à la même place, dans la même posture, mais elle avait changé de robe ; celle-ci était noire, la garniture de dentelle, qui en bordait le haut, frissonnait d'elle-même sur sa gorge blanche, sa chair brillait, sa figure avait cette pâleur lascive que donnent les flambeaux ; la bouche mi-ouverte, les cheveux tout débouclés et pendants sur les épaules, les yeux levés au ciel, elle avait l'air de chercher du regard quelque étoile disparue.

Bien vite, d'un bond joyeux, elle sauta jusqu'à moi et me serra dans ses bras. Ce fut là pour nous une de ces étreintes frissonnantes, telles que les amants, la nuit, doivent en avoir dans leurs rendez-vous, quand, après avoir longtemps, l'oeil tendu dans les ténèbres, guetté chaque foulement des feuilles, chaque forme vague qui passait dans la clairière, ils se rencontrent enfin et viennent à s'embrasser.

Elle me dit, d'une voix précipitée et douce tout ensemble :

— Ah ! tu m'aimes donc, que tu reviens me voir ? dis, dis, ô mon cœur, m'aimes-tu ?

Ses paroles avaient un son aigu et moelleux, comme les intonations les plus élevées de la flûte.

À demi affaissée sur les jarrets et me tenant dans ses bras, elle me regardait avec une ivresse sombre ; pour moi, quelque étonné que je fusse de cette passion si subitement venue, j'en étais charmé, j'en étais fier.

Sa robe de satin craquait sous mes doigts avec un bruit d'étincelles ; quelquefois, après avoir senti le velouté de l'étoffe, je venais à sentir la douceur chaude de son bras nu, son vêtement semblait participer d'elle-même, il exhalait la séduction des plus luxuriantes nudités.

Elle voulut à toutes forces s'asseoir sur mes genoux, et elle recommença sa caresse accoutumée, qui était de me passer la main dans les cheveux tandis qu'elle me regardait fixement, face à face, les yeux dardés contre les miens. Dans cette pose immobile, sa prunelle parut se dilater, il en sortit un fluide que je sentais me couler sur le cœur ; chaque effluve de ce regard béant, semblable aux cercles successifs que décrit l'orfraie, m'attachait de plus en plus à cette magie terrible.

— Ah ! tu m'aimes donc, reprit-elle, tu m'aimes donc que te voilà venu encore chez moi, pour moi ! Mais qu'as-tu ? tu ne dis rien, tu es triste ! ne veux-tu plus de moi ? Elle fit une pause et reprit :

— Comme tu es beau, mon ange ! tu es beau comme le jour ! embrasse-moi donc, aime-moi ! un baiser, un baiser, vite !

Elle se suspendit à ma bouche et, roucoulant comme une colombe, elle se gonflait la poitrine du soupir qu'elle y puisait.

— Ah ! mais pour la nuit, n'est-ce pas, pour la nuit, toute la nuit à nous deux ? C'est comme toi que je voudrais avoir un amant, un amant jeune et frais qui m'aimât bien, qui ne pensât qu'à moi. Oh ! comme je l'aimerais !

Et elle fit une de ces inspirations de désir où il semble que Dieu devrait descendre des cieux.

— Mais n'en as-tu pas un ? lui dis-je.

— Qui ? moi ? est-ce que nous sommes aimées, nous autres ? est-ce qu'on pense à nous ? Qui veut de nous ? toi-même, demain, te souviendras-tu de moi ? tu te diras peut-être seulement : “Tiens, hier, j'ai couché avec une fille”, mais brrr ! la ! la ! la ! la ! (et elle se mit à danser, les poings sur la taille, avec des allures immondes). C'est que je danse bien ! tiens, regarde mon costume.

Elle ouvrit son armoire, et je vis sur une planche un masque noir et des rubans bleus avec un domino ; il y avait aussi un pantalon de velours noir à galons d'or, accroché à un clou, restes flétris du carnaval passé.

— Mon pauvre costume, dit-elle, comme j'ai été souvent au bal avec lui ! c'est moi qui ai dansé, cet hiver !

La fenêtre était ouverte et le vent faisait trembler la lumière de la bougie, elle l'alla prendre de dessus la cheminée et la mit sur la table de nuit. Arrivée près du lit, elle s'assit dessus et se prit à réfléchir profondément, la tête baissée sur la poitrine. Je ne lui parlais pas non plus, j'attendais, l'odeur chaude des nuits d'août montait jusqu'à nous, nous entendions, de là, les arbres du boulevard remuer, le rideau de la fenêtre tremblait ; toute la nuit il fit de l'orage ; souvent, à la lueur des éclairs, j'apercevais sa blême figure, crispée dans une expression de tristesse ardente ; les nuages couraient vite, la lune, à demi cachée par eux, apparaissait par moments dans un coin de ciel pur entouré de nuées sombres.

Elle se déshabilla lentement, avec les mouvements réguliers d'une machine. Quand elle fut en chemise, elle vint à moi, pieds nus sur le pavé, me prit par la main et me conduisit à son lit ; elle ne me regardait pas, elle pensait à autre chose ; elle avait la lèvre rose et humide, les narines ouvertes, l'oeil en feu, et semblait vibrer sous le frottement de sa pensée comme, alors même que l'artiste n'est plus là, l'instrument sonore laisse s'évaporer un secret parfum de notes endormies.

C'est quand elle se fut couchée près de moi qu'elle m'étala, avec un orgueil de courtisane, toutes les splendeurs de sa chair. Je vis à nu sa gorge dure et toujours gonflée comme d'un murmure orageux, son ventre de nacre, au nombril creusé, son ventre élastique et convulsif, doux pour s'y plonger la tête comme sur un oreiller de satin chaud ; elle avait des hanches superbes, de ces vraies hanches de femme, dont les lignes, dégradantes sur une cuisse ronde, rappellent toujours, de profil, je ne sais quelle forme souple et corrompue de serpent et de démon ; la sueur qui mouillait sa peau la lui rendait fraîche et collante, dans la nuit ses yeux brillaient d'une manière terrible, et le bracelet d'ambre qu'elle portait au bras droit sonnait quand elle s'attrapait au lambris de l'alcôve. Ce fut dans ces heures-là qu'elle me disait, tenant ma tête serrée sur son cœur :

— Ange d'amour, de délices, de volupté, d'où viens-tu ? ou est ta mère ? à quoi songeait-elle quand elle t'a conçu ? rêvait-elle la force des lions d'Afrique ou le parfum de ces arbres lointains, si embaumants qu'on meurt à les sentir ? Tu ne dis rien ; regarde-moi avec tes grands yeux, regarde-moi, regarde-moi ! ta bouche ! ta bouche ! tiens, tiens, voilà la mienne !

Et puis ses dents claquaient comme par un grand froid, et ses lèvres écartées tremblaient et envoyaient dans l'air des paroles folles :

— Ah ! je serais jalouse de toi, vois-tu, si nous nous aimions ; la moindre femme qui te regarderait...

Et elle achevait sa phrase dans un cri. D'autres fois elle m'arrêtait avec des bras raidis et disait tout bas qu'elle allait mourir.

— Oh ! que c'est beau, un homme, quand il est jeune ! Si j'étais homme, moi, toutes les femmes m'aimeraient, mes yeux brilleraient si bien ! je serais si bien mis, si joli ! Ta maîtresse t'aime, n'est-ce pas ? je voudrais la connaître . Comment vous voyez-vous ? est-ce chez toi ou chez elle ? est-ce à la promenade, quand tu passes à cheval ? tu dois être si bien à cheval ! au théâtre, quand on sort et qu'on lui donne son manteau ? ou bien la nuit dans son jardin ? Les belles heures que vous passez, n'est-ce pas, à causer ensemble, assis sous la tonnelle !

Je la laissais dire, il me semblait qu'avec ces mots elle me faisait une maîtresse idéale, et j'aimais ce fantôme qui venait d'arriver dans mon esprit et qui y brillait plus rapide qu'un feu follet, le soir, dans la campagne.

— Y a-t-il longtemps que vous vous connaissez ? conte-moi ça un peu. Que lui dis-tu pour lui plaire ? est-elle grande ou petite ? chante-t-elle ?

Je ne pus m'empêcher de lui dire qu'elle se trompait, je lui parlai même de mes appréhensions à la venir trouver, du remords, ou mieux de l'étrange peur que j'en avais eue ensuite, et du retour soudain qui m'avait poussé vers elle. Quand je lui eus bien dit que je n'avais jamais eu de maîtresse, que j'en avais cherché partout, que j'en avais rêvé longtemps, et qu'enfin elle était la première qui eût accepté mes caresses, elle se rapprocha de moi avec étonnement et, me prenant par le bras, comme si j'étais une illusion qu'elle voulût saisir :

— Vrai ? me dit-elle, oh ! ne me mens pas. Tu es donc vierge, et c'est moi qui t'ai défloré, pauvre ange ? Tes baisers, en effet, avaient je ne sais quoi de naïf, tel que les enfants seuls en auraient s'ils faisaient l'amour. Mais tu m'étonnes ! tu es charmant ; à mesure que je te regarde, je t'aime de plus en plus, ta joue est douce comme une pêche, ta peau, en effet, est toute blanche, tes beaux cheveux sont forts et nombreux. Ah ! comme je t'aimerais si tu voulais ! car je n'ai vu que toi comme ça ; on dirait que tu me regardes avec bonté, et pourtant tes yeux me brûlent, j'ai toujours envie de me rapprocher de toi et de te serrer sur moi.

C'étaient les premières paroles d'amour que j'entendisse de ma vie. Parties n'importe d'où, notre cœur les reçoit avec un tressaillement bien heureux ? Rappelez-vous cela ! Je m'en abreuvais à plaisir. Oh ! comme je m'élançais vite dans le ciel nouveau.

— Oui, oui, embrasse-moi bien, embrasse-moi bien ! tes baisers me rajeunissent, disait-elle, j'aime à sentir ton odeur comme celle de mon chèvrefeuille au mois de juin, c'est frais et sucré tout à la fois ; tes dents, voyons-les, elles sont plus blanches que les miennes, je ne suis pas si belle que toi... Ah ! comme il fait bon, là !

Et elle s'appuya la bouche sur mon cou, y fouillant avec d'âpres baisers, comme une bête fauve au ventre de sa victime.

— Qu'ai-je donc, ce soir ? tu m'as mise toute en feu, j'ai envie de boire et de danser en chantant. As-tu quelquefois voulu être petit oiseau ? nous volerions ensemble, ça doit être si doux de faire l'amour dans l'air, les vents vous poussent, les nuages vous entourent... Non, tais-toi que je te regarde, que je te regarde longtemps, afin que je me souvienne de toi toujours !

— Pourquoi cela ?

— Pourquoi cela ? reprit-elle, mais pour m'en souvenir, pour penser à toi ; j'y penserai la nuit, quand je ne dors pas, le matin, quand je m'éveille, j'y penserai toute la journée, appuyée à ma fenêtre pour regarder les passants, mais surtout le soir quand on n'y voit plus et qu'on n'a pas encore allumé les bougies ; je me rappellerai ta figure, ton corps, ton beau corps, où la volupté respire, et ta voix ! Oh ! écoute, je t'en prie, mon amour, laisse-moi couper de tes cheveux, je les mettrai dans ce bracelet-là, ils ne me quitteront jamais.

Elle se leva de suite, alla chercher ses ciseaux et me coupa, derrière la tête, une mèche de cheveux. C'étaient de petits ciseaux pointus, qui crièrent en jouant sur leur vis ; je sens encore sur la nuque le froid de l'acier et la main de Marie.

C'est une des plus belles choses des amants que les cheveux donnés et échangés. Que de belles mains, depuis qu'il y a des nuits, ont passé à travers les balcons et donné des tresses noires ! Arrière les chaînes de montres tordues en huit, les bagues où ils sont collés dessus, les médaillons où ils sont disposés en trèfles, et tous ceux qu'a pollués la main banale du coiffeur ; je les veux tout simples et noués, aux deux bouts, d'un fil, de peur d'en perdre un seul ; on les a coupés soi-même à la tête chérie, dans quelque suprême moment, au plus fort d'un premier amour, la veille du départ. Une chevelure ! manteau magnifique de la femme aux jours primitifs, quand il lui descendait jusqu'aux talons et lui couvrait les bras, alors qu'elle s'en allait avec l'homme, marchant au bord des grands fleuves, et que les premières brises de la création faisaient tressaillir à la fois la cime des palmiers, la crinière des lions, la chevelure des femmes ! J'aime les cheveux. Que de fois, dans des cimetières qu'on remuait ou dans les vieilles églises qu'on abattait, j'en ai contemplé qui apparaissaient dans la terre remuée, entre des ossements jaunes et des morceaux de bois pourri ! Souvent le soleil jetait dessus un pâle rayon et les faisait briller comme un filon d'or ; j'aimais à songer aux jours où, réunis ensemble sur un cuir blanc et graissés de parfum liquide, quelque main, sèche maintenant, passait dessus et les étendait sur l'oreiller, quelque bouche, sans gencives maintenant, les baisait au milieu et en mordait le bout avec des sanglots heureux.

Je me laissai couper les miens avec une vanité niaise, j'eus la honte de n'en pas demander à mon tour, et à cette heure que je n'ai rien, pas un gant, pas une ceinture, pas même trois corolles de rose desséchées et gardées dans un livre, rien que le souvenir de l'amour d'une fille publique, je les regrette.

Quand elle eut fini, elle vint se recoucher près de moi, elle entra dans les draps toute frissonnante de volupté, elle grelottait, et se ratatinait sur moi, comme un enfant ; enfin elle s'endormit, laissant sa tête sur ma poitrine.

Chaque fois que je respirais, je sentais le poids de cette tête endormie se soulever sur mon cœur. Dans quelle communion intime me trouvais-je donc avec cet être inconnu ? Ignorés jusqu'à ce jour l'un à l'autre, le hasard nous avait unis, nous étions là dans la même couche, liés par une force sans nom ; nous allions nous quitter et ne plus nous revoir, les atomes qui roulent et volent dans l'air ont entre eux des rencontres plus longues que n'en ont sur la terre les cœurs qui s'aiment ; la nuit, sans doute, les désirs solitaires s'élèvent et les songes se mettent à la recherche les uns des autres ; celui-là soupire peut-être après l'âme inconnue qui soupire après lui dans un autre hémisphère, sous d'autres cieux.

Quels étaient, maintenant, les rêves qui se passaient dans cette tête-là ? songeait-elle à sa famille, à son premier amour, au monde, aux hommes, à quelque vie riche, éclairée d'opulence, à quelque amour désiré, à moi peut-être ! L'oeil fixé sur son front pâle, j'épiais son sommeil, et je tâchais de découvrir un sens au son rauque qui sortait de ses narines.

Il pleuvait, j'écoutais le bruit de la pluie et Marie dormir ; les lumières, près de s'éteindre, pétillaient dans les bobèches de cristal. L'aube parut, une ligne jaune saillit dans le ciel, s'allongea horizontalement et, prenant de plus en plus des teintes dorées et vineuses, envoya dans l'appartement une faible lumière blanchâtre ; irisée de violet, qui se jouait encore avec la nuit et avec l'éclat des bougies expirantes, reflétées dans la glace.

Marie, étendue sur moi, avait ainsi certaines parties du corps dans la lumière, d'autres dans l'ombre ; elle s'était dérangée un peu, sa tête était plus basse que ses seins ; le bras droit, le bras du bracelet, pendait hors du lit et touchait presque le plancher ; il y avait sur la table de nuit un bouquet de violettes dans un verre d'eau, j'étendis la main, je le pris, je cassai le fil avec mes dents et je les respirai. La chaleur de la veille, sans doute, ou bien le long temps depuis qu'elles étaient cueillies les avait fanées, je leur trouvai une odeur exquise et toute particulière, je humai une à une leur parfum ; comme elles étaient humides, je me les appliquai sur les yeux pour me refroidir, car mon sang bouillait, et mes membres fatigués ressentaient comme une brûlure au contact des draps. Alors, ne sachant que faire et ne voulant pas l'éveiller, car j'éprouvais un étrange plaisir à la voir dormir, je mis doucement toutes les violettes sur la gorge de Marie, bientôt elle en fut toute couverte, et ces belles fleurs fanées, sous lesquelles elle dormait, la symbolisèrent à mon esprit. Comme elles, en effet, malgré leur fraîcheur enlevée, à cause de cela peut-être, elle m'envoyait un parfum plus âcre et plus irritant ; le malheur, qui avait dû passer dessus, la rendait belle de l'amertume que sa bouche conservait, même en dormant, belle des deux rides qu'elle avait derrière le cou, et que le jour, sans doute, elle cachait sous ses cheveux. À voir cette femme si triste dans la volupté et dont les étreintes même avaient une joie lugubre, je devinais mille passions terribles qui l'avaient dû sillonner comme la foudre, à en juger par les traces restées, et puis sa vie devrait me faire plaisir à entendre raconter, moi qui cherchais dans l'existence humaine le côté sonore et vibrant, le monde des grandes passions et des belles larmes.

À ce moment-là, elle s'éveilla, toutes les violettes tombèrent, elle sourit, les yeux encore à demi fermés, en même temps qu'elle étendait ses bras autour de mon cou et m'embrassait d'un long baiser du matin, d'un baiser de colombe qui s'éveille.

Quand je l'ai priée de me raconter son histoire, elle me dit :

— À toi je le peux bien. Les autres mentiraient et commenceraient par te dire qu'elles n'ont pas toujours été ce qu'elles sont, elles te feraient des contes sur leur famille et sur leurs amours, mais je ne veux pas te tromper ni me faire passer pour une princesse ; écoute, tu vas voir si j'ai été heureuse ! Sais-tu que souvent j'ai eu envie de me tuer ? une fois on est arrivé dans ma chambre, j'étais à moitié asphyxiée. Oh ! si je n'avais pas peur de l'enfer, il y longtemps que ça serait fait. J'ai aussi peur de mourir, ce moment-là à passer m'effraie, et pourtant j'ai envie d'être morte ! Je suis de la campagne, notre père était fermier. Jusqu'à ma première communion, on m'envoyait tous les matins garder les vaches dans les champs ; toute la journée je restais seule, je m'asseyais au bord d'un fossé, à dormir, ou bien j'allais dans le bois dénicher des nids ; je montais aux arbres comme un garçon, mes habits étaient toujours déchirés ; souvent on m'a battue pour avoir volé des pommes, ou laissé aller les bestiaux chez les voisins. Quand c'était la moisson et que, le soir venu, on dansait en rond dans la cour, j'entendais chanter des chansons où il y avait des choses que je ne comprenais pas, les garçons embrassaient les filles, on riait aux éclats ; cela m'attristait et me faisait rêver. Quelquefois, sur la route, en m'en retournant à la maison, je demandais à monter dans une voiture de foin, l'homme me prenait avec lui et me plaçait sur les bottes de luzerne ; croirais-tu que je finis par goûter un indicible plaisir à me sentir soulever de terre par les mains fortes et robustes d'un gars solide, qui avait la figure brûlée par le soleil et la poitrine toute en sueur ? D'ordinaire ses bras étaient retroussés jusqu'aux aisselles, j'aimais à toucher ses muscles, qui faisaient des bosses et des creux à chaque mouvement de sa main, et à me faire embrasser par lui, pour me sentir râper la joue par sa barbe. Au bas de la prairie où j'allais tous les jours, il y avait un petit ruisseau entre deux rangées de peupliers, au bord duquel toutes sortes de fleurs poussaient ; j'en faisais des bouquets, des couronnes, des chaînes ; avec des grains de sorbier, je me faisais des colliers, cela devint une manie, j'en avais toujours mon tablier plein, mon père me grondait et disait que je ne serais jamais qu'une coquette. Dans ma petite chambre j'en avais mis aussi ; quelquefois cette quantité d'odeurs-là m'enivrait, et je m'assoupissais, étourdie, mais jouissant de ce malaise. L'odeur du foin coupé, par exemple, du foin chaud et fermenté, m'a toujours semblé délicieuse, si bien que, tous les dimanches, je m'enfermais dans la grange, y passant tout mon après-midi à regarder les araignées filer leur toile aux sommiers, et à entendre les mouches bourdonner. Je vivais comme une fainéante, mais je devenais une belle fille, j'étais toute pleine de santé. Souvent une espèce de folie me prenait, et je courais jusqu'à tomber ou bien je chantaï à tue-tête, ou je parlais seule et longtemps ; d'étranges désirs me possédaient, je regardais toujours les pigeons, sur leur colombier, qui se faisaient l'amour, quelques-uns venaient jusque sous ma fenêtre s'ébattre au soleil et se jouer dans la vigne. La nuit, j'entendais encore le battement de leurs ailes et leur roucoulement, qui me semblait si doux, si suave, que j'aurais voulu être un pigeon comme eux et me tordre ainsi le cou, comme ils faisaient pour s'embrasser. "Que se disent-ils donc, pensais-je, qu'ils ont l'air si heureux ?", et je me rappelais aussi de quel air superbe j'avais vu courir les chevaux après les juments, et comment leurs naseaux étaient ouverts ; je me rappelais la joie qui faisait frissonner la laine des brebis aux approches du bélier, et le murmure des abeilles quand elles se suspendent en grappes aux arbres des vergers. Dans l'étable, souvent, je me glissais entre les animaux pour sentir l'émanation de leurs membres, vapeurs de vie que j'aspirais à pleine poitrine, pour contempler furtivement leur nudité, où le vertige attirait toujours mes yeux troublés. D'autres fois, au détour d'un bois, au crépuscule surtout, les arbres eux-mêmes prenaient des formes singulières : c'étaient tantôt des bras qui s'élevaient vers le ciel, ou bien le tronc qui se tordait comme un corps sous les coups du vent. La nuit, quand je m'éveillais et qu'il y avait de la lune et des nuages, je voyais dans le ciel des choses qui m'épouvantaient et qui me faisaient envie. Je me souviens qu'une fois, la veille de Noël, j'ai vu une grande femme nue, debout, avec des yeux qui roulaient ; elle avait bien cent pieds de haut, mais elle alla, s'allongeant toujours en s'amincissant, et finit par se couper, chaque membre resta séparé, la tête s'envola la première, tout le reste s'agitait encore. Ou bien je rêvais ; à dix ans déjà, j'avais des nuits fiévreuses, des nuits pleines de luxure. N'était-ce pas la luxure qui brillait dans mes yeux, coulait dans mon sang, et me faisait bondir le cœur au frôlement de mes membres entre eux ? elle chantait éternellement dans mon oreille des cantiques de volupté ; dans mes visions, les chairs brillaient comme de l'or, des formes inconnues remuaient, comme du vif-argent répandu.

À l'église je regardais l'homme nu étalé sur la croix, et je redressais la tête, je remplissais ses flancs, je colorais tous ses membres, je levais ses paupières ; je me faisais devant moi une homme beau, avec un regard de feu ; je le détachais de la croix et je le faisais descendre vers moi, sur l'autel, l'encens l'entourait, il s'avavançait dans la fumée et de sensuels frémissements me couraient sur la peau.

Quand un homme me parlait, j'examinais son oeil et le jet qui en sort, j'aimais surtout ceux dont les paupières remuent toujours, qui cachent leurs prunelles et qui les montrent, mouvement semblable au battement d'ailes d'un papillon de nuit ; à travers leurs vêtements, je tâchais de surprendre le secret de leur sexe, et là-dessus j'interrogeais mes jeunes amies, j'épiais les baisers de mon père et de ma mère, et la nuit le bruit de leur couche.

À douze ans, je fis ma première communion, on m'avait fait venir de la ville une belle robe blanche, nous avions toutes des ceintures bleues ; j'avais voulu qu'on me mît les cheveux en papillotes comme à une dame. Avant de partir, je me regardais dans la glace, j'étais belle comme un amour, je fus presque amoureuse de moi, j'aurais voulu pouvoir l'être. C'était aux environs de la Fête-Dieu, les bonnes sœurs avaient rempli l'église de fleurs, on embaumait ; moi-même, depuis trois jours, j'avais travaillé avec les autres à orner de jasmin la petite table sur laquelle on prononce les vœux, l'autel était couvert d'hyacinthes, les marches du chœur étaient couvertes de tapis, nous avions tous des gants blancs et un cierge dans la main ; j'étais bien heureuse, je me sentais faite pour cela ; pendant toute la messe, je remuais mes pieds sur le tapis, car il n'y en avait pas chez mon père ; j'aurais voulu me coucher dessus avec ma belle robe, et demeurer toute seule dans l'église, au milieu des cierges allumés ; mon cœur battait d'une espérance nouvelle, j'attendais l'hostie avec anxiété, j'avais entendu dire que la première communion changeait, et je croyais que, le sacrement passé, tous mes désirs seraient calmés. Mais non ! rassise à ma place, je me retrouvai dans ma fournaise ; j'avais remarqué que l'on m'avait regardée en allant vers le prêtre, et qu'on m'avait admirée ; je me rengorgeai, je me trouvai belle, m'enorgueillissant vaguement de toutes les délices cachés en moi et que j'ignorais moi-même.

À la sortie de la messe, nous défilâmes toutes en rang, dans le cimetière ; les parents et les curieux étaient des deux côtés, dans l'herbe, pour nous voir passer ; je marchais la première, j'étais la plus grande. Pendant le dîner, je ne mangeai pas, j'avais le cœur tout oppressé ; ma mère, qui avait pleuré pendant l'office, avait encore les yeux rouges ; quelques voisins vinrent pour me féliciter et m'embrassèrent, avec effusion, leurs caresses me répugnaient. Le soir, aux vêpres, il y avait encore plus de monde que le matin. En face de nous, on avait disposé les garçons, ils nous regardaient avidement, moi surtout ; même lorsque j'avais les yeux baissés, je sentais encore leurs regards. On les avait frisés, ils étaient en toilette comme nous. Quand, après avoir chanté le premier couplet d'un cantique, ils reprenaient à leur tour, leur voix me soulevait l'âme, et quand elle s'éteignait, ma jouissance expirait avec elle, et puis s'élançait de nouveau quand ils recommençaient. Je prononçai les vœux ; tout ce que je me rappelle, c'est que je parlais de robe blanche et d'innocence.

Marie s'arrêta ici, perdue sans doute dans l'émouvant souvenir par lequel elle avait peur d'être vaincue, puis elle reprit en riant d'une manière désespérée :

— Ah ! la robe blanche ! il y a bien longtemps qu'elle est usée ! et l'innocence avec elle ! Où sont les autres maintenant ? il y en a qui sont mortes, d'autres qui sont mariées et ont des enfants ; je n'en vois plus aucune, je ne connais personne. Tous les jours de l'an encore, je veux écrire à ma mère, mais je n'ose pas, et puis bah ! c'est bête tous ces sentiments-là !

Se raidissant contre son émotion, elle continua :

— Le lendemain, qui était encore un jour de fête, un camarade vint pour jouer avec moi ; ma mère me dit : “Maintenant que tu es une grande fille, tu ne devrais plus aller avec les garçons”, et elle nous sépara. Il n'en fallut pas plus pour me rendre amoureuse de celui-là, je le recherchais, je lui fis la cour, j'avais envie de m'enfuir avec lui de mon pays, il devait m'épouser quand je serais grande, je l'appelai mon mari, mon amant, il n'osait pas. Un jour que nous étions seuls, et que nous revenions ensemble du bois où nous avions été cueillir des fraises, en passant près d'un mulon, je me ruai sur lui, et le couvrant de tout mon corps en l'embrassant à la bouche, je me mis à crier : “Aime-moi donc, marions-nous, marions-nous !” Il se dégagea de moi et s'enfuit.

Depuis ce temps-là, je m'écartais de tout le monde et ne sortis plus de la ferme, je vivais solitairement dans mes désirs, comme d'autres dans leurs jouissances. Disait-on qu'un tel avait enlevé une fille qu'on lui refusait, je m'imaginai être sa maîtresse, fuir avec lui en croupe, à travers champs, et le serrer dans mes bras ; si l'on parlait d'une noce, je me couchais vite dans le lit blanc, comme la mariée je tremblais de crainte et de volupté ; j'enviais jusqu'aux beuglements plaintifs des vaches lorsqu'elles mettent bas ; en rêvant la cause, je jalousais leurs douleurs.

À cette époque-là, mon père mourut, ma mère m'emmena à la ville avec elle, mon frère partit pour l'armée, où il est devenu capitaine. J'avais seize ans quand nous partîmes de la maison ; je dis adieu pour toujours au bois, à la prairie où était mon ruisseau, adieu au portail de l'église, où j'avais passé de si bonnes heures à jouer au soleil, adieu aussi à ma pauvre petite chambre ; je n'ai plus revu tout cela. Des grisettes du quartier, qui devinrent mes amies, me montrèrent leurs amoureux, j'allais avec elles en partie, je les regardais s'aimer, et je me repaissais à loisir de ce spectacle. Tous les jours c'était un nouveau prétexte pour m'absenter, ma mère s'en aperçut bien, elle m'en fit d'abord des reproches, puis finit par me laisser tranquille.

Un jour enfin une vieille femme que je connaissais depuis quelques temps, me proposa de faire ma fortune, me disant qu'elle m'avait trouvé un amant fort riche, que le lendemain soir je n'avais qu'à sortir, comme pour porter de l'ouvrage dans un faubourg, et qu'elle m'y mènerait.

Pendant les vingt-quatre qui suivirent, je crus souvent que j'allais devenir folle ; à mesure que l'heure approchait, le moment s'éloignait, je n'avais que ce mot-là dans ma tête : un amant ! un amant ! j'allais avoir un amant, j'allais être aimée, j'allais donc aimer ! Je mis d'abord mes souliers les plus minces, puis m'apercevant que mon pied s'évasait dedans, je pris des bottines ; j'arrangeai également mes cheveux de cent manières, en torsades, puis en bandeaux, en papillotes, en nattes ; à mesure que je me regardais dans la glace, je devenais plus belle, mais je ne l'étais pas assez, mes habits étaient communs, j'en rougis de honte. Que n'étais-je une de ces femmes qui sont blanches au milieu de leurs velours, toute chargée de dentelles, sentant l'ambre et la rose, avec de la soie qui craque, et des domestiques tout cousus d'or ! Je maudis ma mère, ma vie passée, et je m'enfuis, poussée par toutes les tentations du diable, et d'avance les savourant toutes.

Au détour d'une rue, un fiacre nous attendait, nous montâmes dedans ; une heure après il nous arrêta à la grille d'un parc. Après nous y être promenées quelque temps, je m'aperçus que la vieille m'avait quittée, et je restai seule à marcher dans les allées. Les arbres étaient grands, tout couverts de feuilles, des bandes de gazon entouraient des plates-bandes de fleurs, jamais je n'avais vu de si beau jardin ; une rivière passait au milieu, des pierres, disposées habilement çà et là, formaient des cascades, des cygnes jouaient sur l'eau et, les ailes enflées, se laissaient pousser par le courant. Je m'amusai aussi à voir la volière, où des oiseaux de toutes sortes criaient et se balançaient sur leurs anneaux ; ils étalaient leurs queues panachées et passaient les uns devant les autres, c'était un éblouissement. Deux statues de marbre blanc, au bas du perron, se regardaient dans des poses charmantes ; le grand bassin d'en face était doré par le soleil couchant et donnait envie de s'y baigner. Je pensai à l'amant inconnu qui demeurerait là, à chaque instant je m'attendais à voir sortir d'un bosquet d'arbres quelque homme beau et marchant fièrement comme un Apollon. Après le dîner, et quand le bruit du château, que j'entendais depuis longtemps, se fût apaisé, mon maître parut. C'était un vieillard tout blanc et maigre, serré dans des habits trop justes, avec une croix d'honneur sur son habit, et des dessous du pied qui l'empêchaient de remuer les genoux ; il avait un grand nez, et des petits yeux verts qui avaient l'air méchant. Il m'aborda en souriant, il n'avait plus de dents. Quand on sourit il faut avoir une petite lèvre rose comme la tienne, avec un peu de moustache aux deux bouts, n'est-ce pas cher ange ?

Nous nous assîmes ensemble sur un banc, il me prit les mains, il me les trouva si jolies qu'il en baisait chaque doigt ; il me dit que si je voulais être sa maîtresse, rester sage et demeurer avec lui, je serais bien riche, j'aurais des domestiques pour me servir, et tous les jours de belles robes, je monteraï à cheval, je me promènerais en voiture ; mais pour cela, disait-il, il fallait l'aimer. Je lui promis que je l'aimerais.

Et cependant aucune de ces flammes intérieures qui naguère me brûlaient les entrailles, à l'approche des hommes, ne m'arrivait ; à force d'être à côté de lui et de me dire intérieurement que c'était celui-là dont j'allais être la maîtresse, je finis par en avoir envie. Quand il me dit de rentrer, je me levai vivement, il était ravi, il tremblait de joie, le bonhomme ! Après avoir traversé un beau salon où les meubles étaient tout dorés, il me mena dans ma chambre et voulut me déshabiller lui-même ; il commença par m'ôter mon bonnet, mais voulant ensuite me déchausser, il eut du mal à se baisser et il me dit : "C'est que je suis vieux, mon enfant" ; il était à genoux, il me suppliait du regard, il ajouta, en joignant les deux mains ; "Tu es si jolie !", j'avais peur de ce qui allait suivre.

Un énorme lit était au fond de l'alcôve, il m'y traîna en criant ; je me sentis noyée dans les édredons et dans les matelas, son corps pesait sur moi, avec un horrible supplice, ses lèvres molles me couvraient de baisers froids, le plafond de la chambre m'écrasait. Comme il était heureux ! comme il se pâmail ! Tâchant, à mon tour, de trouver des jouissances, j'excitais les siennes à ce qu'il paraît ; mais que m'importait son plaisir à lui ! c'était le mien qu'il me fallait, j'en aspirais de sa bouche creuse et de ses membres débiles, j'en évoquais de tout ce vieillard, et réunissant dans un incroyable effort tout ce que j'avais en moi de lubricité contenue, je ne parvins qu'au dégoût dans ma première nuit de débauche.

À peine fut-il sorti que je me levai, j'allai à la fenêtre, je l'ouvris et je laissai l'air me refroidir la peau ; j'aurais voulu que l'Océan pût me laver de lui, je refis mon lit, effaçant avec soin toutes les places où ce cadavre m'avait fatiguée de ses convulsion. Toute la nuit se passa à pleurer ; désespérée, je rugissais comme un tigre qu'on a châtré. Ah ! si tu étais venu alors ! si nous nous étions connu dans ce temps-là ! tu avais été du même âge que moi, c'est alors que nous nous serions aimés, quand j'avais seize ans, que mon cœur était neuf ! toute notre vie se fût passée à cela, mes bras se seraient usés à t'étreindre sur moi, mes yeux à plonger dans les tiens.

Elle continua :

— Grande dame, je me levais à midi, j'avais une livrée qui me suivait partout, et une calèche où je m'étendais sur les coussins ; ma bête de race sautait merveilleusement par-dessus le tronc des arbres, et la plume noire de mon chapeau d'amazone remuait avec grâce ; mais devenue riche du jour au lendemain, tout ce luxe m'excitait au lieu de m'apaiser. Bientôt on me connut, ce fut à celui qui m'aurait, mes amants faisaient des folies pour me plaire, tous les soirs je lisais les billets doux de la journée, pour y trouver l'expression nouvelle de quelque cœur autrement moulé que les autres et fait pour moi. Mais tous se ressemblaient, je savais d'avance la fin de leurs phrases et la manière dont ils allaient tomber à genoux ; il y en a deux que j'ai repoussés par caprice et qui se sont tués, leur mort ne m'a point touchée, pourquoi mourir ? que n'ont-ils plutôt tout franchi pour m'avoir ? Si j'aimais un homme, moi, il n'y aurait pas de mers assez larges ni de murs assez hauts pour m'empêcher d'arriver jusqu'à lui. Comme je me serais bien entendue, si j'avais été homme, à corrompre les gardiens, à monter la nuit aux fenêtres, et à étouffer sous ma bouche les cris de ma victime, trompée chaque matin de l'espoir que j'avais eu la veille !

Je les chassais avec colère et j'en prenais d'autres, l'uniformité du plaisir me désespérait, et je courais à sa poursuite avec frénésie, toujours altérée de jouissances nouvelles et magnifiquement rêvées, semblable aux marins en détresse, qui boivent de l'eau de mer et ne peuvent s'empêcher d'en boire, tant la soif les brûle !

Dandys et rustauds, j'ai voulu voir si tous étaient de même ; j'ai goûté la passion des hommes, aux mains blanches et grasses, aux cheveux teints collés sur les tempes ; j'ai eu de pâles adolescents, blonds, efféminés comme des filles, qui se mouraient sur moi ; les vieillards aussi m'ont salie de leurs joies décrépites, et j'ai contemplé au réveil leur poitrine oppressée et leurs yeux éteints. Sur un banc de bois, dans un cabaret de village, entre un pot de vin et une pipe de tabac, l'homme du peuple aussi m'a embrassée avec violence ; je me suis fait comme lui une joie épaisse et des allures faciles ; mais la canaille ne fait pas mieux l'amour que la noblesse, et la botte de paille n'est pas plus chaude que les sofas. Je me suis dévouée à quelques-uns comme une esclave, et ils ne m'en aimaient pas davantage ; j'ai eu, pour des sots, des bassesses infâmes, et en échange ils me haïssaient et me méprisaient, alors que j'aurais voulu centupler mes caresses et les inonder de bonheur. Espérant enfin que les gens difformes pouvaient mieux aimer que les autres, et que les natures rachitiques se raccrochaient à la vie par la volupté, je me suis donnée à des bossus, à des nègres, à des nains, je leurs fis des nuits à rendre jaloux des millionnaires, mais je les épouvantais peut-être, car ils me quittaient vite. Ni les pauvres, ni les riches, ni les laids n'ont pu assouvir l'amour que je leur demandais à remplir ; tous, faibles, languissants, conçus dans l'ennui, avortons faits par des paralytiques que le vin enivre, que la femme tue, craignant de mourir dans les draps comme on meurt à la guerre, il n'en est pas un que je n'aie vu lassé dès la première heure. Il n'y a donc plus, sur terre, de ces jeunesses divines comme autrefois ! plus de Bacchus, plus d'Apollons, plus de ces héros qui marchaient nus, couronnés de pampres et de lauriers ! J'étais faite pour être la maîtresse d'un empereur, moi ; il me fallait l'amour d'un bandit, sur un roc dur, par un soleil d'Afrique ; j'ai souhaité les enlacements des serpents, et les baisers rugissants que donnent les lions.

À cette époque, je lisais beaucoup ; il y a deux livres que j'ai relu cent fois : Paul et Virginie et un autre qui s'appelait Les Crimes des Reines. On voyait les portraits de Messaline, de Théodora, de Marguerite de Bourgogne, de Marie Stuart et de Catherine II. "Etre reine, me disais-je, et rendre la foule amoureuse de toi !" Eh bien, j'ai été reine, reine comme on peut l'être maintenant ; en entrant dans ma loge je promenais sur le public un regard triomphant et provocateur, mille têtes suivaient le mouvement de mes sourcils, je dominais tout par l'insolence de ma beauté.

Fatiguée cependant de toujours poursuivre un amant, et plus que jamais en voulant à tout prix, ayant d'ailleurs fait du vice un supplice qui m'était cher, je suis accourue ici, le cœur enflammé comme si j'avais encore une virginité à vendre ; raffinée, je me résignais à vivre mal ; opulente, à m'endormir dans la misère, car à force de descendre si bas je n'aspirais peut-être plus à monter éternellement, à mesure que mes organes s'useraient, mes désirs s'apaiseraient sans doute, je voulais par là en finir d'un seul coup et me dégoûter pour toujours de ce que j'enviais avec tant de ferveur. Oui, moi qui ai pris des bains de fraises et de lait, je suis venue ici, m'étendre sur le grabat commun où la foule passe ; au lieu d'être la maîtresse d'un seul, je me suis fait la servante de tous, et quel rude maître j'ai pris là ! Plus de feu l'hiver, plus de vin fin à mes repas, il y a un an que j'ai la même robe, mais qu'importe ! mon métier n'est-il pas d'être nue ? Mais ma dernière pensée, mon dernier espoir, le sais-tu ? Oh ! j'y comptais, c'était de trouver un jour ce que je n'avais jamais rencontré, l'homme qui m'a toujours fui, que j'ai poursuivi dans le lit des élégants, au balcon des théâtres ; chimère qui n'est que dans mon cœur et que je veux tenir dans mes mains ; un beau jour, espérais-je, quelqu'un viendra sans doute — dans le nombre cela doit être — plus grand, plus noble, plus fort ; ses yeux seront fendus comme ceux des sultanes, sa voix se modulera dans une mélodie lascive, ses membres auront la souplesse terrible et voluptueuse des léopards, il sentira des odeurs à faire pâmer, et ses dents mordront avec délices ce sein qui se gonfle pour lui. À chaque arrivant, je me disais : "est-ce lui ? qu'il m'aime ! qu'il m'aime ! qu'il me batte ! qu'il me brise ! à moi seule je lui ferai un sérail, je connais quelles fleurs excitent, quelles boissons vous exaltent, et comment la fatigue même se transforme en délicieuse extase ; coquette quand il le voudra, pour irriter sa vanité ou amuser son esprit, tout à coup il me trouvera langoureuse, pliante comme un roseau, exhalant des mots doux et des soupirs tendres ; pour lui je me tordrai dans des mouvements de couleuvre, la nuit j'aurai des soubresauts furieux et des crispations qui déchirent. Dans un pays chaud, en buvant du vin dans du cristal, je lui danserai, avec des castagnettes, des danses espagnoles, ou je bondirai en hurlant un hymne de guerre, comme les femmes des sauvages ; s'il est amoureux des statues et des tableaux, je me ferai des poses de grand maître devant lesquelles il tombera à genoux ; s'il aime mieux que je sois son ami, je m'habillerai en homme et j'irai à la chasse avec lui, je l'aiderai dans ses vengeances ; s'il veut assassiner quelqu'un, je ferai le guet pour lui ; s'il est voleur, nous volerons ensemble ; j'aimerai ses habits et le manteau qui l'enveloppe. Mais non ! jamais ! jamais ! le temps a beau s'écouler et les matins revenir, on a en vain usé chaque place de mon corps, par toutes les voluptés dont se régalaient les hommes, je suis resté comme j'étais à dix ans, vierge, si une vierge est celle qui n'a pas de mari, pas d'amant, qui n'a pas connu le plaisir et qui le rêve sans cesse, qui se fait des fantômes charmants et qui les voit dans ses songes, qui en entend la voix dans le bruit des vents, qui en cherche les traits dans la figure de la lune. Je suis vierge ! cela te fait rire ? mais n'en ai-je pas les vagues pressentiments, les ardentes langueurs ? j'en ai tout, sauf la virginité elle-même.

Regarde au chevet de mon lit toutes ces lignes entrecroisées sur l'acajou, ce sont les marques d'ongle de tout ceux qui s'y sont débattus, de tous ceux dont les têtes ont frotté là ; je n'ai jamais eu rien de commun avec eux ; unis ensemble aussi étroitement que les bras humains peuvent le permettre, je ne sais quel abîme m'en a toujours séparée. Oh ! que de fois, tandis qu'égarés ils auraient voulu s'abîmer tout entiers dans la jouissance, mentalement je m'écarterais à mille lieues de là, pour partager la natte d'un sauvage ou l'ancre garni de peaux de mouton de quelque berger des Abruzzes ! Aucun, en effet ne vient pour moi, aucun ne me connaît, ils cherchent peut-être en moi une certaine femme comme je cherche en eux un certain homme ; n'y a-t-il pas, dans les rues, plus d'un chien qui s'en va flairant dans l'ordure pour trouver des os de poulet et des morceaux de viande ? de même, qui saura tous les amours exaltés qui s'abattent sur une fille publique, toutes les belles élégies qui finissent dans le bonjour qu'on lui adresse ? Combien j'en ai vu arriver ici le cœur gros de dépit et les yeux pleins de larmes ! les uns, au sortir d'un bal, pour résumer sur une seule femme toutes celles qu'ils venaient de quitter ; les autres, après un mariage, exaltés à l'idée de l'innocence ; et puis des jeunes gens, pour toucher à loisir leurs maîtresses à qui ils n'osent parler, fermant les yeux et la voyant ainsi dans leurs cœurs ; des maris pour se refaire jeunes et savourer les plaisirs faciles de leur bon temps, des prêtres poussés par le démon et ne voulant pas d'une femme, mais d'une courtisane, mais du péché incarné, ils me maudissent, ils ont peur de moi et ils m'adorent ; pour que la tentation soit plus forte et l'effroi plus grand, ils voudraient que j'eusse le pied fourchu et que ma robe étincelât de pierreries. Tous passent tristement, uniformément, comme des ombres qui se succèdent, comme une foule dont on ne garde plus que le souvenir du bruit qu'elle faisait, du piétinement de ces mille pieds, des clameurs confuses qui en sortaient. Sais-je, en effet, le nom d'un seul ? ils viennent et ils me quittent, jamais une caresse désintéressée, et ils en demandent, ils demanderaient de l'amour, s'ils l'osaient ! il faut les appeler beaux, les supposer riches, et ils sourient. Et puis ils aiment à rire, quelquefois il faut chanter, ou se taire ou parler. Dans cette femme si connue, personne ne s'est douté qu'il y avait un cœur ; imbéciles qui louaient l'arc de mes sourcils et l'éclat de mes épaules, tout heureux d'avoir à bon marché un morceau de roi, et qui ne prenaient pas cet amour inextinguible qui courait au-devant d'eux et se jetait à leurs genoux !

J'en vois pourtant qui ont des amants, même ici, de vrais amants qui les aiment ; elles leur font une place à part, dans leur lit comme dans leur âme, et quand ils viennent elles sont heureuses . C'est pour eux, vois-tu, qu'elles se peignent si longuement les cheveux, qu'elles arrosent les pots de fleurs qui sont à leurs fenêtres ; mais moi, personne, personne ; pas même l'affection paisible d'un pauvre enfant, car on la leur montre du doigt, la prostituée, et ils passent devant elle sans lever la tête. Qu'il y a longtemps, mon Dieu que je ne suis sortie dans les champs et que je n'ai vu la campagne ! que de dimanches j'ai passés à entendre le son de ces tristes cloches, qui appellent tout le monde aux offices où je ne vais pas ! qu'il y a longtemps que je n'ai entendu le grelot des vaches dans le taillis ! Ah ! je veux m'en aller d'ici, je m'ennuie, je m'ennuie, je retournerai au pays, j'irai chez ma nourrice, c'est une brave femme qui me recevra bien. Quand j'étais toute petite, j'allais chez elle, et elle me donnait du lait ; je l'aiderai à élever ses enfants et à faire le ménage, j'irai ramasser du bois mort dans la forêt, nous nous chaufferons, le soir, au coin du feu quand il neigera, voilà bientôt l'hiver ; aux rois nous tirerons le gâteau. Oh ! elle m'aimera bien, je bercerai les enfants pour les endormir, comme je serai heureuse !

Elle se tut, puis releva sur moi un regard étincelant à travers ses larmes, comme pour me dire : Est-ce toi ?

Je l'avais écoutée avec avidité, j'avais regardé tous les mots sortir de sa bouche ; tâchant de m'identifier à la vie qu'ils exprimaient. Agrandie tout à coup à des proportions que je lui prêtais, sans doute, elle me parut une femme nouvelle, pleine de mystères ignorés et, malgré mes rapports avec elle, toute tentante d'un charme irritant et d'attraits nouveaux. Les hommes en effet, qui l'avaient possédée avaient laissé sur elle comme une odeur de parfum éteint, trace de passions disparues, qui lui faisaient une majesté voluptueuse ; la débauche la décorait d'une beauté infernale. Sans les orgies passées, aurait-elle eu ce sourire de suicide, qui la faisait ressembler à une morte se réveillant dans l'amour ? sa joue en était plus appâlie, ses cheveux plus élastiques et plus odorants, ses membres plus souples, plus mous et plus chauds ; comme moi, aussi, elle avait marché de joies en chagrins, couru d'espérances en dégoûts, des abattements sans nom avaient succédé à des spasmes fous ; sans nous connaître, elle dans sa prostitution et moi dans ma chasteté, nous avions suivi le même chemin, aboutissant au même gouffre ; pendant que je me cherchais une maîtresse, elle s'était cherché un amant, elle dans le monde, moi dans mon cœur, l'un et l'autre nous avaient fuis.

— Pauvre femme, lui dis-je, en le serrant sur moi, comme tu as du souffrir !

— Tu as donc souffert quelque chose de semblable ? me répondit-elle, est-ce que tu es comme moi ? est-ce que souvent tu as trempé ton oreiller de larmes ? est-ce que, pour toi, les jours de soleil en hiver sont aussi tristes ? Quand il fait du brouillard, le soir, et que je marche seule, il me semble que la pluie traverse mon cœur et la fait tomber en débris.

— Je doute pourtant que tu te sois jamais aussi ennuyée que moi dans le monde, tu as eu des jours de plaisir, mais moi c'est comme si j'étais né en prison, j'ai mille choses qui n'ont pas vu la lumière.

— Tu es si jeune cependant ! Au fait, tous les hommes sont vieux maintenant, les enfants se trouvent dégoûtés comme les vieillards, nos mères s'ennuyaient quand elles nous ont conçus, on n'était pas comme cela autrefois, n'est-ce pas vrai ?

— C'est vrai, repris-je, les maisons où nous habitons sont toutes pareilles, blanches et mornes comme des tombes dans des cimetières ; dans les vieilles baraques noires qu'on démolit la vie devait être plus chaude, on y chantait fort, on y brisait les brocs sur les tables, on y cassait les lits en faisant l'amour.

— Mais qui te rend si triste ? tu as donc bien aimé ?

— Si j'ai aimé, mon Dieu ! assez pour envier ta vie.

— Envier ma vie ! dit-elle.

— Oui, l'envier ! car, à ta place, j'aurais peut-être été heureux, car, si un homme comme tu le désires n'existe pas, une femme comme j'en veux doit vivre quelque part ; parmi tant de cœurs qui battent, il doit s'en trouver un pour moi.

— Cherche-le ! cherche-le !

— Oh ! si, j'ai aimé ! si bien que je suis saturé de désirs rentrés. Non, tu ne sauras jamais toutes celles qui m'ont égaré et que dans le fond de mon cœur j'abritais d'un amour angélique. Ecoute, quand j'avais vécu un jour avec une femme, je me disais : "Que ne l'ai-je connue depuis dix ans ! tous ses jours qui ont fui m'appartenaient, son premier sourire devait être pour moi, sa première pensée au monde, pour moi. Des gens viennent et lui parlent, elle leur répond, elle y pense, les livres qu'elle admire, j'aurais dû les lire. Que ne me suis-je promené avec elle, sous tous les ombrages qui l'ont abritée ! il y a bien des robes qu'elle a usées et que je n'ai pas vues, elle a entendu, dans sa vie, les plus beaux opéras, et je n'étais pas là ; d'autres lui ont déjà fait sentir les fleurs que je n'ai pas cueillies, je ne pourrai rien faire, elle m'oubliera, je suis pour elle comme un passant dans la rue", et quand j'en étais séparé, je me disais : "Où est-elle ? que fait-elle, toute la journée, loin de moi ? à quoi son temps se passe-t-il ?". Qu'une femme aime un homme, qu'elle lui fasse signe, et il tombe à genoux. Mais nous, quel hasard qu'elle vienne à nous regarder, et encore !... il faut être riche, avoir des chevaux qui vous emportent, avoir une maison ornée de statues, donner des fêtes, jeter l'or, faire du bruit ; mais vivre dans la foule, sans pouvoir la dominer par le génie ou par l'argent, et demeurer aussi inconnu que le plus lâche et le plus sot de tous, quand on aspire à des amours du ciel, quand on mourrait avec joie sous le regard d'une femme aimée, j'ai connu ce supplice.

— Tu es timide, n'est-ce pas ? elles te font peur .

— Plus maintenant. Autrefois le bruit de leurs pas seulement me faisait tressaillir, je restais devant la boutique d'un coiffeur, à regarder les belles figures de cire avec des fleurs et des diamants dans les cheveux, roses, blanches et décolletées, j'ai été amoureux de quelques-unes ; l'étalage d'un cordonnier me tenait aussi en extase : dans ces petits souliers de satin, que l'on allait emporter pour le bal du soir, je plaçais un pied nu, un pied charmant avec des ongles fins, un pied d'albâtre vivant, tel que celui d'une princesse qui entre au bain ; les corsets suspendus devant les magasins de modes, et que le vent fait remuer, me donnaient également de bizarres envies ; j'ai offert des bouquets de fleurs à des femmes que je n'aimais pas, espérant que l'amour viendrait par là, je l'avais entendu dire ; j'ai écrit des lettres adressées à n'importe qui, pour m'attendrir avec la plume, et j'ai pleuré ; le moindre sourire d'une bouche de femme me faisait fondre le cœur en délices, et puis c'était tout ! Tant de bonheur n'était pas fait pour moi, qu'est-ce qui pouvait m'aimer ?

— Attends ! attends encore un an, six mois ! demain peut-être, espère ! — J'ai trop espéré pour obtenir.

— Tu parles comme un enfant, me dit-elle.

— Non, je ne vois même pas d'amour dont je ne serais rassasié au bout de vingt-quatre heures, j'ai tant rêvé le sentiment que j'en suis fatigué, comme ceux que l'on a trop fortement chéris.

— Il n'y a pourtant que cela de beau dans le monde.

— À qui le dis-tu ? je donnerais tout pour passer une seule nuit avec une femme qui m'aimerait.

— Oh ! si au lieu de cacher ton cœur, tu laissais voir tout ce qui bat dedans de généreux et de bon, toutes les femmes voudraient de toi, il n'en est pas une qui ne tâcherait d'être ta maîtresse ; mais tu as été plus fou que moi encore ! Fait-on cas des trésors enfouis ? les coquettes seules devinent les gens comme toi, et les torturent, mais les autres ne les voient pas. Tu valais pourtant la peine qu'on t'aimât ! Eh bien, tant mieux ! c'est moi qui t'aimerai, c'est moi qui serai ta maîtresse.

— Ma maîtresse ?

— Oh ! je t'en prie ! je te suivrai où tu voudras, je partirai d'ici, j'irai louer une chambre en face de toi, je te regarderai toute la journée. Comme je t'aimerai ! être avec toi, le soir, le matin, la nuit dormir ensemble, les bras passés autour du corps, manger à la même table, vis-à-vis l'un de l'autre, nous habiller dans la même chambre, sortir ensemble et te sentir près de moi ! Ne sommes-nous pas faits l'un pour l'autre ? tes espérances ne vont-elles pas bien avec mes dégoûts ? ta vie et la mienne, n'est-ce pas la même ? Tu me raconteras tous les ennuis de ta solitude, je te redirai les supplices que j'ai endurés ; il faudra vivre comme si nous ne devions rester ensemble qu'une heure, épuiser tout ce qu'il y a en nous de volupté et de tendresse, et puis recommencer, mourir ensemble. Embrasse-moi, embrasse-moi encore ! mets là ta tête sur ma poitrine, que j'en sente bien le poids, que tes cheveux me caressent le cou, que mes mains parcourent tes épaules, ton regard est si tendre.

La couverture défaite, qui pendait à terre, laissait nos pieds à nu ; elle se releva sur les genoux et la repoussa sous le matelas, je vis son dos blanc se courber comme un roseau ; les insomnies de la nuit m'avaient brisé, mon front était lourd, les yeux me brûlaient les paupières, elle me les baisa doucement du bout des lèvres, ce qui me les rafraîchit comme si on me les eût humectés avec de l'eau froide. Elle aussi se réveillait de plus en plus de la torpeur où elle s'était laissée aller un instant ; irritée par la fatigue, enflammée par le goût des caresses précédentes, elle m'étreignit avec une volupté désespérée, en me disant : "Aimons-nous, puisque personne ne nous a aimés, tu es à moi !"

Elle haletait, la bouche ouverte, et m'embrassait furieusement, puis tout à coup, se reprenant et passant sa main sur ses bandeaux dérangés, elle ajouta :

— Ecoute, comme notre vie serait belle si c'était ainsi, si nous pouvions demeurer dans un pays où le soleil fait pousser des fleurs jaunes et mûrit les oranges, sur un rivage comme il y en a, à ce qu'il paraît, où les hommes portent des turbans, où les femmes ont des robes de gaze ; nous demeurerions couchés sous quelque grand arbre à larges feuilles, nous écouterions le bruit des golfes, nous marcherions ensemble au bord des flots pour ramasser des coquilles, je ferais des paniers avec des roseaux, tu irais les vendre ; c'est moi qui t'habillerais, je friserai tes cheveux dans mes doigts, je te mettrai un collier autour du cou, oh ! comme je t'aimerais ! comme je t'aime ! laisse-moi donc m'assouvir de toi !

Me collant à sa couche, d'un mouvement impétueux, elle s'abattit sur tout mon corps et s'y étendit avec une joie obscène, pâle, frissonnante, les dents serrées avec une force enragée ; je me sentis entraîné comme dans un ouragan d'amour, des sanglots éclataient, et puis des cris aigus ; ma lèvre, humide de sa salive, pétillait et me démangeait ; nos muscles, tordus dans les mêmes nœuds, se serraient et entraient les uns dans les autres, la volupté se tournait en délire, la jouissance en supplice.

Ouvrant tout à coup les yeux ébahis et épouvantés, elle dit :

— Si j'allais avoir un enfant !

Et passant, au contraire, à une câlinerie suppliante :

— Oui, oui, un enfant ! un enfant de toi !... Tu me quittes ? nous ne nous reverrons plus, jamais tu ne reviendras ? penseras-tu à moi quelquefois ? j'aurai toujours tes cheveux là, adieu !... Attends, il fait à peine jour.

Pourquoi donc avais-je hâte de la fuir ? est-ce que déjà je l'aimais ?

Marie ne me parla plus, quoique je restasse bien encore une demi-heure chez elle ; elle songeait peut-être à l'amant absent. Il y a un instant, dans le départ où, par anticipation de tristesse, la personne aimée n'est déjà plus avec vous.

Nous ne nous fîmes pas d'adieux, je lui pris la main, elle y répondit, mais la force pour la serrer était restée dans son cœur.

Je ne l'ai plus revue.

J'ai pensé à elle depuis, pas un jour ne s'est écoulé sans perdre à y rêver le plus d'heures possibles, quelquefois je m'enferme exprès et seul, je tâche de revivre dans ce souvenir ; souvent je m'efforce à y penser avant de m'endormir, pour la rêver la nuit, mais ce bonheur ne m'est pas arrivé.

Je l'ai cherchée partout, dans les promenades, au théâtre, au coin des rues, sans savoir pourquoi j'ai cru qu'elle m'écrirait ; quand j'entendais une voiture s'arrêter à ma porte, je m'imaginai qu'elle allait en descendre. Avec quelle angoisse j'ai suivi certaines femmes ! avec quel battement de cœur je détournais la tête pour voir si c'était elle !

La maison a été démolie, personne n'a pu me dire ce qu'elle était devenue.

Le désir d'une femme que l'on a obtenue est quelque chose d'atroce et de mille fois pire que l'autre ; de terribles images vous poursuivent comme des remords. Je ne suis pas jaloux des hommes qui l'ont eue avant moi, mais je suis jaloux de ceux qui l'ont eue depuis ; une convention tacite faisait, il me semble, que nous devions nous être fidèles, j'ai été plus d'un an à lui garder cette parole, et puis le hasard, l'ennui, la lassitude du même sentiment peut-être, on fait que j'y ai manqué. Mais c'était elle que je poursuivais partout ; dans le lit des autres, je rêvais à ses caresses.

On a beau, par-dessus les passions anciennes, vouloir en semer de nouvelles, elles reparaissent toujours, il n'y a pas de force au monde pour en arracher les racines. Les voies romaines, où roulaient les chars consulaires, ne servent plus depuis longtemps, mille nouveaux sentiers les traversent, les champs se sont élevés dessus, le blé y pousse, mais on en aperçoit encore la trace, et leurs grosses pierres ébrèchent les charrues quand on laboure.

Le type dont presque tous les hommes sont en quête n'est peut-être que le souvenir d'un amour conçu dans le ciel ou dès les premiers jours de la vie ; nous sommes en quête de tout ce qui s'y rapporte, la seconde femme qui vous plaît ressemble presque toujours à la première, il faut un grand degré de corruption ou un cœur bien vaste pour tout aimer. Voyez aussi comme ce sont éternellement les mêmes dont vous parlent les gens qui écrivent, et qu'ils décrivent cent fois sans jamais s'en lasser. J'ai connu un ami qui avait adoré, à 15 ans, une jeune mère qu'il avait vue nourrissant son enfant ; de longtemps il n'estima que les tailles de poissarde, la beauté des femmes sveltes lui était odieuse.

À mesure que le temps s'éloignait, je l'en aimais de plus en plus ; avec la rage que l'on a pour les choses impossibles, j'inventais des aventures pour la retrouver, j'imaginai notre rencontre, j'ai revu ses yeux dans les globules bleus des fleuves, et la couleur de sa figure dans les feuilles du tremble, quand l'automne les colore. Une fois, je marchais vite dans un pré, les herbes sifflaient autour de mes pieds en m'avancant, elle était derrière moi ; je me suis retourné, il n'y avait personne. Un autre jour, une voiture a passé devant mes yeux, j'ai levé la tête, un grand voile blanc sortait de la portière et s'agitait au vent, les roues tournaient, il se tordait, il m'appelait, il a disparu, et je suis retombé seul, abîmé, plus abandonné qu'au fond d'un précipice.

Oh ! si l'on pouvait extraire de soi tout ce qui y est et faire un être avec la pensée seule ! si l'on pouvait tenir son fantôme dans les mains et le toucher au front, au lieu de perdre dans l'air tant de caresses et de soupirs ! Loin de là, la mémoire oublie et l'image s'efface, tandis que l'acharnement de la douleur reste en vous. C'est pour me la rappeler que j'ai écrit ce qui précède, espérant que les mots me la feraient revivre ; j'y ai échoué, j'en sais bien plus que je n'en ai dit.

C'est, d'ailleurs, une confidence que je n'ai faite à personne, on se serait moqué de moi. Ne se raille-t-on pas de ceux qui aiment, car c'est une honte parmi les hommes ; chacun, par pudeur ou par égoïsme, cache ce qu'il possède dans l'âme de meilleur et de plus délicat ; pour se faire estimer, il ne faut montrer que les côtés les plus laids, c'est le moyen d'être au niveau commun. Aimer une telle femme ? m'aurait-on dit, et d'abord personne ne l'eût compris ; à quoi bon, dès lors, en ouvrir la bouche ?

Ils auraient eu raison, elle n'était peut-être ni plus belle ni plus ardente qu'une autre, j'ai peur de n'aimer qu'une conception de mon esprit et de ne chérir en elle que l'amour qu'elle m'avait fait rêver.

Longtemps, je me suis débattu sous cette pensée, j'avais placé l'amour trop haut pour espérer qu'il descendrait jusqu'à moi ; mais, à la persistance de cette idée, il a bien fallu reconnaître que c'était quelque chose d'analogue. Ce n'est que plusieurs mois après l'avoir quittée que je l'ai ressentie ; dans les premiers temps, au contraire, j'ai vécu dans un grand calme.

Comme le monde est vide à celui qui y marche seul ! Qu'allais-je faire ? Comment passer le temps ? à quoi employer mon cerveau ? comme les journées sont longues ! Où est donc l'homme qui se plaint de la brièveté des jours de la vie ? qu'on me le montre, ce doit être un mortel heureux.

Distrayez-vous, disent-ils, mais à quoi ? c'est me dire : tâchez d'être heureux ; mais comment ? et à quoi bon tant de mouvement ? Tout est bien dans la nature, les arbres poussent, les fleuves coulent, les oiseaux chantent, les étoiles brillent ; mais l'homme tourmenté remue, s'agite, abat les forêts, bouleverse la terre, s'élance sur la mer, voyage, court, tue les animaux, se tue lui-même, et pleure, et rugit, et pense à l'enfer, comme si Dieu lui avait donné un esprit pour concevoir encore plus de maux qu'il n'en endure !

Autrefois, avant Marie, mon ennui avait quelque chose de beau, de grand ; mais maintenant il est stupide, c'est l'ennui d'un homme plein de mauvaise eau-de-vie, sommeil d'ivre mort.

Ceux qui ont beaucoup vécu ne sont pas de même. À 50 ans, ils sont plus frais que moi à vingt, tout leur est encore neuf et attrayant. Serai-je comme ces mauvais chevaux, qui sont fatigués à peine sortis de l'écurie, et qui ne trottent à l'aise qu'après un long bout de route, fait en boitant et en souffrant ? Trop de spectacles me font mal, trop aussi me font pitié, ou plutôt tout cela se confond dans le même dégoût.

Celui qui est assez bien né pour ne pas vouloir de maîtresse parce qu'il ne pourrait la couvrir de diamants ni la loger dans un palais, et qui assiste à des amours vulgaires, qui contemple, d'un oeil calme, la laideur bête de ces deux animaux en rut que l'on appelle un amant et une maîtresse, n'est pas tenté de se ravalier si bas, il se défend d'aimer comme une faiblesse, et il terrasse sous ses genoux tous les désirs qui viennent ; cette lutte l'épuise. L'égoïsme cynique des hommes m'écarte d'eux, de même que l'esprit borné des femmes me dégoûte de leur commerce ; j'ai tort, après tout, car deux belles lèvres valent mieux que toute l'éloquence du monde.

La feuille tombée s'agite et vole aux vents, de même, moi, je voudrais voler, m'en aller, partir pour ne plus revenir, n'importe où, mais quitter mon pays ; ma maison me pèse sur les épaules, je suis tant de fois entré et sorti par la même porte ! j'ai tant de fois levé les yeux à la même place, au plafond de ma chambre, qu'il devrait en être usé.

Oh ! se sentir plier sur le dos des chameaux ! devant soi un ciel tout rouge, un sable tout brun, l'horizon flamboyant qui s'allonge, les terrains qui ondulent, l'aigle qui pointe sur votre tête ; dans un coin, une troupe de cigognes aux pattes roses, qui passent et s'en vont vers les citernes ; le vaisseau mobile du désert vous berce, le soleil vous fait fermer les yeux, vous baigne dans ses rayons, on n'entend que le bruit étouffé du pas des montures, le conducteur vient de finir sa chanson, on va, on va. Le soir, on plante les pieux, on dresse la tente, on fait boire les dromadaires, on se couche sur une peau de lion, on fume, on allume des feux pour éloigner les chacals, que l'on entend glapir au fond du désert, des étoiles inconnues et quatre fois grandes comme les nôtres palpitent aux cieux ; le matin, on remplit les outres à l'oasis, on repart, on est seul, le vent siffle, le sable s'élève en tourbillons.

Et puis, dans quelque plaine où l'on galope tout le jour, des palmiers s'élèvent entre les colonnes et agitent doucement leur ombrage, à côté de l'ombre immobile des temples détruits ; des chèvres grimpent sur des frontispices renversés et mordent les plantes qui ont poussé dans les ciselles du marbre, elles fuient en bondissant quand vous approchez. Au-delà, après avoir traversé des forêts où les arbres sont liés ensemble par des lianes gigantesques, et des fleuves dont on n'aperçoit pas l'autre rive du bord, c'est le Soudan, le pays des nègres, le pays de l'or ; mais plus loin, oh ! allons toujours plus loin, je veux voir le Malabar furieux et ses danses où l'on se tue ; les vins donnent la mort comme les poisons, les poisons sont doux comme les vins ; la mer, une mer bleue remplie de corail et de perles, retentit du bruit des orgies sacrées qui se font dans les antres des montagnes, il n'y a plus de vagues, l'atmosphère est vermeille, le ciel sans nuage se mire dans le tiède Océan, les câbles fument quand on les retire de l'eau, les requins suivent le navire et mangent les morts.

Oh ! l'Inde ! l'Inde surtout ! Des montagnes blanches, remplies de pagodes et d'idoles, au milieu de bois remplis de tigres et d'éléphants, des hommes jaunes avec des vêtements blancs, des femmes couvertes d'étain avec des anneaux aux pieds et aux mains, des robes de gaze qui les enveloppent comme une vapeur, des yeux dont on ne voit que les paupières noircies avec du henné ; elles chantent ensemble un hymne à quelque dieu, elles dansent... Danse, danse, bayadère, fille du Gange, tournoie bien tes pieds dans ma tête ! Comme une couleuvre, elle se replie, dénoue ses bras, sa tête remue, ses hanches se balancent, ses narines s'enflent, ses cheveux se dénouent, l'encens qui fume entoure l'idole stupide et dorée, qui a quatre têtes et vingt bras.

Dans un canot de bois de cèdre, un canot allongé, dont les avirons minces ont l'air de plumes, sous une voile faite de bambous tressés, au bruit des tam-tams et des tambourins, j'irai dans le pays jaune que l'on appelle la Chine ; les pieds des femmes se prennent dans la main, leur tête est petite, leurs sourcils minces, relevés aux coins, elles vivent dans des tonnelles de roseau vert, et mangent des fruits à la peau de velours, dans de la porcelaine peinte. Moustache aiguë, tombant sur la poitrine, tête rase, avec une houppe qui lui descend sur le dos, le mandarin, un éventail rond dans les doigts, se promène dans la galerie, où des trépieds brûlent, et marche lentement sur les nattes de riz ; une petit pipe est passée dans son bonnet pointu, et des écritures noires sont empreintes sur ses vêtements de soie rouge. Oh ! que les boîtes à thé m'ont fait faire des voyages !

Emportez-moi, tempêtes du Nouveau Monde, qui déracinez les chênes séculaires et tourmentez les lacs où les serpents se jouent dans les flots ! Que les torrents de Norvège me couvrent de leur mousse ! que la neige de Sibérie, qui tombe tassée efface mon chemin ! Oh ! voyager, voyager, ne jamais s'arrêter, et, dans cette valse immense, tout voir apparaître et passer, jusqu'à ce que la peau vous crève et que le sang jaillisse !

Que les vallées succèdent aux montagnes, les champs aux villes, les plaines aux mers. Descendons et montons les côtes, que les aiguilles des cathédrales disparaissent, après les mâts de vaisseaux pressés dans les ports ; écoutons les cascades tomber sur les rochers, le vent dans les forêts, les glaciers se fondre au soleil ; que je voie les cavaliers arabes courir, des femmes portées en palanquin, et puis des coupoles s'arrondir, des pyramides s'élever dans les cieux, des souterrains étouffés, où les momies dorment, des défilés étroits, où le brigand arme son fusil, des joncs où se cache le serpent à sonnettes, des zèbres bariolés courant dans les grandes herbes, des kangourous dressés sur leurs pattes de derrière, des singes se balançant au bout des branches des cocotiers, des tigres bondissant sur leur proie, des gazelles leur échappant...

Allons, allons ! passons les océans larges, où les baleines et les cachalots se font la guerre. Voici venir comme un grand oiseau de mer, qui bat des deux ailes, sur la surface des flots, la pirogue des sauvages ; des chevelures sanglantes pendent à la proue, ils se sont peints les côtes en rouge ; les lèvres fendues, le visage barbouillé, des anneaux dans le nez, ils chantent en hurlant le chant de la mort, leur grand arc est tendu, leurs flèches à la pointe verte sont empoisonnées et font mourir dans les tourments ; leurs femmes nues, seins et mains tatoués, élèvent de grands bûchers pour les victimes de leurs époux, qui leur ont promis de la chair de blanc, si moelleuse sous la dent.

Où irai-je ? la terre est grande, j'épuiserai tous les chemins, je viderai tous les horizons ; puissé-je périr en doublant Le Cap, mourir du choléra à Calcutta ou de la peste à Constantinople !

Si j'étais seulement muletier en Andalousie ! et trotter tout le jour, dans les gorges des sierras, voir couler le Guadalquivir, sur lequel il y a des îles de lauriers-roses, entendre, le soir, les guitares et les voix chanter sous les balcons, regarder la lune se mirer dans le bassin de marbre de l'Alhambra, où autrefois se baignaient les sultanes.

Que ne suis-je gondolier à Venise ou conducteur d'une de ces carrioles, qui, dans la belle saison, vous mènent de Nice à Rome ! il y a pourtant des gens qui vivent à Rome, des gens qui y demeurent toujours. Heureux le mendiant de Naples, qui dort au grand soleil, couché sur le rivage, et qui, en fumant son cigare, voit aussi la fumée du Vésuve monter dans le ciel ! Je lui envie son lit de galets et les songes qu'il y peut faire ; la mer, toujours belle, lui apporte le parfum de ses flots et le murmure lointain qui vient de Caprée.

Quelquefois je me figure arriver en Sicile, dans un petit village de pêcheurs, où toutes les barques ont des voiles latines. C'est le matin ; là, entre des corbeilles et des filets étendus, une fille du peuple est assise, elle a ses pieds nus, à son corset est un cordon d'or, comme les femmes des colonies grecques ; ses cheveux noirs, séparés en deux tresses, lui tombent jusqu'aux talons, elle se lève, secoue son tablier ; elle marche, et sa taille est robuste et souple à la fois, comme celle de la nymphe antique. Si j'étais aimé d'une telle femme ! une pauvre enfant ignorante qui ne saurait seulement pas lire, mais dont la voix serait si douce, quand elle me dirait, avec son accent sicilien : "Je t'aime ! reste ici !"

Le manuscrit s'arrête ici, mais j'en ai connu l'auteur, et si quelqu'un, ayant passé, pour arriver jusqu'à cette page, à travers toutes les métaphores, hyperboles et autres figures qui remplissent les précédentes, désire y trouver une fin, qu'il continue ; nous allons la lui donner.

Il faut que les sentiments aient peu de mots à leur service, sans cela le livre se fût achevé à la première personne. Sans doute que notre homme n'aura plus rien trouvé à dire ; il se trouve un point où l'on n'écrit plus et où l'on pense davantage, c'est à ce point qu'il s'arrêta, tant pis pour le lecteur !

J'admire le hasard, qui a voulu que le livre en demeurât là, au moment où il serait devenu meilleur ; l'auteur allait entrer dans le monde, il aurait eu mille choses à nous apprendre, mais il s'est, au contraire, livré de plus en plus à une solitude austère, d'où rien ne sortait. Or il jugea convenable de ne plus se plaindre, preuve peut-être qu'il commença réellement à souffrir. Ni dans sa conversation, ni dans ses lettres, ni dans les papiers que j'ai fouillés après sa mort, et où ceci se trouvait, je n'ai saisi rien qui dévoilât l'état de son âme, à partir de l'époque où il cessa d'écrire ses confessions.

Son grand regret était de ne pas être peintre, il disait avoir de très beaux tableaux dans l'imagination. Il se désolait également de n'être pas musicien ; par les matinées de printemps, quand il se promenait le long des avenues de peupliers, des symphonies sans fin lui résonnaient dans la tête. Du reste, il n'entendait rien à la peinture ni à la musique, je l'ai vu admirer des galettes authentiques et avoir la migraine en sortant de l'Opéra. Avec un peu plus de temps, de patience, de travail, et surtout avec un goût plus délicat de la plastique des arts, il fût arrivé à faire des vers médiocres, bons à mettre dans l'album d'une dame, ce qui est toujours galant, quoi qu'on en dise.

Dans sa première jeunesse, il s'était nourri de très mauvais auteurs, comme on l'a pu voir à son style ; en vieillissant, il s'en dégoûta, mais les excellents ne lui donnèrent plus le même enthousiasme.

Passionné pour ce qui est beau, la laideur lui répugnait comme le crime ; c'est, en effet, quelque chose d'atroce qu'un être laid, de loin il épouvante, de près il dégoûte ; quand il parle, on souffre ; s'il pleure, ses larmes vous agacent ; on voudrait le battre quand il rit et, dans le silence, sa figure immobile vous semble le siège de tous les vices et de tous les bas instincts. Aussi il ne pardonna jamais à un homme qui lui avait déplu dès le premier abord ; en revanche, il était très dévoué à des gens qui ne lui avaient jamais adressé quatre mots, mais dont il aimait la démarche ou la coupe du crâne. Il fuyait les assemblées, les spectacles, les bals, les concerts, car, à peine y était-il entré, qu'il se sentait glacé de tristesse et qu'il avait froid dans les cheveux. Quand la foule le coudoyait, une haine toute jeune lui montait au cœur, il lui portait, à cette foule, un cœur de loup, un cœur de bête fauve traquée dans son terrier.

Il avait la vanité de croire que les hommes ne l'aimaient pas, que les hommes ne le connaissaient pas.

Les malheurs publics et les douleurs collectives l'attristaient médiocrement, je dirai même qu'il s'apitoyait plus sur les serins en cage, battant des ailes quand il fait du soleil, que sur les peuples en esclavage, c'est ainsi qu'il était fait. Il était plein de scrupules délicats et de vraie pudeur, il ne pouvait, par exemple, rester chez un pâtissier et voir un pauvre le regarder manger sans rougir jusqu'aux oreilles ; en sortant, il lui donnait tout ce qu'il avait d'argent dans la main et s'enfuyait bien vite. Mais on le trouvait cynique, parce qu'il se servait de mots propres et disait tout haut ce que l'on pense tout bas.

L'amour des femmes entretenues (idéal des jeunes gens qui n'ont pas le moyen d'en entretenir) lui était odieux, le dégoûtait ; il pensait que l'homme qui paie est le maître, le seigneur, le roi. Quoiqu'il fût pauvre, il respectait la richesse et non les gens riches ; être gratis l'amant d'une femme qu'un autre loge, habille et nourrit, lui semblait quelque chose d'aussi spirituel que de voler une bouteille de vin dans la cave d'autrui ; il ajoutait que s'en vanter était le propre des domestiques fripons et des petites gens.

Vouloir une femme mariée, et pour cela se rendre l'ami du mari, lui serrer affectueusement les mains, rire à ses calembours, s'attrister de ses mauvaises affaires, faire ses commissions, lire le même journal que lui, en un mot exécuter, dans un seul jour, plus de bassesses et de platitudes que dix galériens n'en ont fait en toute leur vie, c'était quelque chose de trop humiliant pour son orgueil, et il aima cependant plusieurs femmes mariées ; quelquefois, il se mit en beau chemin mais la répugnance le prenait tout à coup, quand déjà la belle dame commençait à lui faire les yeux doux, comme les gelées du mois de mai qui brûlent les abricotiers en fleurs.

Et les grisettes, me direz-vous ? Eh bien, non ! il ne pouvait se résigner à monter dans une mansarde, pour embrasser une bouche qui vient de déjeuner avec du fromage, et prendre une main qui a des engelures.

Quant à séduire une jeune fille, il se serait cru moins coupable s'il l'avait violée, attacher quelqu'un à soi était pour lui pire que de l'assassiner. Il pensait sérieusement qu'il y a moins de mal à tuer un homme qu'à faire un enfant ; au premier vous ôtez la vie, non pas la vie entière, mais la moitié ou le quart ou la centième partie de cette existence qui va finir, qui finirait sans vous ; mais envers le second, disait-il, n'êtes-vous pas responsable de toutes les larmes qu'il versera depuis son berceau jusqu'à sa tombe ? sans vous, il ne serait pas né, et s'il naît, pourquoi cela ? pour votre amusement, non pour le sien, à coup sûr ; pour porter votre nom, le nom d'un sot, je parie ? autant vaudrait l'écrire sur un mur ; à quoi bon un homme pour supporter le fardeau de trois ou quatre lettres ?

À ses yeux, celui qui, appuyé sur le Code civil, entre de force dans le lit de la vierge qu'on lui a donnée le matin, exerçant ainsi un viol légal que l'autorité protège, n'avait pas d'analogue chez les singes, les hippopotames et les crapauds, qui, mâle et femelle, s'accouplent lorsque des désirs communs les font se chercher et s'unir, où il n'y a ni épouvante et dégoût d'un côté, ni brutalité et despotisme obscène de l'autre ; et il exposait là-dessus de longues théories immorales, qu'il est inutile de rapporter.

Voilà pourquoi il ne se maria point et n'eut pour maîtresse ni fille entretenue, ni femme mariée, ni grisette, ni jeune fille ; restaient les veuves, il n'y pensa pas.

Quand il fallut choisir un état, il hésita entre mille répugnances. Pour se mettre philanthrope, il n'était pas assez malin, et son bon naturel l'écartait de la médecine ; — quant au commerce, il était incapable de calculer, la vue seule d'une banque lui agaçait les nerfs. Malgré ses folies, il avait trop de sens pour prendre au sérieux la noble profession d'avocat ; d'ailleurs sa justice ne se fût pas accommodée aux lois. Il avait aussi trop de goût pour se lancer dans la critique, il était trop poète, peut-être, pour réussir dans les lettres. Et puis, sont-ce là des états ? Il faut s'établir, avoir une position dans le monde, on s'ennuie à rester oisif, il faut se rendre utile, l'homme est né pour travailler : maximes difficiles à comprendre et qu'on avait soin de souvent lui répéter.

Résigné à s'ennuyer partout et à s'ennuyer de tout, il déclara vouloir faire son droit et il alla habiter Paris. Beaucoup de gens l'envièrent dans son village, et lui dirent qu'il allait être heureux de fréquenter les cafés, les spectacles, les restaurants, de voir les belles femmes ; il les laissa dire, et il sourit comme lorsqu'on a envie de pleurer. Que de fois, cependant, il avait désiré quitter pour toujours sa chambre, où il avait tant baillé, et dérangé ses coudes de dessus le vieux bureau d'acajou où il avait composé ses drames à quinze ans ! et il se sépara de tout cela avec peine ; ce sont peut-être les endroits qu'on a le plus maudits que l'on préfère aux autres, les prisonniers ne regrettent-ils pas leur prison ? C'est que, dans cette prison, ils espéraient et que, sortis, ils n'espèrent plus ; à travers les murs de leur cachot, ils voyaient la campagne émaillée de marguerites, sillonnée de ruisseaux, couverte de blés jaunes, avec des routes bordées d'arbres, — mais rendus à la liberté, à la misère, ils revoient la vie telle qu'elle est, ornée de gardes champêtres pour les empêcher de prendre les fruits s'ils ont soif, fournie en gardes forestiers, s'ils veulent tuer du gibier et qu'ils aient faim, couverte de gendarmes, s'ils ont envie de se promener et qu'ils n'aient pas de passeport.

Il alla se loger dans une chambre garnie, où les meubles avaient été achetés pour d'autres, usés par d'autres que lui ; il lui sembla habiter dans des ruines. Il passait la journée à travailler, à écouter le bruit sourd de la rue, à regarder la pluie tomber sur les toits.

Quand il faisait du soleil, il allait se promener au Luxembourg, il marchait sur les feuilles tombées, se rappelant qu'au collège il faisait de même ; mais il ne se serait pas douté que, dix ans plus tard, il en serait là. Ou bien il s'asseyait sur un banc et songeait à mille choses tendres et tristes, il regardait l'eau froide et noire des bassins, puis il s'en retournait le cœur serré. Deux ou trois fois, ne sachant que faire, il alla dans les églises à l'heure du salut, il tâchait de prier ; comme ses amis auraient ri, s'ils l'avaient vu tremper ses doigts dans le bénitier et faire le signe de la croix.

Un soir qu'il errait dans un faubourg et qu'irrité sans cause il eût voulu sauter sur des épées nues et se battre à outrance, il entendit des voix chanter et le son doux d'un orgue y répondre par bouffées. Il entra. Sous le portique, une vieille femme, accroupie par terre, demandait la charité en secouant des sous dans un gobelet de fer-blanc ; la porte tapissée allait et venait à chaque personne qui entrait ou qui sortait, on entendait des bruits de sabots, des chaises qui remuaient sur des dalles ; au fond, le chœur était illuminé, le tabernacle brillait aux flambeaux, le prêtre chantait des prières, les lampes, suspendues dans la nef, se balançaient à leurs longues cordes, le haut des ogives et les bas-côtés étaient dans l'ombre, la pluie fouettait sur les vitraux et en faisait craquer les fils de plomb, l'orgue allait, et les voix reprenaient, comme le jour où il avait entendu sur les falaises la mer et les oiseaux se parler. Il fut pris d'envie d'être prêtre, pour dire des oraisons sur le corps des morts, pour porter un cilice et se prosterner ébloui dans l'amour de Dieu... Tout à coup un ricanement de pitre lui vint au fond du cœur, il enfonça son chapeau sur ses oreilles, et sortit en haussant les épaules.

Plus que jamais il devint triste, plus que jamais les jours furent longs pour lui ; les orgues de Barbarie qu'il entendait jouer sous sa fenêtre lui arrachaient l'âme, il trouvait à ces instruments une mélancolie invincible, il disait que ces boîtes-là étaient pleines de larmes. Ou plutôt il ne disait rien, car il ne faisait pas le blasé, l'ennuyé, l'homme qui est désillusionné de tout ; sur la fin, même, on trouva qu'il était devenu d'un caractère plus gai. C'était, le plus souvent, quelque pauvre homme du Midi, un Piémontais, un Génois, qui tournait la manivelle. Pourquoi celui-là avait-il quitté sa corniche, et sa cabane couronnée de maïs à la moisson ? il le regardait jouer longtemps, sa grosse tête carrée, sa barbe noire et ses mains brunes, un petit singe habillé de rose sautait sur son épaule et grimaçait, l'homme tendait sa casquette, il lui jetait son aumône dedans et le suivait jusqu'à ce qu'il l'eût perdu de vue.

En face de lui on bâtissait une maison, cela dura trois mois ; il vit les murs s'élever, les étages monter les uns sur les autres, on mit des carreaux aux fenêtres, on la crépita, on la peignit, puis on ferma les portes ; des ménages vinrent l'habiter et commencèrent à y vivre, il fut fâché d'avoir des voisins, il aimait mieux la vue des pierres.

Il se promenait dans les musées, il contemplait tous ces personnages factices, immobiles et toujours jeunes dans leur vie idéale, que l'on va voir, et qui voient passer devant eux la foule, sans déranger leur tête, sans ôter la main de dessus leurs épées, et dont les yeux brilleront encore quand nos petits-fils seront ensevelis. Il se perdait en contemplations devant les statues antiques, surtout celles qui étaient mutilées.

Une chose pitoyable lui arriva. Un jour, dans la rue, il crut reconnaître quelqu'un en passant près de lui, l'étranger avait fait le même mouvement, ils s'arrêtèrent et s'abordèrent. C'était lui ! son ancien ami, son meilleur ami, son frère, celui à côté de qui il était au collège, en classe, à l'étude, au dortoir ; ils faisaient leurs pensums et leurs devoirs ensemble ; dans la cour et en promenade, ils se promenaient bras dessus bras dessous, ils avaient juré autrefois de vivre en commun et d'être amis jusqu'à la mort. D'abord ils se donnèrent une poignée de main, en s'appelant par leur nom, puis se regardèrent des pieds à la tête sans rien dire, ils étaient changés tous les deux et déjà un peu vieilliss. Après s'être demandé ce qu'ils faisaient, ils s'arrêtèrent tout court et ne surent aller plus loin ; ils ne s'étaient pas vus depuis six ans et ne purent trouver quatre mots à échanger. Ennuyés, à la fin, de s'être regardés l'un et l'autre dans le blanc des yeux, ils se séparèrent.

Comme il n'avait d'énergie pour rien et que le temps, contrairement à l'avis des philosophes, lui semblait la richesse la moins prêteuse du monde, il se mit à boire de l'eau-de-vie et à fumer de l'opium ; il passait souvent ses journées tout couché et à moitié ivre, dans un état qui tenait le milieu entre l'apathie et le cauchemar.

D'autres fois la force lui revenait, et il se redressait tout à coup comme un ressort. Alors le travail lui apparaissait plein de charmes, et le rayonnement de la pensée le faisait sourire, de ce sourire placide et profond des sages ; il se mettait vite à l'ouvrage, il avait des plans superbes, il voulait faire apparaître certaines époques sous un jour tout nouveau, lier l'art à l'histoire, commenter les grands poètes comme les grands peintres, pour cela apprendre les langues, remonter à l'antiquité, entrer dans l'Orient ; il se voyait déjà lisant des inscriptions et déchiffrant des obélisques ; puis il se trouvait fou et recroisait les bras.

Il ne lisait plus, ou bien c'étaient des livres qu'il trouvait mauvais et qui, néanmoins, lui causaient un certain plaisir par leur médiocrité même. La nuit il ne dormait pas, des insomnies le retournaient sur son lit, il rêvait et il s'éveillait, si bien que, le matin, il était plus fatigué que s'il eût veillé.

Usé par l'ennui, habitude terrible, et trouvant même un certain plaisir à l'abrutissement qui en est la suite, il était comme les gens qui se voient mourir, il n'ouvrait plus sa fenêtre pour respirer l'air, il ne se lavait plus les mains, il vivait même dans une saleté de pauvre, la même chemise lui servait une semaine, il ne se faisait plus la barbe et ne se peignait plus les cheveux. Quoique frileux, s'il était sorti dans la matinée et qu'il eût les pieds mouillés, il restait toute la journée sans changer de chaussures et sans faire de feu, ou bien il se jetait tout habillé sur son lit et tâchait de s'endormir ; il regardait les mouches courir sur le plafond, il fumait et suivait de l'oeil les petites spirales bleues qui sortaient de ses lèvres.

On concevra sans peine qu'il n'avait pas de but, et c'est là le malheur. Qui eût pu l'animer, l'émouvoir ? l'amour ? il s'en écartait ; l'ambition le faisait rire ; pour l'argent, sa cupidité était fort grande, mais sa paresse avait le dessus, et puis un million ne valait pas pour lui la peine de le conquérir ; c'est à l'homme né dans l'opulence que le luxe va bien ; celui qui a gagné sa fortune, presque jamais ne la sait manger ; son orgueil était tel qu'il n'aurait pas voulu d'un trône. Vous me demanderez : Que voulait-il ? je n'en sais rien, mais, à coup sûr, il ne songeait point à se faire plus tard élire député ; il eût même refusé une place de préfet, y compris l'habit brodé, la croix d'honneur passée autour du cou, la culotte de peau et les bottes écuyères les jours de cérémonie. Il aimait mieux lire André Chénier que d'être ministre, il aurait préféré être Talma que Napoléon.

C'était un homme qui donnait dans le faux, dans l'amphigourique et faisait grand abus d'épithètes.

Du haut de ces sommets, la terre disparaît, et tout ce qu'on y arrache. Il y a également des douleurs du haut desquelles on n'est plus rien et l'on méprise tout ; quand elles ne vous tuent pas, le suicide seul vous en délivre. Il ne se tua pas, il vécut encore.

Le carnaval arriva, il ne s'y divertit point. Il faisait tout à contretemps, les enterrements excitaient presque sa gaieté, et les spectacles lui donnaient de la tristesse ; toujours il se figurait une foule de squelettes habillés, avec des gants, des manchettes et des chapeaux à plumes, se penchant au bord des loges, se lorgnant, minaudant, s'envoyant des regards vides ; au parterre il voyait étinceler, sous le feu du lustre, une foule de crânes blancs serrés les uns près des autres.

Il entendit des gens descendre en courant l'escalier, ils riaient, ils s'en allaient avec des femmes.

Un souvenir de jeunesse lui repassa dans l'esprit, il pensa à X..., ce village où il avait été un jour à pied, et dont il a parlé lui-même dans ce que vous avez lu ; il voulut le revoir avant de mourir, il se sentait s'éteindre. Il mit de l'argent dans sa poche, prit son manteau et partit tout de suite. Les jours gras, cette année-là, étaient tombés dès le commencement de février, il faisait encore très froid, les routes étaient gelées, la voiture roulait au grand galop, il était dans le coupé, il ne dormait pas, mais se sentait traîné avec plaisir vers cette mer qu'il allait encore revoir ; il regardait les guides du postillon, éclairés par la lanterne de l'impériale, se remuer en l'air et sauter sur la croupe fumante des chevaux, le ciel était pur et les étoiles brillaient comme dans les plus belles nuits d'été.

Vers dix heures du matin, il descendit à Y... et de là fit la route à pied jusqu'à X... ; il alla vite, cette fois, d'ailleurs il courait pour se réchauffer. Les fossés étaient pleins de glace, les arbres, dépouillés, avaient le bout de leurs branches rouge, les feuilles tombées, pourries par les pluies, formaient une grande couche noire et gris de fer, qui couvrait le pied de la forêt, le ciel était tout blanc sans soleil. Il remarqua que les poteaux qui indiquent le chemin avaient été renversés ; à un endroit on avait fait une coupe de bois depuis qu'il était passé par là. Il se dépêchait, il avait hâte d'arriver. Enfin le terrain vint à descendre, là il prit, à travers champs, un sentier qu'il connaissait, et bientôt il vit, dans le loin, la mer. Il s'arrêta, il l'entendait battre sur le rivage et gronder au fond de l'horizon, in altum ; une odeur salée lui arriva, portée par la brise froide d'hiver, son cœur battait.

On avait bâti une nouvelle maison à l'entrée du village, deux ou trois autres avaient été abattues.

Les barques étaient à la mer, le quai était désert, chacun se tenait enfermé dans sa maison ; de longs morceaux de glace, que les enfants appellent chandelles des rois, pendaient au bord des toits et au bout des gouttières, les enseignes de l'épicier et de l'aubergiste criaient aigrement sur leur tringle de fer, la marée montait et s'avancait sur les galets, avec un bruit de chaînes et de sanglots.

Après qu'il eût déjeuné, et il fut tout étonné de n'avoir pas faim, il s'alla promener sur la grève. Le vent chantait dans l'air, les joncs minces, qui poussent dans les dunes, sifflaient et se courbaient avec furie, la mousse s'envolait du rivage et courait sur le sable, quelquefois une rafale l'emportait vers le rivage.

La nuit vint, ou mieux ce long crépuscule qui la précède dans les plus tristes jours de l'année ; de gros flocons de neige tombèrent du ciel, ils se fondaient sur les flots, mais ils restaient longtemps sur la plage, qu'ils tachaient de grandes larmes d'argent.

Il vit, à une place, une vieille barque à demi enfouie dans le sable, échouée là peut-être depuis vingt ans, de la christe marine avait poussé dedans, des polypes et des moules s'étaient attachés à ses planches verdies ; il aima cette barque, il tourna tout autour, il la toucha à différentes places, il la regarda singulièrement, comme on regarde un cadavre.

À cent pas de là, il y avait un petit endroit dans la gorge d'un rocher, ou souvent il avait été s'asseoir et avait passé de bonnes heures à ne rien faire, — il emportait un livre et ne lisait pas, il s'y installait tout seul, le dos par terre, pour regarder le bleu du ciel entre les murs blancs des rochers à pic ; c'était là qu'il avait le mieux entendu le cri des mouettes, et que les fucus suspendus avaient secoué sous lui les perles de leur chevelure ; c'était là qu'il voyait la voile des vaisseaux s'enfoncer sous l'horizon, et que le soleil, pour lui, avait été plus chaud que partout ailleurs sur le reste de la terre.

Il y retourna, il le retrouva ; mais d'autres en avaient pris possession, car, en fouillant le sol, machinalement, avec son pied, il fit trouvaille d'un cul de bouteille et d'un couteau. Des gens y avaient fait une partie, sans doute, on était venu là avec des dames, on y avait déjeuné, on avait rit, on avait fait des plaisanteries. "O mon Dieu, se dit-il, est-ce qu'il n'y a pas sur la terre des lieux que nous avons assez aimés, où nous avons assez vécu pour qu'ils nous appartiennent jusqu'à la mort, et que d'autres que nous-mêmes n'y mettent jamais les yeux !"

Il remonta donc par le ravin, où si souvent il avait fait dérouler des pierres sous ses pieds ; souvent même il en avait lancé exprès, avec force, pour les entendre se frapper contre les parois des rochers et l'écho solitaire y répondre. Sur le plateau qui domine la falaise, l'air devint plus vif, il vit la lune s'élever en face, dans une portion du ciel bleu sombre ; sous la lune, à gauche, il y avait une petite étoile.

Il pleurait, était-ce de froid ou de tristesse ? son cœur crevait, il avait besoin de parler à quelqu'un. Il entra dans un cabaret, où quelquefois il avait été boire de la bière, il demanda un cigare, et il ne put s'empêcher de dire à la bonne femme qui le servait : "Je suis déjà venu ici." Elle lui répondit : "Ah ! mais, c'est pas la belle saison, m'sieu, c'est pas la belle saison", et elle lui rendit de la monnaie.

Le soir il voulut encore sortir, il alla se coucher dans un trou qui sert aux chasseurs pour tirer les canards sauvages, il vit un instant l'image de la lune rouler sur les flots et remuer dans la mer, comme un grand serpent, puis de tous les côtés du ciel des nuages s'amoncelèrent de nouveau, et tout fut noir. Dans les ténèbres, des flots ténébreux se balançaient, montaient les uns sur les autres et détonaient comme des canons, une sorte de rythme faisait de ce bruit une mélodie terrible, le rivage, vibrant sous le coup de vagues, répondait à la haute mer retentissante.

Il songea un instant s'il ne devait pas en finir, personne ne le verrait, pas de secours à espérer, en trois minutes il serait mort ; mais de suite, par une antithèse ordinaire dans ces moments-là, l'existence vint à lui sourire, il revit sa bonne chambre de travail, et tous les jours tranquilles qu'il pourrait y passer encore. Et cependant les voix de l'abîme l'appelaient, les flots s'ouvraient comme un tombeau, prêts de suite à se refermer sur lui et à l'envelopper dans leurs plis liquides...

Il eut peur, il rentra, toute la nuit il entendit le vent siffler dans la terreur ; il fit un énorme feu et se chauffa de façon à se rôtir les jambes.

Son voyage était fini. Rentré chez lui, il trouva ses vitres blanches couvertes de givre, dans la cheminée les charbons étaient éteints, ses vêtements étaient restés sur son lit comme il les avait laissés, l'encre avait séché dans l'encrier ; les murailles étaient froides et suintaient.

Il se dit : "Pourquoi ne suis-je pas resté là-bas ?" et il pensa avec amertume à la joie de son départ.

L'été revint, il n'en fut pas plus joyeux. Quelquefois seulement il allait sur le pont des Arts, et il regardait remuer les arbres des Tuileries, et les rayons du soleil couchant qui empourprent le ciel passer, comme une pluie lumineuse, sous l'Arc de l'Étoile.

Enfin, au mois de décembre dernier, il mourut, mais lentement, petit à petit, par le seule force de la pensée, sans qu'aucun organe fût malade, comme on meurt de tristesse, ce qui paraîtra difficile aux gens qui ont beaucoup souffert, mais ce qu'il faut bien tolérer dans un roman, par amour du merveilleux.

Il recommanda qu'on l'ouvrît, de peur d'être enterré vif, mais il défendit bien qu'on l'embaumât.

25 octobre 1842.

CHRONIQUE NORMANDE DU DIXIÈME SIÈCLE.

N'ayant pas été renseigné en temps opportun sur leur existence, nous plaçons à la fin du second volume des Œuvres inédites ces quelques essais qui, chronologiquement, appartiennent, sauf le dernier, au tome I.

Connaissez-vous la Normandie, cette vieille terre classique du moyen âge, où chaque champ a eu sa bataille, chaque pierre garde son nom et chaque débris un souvenir ? Vous figurez-vous Rouen, la métropole, au temps des assauts, des guerres, des famines, au temps où les preux venaient se battre sous ses murs, où les chevaux faisaient étinceler le pavé des quais, tout chauds encore du sang des Anglais ?

Ce jour-là, je veux dire le 28 août de l'an 952, toutes les cloches y étaient en branle ; les habitants, parés de leurs vêtements de fête, se montraient partout, sur les toits, aux lucarnes, aux fenêtres, dans les rues ; tout le peuple se pressait sur la route de Paris en criant de joie et en jetant des fleurs.

Le roi arriva à la porte Beauvoisine à huit heures du soir, on l'attendait depuis le matin. Dès qu'il parut, ce furent des trépignements, des bravos, des cris de joie, des hurlements d'enthousiasme, et l'on vit même des mains qui laissaient tomber des Lis et des roses à travers Les meurtrières des tours.

Le jeune Richard, fils du duc Guillaume assassiné en Flandre, alla au-devant de lui. Il était âgé de 12 ans, et c'était un bel enfant aux cheveux blonds, aux yeux tendres, au teint pâle ; pourtant il montait habilement sa jument noire, et sa main portait fort bien une grande épée, qu'il abaissa devant le roi, comme vassal et sujet.

— Pauvre enfant ! dit Louis IV en l'embrassant et en versant une larme que chacun vit couler sur sa joue, je viens ici pour vous venger de la mort de Guillaume.

Le peuple sautait de joie, il bondissait, il dansait, et ses bras tatoués jetaient des couronnes qui tombaient sur Le casque du monarque. N'est-ce pas que tout ce peuple, suspendu à chaque sculpture, à chaque pignon de maison, à chaque proéminence d'église, de rue, de muraille, n'est-ce pas que toute cette multitude enfin, bénissant un seul homme, avait quelque chose d'auguste et de solennel ?

Le ciel était pur, éclairé, quelques étoiles commençaient à y briller, l'air embaumait des fleurs que l'on avait jetées aux pieds des chevaux, et les eaux de la Seine étaient calmes et paisibles ; Le peuple chantait toujours des cris d'allégresse. Oh ! c'était un beau jour ! La lune vint reluire sur les armes des chevaliers tout couverts de poussière, ce qui les fit paraître d'argent, et le roi entra à l'hôtel de ville.

— Vous coucherez avec nous, dit-il au jeune duc en entrant sous le portique de la salle basse ; veillez, messire bailli, à ce que tout soit prêt dans notre appartement commun.

Minuit arriva, et Richard dormait d'un sommeil paisible auprès de Louis ; celui-ci, appuyé sur le balcon, regardait attentivement les dernières lumières de la ville, qui s'éteignaient les unes après les autres ; bientôt tout rentra dans le silence, et Rouen s'endormit avec calme et bonheur, comme l'enfant qui penchait gracieusement hors de sa couche sa belle chevelure blonde.

La main appuyée sur son front, Le roi aspirait avec volupté le vent frais de la nuit, car il est de si beaux moments dans la vie d'un homme, où la nature émane un parfum si suave et si doux à l'âme, qu'on se sentirait coupable de ne pas jouir de ces délices.

Un page, qui ouvrit la porte en faisant un grand salut, le tira de sa rêverie.

— Que veux-tu ? Lui dit-il.

— Sire, un homme entouré d'un large manteau, ayant une toque de velours rouge sur la tête, demande audience sur-le-champ ; il prétend avoir de grands secrets à vous communiquer.

— Dis-lui d'entrer... Ah ! c'est toi, dit-il à l'inconnu, qui ôta son manteau et laissa voir un homme d'une stature élevée, Le corps maigre, le front ridé, et le visage couvert de balafres, c'est toi, Arnould. Quelles nouvelles de Flandre ?

— Vous savez la grande d'abord ?

— Oui, et qu'a dit le peuple ?

— Lui ? rien du tout, il suffit qu'on lui mette un bâillon et il ne dit plus rien.

— Qu'a-t-il été, ce bâillon ?

— Une distribution de blé aux pauvres.

— Fort bien. Mais que veux-tu faire de cet enfant ?

Et il montrait Richard.

— Ne vous l'ai-je pas dit ? le garder, annoncer qu'il est malade, qu'il tombe en Langueur, et puis, une nuit, on fait venir dans sa chambre un prêtre et un bourreau, Le prêtre sort d'abord, le bourreau ensuite, Le jeune prince est mort ; Le lendemain on fait dire douze messes pour le repos de son âme, et tout est fini. Vous comprenez, sire ? — Oui, je te fais mon premier ministre et je te donne La Normandie que je vais avoir... Ah ! ah ! je l'aurai, dit-il comme machinalement et en Lui-même, je l'aurai donc ce beau fleuron de ma couronne, je serai roi chez moi... Et puis pourquoi n'aurais-je pas la Bourgogne, la Champagne, la Bretagne ?... Encore une fois, Arnould, je te fais mon premier ministre.

Et il Le congédia en L'embrassant.

— En ce moment le vent devint plus fort, et son souffle dans l'air souleva quelques fleurs que le soleil avait fanées et qui vinrent voltiger devant la fenêtre du roi. "Les fleurs du peuple", se dit-il en riant amèrement, et un remords lui tortura l'âme.

Le lendemain, Osmond, tuteur du duc, vint redemander son pupille au roi.

— Pourquoi ? répondit celui-ci.

— Sire, j'étais un des plus vaillants capitaines de la Normandie lorsqu'elle était sous Guillaume, j'ai Laissé bien des Grandes gouttes de sang dans des champs de bataille, Le duc m'aimait comme son fils, et lorsqu'il partit pour son entrevue en Flandre, où il fut si lâchement assassiné...

— Qu'y-a-il besoin de revenir sans cesse sur cette affaire ? dit Le roi en rougissant, nous la connaissons, continuez.

— Je vous disais, sire, qu'avant de partir pour la Flandre, il se méfiait de quelque chose et il craignait Arnould, ce seigneur assassin.

— Je vous ai averti, messire Osmond, insulter le nom d'un de nos vassaux c'est m'insulter moi-même. Vous croyez donc, parce que vous êtes tuteur de cet enfant, que vous êtes maître de la Normandie ? que le roi est ici par hospitalité ? que vous pouvez gouverner Rouen sans que personne, excepté vous, ait le droit de vie ou de mort ? Vous vous trompez, car si je faisais dresser une potence et mettre un grand seigneur au haut, que diriez-vous alors ? — Pardon, sire.

— Continuez.

— Eh bien, sire, il me dit, Les larmes aux yeux, en mettant le pied dans l'étrier : “Veillez sur mon fils, ne Le quittez pas d'un instant, d'une minute, et si je ne reviens pas dans quinze jours, un mois, brûlez huit cierges à Notre-Dame de Bon-Secours pour le repos de votre ami ; vous entendez ? prenez garde à mon fils ! Adieu, et, si c'est pour toujours, encore adieu !)) Il me semble Le revoir encore, sire, me serrant la main en me disant ces mots d'adieu, et des Larmes restèrent Longtemps sur sa barbe blanche ; il embrassa son fils, et nous vîmes bientôt son cheval disparaître dans un tourbiLlon de poussière. Nous l'attendîmes quinze jours, un mois, personne ! Alors toute la ville prit le deuil, et l'on fit plus, car on versa des larmes !

— Vous êtes un brave homme, dit le roi en soupirant, vos paroles m'ont touché. Eh bien, craignez-vous quelque chose pour cet enfant ? Eh, mon Dieu, nous avons assez de richesses pour le contenter ; pourquoi voulez-vous le reprendre ? Soyez tranquille, Osmond, un roi sait garder quelque chose de précieux, et la preuve c'est que Lorsqu'on lui prend sa couronne on lui arrache quelquefois ta tête avec, tellement il y tient.

Osmond sortit sans rien dire.

— Qu'ai-je appris, dit Osmond en entrant chez Le roi, Le lendemain matin, Richard est malade ?

— Mais oui.

— Qu'a-t-il ?

— Rien... Tenez, je vais vous te dire, je veux garder le duc auprès de moi, je l'aurai. Il est temps de cesser cet inutile carnaval ; dans une heure huit mille hommes sont aux portes de Rouen, j'ai envoyé Arnould vers Bernard, général des troupes de Normandie. Quant à vous, messire Osmond. qui voulez faire La leçon à l'homme roi comme au duc enfant, vous êtes libre maintenant, mais ce soir, au clair de lune, ies vautours auront un cadavre de plus aux chasses du gibet... Allez maintenant, le masque est jeté, montrez-le au peuPLe.

Suivons un instant le vieux guerrier insulté, qui descend en courant Le grand escalier. Il s'enfonça dans les rues tortueuses de la basse vieille tour. Sur la place Saint-Marc il rencontra Jehan de Montivilliers.

— Bien, dit-ii, je te cherchais, j'ai de grandes nouvelles à t'annoncer. Eh bien, mes seigneurs, savezvous une chose ?

— Laquelle ? dirent-ils avec empressement.

— Nous sommes dans une ville assiégée.

— Gare ! cria un homme monté sur un cheval et qui traversait la place à bride abattue.

C'était Arnould, duc de Flandre et sbire du roi.

— Parlez plus bas, dit le comte de Rochepeaux lorsqu'il Le vit passer.

— Oui, messieurs, continua Osmond, et par le roi encore ; ce même homme que vous avez accueilli avec des bravos est un assassin, et le vengeur de Guillaume est son meurtrier !

— Mais, voyons, comment le savez-vous ?

— Il a voulu garder Richard avec lui, et tout à l'heure, lorsque j'ai été Lui redemander mon cher enfnt, il m'a dit... oh ! non, vous ne le croirez pas !... il m'a dit, L'infâme ! sans pudeur et sans honte, que tout ce qu'il avait fait était une comédie, une mascarade, et qu'il se moquait du peuple comme d'un enfant qu'on trompe ; il a ajouté que dans une heure huit mille hommes assiégeraient Rouen. Vive Dieu ! mes seigneurs, il n'en sera pas ainsi, dussions-nous, tous nous faire assassiner comme Guillaume Longue-Épée ! non, non, le peuple ne se laissera pas tromper de la sorte, il va prendre les armes. Toi, Jehan de Montivilliers, va à la porte Beauvoisine ; Arthur de Rochepeaux, va au parvis Notre-Dame, c'est L'heure de la grève, tu y trouveras Le peuple ; va, dis-lui qu'on Lui a pris son duc, son enfant bien-aimé, excite-le, mets-lui les armes dans les mains. Toi, Henry d'Harcourt, vole à Saint-Gervais, L'église est pleine de peuple, on y chante un Te Deum pour Le roi ; va, dis-lui que Louis IV L'a trompé, dirige sur l'hôtel de ville nos amis. Hardi ! allez !

Deux heures après la multitude assiégeait le palais du roi avec des cris, des huées, des menaces, et les yeux tout rouges de colère ; elle avait déjà massacré Les sentinelles qui veillaient à la porte, et elle promettait avec rage d'en fbncer les portes si Le roi ne se présentait.

C'était pourtant le même peuple qui était venu avec des fleurs et des cris d'amour ! Maintenant il trépignait d'impatience et de rage, comme un homme en délire, il demandait à grands cris : le roi ! le roi ! et mille bras agitaient dans l'air des piques, des haches, des hallebardes, des poignards, des lances et des poings fermés.

Le roi était resté dans sa chambre, seul, assis sur son lit ; il attendait Arnould avec impatience, et les hurlements effrénés du peuple, qui allaient toujours croissant, étaient pour lui l'heure qui précède le moment où la tête du condamné doit rouler sur l'échafaud. Un instant il eut le courage de s'approcher du balcon et de regarder par la fenêtre, mais lorsqu'il vit toute cette mer de têtes qui s'agitait dans les rues tortueuses et qui montait vers le palais comme la tempête, il trembla, il faillit s'évanouir, ses jambes pliaient sous lui, ses dents claquaient, et ses mains humides d'une sueur moite et malade touchaient instinctivement un crucifix de bois qu'il avait sur la poitrine.

Pourtant il entend des pas précipités dans le corridor, son cœur bat avec violence. Arnould entra, il était pâle et défiguré, il avait du sang sur le visage. — Eh bien ? dit le roi vivement, et les troupes ?

— Tout est perdu, sire ! J'arrive chez Bernard, je lui demande des troupes, je dis qu'il y va pour vous de la vie ou de la mort, il refuse ; je le supplie, j'embrasse ses genoux, ses mains, je te prie comme on prie Dieu : "Non, dit-il en me repoussant du pied avec mépris et dédain ; moi ! j'irais porter du secours à ton maître ! si j'avais des assassins, je lui en enverrais ; mais il en a un, c'est toi ! Tu as bien assassiné Guillaume, assassine le peuple, assassine-le donc, ce seigneur-là !... Moi ! des troupes au roi de France ! je ne dois donner du secours qu'au duc de Normandie. Que le roi rende son prisonnier et qu'il laisse cette province !)" "Va-t'en, a-t-il ajouté en me donnant un coup de cravache sur la figure, va-t'en, assassin, dire ces mots à celui qui t'envoie !"

En ce moment-là le peuple avait brisé les portes, il était dix des escaliers, ses pas retentissaient sous les voûtes.

— Le roi ! le roi ! criait-il.

La fenêtre s'ouvrit et laissa voir Louis IV, portant dans ses bras le duc de Normandie.

Les piques et les armes tombèrent des mains.

— Noël ! Noël ! vive le roi ! vive le duc ! criait le peuple.

Et cette immense acclamation se répandait dans toutes les rues, et trouvait un écho dans tous les cœurs.

LA DERNIERE HEURE .

(CONTE PHILOSOPHIQUE.)

Le moyne dit “Que pensez-vous en vostre entendement estre par cet enigme designé et signifié ?”

Rabelais, Gargantua.

J’ai regardé à ma montre et j’ai calculé combien de temps il me restait à vivre ; j’ai vu que j’avais encore une heure à peine. Il me reste assez de papier sur ma table pour retracer à la hâte tous les souvenirs de ma vie et toutes les circonstances qui ont influé sur cet enchaînement stupide et logique de jours et de nuits, de larmes et de rires, qu’on a coutume d’appeler l’existence d’un homme.

Ma chambre est basse et étroite, mes fenêtres sont bien fermées, j’ai eu soin de boucher la serrure avec de la mie de pain, mon charbon commence à s’enflammer, la mort va donc venir ; je puis l’attendre calme et tranquille, voyant à chaque minute la vie qui s’éloigne et l’éternité qui s’avance.

I

On a coutume d’appeler heureux un homme qui a vingt-cinq mille livres de rente, qui est beau, grand, bien fait, vit au milieu de sa famille, va tous les soirs au spectacle, rit, boit, dort, mange, et digère bien. L’adage est vieux, mais il n’en est pas moins faux. Pour moi, j’ai eu plus de vingt-cinq mille livres de rente, ma famille était bonne pour moi ; j’ai vu presque tous les théâtres de l’Europe, j’ai bu, j’ai dormi, je n’ai jamais eu une seule indigestion depuis le jour de ma naissance, je ne suis ni borgne, ni boiteux, ni bossu, ... et je suis si heureux qu’aujourd’hui, à 19 ans, je me suicide !

II

Un jour, je m’en souviens, j’avais dix ans à cette époque, ma mère m’embrassa en pleurant et me dit d’aller jouer sous les marronniers qui bordaient la pelouse du château... (Oh ! comme ils doivent avoir grandi depuis !). Je m'y rendis, mais comme ma Lélia ne vint pas m'y trouver, j'eus peur qu'elle ne fût malade, je revins à la maison. Tout était désert, un grand drap noir était étendu sur la grille d'entrée ; je montai à la chambre de ma sœur, je me souvins alors qu'il y avait plus de huit jours qu'elle n'était venue jouer avec moi.

Je montai donc à sa chambre. Il y avait deux femmes qui venaient d'ordinaire demander l'aumône à La porte du château, elles tenaient quelque chose de lourd dans leurs bras, qu'elles entouraient d'un drap blanc... C'était elle !

On m'a souvent demandé depuis pourquoi j'étais triste.

III

C'était elle ! ma sœur ! morte ! sans souffle !

La nuit arriva bientôt, oh ! qu'elle fut longue et amère !

Les deux femmes, vêtues de noir, remirent le corps dans le lit de ma sœur, elles jetèrent dessus des fleurs et de l'eau bénite, puis, lorsque le soleil eut fini de jeter dans l'appartement sa lueur rougeâtre et terne comme le regard d'un cadavre, quand le jour eut disparu de dessus les vitres, elles allumèrent deux petites bougies qui étaient sur la table de nuit, s'agenouillèrent et me dirent de prier comme elles.

Je priai, oh ! bien fort, le plus qu'il m'était possible ! mais rien... Lélia ne remuait pas !

Je fus longtemps ainsi agenouillé, la tête sur les draps du lit froids et humides, je pleurais, mais bas et sans angoisses ; il me semblait qu'en pensant, en pleurant, en me déchirant l'âme avec des prières et des vœux, j'obtiendrais un souffle, un regard, un geste de ce corps aux formes indécises et dont on ne distinguait rien si ce n'est, à une place, une forme ronde qui devait être La tête, et plus bas une autre qui semblait être les pieds. Je croyais, moi, pauvre naïf enfant, je croyais que la prière pouvait rendre la vie à un cadavre, tant j'avais de foi et de candeur !

Oh ! on ne sait ce qu'a d'amer et de sombre une nuit ainsi passée à prier sur un cadavre, à pleurer, à vouloir faire renaître le néant ! On ne sait tout ce qu'il y a de hideux et d'horrible dans une nuit de larmes et de sanglots, à la lueur de deux cierges mortuaires, entouré de deux femmes aux chants monotones, aux larmes vénales, aux grotesques psalmodies ! On ne sait enfin tout ce que cette scène de désespoir et de deuil vous remplit le cœur : enfant, de tristesse et d'amertume ; jeune homme, de scepticisme ; vieillard, de désespoir !

Le jour arriva.

Mais quand le jour commença à paraître, lorsque les deux cierges mortuaires commençaient à mourir aussi, alors ces deux femmes partirent et me laissèrent seul. Je courus après elles, et me traînant à leurs pieds, m'attachant à leurs vêtements :

— Ma sœur ! leur dis-je, eh bien, ma sœur ! oui, Lélia ! où est-elle ? Elles me regardèrent étonnées.

— Ma sœur ! vous m'avez dit de prier, j'ai prié pour qu'elle revienne, vous m'avez trompé !

— Mais c'était pour son âme !

Son âme ? Qu'est-ce que cela signifiait ? On m'avait souvent parlé de Dieu, jamais de l'âme.

Dieu, je comprenais cela au moins, car si l'on m'eût demandé ce qu'il était, eh bien, j'aurais pris La linotte de Lélia, et, lui brisant la tête entre mes mains, j'aurais dit : "Et moi aussi, je suis Dieu !" Mais l'âme ? l'âme ? qu'est-ce cela ?

J'eus la hardiesse de le leur demander, mais elles s'en allèrent sans me répondre.

Son âme ! eh bien, elles m'ont trompé, ces femmes. Pour moi, ce que je voulais, c'était Lélia, Lélia qui jouait avec moi sur le gazon, dans les bois, qui se couchait sur la mousse, qui cueillait des fleurs et puis qui les jetait au vent ; c'était Lélia, ma belle petite sœur aux grands yeux bleus, Lélia qui m'embrassait le soir après sa poupée, après son mouton chéri, après sa linotte. Pauvre sœur ! c'était toi que je demandais à grands cris, en pleurant, et ces gens barbares et inhumains me répondaient : "Non, tu ne la reverras pas, tu as prié non pour elle, mais tu as prié pour son âme ! quelque chose d'inconnu, de vague comme un mot d'une langue étrangère ; tu as prié pour un souffle, pour un mot, pour le néant, pour son âme enfin !"

Son âme, son âme, je la méprise, son âme, je la regrette, je n'y pense plus. Qu'est-ce que ça me fait à moi, son âme ? savez-vous ce que c'est que son âme ? Mais c'est son corps que je veux ! c'est son regard, sa vie, c'est elle enfin ! et vous ne m'avez rien rendu de tout cela.

Ces femmes m'ont trompé, eh bien, je les ai maudites.

Cette malédiction est retombée sur moi, philosophe imbécile qui ne sais pas comprendre un mot sans L'épeler, croire à une âme sans la sentir, et craindre un Dieu dont, semblable au Prométhée d'Eschyle, je brave les coups et que je méprise trop pour blasphémer.

IV

Souvent, en regardant le soleil, je me suis dit "Pourquoi viens-tu chaque jour éclairer tant de souffrances, découvrir tant de douleurs, présider à tant de sottes misères ?"

Souvent, en me regardant moi-même, je me suis dit : "Pourquoi existes-tu ? pourquoi, puisque tu pleures, ne taris-tu pas tes larmes d'un seul coup qui serait sûr et infaillible, et dont Dieu lui-même ne pourrait empêcher la fatale conséquence ?"

Souvent, en regardant tous ces hommes qui marchent, qui courent les uns après un nom, d'autres après un trône, d'autres après un type idéal de vertu, toutes choses plus ou moins creuses et vides de sens, en voyant ce tourbillon, cette fournaise ardente, cet immonde chaos de joie, de vices, de faits, de sentiments, de matière et de passions : "Où tend tout cela ? sur qui va tomber toute cette fétide poussière ? et puisqu'un vent l'emporte toujours, dans le sein de quel néant va-t-il l'enfermer ?"

Plus souvent encore je me suis dit en regardant les bois, la nature si vantée, ce beau soleil qui se couche chaque soir, se lève chaque matin, qui brille aussi bien un jour de larmes qu'un jour de bonheur, en regardant les arbres, la mer, le ciel toujours étincelant de ses étoiles, que de fois je me suis dit alors, dans mon amer désespoir : "Pourquoi tout cela existe-t-il ?"

V

Une pensée m'est venue, et c'est le seul remords qui soit venu me troubler, car jamais je n'ai eu de remords, croyant que les hommes n'étaient ni bons, ni mauvais, ni coupables, ni innocents, sachant que j'agissais non par ma volonté, mais par instinct, par puissance d'organisation, par une fatalité plus forte que moi — je ne m'affligerai jamais des sottises que mon ennemi aurait pu faire, — je trouve donc que j'aurais dû vivre comme je meurs, gai et tranquille ; qu'au lieu de pleurer et de maudire Dieu, j'aurais dû en rire et le braver ; j'aurais dû éteindre mes pleurs sous un rire, oublier la réalité, et puisque je n'avais pu trouver l'amour, prendre la volupté !

VI

J'ai éprouvé de bonne heure un profond dégoût des hommes, dès que j'ai été mis en contact avec eux.

Dès douze ans on me plaça dans un collège : là, j'y vis le raccourci du monde, ses vices en miniature, ses germes de ridicules, ses petites passions, ses petites coteries, sa petite cruauté ; j'y vis le triomphe de la force, mystérieux emblème de la puissance de Dieu ; je vis des défauts qui devaient plus tard être des vices, des vices qui seraient des crimes, et des enfants qui seraient des hommes.

Maintenant j'éprouve que les hommes sont esclaves du destin et obéissent aux décrets des fées qui président à leur naissance.

I

C'était dans Saragosse, la ville espagnole aux souvenirs d'Orient, Saragosse, l'antique cité des califes, jadis si forte et si pleine de vie, et qui maintenant reste plongée dans ses rêves du passé et dort d'ennui et de lassitude sous son beau soleil du Midi. Où est-il le temps où les cavaliers arabes faisaient piaffer leurs chevaux sur les dalles de tes quais ? où les fraîches odalisques erraient la nuit dans tes jardins ? et où l'encens de la mosquée du prophète se mêlait aux parfums des roses qui couvrent tes terrasses ? Non, tout est morne et désert ; à peine si, lorsque la lourde cloche d'airain vibre sous les aiguilles gothiques, à peine, dis-je, si quelque fidèle vient s'agenouiller sur la pierre de tes cathédrales ; quelques femmes, il est vrai, de temps en temps, des jeunes filles, et puis des enfants et des vieillards, mais des hommes ? oh ! jamais.

Pourtant il se trouve parfois un cœur jeune et vierge qui vient se nourrir de la foi, et plus souvent encore quelque âme blasée et flétrie qui vient se rajeunir dans l'amour céleste, se vivifier dans les croyances, se sanctifier dans la prière. Celui-là qui prend Dieu comme un amour de jeunesse et la foi comme une passion, celui-là s'y livre tout entier, il s'agenouille avec délices, il prie avec ardeur, il croit par instinct ; la messe des morts n'est plus pour lui une grotesque psalmodie, le chant des prêtres cesse d'être vénal, l'église est quelque chose de saint, l'espérance est pour lui palpable et positive, il est heureux, car il croit. Que faut-il de plus pour le bonheur ? une croyance, il y a tant de gens qui n'en ont pas !

II

Tel était Manoello. Il était beau, riche, grand seigneur et religieux ; la chose est bizarre, mais c'est possible. Il était triste, mais sans avoir rien de sombre ni de fantasque ; sa mélancolie avait quelque chose d'évangélique et de doux, sans ce chagrin âpre et brutal qu'impriment chez les poètes le désespoir et le malheur. Il y avait de la noblesse dans ses paroles, de la fierté dans ses gestes et de la poésie dans son regard, car il était né poète sans le savoir ; enfant, il aimait à cueillir des roses, à écouter la mer qui se brise sur les rochers, et couché sur la plage, il s'endormait avec bonheur au bruit des vagues qui le berçaient mollement comme un chant de nourrice.

Plus tard il aima une belle enfant de 15 ans, mais cet amour passa bientôt comme celui de la mer, des coquilles et des roses.

Un jour, il avait 19 ans alors, il entra dans une église, il prêta l'oreille. C'étaient des sons graves et sonores qui s'élevaient dans la nef, sublimes et majestueux ; c'était l'orgue, et puis des cris purs et plaintifs, et, au loin, la voix gracieuse et frêle d'un enfant, qui se mariait avec l'encens, comme deux parfums ! Le soleil, pénétrant à travers les vitraux dorés, jetait sur tout cela un jour mystique et azuré qui lui remplit l'me d'une douce rêverie de foi et d'amour. Cette rêverie fut sa jeunesse, il prit dès lors Dieu comme une autre passion ; elle passa comme les autres !

De ce jour on vit Manoello dans la cathédrale ; il y venait le matin, n'en sortait que le soir et passait ses jours dans la méditation et la prière. On savait peu de choses sur sa personne et sur son genre de vie : il vivait retiré avec ses parents, il était riche, et voilà tout. Il paraissait sans désirs, sans passions de jeunesse, sans amours de femmes ; son indifférence pour elles les excitait davantage à lui faire des avances, et jamais pour aucune d'elles un regard aimable, une douce parole. Plus d'une pourtant vint souvent, au sortir de la messe, lui offrir l'eau bénite, avec un sourire apprêté et qui renfermait toute une pensée de jalousie et de désirs, et jamais pour ces pauvres jeunes filles un tendre soupir, un pressement de main langoureux ! son regard de plomb leur faisait baisser les yeux, et son front pâle les intimidait comme celui d'un vieillard.

Aussi on le haïssait, en revanche, on déchirait sa réputation dans les salons et dans les cercles de la haute société, sa tristesse passait pour des remords et son indifférence pour un dédain vaniteux ; le peuple le haïssait aussi, son laconisme et ses hauteurs semblaient l'insulter. S'il faisait l'aumône à un pauvre, il accompagnait cela d'un regard si froid et si paisible que le mendiant voyait sans peine que la pièce d'or sortait de la bourse mais non du cœur, de l'habitude mais non de l'âme.

Jamais la jeunesse de Saragosse ne l'avait vu s'enivrer avec elle, dans une splendide orgie : jamais on ne l'avait vu faire blanchir d'écume sa cavale andalouse aux courses du Prado, ni applaudir au théâtre à une danse de volupté. Il aimait, à la vérité, sa famille, son Dieu, sa patrie ; eh ! qu'est-ce que tout cela fait au peuple, en vérité, lui qui maintenant n'a plus ni Dieu, ni famille, ni patrie ?

ROME ET LES CÉSARS .

Vu à travers le prisme que jette toujours une société évanouie, l'Empire romain nous apparaît encore comme Le plus monstrueux phénomène de la puissance des hommes. Après avoir, dans l'antiquité, conquis matériellement Le monde, après l'avoir dominé par ses croyances au moyen âge, nous le retrouvons encore enseveli sous sa vieille poussière et murmurant son éternelle douleur. Il n'a plus à craindre pourtant La torche d'Alaric, ou le coup de pied du cheval barbare d'Attila ; on ne peut plus Lui arracher ses provinces dispersées, et il n'a plus d'empereur qui réunisse dans sa main les nations assemblées sous le joug, car le moyen âge l'a battu en brèche, il lui a arraché sa gloire pierre à pierre, lui a substitué La sienne, a chassé Jupiter de Rome et y a fait entrer Jésus-Christ, les martyrs du christianisme ont remplacé ses héros.

Sacerdotale et liturgique sous les Étrusques, matérialiste et guerrière sous les Romains, spiritualiste et artistique sous les papes, que va-t-elle maintenant devenir ? et depuis le XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle qu'a-t-elle fait ? Après avoir été la ruine des choses passées, sera-t-elle aussi éternellement la ruine de toute croyance, de toute foi, de tout amour ? restera-t-elle gisante au milieu des deux océans, entre l'Orient et l'Occident, reniée de sa mère, oubliée de sa fille ?

Hélas ! malgré sa sainteté, ses martyrs, ses papes, toute sa gloire chrétienne et toutes les splendeurs de son pompeux catholicisme, elle demeurera toujours romaine et impériale avant tout ; ce sera la terre du matérialisme ou plutôt du sensualisme artistique, car le sol ici est plus poète que tous les poètes du monde, et sa poussière porte les pas de l'histoire tout entière. Mais à travers la grande voix du moyen âge, qui retentit encore sur les marches du Vatican, j'entends toujours le dernier murmure de l'orgie impériale, les temples me font penser au paganisme, et le Tibre, qui murmure son onde dans ses joncs flétris, ne roule-t-il pas encore la cendre toute chaude de l'Empire ?

La nuit, quand la lune éclaire ces débris d'un autre monde, que le renard des marais pontins pousse son cri rauque dans Les rues silencieuses, que la grenouille coasse dans les thermes de Titus, ne doit-il pas s'élever souvent un long soupir du monde païen évanoui ? ne monte-t-il pas quelquefois jusqu'à nous un dernier écho des voluptés impériales ? le cirque est-il vide ? les lions ne rugissent-ils plus au bruit de la clameur du peuple en délire, qui s'en va jusqu'à Ostie ? les coupes d'or ne retentissent-elles plus, entrechoquées par les belles mains ivres ? Néron ne vient-il jamais reprendre les rênes de son char splendide, qui vole sur le sable d'or et dont les roues broient des hommes ? ses orgies titaniques, aux flambeaux humains, sont-elles bien finies ? et l'amoureuse Naples a-t-elle cessé de soupirer comme une femme endormie, dans les eaux bleues de son golfe d'Ischia, et sa terre chaude n'a-t-elle plus au crépuscule des parfums de fleur ?

Oh ! non, vous avez beau faire, le monde romain n'est pas mort ! il vit en vous, il vous obsède de ses souvenirs et de sa gloire éternelle ; ses empereurs vous font oublier ses papes, ses artistes ses fidèles ; l'art a plus de pouvoir que la foi, car la foi elle-même ici a quelque chose d'artiste, de théâtral et de superbe ; Michel-Ange efface Mino da Fiesole, et Raphaël Cimabué. C'est que l'époque des Césars est en effet Le plus bel acte, le plus somptueux, le plus sanglant de cette longue tragédie que Rome a jouée au monde ; il y a là deux ou trois hommes qui sont venus pour épuiser les dernières voluptés, pour vider le vin des coupes, pour chasser la vertu des cœurs et faire place, après, à des voluptés plus mâles, au vin du calice et aux vertus chrétiennes.

L'œuvre de Rome, c'est la conquête du monde. Quand le monde fut conquis, elle n'eut plus qu'à s'enivrer et à s'endormir ; gorgée de sang chaud, de vin, de voluptés, elle roule sur son or, elle chancelle et elle tombe épuisée. Vous ne rêverez rien de si terrible et de si monstrueux que les dernières heures de l'Empire, c'est là le règne du crime, c'est son apogée, sa gloire ; il est monté sur le trône, il s'y étale à l'aise, en souverain ; il se farde encore pour être plus beau, à aucune époque vous le verrez pareil ; Alexandre VI est un nain à côté de Tibère, et les imaginations de dix grands poètes ne créeraient pas quelque chose qui vaudrait cinq minutes de la vie de Néron. Nous remarquerons d'abord le crime grand, politique et froid, dans la personne de Sylla : il accomplit sa mission fatalement, comme une hache, puis il abdique la dictature et s'en va au milieu du peuple ; c'est là un orgueil plein de grandeur, ce sont là les crimes d'un homme de génie. J'aime encore Marius pleurant sur les ruines de Carthage ; mais Pompée, mais Caton, mais Brunis, que leurs têtes républicaines sont étroites à côté de ce large front de César, rendu chauve avant l'âge par les débauches de Rome et par ses pensées de géant ! Il avilit le Sénat, tue en Gaule des populations entières, fait entrer des Gaulois dans le Sénat, et est aimé des peuples vaincus attelés à son char de triomphe. On conspire contre lui et il pardonne, il voulait rétablir Corinthe et Carthage, il voulait conquérir l'Asie... mais il mourut... comme un homme, et l'Empire après lui agonisa dans un festin de cinq siècles.

Auguste l'imité dans ses crimes et dans sa clémence, et il demandait tout fier en mourant : "Ai-je bien joué mon rôle ?" En effet, il n'y a plus de foi, les augures ne peuvent se regarder sans rire ; L'empereur se fait appeler Dieu par ses poètes, qui n'ont, eux, pour toute religion que L'intime conviction de Leur talent et du néant de la vie. Nous n'en sommes qu'au sentiment de Virgile et à La grâce ciselée d'Horace, ils sentent bien que La volupté ne va pas plus loin, et ils s'arrêtent à un point difficile à préciser, qui n'est ni le spiritualisme ni le matérialisme, ni Le dogme ni La dialectique, mais qui est le point artistique humain par excellence ; ils s'arrêtent aux pensées morales, au sentiment de L'homme, à la satisfaction des sens, aux douces choses, au simple courant de La vie qui coule entre le rire et les pleurs pour arriver à la tombe, un soir d'été, après que la treille n'a plus de fruits, Le cœur plus d'amour. Bientôt va venir le sensualisme excité, la débauche savante de Pétrone, L'inspiration fiévreuse d'Apulée, Les soupirs amoureux de Tibulle, tandis que, de l'autre côté, Tacite écrit avec un style de bronze et que Juvénal fait retentir son hexamètre ronflant de colère. Attendez.

L'Orient et L'Occident ont lutté ensemble avec Auguste et Antoine, et l'Orient a été vaincu, Antoine s'est enfui sur sa galère pour rejoindre Cléopâtre, le vent a soufflé dans ses voiles de pourpre, les rames d'argent ont battu l'onde, la reine d'Egypte est ournée dans son palais ; une dernière fois elle veut essayer sur Octave les charmes de sa beauté orientale et la coquetterie de son désespoir, mais c'est en vain ; un matin on la trouve morte dans ses vêtements royaux, car elle avait craint d'être l'esclave d'Octave et de servir à son triomphe. Son empire est mort avec elle, Octave n'a que le cadavre de l'un et de l'autre. Avec Tibère commence l'ère nouvelle voluptueuse ; le premier, il est atteint du malaise intime qui torture Les entrailles de la société à ses vieux jours ; il se retire à Caprée, malade, fatigué de la vie et craignant La mort ; il convoite Le bonheur, il aspire aux voluptés, mais le bonheur fuit devant lui et la volupté glisse dans ses mains.

Le pouvoir est alors si élevé que le vertige monte à la tête de ceux qui s'en emparent, et ils sont pris d'une manie insensée ; le monde étant à un seul homme, comme un esclave, il pouvait le torturer pour son plaisir, et il fut torturé en effet jusqu'à la dernière fibre.

Après qu'il avait arraché au monde romain sa gloire passée pour se l'attribuer, ses dieux pour se mettre à leur place, ses richesses pour les manger, ses sénateurs pour en faire des laquais, ses prêtres pour en faire des bouffons, et la capitale de l'empire pour l'honorer du spectacle de ses débauches, étonné alors que cela fut si superbe, et surpris Lui-même, L'empereur eût pu s'écrier, dans l'étonnement d'un sensualisme atroce et regardant la patrie esclave à ses pieds :

“Je ne savais pas que ma mère fût si belle !”

Ils s'appelaient Caligula, Néron, Domitien ; des millions se mangent à leur table, on égorge des hommes pendant qu'ils s'enivrent, et la vapeur du sang e mêle à celle des mets. Le crime est une volupté comme Les autres, on entendait les cris des victimes égorgées dans Le cirque pendant que la fanfare résonnait, que les esclaves chantaient. Néron disait aux bourreaux : “Faites en sorte qu'ils se sentent mourir”, et, penché en avant sur Les poitrines ouvertes des victimes, il regardait Le sang battre dans Les cœurs, et il trouvait, dans ces derniers gémisséments d'un être qui quitte fa vie, des délices inconnues, des voluptés suprêmes, comme lorsqu'une femme, éperdue sous l'œil de l'empereur, tombait dans ses bras et se mourait sous ses baisers. Oh ! les cœurs atroces ! oh ! les âmes sublimes dans Le crime ! Chaque jour ils redoublent, chaque jour ils inventent, leur esprit est un enfer qui fournit des tortures au monde, ils insultent à La nature dans leurs débauches ; bêtes fauves, ils se déguisent en bêtes fauves, ils assassinent leurs mères, ils épousent leurs valets, ils se font applaudir au théâtre.

La société se modèle sur L'empereur, les patriciens s'efforcent de l'imiter ; l'âme des hommes, en effet, n'est qu'une prostituée qui se donne à tous les vices, à tous les crimes. Quelque chose de ceLa palpite encore dans Les pages de Suétone, dans Les vers de Juvénal.

Vous rappelez-vous la Longue Maura, qui épuisa tant d'hommes en un jour ? Hamiltus qui corrompt les enfants ? et la noblesse entière, et la famille de l'empereur, et l'empereur Lui-même, et sa femme, et ses sœurs, et son affranchi ? L'histoire aLors est une orgie sangLante, dans laquelle il nous faut entrer, sa vue même enivre et fait venir la nausée au cœur.

CeLa dure longtemps, trop longtemps pour le monde, quoique les empereurs s'usent vite sur ce trône de fu et que leur âme se fatigue vite à contenir tant de choses monstrueuses.

Comme la mort les emporte tous ! Après Néron, Galba ; après Lui, Othon qui a au moins Je cœur de mourir, "et alors Le secret de l'Empire est divulgué", dit Tacite ; et après Othon, Vitellius dont le règne ne fut qu'un long repas qui commença avec des applaudissements et qui finit avec du sang ; puis Vespasien et Titus. Mais Commode ranime la fête ; Pertinax et Didius Julianus, Sévère, Caracalla, Macrin, et nous voici à Héliogabale, le dernier de cette famille. L'Orient avait débordé dans Rome, in Tiberim defluxit orantes ; depuis longtemps les bouffons d'Antoine avaient chassé les bouffons italiens ; les prêtres de Cybèle arrivent, toutes Les religions s'accumulent dans la Ville éternelle, avec tous les vices inventés ; la philosophie se débat mieux, la rhétorique péroré dans ses écoles, la société agonise au milieu de tous ces bruits. Elle voudrait bien se cacher la ruine qu'elle a dans le cœur, et farder ses rides avec le parfum de quelque croyance, c'est en vain, eLle ne sait laquelle adopter. Son empereur veut introduire le culte des juifs et des chrétiens, il se fait juif lui-même, il est, comme la nature, tourmenté d'une grande douleur, et, comme le monde romain, il reste haletant de débauches et d'anoïsses sur ses lits de fleurs, fanées moitis vite que son ame.

Tout craquait donc au cœur du vieux monde : pouvoir civil, croyance religieuse, et l'me et le corps ; tout tombait délabré, abîmé dans un immense dégoût. Il faudra, pour ranimer cette chair flétrie, pour remettre de la force dans Les muscles de ce grand corps, le long ascétisme du moyen âge et les douleurs du inonde chrétien. Alors reparâtra, au xvIc siècle, cette force, cette sève, ce nouveL empire invisible substitué à L'autre, et qui s'étale splend4ement sur les toiles de Raphael et se courbe sur Je-èndè avec La coupole de Saint-Pierre.

THREE TALES

Translated by M. Walter Dunne

This is a collection of three short stories, first published in France in 1877.

A Simple Soul concerns a servant girl named Felicité. After her one and only love Théodore is reported to have married a well-to-do woman to avoid conscription, Felicité quits the farm she works on and heads for Pont-l'Évêque where she immediately picks up work in a widow's house as a servant. She is very loyal, and easily lends her affections to the two children of her mistress, Mme Aubain. She gives entirely to others, and although many take advantage of her she is unaffected. She is the epitome of a selfless character, and Flaubert shows how true altruism – the reality of being truly selfless – is the reward in itself. Whatever comes her way she is able to deal with it.

The Legend of Saint Julian the Hospitalier tells the story of Julian, who is predicted at birth to do great things. His father is told that he will marry into the family of a great emperor, while his mother is told he will be a saint. They dote on him. After Julian kills a mouse who interrupted his concentration in church, his cruelty towards animals grows and culminates into his massacre of an entire valley of deer. A stag curses him to kill his own parents. He almost brings the curse to fruition twice: he drops a sword while standing on a ladder near his father, and he pins his mother's white shawl against a wall with a javelin because it looked like a bird's wings.

Herodias is the retelling of the Biblical story of the beheading of John the Baptist. The narrative opens just before the arrival of the Syrian governor, Vitellius. Herodias holds a huge birthday celebration for her second husband, Herod Antipas. Unknown to him, she has concocted a plan to behead John. According to Flaubert, this plan entails making her husband fall in love with her daughter, Salomé, leading to him promising her whatever she wants. Salomé, obviously in line with the instructions of her mother, will ask for John's head. Everything goes as planned. John has been repeatedly insulting the royals, so the king does not think long before granting Salomé's wish.

The crowd gathered for the party waits anxiously while the executioner, Mannaesus, kills John. The story ends with some of John's disciples awaiting the Messiah.

A SIMPLE SOUL

CHAPTER I

For half a century the housewives of Pont-l'Eveque had envied Madame Aubain her servant Felicite.

For a hundred francs a year, she cooked and did the housework, washed, ironed, mended, harnessed the horse, fattened the poultry, made the butter and remained faithful to her mistress — although the latter was by no means an agreeable person.

Madame Aubain had married a comely youth without any money, who died in the beginning of 1809, leaving her with two young children and a number of debts. She sold all her property excepting the farm of Touques and the farm of Geffosses, the income of which barely amounted to 5,000 francs; then she left her house in Saint-Melaine, and moved into a less pretentious one which had belonged to her ancestors and stood back of the market-place. This house, with its slate-covered roof, was built between a passage-way and a narrow street that led to the river. The interior was so unevenly graded that it caused people to stumble. A narrow hall separated the kitchen from the parlour, where Madame Aubain sat all day in a straw armchair near the window. Eight mahogany chairs stood in a row against the white wainscoting. An old piano, standing beneath a barometer, was covered with a pyramid of old books and boxes. On either side of the yellow marble mantelpiece, in Louis XV. style, stood a tapestry armchair. The clock represented a temple of Vesta; and the whole room smelled musty, as it was on a lower level than the garden.

On the first floor was Madame's bed-chamber, a large room papered in a flowered design and containing the portrait of Monsieur dressed in the costume of a dandy. It communicated with a smaller room, in which there were two little cribs, without any mattresses. Next, came the parlour (always closed), filled with furniture covered with sheets. Then a hall, which led to the study, where books and papers were piled on the shelves of a book-case that enclosed three quarters of the big black desk. Two panels were entirely hidden under pen-and-ink sketches, Gouache landscapes and Audran engravings, relics of better times and vanished luxury. On the second floor, a garret-window lighted Felicite's room, which looked out upon the meadows.

She arose at daybreak, in order to attend mass, and she worked without interruption until night; then, when dinner was over, the dishes cleared away and the door securely locked, she would bury the log under the ashes and fall asleep in front of the hearth with a rosary in her hand. Nobody could bargain with greater obstinacy, and as for cleanliness, the lustre on her brass sauce-pans was the envy and despair of other servants. She was most economical, and when she ate she would gather up crumbs with the tip of her finger, so that nothing should be wasted of the loaf of bread weighing twelve pounds which was baked especially for her and lasted three weeks.

Summer and winter she wore a dimity kerchief fastened in the back with a pin, a cap which concealed her hair, a red skirt, grey stockings, and an apron with a bib like those worn by hospital nurses.

Her face was thin and her voice shrill. When she was twenty-five, she looked forty. After she had passed fifty, nobody could tell her age; erect and silent always, she resembled a wooden figure working automatically.

CHAPTER II

Like every other woman, she had had an affair of the heart. Her father, who was a mason, was killed by falling from a scaffolding. Then her mother died and her sisters went their different ways; a farmer took her in, and while she was quite small, let her keep cows in the fields. She was clad in miserable rags, beaten for the slightest offence and finally dismissed for a theft of thirty sous which she did not commit. She took service on another farm where she tended the poultry; and as she was well thought of by her master, her fellow-workers soon grew jealous.

One evening in August (she was then eighteen years old), they persuaded her to accompany them to the fair at Colleville. She was immediately dazzled by the noise, the lights in the trees, the brightness of the dresses, the laces and gold crosses, and the crowd of people all hopping at the same time. She was standing modestly at a distance, when presently a young man of well-to-do appearance, who had been leaning on the pole of a wagon and smoking his pipe, approached her, and asked her for a dance. He treated her to cider and cake, bought her a silk shawl, and then, thinking she had guessed his purpose, offered to see her home. When they came to the end of a field he threw her down brutally. But she grew frightened and screamed, and he walked off.

One evening, on the road leading to Beaumont, she came upon a wagon loaded with hay, and when she overtook it, she recognised Theodore. He greeted her calmly, and asked her to forget what had happened between them, as it "was all the fault of the drink."

She did not know what to reply and wished to run away.

Presently he began to speak of the harvest and of the notables of the village; his father had left Colleville and bought the farm of Les Ecots, so that now they would be neighbours. "Ah!" she exclaimed. He then added that his parents were looking around for a wife for him, but that he, himself, was not so anxious and preferred to wait for a girl who suited him. She hung her head. He then asked her whether she had ever thought of marrying. She replied, smilingly, that it was wrong of him to make fun of her. "Oh! no, I am in earnest," he said, and put his left arm around her waist while they sauntered along. The air was soft, the stars were bright, and the huge load of hay oscillated in front of them, drawn by four horses whose ponderous hoofs raised clouds of dust. Without a word from their driver they turned to the right. He kissed her again and she went home. The following week, Theodore obtained meetings.

They met in yards, behind walls or under isolated trees. She was not ignorant, as girls of well-to-do families are — for the animals had instructed her; — but her reason and her instinct of honour kept her from falling. Her resistance exasperated Theodore's love and so in order to satisfy it (or perchance ingenuously), he offered to marry her. She would not believe him at first, so he made solemn promises. But, in a short time he mentioned a difficulty; the previous year, his parents had purchased a substitute for him; but any day he might be drafted and the prospect of serving in the army alarmed him greatly. To Felicite his cowardice appeared a proof of his love for her, and her devotion to him grew stronger. When she met him, he would torture her with his fears and his entreaties. At last, he announced that he was going to the prefect himself for information, and would let her know everything on the following Sunday, between eleven o'clock and midnight.

When the time grew near, she ran to meet her lover.

But instead of Theodore, one of his friends was at the meeting-place.

He informed her that she would never see her sweetheart again; for, in order to escape the conscription, he had married a rich old woman, Madame Lehoussais, of Toucques.

The poor girl's sorrow was frightful. She threw herself on the ground, she cried and called on the Lord, and wandered around desolately until sunrise. Then she went back to the farm, declared her intention of leaving, and at the end of the month, after she had received her wages, she packed all her belongings in a handkerchief and started for Pont-l'Eveque.

In front of the inn, she met a woman wearing widow's weeds, and upon questioning her, learned that she was looking for a cook. The girl did not know very much, but appeared so willing and so modest in her requirements, that Madame Aubain finally said:

“Very well, I will give you a trial.”

And half an hour later Felicite was installed in her house.

At first she lived in a constant anxiety that was caused by “the style of the household” and the memory of “Monsieur,” that hovered over everything. Paul and Virginia, the one aged seven, and the other barely four, seemed made of some precious material; she carried them pig-a-back, and was greatly mortified when Madame Aubain forbade her to kiss them every other minute.

But in spite of all this, she was happy. The comfort of her new surroundings had obliterated her sadness.

Every Thursday, friends of Madame Aubain dropped in for a game of cards, and it was Felicite’s duty to prepare the table and heat the foot-warmers. They arrived at exactly eight o’clock and departed before eleven.

Every Monday morning, the dealer in second-hand goods, who lived under the alley-way, spread out his wares on the sidewalk. Then the city would be filled with a buzzing of voices in which the neighing of horses, the bleating of lambs, the grunting of pigs, could be distinguished, mingled with the sharp sound of wheels on the cobblestones. About twelve o’clock, when the market was in full swing, there appeared at the front door a tall, middle-aged peasant, with a hooked nose and a cap on the back of his head; it was Robelin, the farmer of Geffosses. Shortly afterwards came Liebard, the farmer of Toucques, short, rotund and ruddy, wearing a grey jacket and spurred boots.

Both men brought their landlady either chickens or cheese. Felicite would invariably thwart their ruses and they held her in great respect.

At various times, Madame Aubain received a visit from the Marquis de Gremanville, one of her uncles, who was ruined and lived at Falaise on the remainder of his estates. He always came at dinner-time and brought an ugly poodle with him, whose paws soiled their furniture. In spite of his efforts to appear a man of breeding (he even went so far as to raise his hat every time he said “My deceased father”), his habits got the better of him, and he would fill his glass a little too often and relate broad stories. Felicite would show him out very politely and say: “You have had enough for this time, Monsieur de Gremanville! Hoping to see you again!” and would close the door.

She opened it gladly for Monsieur Bourais, a retired lawyer. His bald head and white cravat, the ruffling of his shirt, his flowing brown coat, the manner in which he took snuff, his whole person, in fact, produced in her the kind of awe which we feel when we see extraordinary persons. As he managed Madame's estates, he spent hours with her in Monsieur's study; he was in constant fear of being compromised, had a great regard for the magistracy and some pretensions to learning.

In order to facilitate the children's studies, he presented them with an engraved geography which represented various scenes of the world; cannibals with feather head-dresses, a gorilla kidnapping a young girl, Arabs in the desert, a whale being harpooned, etc.

Paul explained the pictures to Felicite. And, in fact, this was her only literary education.

The children's studies were under the direction of a poor devil employed at the town-hall, who sharpened his pocket-knife on his boots and was famous for his penmanship.

When the weather was fine, they went to Geffosses. The house was built in the centre of the sloping yard; and the sea looked like a grey spot in the distance. Felicite would take slices of cold meat from the lunch basket and they would sit down and eat in a room next to the dairy. This room was all that remained of a cottage that had been torn down. The dilapidated wall-paper trembled in the drafts. Madame Aubain, overwhelmed by recollections, would hang her head, while the children were afraid to open their mouths. Then, "Why don't you go and play?" their mother would say; and they would scamper off.

Paul would go to the old barn, catch birds, throw stones into the pond, or pound the trunks of the trees with a stick till they resounded like drums. Virginia would feed the rabbits and run to pick the wild flowers in the fields, and her flying legs would disclose her little embroidered pantalettes. One autumn evening, they struck out for home through the meadows. The new moon illumined part of the sky and a mist hovered like a veil over the sinuosities of the river. Oxen, lying in the pastures, gazed mildly at the passing persons. In the third field, however, several of them got up and surrounded them. "Don't be afraid," cried Felicite; and murmuring a sort of lament she passed her hand over the back of the nearest ox; he turned away and the others followed. But when they came to the next pasture, they heard frightful bellowing.

It was a bull which was hidden from them by the fog. He advanced towards the two women, and Madame Aubain prepared to flee for her life. "No, no! not so fast," warned Felicite. Still they hurried on, for they could hear the noisy breathing of the bull behind them. His hoofs pounded the grass like hammers, and presently he began to gallop! Felicite turned around and threw patches of grass in his eyes. He hung his head, shook his horns and bellowed with fury. Madame Aubain and the children, huddled at the end of the field, were trying to jump over the ditch. Felicite continued to back before the bull, blinding him with dirt, while she shouted to them to make haste.

Madame Aubain finally slid into the ditch, after shoving first Virginia and then Paul into it, and though she stumbled several times she managed, by dint of courage, to climb the other side of it.

The bull had driven Felicite up against a fence; the foam from his muzzle flew in her face and in another minute he would have disembowelled her. She had just time to slip between two bars and the huge animal, thwarted, paused.

For years, this occurrence was a topic of conversation in Pont-l'Évêque. But Felicite took no credit to herself, and probably never knew that she had been heroic.

Virginia occupied her thoughts solely, for the shock she had sustained gave her a nervous affection, and the physician, M. Poupart, prescribed the salt-water bathing at Trouville. In those days, Trouville was not greatly patronised. Madame Aubain gathered information, consulted Bourais, and made preparations as if they were going on an extended trip.

The baggage was sent the day before on Liebard's cart. On the following morning, he brought around two horses, one of which had a woman's saddle with a velveteen back to it, while on the crupper of the other was a rolled shawl that was to be used for a seat. Madame Aubain mounted the second horse, behind Liebard. Felicite took charge of the little girl, and Paul rode M. Lechaptois' donkey, which had been lent for the occasion on the condition that they should be careful of it.

The road was so bad that it took two hours to cover the eight miles. The two horses sank knee-deep into the mud and stumbled into ditches; sometimes they had to jump over them. In certain places, Liebard's mare stopped abruptly. He waited patiently till she started again, and talked of the people whose estates bordered the road, adding his own moral reflections to the outline of their histories. Thus, when they were passing through Toucques, and came to some windows draped with nasturtiums, he shrugged his shoulders and said: "There's a woman, Madame Lehoussais, who, instead of taking a young man — " Felicite could not catch what followed; the horses began to trot, the donkey to gallop, and they turned into a lane; then a gate swung open, two farm-hands appeared and they all dismounted at the very threshold of the farm-house.

Mother Liebard, when she caught sight of her mistress, was lavish with joyful demonstrations. She got up a lunch which comprised a leg of mutton, tripe, sausages, a chicken fricassee, sweet cider, a fruit tart and some preserved prunes; then to all this the good woman added polite remarks about Madame, who appeared to be in better health, Mademoiselle, who had grown to be "superb," and Paul, who had become singularly sturdy; she spoke also of their deceased grandparents, whom the Liebards had known, for they had been in the service of the family for several generations.

Like its owners, the farm had an ancient appearance. The beams of the ceiling were mouldy, the walls black with smoke and the windows grey with dust. The oak sideboard was filled with all sorts of utensils, plates, pitchers, tin bowls, wolf-traps. The children laughed when they saw a huge syringe. There was not a tree in the yard that did not have mushrooms growing around its foot, or a bunch of mistletoe hanging in its branches. Several of the trees had been blown down, but they had started to grow in the middle and all were laden with quantities of apples. The thatched roofs, which were of unequal thickness, looked like brown velvet and could resist the fiercest gales. But the wagon-shed was fast crumbling to ruins. Madame Aubain said that she would attend to it, and then gave orders to have the horses saddled.

It took another thirty minutes to reach Trouville. The little caravan dismounted in order to pass Les Ecores, a cliff that overhangs the bay, and a few minutes later, at the end of the dock, they entered the yard of the Golden Lamb, an inn kept by Mother David.

During the first few days, Virginia felt stronger, owing to the change of air and the action of the sea-baths. She took them in her little chemise, as she had no bathing suit, and afterwards her nurse dressed her in the cabin of a customs officer, which was used for that purpose by other bathers.

In the afternoon, they would take the donkey and go to the Roches-Noires, near Hennequeville. The path led at first through undulating grounds, and thence to a plateau, where pastures and tilled fields alternated. At the edge of the road, mingling with the brambles, grew holly bushes, and here and there stood large dead trees whose branches traced zigzags upon the blue sky.

Ordinarily, they rested in a field facing the ocean, with Deauville on their left, and Havre on their right. The sea glittered brightly in the sun and was as smooth as a mirror, and so calm that they could scarcely distinguish its murmur; sparrows chirped joyfully and the immense canopy of heaven spread over it all. Madame Aubain brought out her sewing, and Virginia amused herself by braiding reeds; Felicite wove lavender blossoms, while Paul was bored and wished to go home.

Sometimes they crossed the Touques in a boat, and started to hunt for sea-shells. The outgoing tide exposed star-fish and sea-urchins, and the children tried to catch the flakes of foam which the wind blew away. The sleepy waves lapping the sand unfurled themselves along the shore that extended as far as the eye could see, but where land began, it was limited by the downs which separated it from the "Swamp," a large meadow shaped like a hippodrome. When they went home that way, Trouville, on the slope of a hill below, grew larger and larger as they advanced, and, with all its houses of unequal height, seemed to spread out before them in a sort of giddy confusion.

When the heat was too oppressive, they remained in their rooms. The dazzling sunlight cast bars of light between the shutters. Not a sound in the village, not a soul on the sidewalk. This silence intensified the tranquility of everything. In the distance, the hammers of some calkers pounded the hull of a ship, and the sultry breeze brought them an odour of tar.

The principal diversion consisted in watching the return of the fishing-smacks. As soon as they passed the beacons, they began to ply to windward. The sails were lowered to one third of the masts, and with their fore-sails swelled up like balloons they glided over the waves and anchored in the middle of the harbour. Then they crept up alongside of the dock and the sailors threw the quivering fish over the side of the boat; a line of carts was waiting for them, and women with white caps sprang forward to receive the baskets and embrace their men-folk.

One day, one of them spoke to Felicite, who, after a little while, returned to the house gleefully. She had found one of her sisters, and presently Nastasie Barette, wife of Leroux, made her appearance, holding an infant in her arms, another child by the hand, while on her left was a little cabin-boy with his hands in his pockets and his cap on his ear.

At the end of fifteen minutes, Madame Aubain bade her go.

They always hung around the kitchen, or approached Felicite when she and the children were out walking. The husband, however, did not show himself.

Felicite developed a great fondness for them; she bought them a stove, some shirts and a blanket; it was evident that they exploited her. Her foolishness annoyed Madame Aubain, who, moreover did not like the nephew's familiarity, for he called her son "thou"; — and, as Virginia began to cough and the season was over, she decided to return to Pont-l'Eveque.

Monsieur Bourais assisted her in the choice of a college. The one at Caen was considered the best. So Paul was sent away and bravely said good-bye to them all, for he was glad to go to live in a house where he would have boy companions.

Madame Aubain resigned herself to the separation from her son because it was unavoidable. Virginia brooded less and less over it. Felicite regretted the noise he made, but soon a new occupation diverted her mind; beginning from Christmas, she accompanied the little girl to her catechism lesson every day.

CHAPTER III

After she had made a curtsy at the threshold, she would walk up the aisle between the double lines of chairs, open Madame Aubain's pew, sit down and look around.

Girls and boys, the former on the right, the latter on the left-hand side of the church, filled the stalls of the choir; the priest stood beside the reading-desk; on one stained window of the side-aisle the Holy Ghost hovered over the Virgin; on another one, Mary knelt before the Child Jesus, and behind the altar, a wooden group represented Saint Michael felling the dragon.

The priest first read a condensed lesson of sacred history. Felicite evoked Paradise, the Flood, the Tower of Babel, the blazing cities, the dying nations, the shattered idols; and out of this she developed a great respect for the Almighty and a great fear of His wrath. Then, when she had listened to the Passion, she wept. Why had they crucified Him who loved little children, nourished the people, made the blind see, and who, out of humility, had wished to be born among the poor, in a stable? The sowings, the harvests, the wine-presses, all those familiar things which the Scriptures mention, formed a part of her life; the word of God sanctified them; and she loved the lambs with increased tenderness for the sake of the Lamb, and the doves because of the Holy Ghost.

She found it hard, however, to think of the latter as a person, for was it not a bird, a flame, and sometimes only a breath? Perhaps it is its light that at night hovers over swamps, its breath that propels the clouds, its voice that renders church-bells harmonious. And Felicite worshipped devoutly, while enjoying the coolness and the stillness of the church.

As for the dogma, she could not understand it and did not even try. The priest discoursed, the children recited, and she went to sleep, only to awaken with a start when they were leaving the church and their wooden shoes clattered on the stone pavement.

In this way, she learned her catechism, her religious education having been neglected in her youth; and thenceforth she imitated all Virginia's religious practices, fasted when she did, and went to confession with her. At the Corpus-Christi Day they both decorated an altar.

She worried in advance over Virginia's first communion. She fussed about the shoes, the rosary, the book and the gloves. With what nervousness she helped the mother dress the child!

During the entire ceremony, she felt anguished. Monsieur Bourais hid part of the choir from view, but directly in front of her, the flock of maidens, wearing white wreaths over their lowered veils, formed a snow-white field, and she recognised her darling by the slenderness of her neck and her devout attitude. The bell tinkled. All the heads bent and there was a silence. Then, at the peals of the organ the singers and the worshippers struck up the Agnes Dei; the boys' procession began; behind them came the girls. With clasped hands, they advanced step by step to the lighted altar, knelt at the first step, received one by one the Host, and returned to their seats in the same order. When Virginia's turn came, Felicite leaned forward to watch her, and through that imagination which springs from true affection, she at once became the child, whose face and dress became hers, whose heart beat in her bosom, and when Virginia opened her mouth and closed her lids, she did likewise and came very near fainting.

The following day, she presented herself early at the church so as to receive communion from the cure. She took it with the proper feeling, but did not experience the same delight as on the previous day.

Madame Aubain wished to make an accomplished girl of her daughter; and as Guyot could not teach English or music, she decided to send her to the Ursulines at Honfleur.

The child made no objection, but Felicite sighed and thought Madame was heartless. Then, she thought that perhaps her mistress was right, as these things were beyond her sphere. Finally, one day, an old fiacre stopped in front of the door and a nun stepped out. Felicite put Virginia's luggage on top of the carriage, gave the coachman some instructions, and smuggled six jars of jam, a dozen pears and a bunch of violets under the seat.

At the last minute, Virginia had a fit of sobbing; she embraced her mother again and again, while the latter kissed her on the forehead, and said: "Now, be brave, be brave!" The step was pulled up and the fiacre rumbled off.

Then Madame Aubain had a fainting spell, and that evening all her friends, including the two Lormeaux, Madame Lechaptois, the ladies Rochefeuille, Messieurs de Houpeville and Bourais, called on her and tendered their sympathy.

At first the separation proved very painful to her. But her daughter wrote her three times a week and the other days she, herself, wrote to Virginia. Then she walked in the garden, read a little, and in this way managed to fill out the emptiness of the hours.

Each morning, out of habit, Felicite entered Virginia's room and gazed at the walls. She missed combing her hair, lacing her shoes, tucking her in her bed, and the bright face and little hand when they used to go out for a walk. In order to occupy herself she tried to make lace. But her clumsy fingers broke the threads; she had no heart for anything, lost her sleep and "wasted away," as she put it.

In order to have some distraction, she asked leave to receive the visits of her nephew Victor.

He would come on Sunday, after church, with ruddy cheeks and bared chest, bringing with him the scent of the country. She would set the table and they would sit down opposite each other, and eat their dinner; she ate as little as possible, herself, to avoid any extra expense, but would stuff him so with food that he would finally go to sleep. At the first stroke of vespers, she would wake him up, brush his trousers, tie his cravat and walk to church with him, leaning on his arm with maternal pride.

His parents always told him to get something out of her, either a package of brown sugar, or soap, or brandy, and sometimes even money. He brought her his clothes to mend, and she accepted the task gladly, because it meant another visit from him.

In August, his father took him on a coasting-vessel.

It was vacation time and the arrival of the children consoled Felicite. But Paul was capricious, and Virginia was growing too old to be thee-and-thou'd, a fact which seemed to produce a sort of embarrassment in their relations.

Victor went successively to Morlaix, to Dunkirk, and to Brighton; whenever he returned from a trip he would bring her a present. The first time it was a box of shells; the second, a coffee-cup; the third, a big doll of ginger-bread. He was growing handsome, had a good figure, a tiny moustache, kind eyes, and a little leather cap that sat jauntily on the back of his head. He amused his aunt by telling her stories mingled with nautical expressions.

One Monday, the 14th of July, 1819 (she never forgot the date), Victor announced that he had been engaged on a merchant-vessel and that in two days he would take the steamer at Honfleur and join his sailer, which was going to start from Havre very soon. Perhaps he might be away two years.

The prospect of his departure filled Felicite with despair, and in order to bid him farewell, on Wednesday night, after Madame's dinner, she put on her pattens and trudged the four miles that separated Pont-l'Eveque from Honfleur.

When she reached the Calvary, instead of turning to the right, she turned to the left and lost herself in coal-yards; she had to retrace her steps; some people she spoke to advised her to hasten. She walked helplessly around the harbour filled with vessels, and knocked against hawsers. Presently the ground sloped abruptly, lights flitted to and fro, and she thought all at once that she had gone mad when she saw some horses in the sky.

Others, on the edge of the dock, neighed at the sight of the ocean. A derrick pulled them up in the air, and dumped them into a boat, where passengers were bustling about among barrels of cider, baskets of cheese and bags of meal; chickens cackled, the captain swore and a cabin-boy rested on the railing, apparently indifferent to his surroundings. Felicite, who did not recognise him, kept shouting: "Victor!" He suddenly raised his eyes, but while she was preparing to rush up to him, they withdrew the gangplank.

The packet, towed by singing women, glided out of the harbour. Her hull squeaked and the heavy waves beat up against her sides. The sail had turned and nobody was visible; — and on the ocean, silvered by the light of the moon, the vessel formed a black spot that grew dimmer and dimmer, and finally disappeared.

When Felicite passed the Calvary again, she felt as if she must entrust that which was dearest to her to the Lord; and for a long while she prayed, with uplifted eyes and a face wet with tears. The city was sleeping; some customs officials were taking the air; and the water kept pouring through the holes of the dam with a deafening roar. The town clock struck two.

The parlour of the convent would not open until morning, and surely a delay would annoy Madame, so, in spite of her desire to see the other child, she went home. The maids of the inn were just arising when she reached Pont-l'Évêque.

So the poor boy would be on the ocean for months! His previous trips had not alarmed her. One can come back from England and Brittany; but America, the colonies, the islands, were all lost in an uncertain region at the very end of the world.

From that time on, Felicite thought solely of her nephew. On warm days she feared he would suffer from thirst, and when it stormed, she was afraid he would be struck by lightning. When she harkened to the wind that rattled in the chimney and dislodged the tiles on the roof, she imagined that he was being buffeted by the same storm, perched on top of a shattered mast, with his whole body bent backward and covered with sea-foam; or, — these were recollections of the engraved geography — he was being devoured by savages, or captured in a forest by apes, or dying on some lonely coast. She never mentioned her anxieties, however.

Madame Aubain worried about her daughter.

The sisters thought that Virginia was affectionate but delicate. The slightest emotion enervated her. She had to give up her piano lessons. Her mother insisted upon regular letters from the convent. One morning, when the postman failed to come, she grew impatient and began to pace to and fro, from her chair to the window. It was really extraordinary! No news since four days!

In order to console her mistress by her own example, Felicite said:

“Why, Madame, I haven’t had any news since six months! — ”

“From whom? — ”

The servant replied gently:

“Why — from my nephew.”

“Oh, yes, your nephew!” And shrugging her shoulders, Madame Aubain continued to pace the floor as if to say: “I did not think of it. — Besides, I do not care, a cabin-boy, a pauper! — but my daughter — what a difference! just think of it! — ”

Felicite, although she had been reared roughly, was very indignant. Then she forgot about it.

It appeared quite natural to her that one should lose one's head about Virginia.

The two children were of equal importance; they were united in her heart and their fate was to be the same.

The chemist informed her that Victor's vessel had reached Havana. He had read the information in a newspaper.

Felicite imagined that Havana was a place where people did nothing but smoke, and that Victor walked around among negroes in a cloud of tobacco. Could a person, in case of need, return by land? How far was it from Pont-l'Eveque? In order to learn these things, she questioned Monsieur Bourais. He reached for his map and began some explanations concerning longitudes, and smiled with superiority at Felicite's bewilderment. At last, he took a pencil and pointed out an imperceptible black point in the scallops of an oval blotch, adding: "There it is." She bent over the map; the maze of coloured lines hurt her eyes without enlightening her; and when Bourais asked her what puzzled her, she requested him to show her the house Victor lived in. Bourais threw up his hands, sneezed, and then laughed uproariously; such ignorance delighted his soul; but Felicite failed to understand the cause of his mirth, she whose intelligence was so limited that she perhaps expected to see even the picture of her nephew!

It was two weeks later that Liebard came into the kitchen at market-time, and handed her a letter from her brother-in-law. As neither of them could read, she called upon her mistress.

Madame Aubain, who was counting the stitches of her knitting, laid her work down beside her, opened the letter, started, and in a low tone and with a searching look said: "They tell you of a — misfortune. Your nephew — "

He had died. The letter told nothing more.

Felicite dropped on a chair, leaned her head against the back, and closed her lids; presently they grew pink. Then, with drooping head, inert hands and staring eyes she repeated at intervals:

"Poor little chap! poor little chap!"

Liebard watched her and sighed. Madame Aubain was trembling. She proposed to the girl to go to see her sister in Trouville.

With a single motion, Felicite replied that it was not necessary.

There was a silence. Old Liebard thought it about time for him to take leave.

Then Felicite uttered:

“They have no sympathy, they do not care!”

Her head fell forward again, and from time to time, mechanically, she toyed with the long knitting-needles on the work-table.

Some women passed through the yard with a basket of wet clothes.

When she saw them through the window, she suddenly remembered her own wash; as she had soaked it the day before, she must go and rinse it now. So she arose and left the room.

Her tub and her board were on the bank of the Toucques. She threw a heap of clothes on the ground, rolled up her sleeves and grasped her bat; and her loud pounding could be heard in the neighbouring gardens. The meadows were empty, the breeze wrinkled the stream, at the bottom of which were long grasses that looked like the hair of corpses floating in the water. She restrained her sorrow and was very brave until night; but, when she had gone to her own room, she gave way to it, burying her face in the pillow and pressing her two fists against her temples.

A long while afterward, she learned through Victor's captain, the circumstances which surrounded his death. At the hospital they had bled him too much, treating him for yellow fever. Four doctors held him at one time. He died almost instantly, and the chief surgeon had said:

“Here goes another one!”

His parents had always treated him barbarously; she preferred not to see them again, and they made no advances, either from forgetfulness or out of innate hardness.

Virginia was growing weaker.

A cough, continual fever, oppressive breathing and spots on her cheeks indicated some serious trouble. Monsieur Popart had advised a sojourn in Provence. Madame Aubain decided that they would go, and she would have had her daughter come home at once, had it not been for the climate of Pont-l'Eveque.

She made an arrangement with a livery-stable man who drove her over to the convent every Tuesday. In the garden there was a terrace, from which the view extends to the Seine. Virginia walked in it, leaning on her mother's arm and treading the dead vine leaves.

Sometimes the sun, shining through the clouds, made her blink her lids, when she gazed at the sails in the distance, and let her eyes roam over the horizon from the chateau of Tancarville to the lighthouses of Havre. Then they rested on the harbour. Her mother had bought a little cask of fine Malaga wine, and Virginia, laughing at the idea of becoming intoxicated, would drink a few drops of it, but never more.

Her strength returned. Autumn passed. Felicite began to reassure Madame Aubain. But, one evening, when she returned home after an errand, she met M. Boupart's coach in front of the door; M. Boupart himself was standing in the vestibule and Madame Aubain was tying the strings of her bonnet. "Give me my foot-warmer, my purse and my gloves; and be quick about it," she said.

Virginia had congestion of the lungs; perhaps it was desperate.

"Not yet," said the physician, and both got into the carriage, while the snow fell in thick flakes. It was almost night and very cold.

Felicite rushed to the church to light a candle. Then she ran after the coach which she overtook after an hour's chase, sprang up behind and held on to the straps. But suddenly a thought crossed her mind: "The yard had been left open; supposing that burglars got in!" And down she jumped.

The next morning, at daybreak, she called at the doctor's. He had been home, but had left again. Then she waited at the inn, thinking that strangers might bring her a letter. At last, at daylight she took the diligence for Lisieux.

The convent was at the end of a steep and narrow street. When she arrived about at the middle of it, she heard strange noises, a funeral knell. "It must be for some one else," thought she; and she pulled the knocker violently.

After several minutes had elapsed, she heard footsteps, the door was half opened and a nun appeared. The good sister, with an air of compunction, told her that "she had just passed away." And at the same time the tolling of Saint-Leonard's increased.

Felicite reached the second floor. Already at the threshold, she caught sight of Virginia lying on her back, with clasped hands, her mouth open and her head thrown back, beneath a black crucifix inclined toward her, and stiff curtains which were less white than her face. Madame Aubain lay at the foot of the couch, clasping it with her arms and uttering groans of agony. The Mother Superior was standing on the right side of the bed. The three candles on the bureau made red blurs, and the windows were dimmed by the fog outside. The nuns carried Madame Aubain from the room.

For two nights, Felicite never left the corpse. She would repeat the same prayers, sprinkle holy water over the sheets, get up, come back to the bed and contemplate the body. At the end of the first vigil, she noticed that the face had taken on a yellow tinge, the lips grew blue, the nose grew pinched, the eyes were sunken. She kissed them several times and would not have been greatly astonished had Virginia opened them; to souls like this the supernatural is always quite simple. She washed her, wrapped her in a shroud, put her into the casket, laid a wreath of flowers on her head and arranged her curls. They were blond and of an extraordinary length for her age. Felicite cut off a big lock and put half of it into her bosom, resolving never to part with it.

The body was taken to Pont-l'Eveque, according to Madame Aubain's wishes; she followed the hearse in a closed carriage.

After the ceremony it took three quarters of an hour to reach the cemetery. Paul, sobbing, headed the procession; Monsieur Bourais followed, and then came the principle inhabitants of the town, the women covered with black capes, and Felicite. The memory of her nephew, and the thought that she had not been able to render him these honours, made her doubly unhappy, and she felt as if he were being buried with Virginia.

Madame Aubain's grief was uncontrollable. At first she rebelled against God, thinking that he was unjust to have taken away her child — she who had never done anything wrong, and whose conscience was so pure! But no! she ought to have taken her South. Other doctors would have saved her. She accused herself, prayed to be able to join her child, and cried in the midst of her dreams. Of the latter, one more especially haunted her. Her husband, dressed like a sailor, had come back from a long voyage, and with tears in his eyes told her that he had received the order to take Virginia away. Then they both consulted about a hiding-place.

Once she came in from the garden, all upset. A moment before (and she showed the place), the father and daughter had appeared to her, one after the other; they did nothing but look at her.

During several months she remained inert in her room. Felicite scolded her gently; she must keep up for her son and also for the other one, for "her memory."

"Her memory!" replied Madame Aubain, as if she were just awakening, "Oh! yes, yes, you do not forget her!" This was an allusion to the cemetery where she had been expressly forbidden to go.

But Felicite went there every day. At four o'clock exactly, she would go through the town, climb the hill, open the gate and arrive at Virginia's tomb. It was a small column of pink marble with a flat stone at its base, and it was surrounded by a little plot enclosed by chains. The flower-beds were bright with blossoms. Felicite watered their leaves, renewed the gravel, and knelt on the ground in order to till the earth properly. When Madame Aubain was able to visit the cemetery she felt very much relieved and consoled.

Years passed, all alike and marked by no other events than the return of the great church holidays: Easter, Assumption, All Saints' Day. Household happenings constituted the only data to which in later years they often referred. Thus, in 1825, workmen painted the vestibule; in 1827, a portion of the roof almost killed a man by falling into the yard. In the summer of 1828, it was Madame's turn to offer the hallowed bread; at that time, Bourais disappeared mysteriously; and the old acquaintances, Guyot, Liebard, Madame Lechaptois, Robelin, old Gremenville, paralysed since a long time, passed away one by one. One night, the driver of the mail in Pont-l'Eveque announced the Revolution of July. A few days afterward a new sub-prefect was nominated, the Baron de Larsonniere, ex-consul in America, who, besides his wife, had his sister-in-law and her three grown daughters with him. They were often seen on their lawn, dressed in loose blouses, and they had a parrot and a negro servant. Madame Aubain received a call, which she returned promptly. As soon as she caught sight of them, Felicite would run and notify her mistress. But only one thing was capable of arousing her: a letter from her son.

He could not follow any profession as he was absorbed in drinking. His mother paid his debts and he made fresh ones; and the sighs that she heaved while she knitted at the window reached the ears of Felicite who was spinning in the kitchen.

They walked in the garden together, always speaking of Virginia, and asking each other if such and such a thing would have pleased her, and what she would probably have said on this or that occasion.

All her little belongings were put away in a closet of the room which held the two little beds. But Madame Aubain looked them over as little as possible. One summer day, however, she resigned herself to the task and when she opened the closet the moths flew out.

Virginia's frocks were hung under a shelf where there were three dolls, some hoops, a doll-house, and a basin which she had used. Felicite and Madame Aubain also took out the skirts, the handkerchiefs, and the stockings and spread them on the beds, before putting them away again. The sun fell on the piteous things, disclosing their spots and the creases formed by the motions of the body. The atmosphere was warm and blue, and a blackbird trilled in the garden; everything seemed to live in happiness. They found a little hat of soft brown plush, but it was entirely moth-eaten. Felicite asked for it. Their eyes met and filled with tears; at last the mistress opened her arms and the servant threw herself against her breast and they hugged each other and giving vent to their grief in a kiss which equalised them for a moment.

It was the first time that this had ever happened, for Madame Aubain was not of an expansive nature. Felicite was as grateful for it as if it had been some favour, and thenceforth loved her with animal-like devotion and a religious veneration.

Her kind-heartedness developed. When she heard the drums of a marching regiment passing through the street, she would stand in the doorway with a jug of cider and give the soldiers a drink. She nursed cholera victims. She protected Polish refugees, and one of them even declared that he wished to marry her. But they quarrelled, for one morning when she returned from the Angelus she found him in the kitchen coolly eating a dish which he had prepared for himself during her absence.

After the Polish refugees, came Colmiche, an old man who was credited with having committed frightful misdeeds in '93. He lived near the river in the ruins of a pig-sty. The urchins peeped at him through the cracks in the walls and threw stones that fell on his miserable bed, where he lay gasping with catarrh, with long hair, inflamed eyelids, and a tumour as big as his head on one arm.

She got him some linen, tried to clean his hovel and dreamed of installing him in the bake-house without his being in Madame's way. When the cancer broke, she dressed it every day; sometimes she brought him some cake and placed him in the sun on a bundle of hay; and the poor old creature, trembling and drooling, would thank her in his broken voice, and put out his hands whenever she left him. Finally he died; and she had a mass said for the repose of his soul.

That day a great joy came to her: at dinner-time, Madame de Larsonniere's servant called with the parrot, the cage, and the perch and chain and lock. A note from the baroness told Madame Aubain that as her husband had been promoted to a prefecture, they were leaving that night, and she begged her to accept the bird as a remembrance and a token of her esteem.

Since a long time the parrot had been on Felicite's mind, because he came from America, which reminded her of Victor, and she had approached the negro on the subject.

Once even, she had said:

"How glad Madame would be to have him!"

The man had repeated this remark to his mistress who, not being able to keep the bird, took this means of getting rid of it.

CHAPTER IV

He was called Loulou. His body was green, his head blue, the tips of his wings were pink and his breast was golden.

But he had the tiresome tricks of biting his perch, pulling his feathers out, scattering refuse and spilling the water of his bath. Madame Aubain grew tired of him and gave him to Felicite for good.

She undertook his education, and soon he was able to repeat: "Pretty boy! Your servant, sir! I salute you, Marie!" His perch was placed near the door and several persons were astonished that he did not answer to the name of "Jacquot," for every parrot is called Jacquot. They called him a goose and a log, and these taunts were like so many dagger thrusts to Felicite. Strange stubbornness of the bird which would not talk when people watched him!

Nevertheless, he sought society; for on Sunday, when the ladies Rochefeuille, Monsieur de Houppeville and the new habitues, Onfroy, the chemist, Monsieur Varin and Captain Mathieu, dropped in for their game of cards, he struck the window-panes with his wings and made such a racket that it was impossible to talk.

Bourais' face must have appeared very funny to Loulou. As soon as he saw him he would begin to roar. His voice re-echoed in the yard, and the neighbours would come to the windows and begin to laugh, too; and in order that the parrot might not see him, Monsieur Bourais edged along the wall, pushed his hat over his eyes to hide his profile, and entered by the garden door, and the looks he gave the bird lacked affection. Loulou, having thrust his head into the butcher-boy's basket, received a slap, and from that time he always tried to nip his enemy. Fabu threatened to ring his neck, although he was not cruelly inclined, notwithstanding his big whiskers and tattooings. On the contrary, he rather liked the bird, and, out of devilry, tried to teach him oaths. Felicite, whom his manner alarmed, put Loulou in the kitchen, took off his chain and let him walk all over the house.

When he went downstairs, he rested his beak on the steps, lifted his right foot and then his left one; but his mistress feared that such feats would give him vertigo. He became ill and was unable to eat. There was a small growth under his tongue like those chickens are sometimes afflicted with. Felicite pulled it off with her nails and cured him. One day, Paul was imprudent enough to blow the smoke of his cigar in his face; another time, Madame Lormeau was teasing him with the tip of her umbrella and he swallowed the tip. Finally he got lost.

She had put him on the grass to cool him and went away only for a second; when she returned, she found no parrot! She hunted among the bushes, on the bank of the river, and on the roofs, without paying any attention to Madame Aubain who screamed at her: "Take care! you must be insane!" Then she searched every garden in Pont-l'Eveque and stopped the passers-by to inquire of them: "Haven't you perhaps seen my parrot?" To those who had never seen the parrot, she described him minutely. Suddenly she thought she saw something green fluttering behind the mills at the foot of the hill. But when she was at the top of the hill she could not see it. A hod-carrier told her that he had just seen the bird in Saint-Melaine, in Mother Simon's store. She rushed to the place. The people did not know what she was talking about. At last she came home, exhausted, with her slippers worn to shreds, and despair in her heart. She sat down on the bench near Madame and was telling of her search when presently a light weight dropped on her shoulder — Loulou! What the deuce had he been doing? Perhaps he had just taken a little walk around the town!

She did not easily forget her scare; in fact, she never got over it. In consequence of a cold, she caught a sore throat; and some time later she had an earache. Three years later she was stone deaf, and spoke in a very loud voice even in church. Although her sins might have been proclaimed throughout the diocese without any shame to herself, or ill effects to the community, the cure thought it advisable to receive her confession in the vestry-room.

Imaginary buzzings also added to her bewilderment. Her mistress often said to her: "My goodness, how stupid you are!" and she would answer: "Yes, Madame," and look for something.

The narrow circle of her ideas grew more restricted than it already was; the bellowing of the oxen, the chime of the bells no longer reached her intelligence. All things moved silently, like ghosts. Only one noise penetrated her ears; the parrot's voice.

As if to divert her mind, he reproduced for her the tick-tack of the spit in the kitchen, the shrill cry of the fish-vendors, the saw of the carpenter who had a shop opposite, and when the door-bell rang, he would imitate Madame Aubain: "Felicite! go to the front door."

They held conversations together, Loulou repeating the three phrases of his repertory over and over, Felicite replying by words that had no greater meaning, but in which she poured out her feelings. In her isolation, the parrot was almost a son, a love. He climbed upon her fingers, pecked at her lips, clung to her shawl, and when she rocked her head to and fro like a nurse, the big wings of her cap and the wings of the bird flapped in unison. When clouds gathered on the horizon and the thunder rumbled, Loulou would scream, perhaps because he remembered the storms in his native forests. The dripping of the rain would excite him to frenzy; he flapped around, struck the ceiling with his wings, upset everything, and would finally fly into the garden to play. Then he would come back into the room, light on one of the andirons, and hop around in order to get dry.

One morning during the terrible winter of 1837, when she had put him in front of the fire-place on account of the cold, she found him dead in his cage, hanging to the wire bars with his head down. He had probably died of congestion. But she believed that he had been poisoned, and although she had no proofs whatever, her suspicion rested on Fabu.

She wept so sorely that her mistress said: "Why don't you have him stuffed?"

She asked the advice of the chemist, who had always been kind to the bird.

He wrote to Havre for her. A certain man named Fellacher consented to do the work. But, as the diligence driver often lost parcels entrusted to him, Felicite resolved to take her pet to Honfleur herself.

Leafless apple-trees lined the edges of the road. The ditches were covered with ice. The dogs on the neighbouring farms barked; and Felicite, with her hands beneath her cape, her little black sabots and her basket, trotted along nimbly in the middle of the sidewalk. She crossed the forest, passed by the Haut-Chene, and reached Saint-Gatien.

Behind her, in a cloud of dust and impelled by the steep incline, a mail-coach drawn by galloping horses advanced like a whirlwind. When he saw a woman in the middle of the road, who did not get out of the way, the driver stood up in his seat and shouted to her and so did the postilion, while the four horses, which he could not hold back, accelerated their pace; the two leaders were almost upon her; with a jerk of the reins he threw them to one side, but, furious at the incident, he lifted his big whip and lashed her from her head to her feet with such violence that she fell to the ground unconscious.

Her first thought, when she recovered her senses, was to open the basket. Loulou was unharmed. She felt a sting on her right cheek; when she took her hand away it was red, for the blood was flowing.

She sat down on a pile of stones, and sopped her cheek with her handkerchief; then she ate a crust of bread she had put in her basket, and consoled herself by looking at the bird.

Arriving at the top of Ecquemanville, she saw the lights of Honfleur shining in the distance like so many stars; further on, the ocean spread out in a confused mass. Then a weakness came over her; the misery of her childhood, the disappointment of her first love, the departure of her nephew, the death of Virginia; all these things came back to her at once, and, rising like a swelling tide in her throat, almost choked her.

Then she wished to speak to the captain of the vessel, and without stating what she was sending, she gave him some instructions.

Fellacher kept the parrot a long time. He always promised that it would be ready for the following week; after six months he announced the shipment of a case, and that was the end of it. Really, it seemed as if Loulou would never come back to his home. "They have stolen him," thought Felicite.

Finally he arrived, sitting bold upright on a branch which could be screwed into a mahogany pedestal, with his foot in the air, his head on one side, and in his beak a nut which the naturalist, from love of the sumptuous, had gilded. She put him in her room.

This place, to which only a chosen few were admitted, looked like a chapel and a second-hand shop, so filled was it with devotional and heterogeneous things. The door could not be opened easily on account of the presence of a large wardrobe. Opposite the window that looked out into the garden, a bull's-eye opened on the yard; a table was placed by the cot and held a wash-basin, two combs, and a piece of blue soap in a broken saucer. On the walls were rosaries, medals, a number of Holy Virgins, and a holy-water basin made out of a cocoanut; on the bureau, which was covered with a napkin like an altar, stood the box of shells that Victor had given her; also a watering-can and a balloon, writing-books, the engraved geography and a pair of shoes; on the nail which held the mirror, hung Virginia's little plush hat! Felicite carried this sort of respect so far that she even kept one of Monsieur's old coats. All the things which Madame Aubain discarded, Felicite begged for her own room. Thus, she had artificial flowers on the edge of the bureau, and the picture of the Comte d'Artois in the recess of the window. By means of a board, Loulou was set on a portion of the chimney which advanced into the room. Every morning when she awoke, she saw him in the dim light of dawn and recalled bygone days and the smallest details of insignificant actions, without any sense of bitterness or grief.

As she was unable to communicate with people, she lived in a sort of somnambulistic torpor. The processions of Corpus-Christi Day seemed to wake her up. She visited the neighbours to beg for candlesticks and mats so as to adorn the temporary altars in the street.

In church, she always gazed at the Holy Ghost, and noticed that there was something about it that resembled a parrot. The likenesses appeared even more striking on a coloured picture by Espinal, representing the baptism of our Saviour. With his scarlet wings and emerald body, it was really the image of Loulou. Having bought the picture, she hung it near the one of the Comte d'Artois so that she could take them in at one glance.

They associated in her mind, the parrot becoming sanctified through the neighbourhood of the Holy Ghost, and the latter becoming more lifelike in her eyes, and more comprehensible. In all probability the Father had never chosen as messenger a dove, as the latter has no voice, but rather one of Loulou's ancestors. And Felicite said her prayers in front of the coloured picture, though from time to time she turned slightly towards the bird.

She desired very much to enter in the ranks of the "Daughters of the Virgin." But Madame Aubain dissuaded her from it.

A most important event occurred: Paul's marriage.

After being first a notary's clerk, then in business, then in the customs, and a tax collector, and having even applied for a position in the administration of woods and forests, he had at last, when he was thirty-six years old, by a divine inspiration, found his vocation: magistrature! and he displayed such a high ability that an inspector had offered him his daughter and his influence.

Paul, who had become quite settled, brought his bride to visit his mother.

But she looked down upon the customs of Pont-l'Eveque, put on airs, and hurt Felicite's feelings. Madame Aubain felt relieved when she left.

The following week they learned of Monsieur Bourais' death in an inn. There were rumours of suicide, which were confirmed; doubts concerning his integrity arose. Madame Aubain looked over her accounts and soon discovered his numerous embezzlements; sales of wood which had been concealed from her, false receipts, etc. Furthermore, he had an illegitimate child, and entertained a friendship for "a person in Dozule."

These base actions affected her very much. In March, 1853, she developed a pain in her chest; her tongue looked as if it were coated with smoke, and the leeches they applied did not relieve her oppression; and on the ninth evening she died, being just seventy-two years old.

People thought that she was younger, because her hair, which she wore in bands framing her pale face, was brown. Few friends regretted her loss, for her manner was so haughty that she did not attract them. Felicite mourned for her as servants seldom mourn for their masters. The fact that Madame should die before herself perplexed her mind and seemed contrary to the order of things, and absolutely monstrous and inadmissible. Ten days later (the time to journey from Besancon), the heirs arrived. Her daughter-in-law ransacked the drawers, kept some of the furniture, and sold the rest; then they went back to their own home.

Madame's armchair, foot-warmer, work-table, the eight chairs, everything was gone! The places occupied by the pictures formed yellow squares on the walls. They had taken the two little beds, and the wardrobe had been emptied of Virginia's belongings! Felicite went upstairs, overcome with grief.

The following day a sign was posted on the door; the chemist screamed in her ear that the house was for sale.

For a moment she tottered, and had to sit down.

What hurt her most was to give up her room, — so nice for poor Loulou! She looked at him in despair and implored the Holy Ghost, and it was this way that she contracted the idolatrous habit of saying her prayers kneeling in front of the bird. Sometimes the sun fell through the window on his glass eye, and lighted a spark in it which sent Felicite into ecstasy.

Her mistress had left her an income of three hundred and eighty francs. The garden supplied her with vegetables. As for clothes, she had enough to last her till the end of her days, and she economised on the light by going to bed at dusk.

She rarely went out, in order to avoid passing in front of the second-hand dealer's shop where there was some of the old furniture. Since her fainting spell, she dragged her leg, and as her strength was failing rapidly, old Mother Simon, who had lost her money in the grocery business, came very morning to chop the wood and pump the water.

Her eyesight grew dim. She did not open the shutters after that. Many years passed. But the house did not sell or rent. Fearing that she would be put out, Felicite did not ask for repairs. The laths of the roof were rotting away, and during one whole winter her bolster was wet. After Easter she spit blood.

Then Mother Simon went for a doctor. Felicite wished to know what her complaint was. But, being too deaf to hear, she caught only one word: "Pneumonia." She was familiar with it and gently answered: — "Ah! like Madame," thinking it quite natural that she should follow her mistress.

The time for the altars in the street drew near.

The first one was always erected at the foot of the hill, the second in front of the post-office, and the third in the middle of the street. This position occasioned some rivalry among the women and they finally decided upon Madame Aubain's yard.

Felicite's fever grew worse. She was sorry that she could not do anything for the altar. If she could, at least, have contributed something towards it! Then she thought of the parrot. Her neighbours objected that it would not be proper. But the cure gave his consent and she was so grateful for it that she begged him to accept after her death, her only treasure, Loulou. From Tuesday until Saturday, the day before the event, she coughed more frequently. In the evening her face was contracted, her lips stuck to her gums and she began to vomit; and on the following day, she felt so low that she called for a priest.

Three neighbours surrounded her when the dominie administered the Extreme Unction. Afterwards she said that she wished to speak to Fabu.

He arrived in his Sunday clothes, very ill at ease among the funereal surroundings.

“Forgive me,” she said, making an effort to extend her arm, “I believed it was you who killed him!”

What did such accusations mean? Suspect a man like him of murder! And Fabu became excited and was about to make trouble.

“Don’t you see she is not in her right mind?”

From time to time Felicite spoke to shadows. The women left her and Mother Simon sat down to breakfast.

A little later, she took Loulou and holding him up to Felicite:

“Say good-bye to him, now!” she commanded.

Although he was not a corpse, he was eaten up by worms; one of his wings was broken and the wadding was coming out of his body. But Felicite was blind now, and she took him and laid him against her cheek. Then Mother Simon removed him in order to set him on the altar.

CHAPTER V

The grass exhaled an odour of summer; flies buzzed in the air, the sun shone on the river and warmed the slated roof. Old Mother Simon had returned to Felicite and was peacefully falling asleep.

The ringing of bells woke her; the people were coming out of church. Felicite's delirium subsided. By thinking of the procession, she was able to see it as if she had taken part in it. All the school-children, the singers and the firemen walked on the sidewalks, while in the middle of the street came first the custodian of the church with his halberd, then the beadle with a large cross, the teacher in charge of the boys and a sister escorting the little girls; three of the smallest ones, with curly heads, threw rose leaves into the air; the deacon with outstretched arms conducted the music; and two incense-bearers turned with each step they took toward the Holy Sacrament, which was carried by M. le Cure, attired in his handsome chasuble and walking under a canopy of red velvet supported by four men. A crowd of people followed, jammed between the walls of the houses hung with white sheets; at last the procession arrived at the foot of the hill.

A cold sweat broke out on Felicite's forehead. Mother Simon wiped it away with a cloth, saying inwardly that some day she would have to go through the same thing herself.

The murmur of the crowd grew louder, was very distinct for a moment and then died away. A volley of musketry shook the window-panes. It was the postilions saluting the Sacrament. Felicite rolled her eyes, and said as loudly as she could:

"Is he all right?" meaning the parrot.

Her death agony began. A rattle that grew more and more rapid shook her body. Froth appeared at the corners of her mouth, and her whole frame trembled. In a little while could be heard the music of the bass horns, the clear voices of the children and the men's deeper notes. At intervals all was still, and their shoes sounded like a herd of cattle passing over the grass.

The clergy appeared in the yard. Mother Simon climbed on a chair to reach the bull's-eye, and in this manner could see the altar. It was covered with a lace cloth and draped with green wreaths. In the middle stood a little frame containing relics; at the corners were two little orange-trees, and all along the edge were silver candlesticks, porcelain vases containing sun-flowers, lilies, peonies, and tufts of hydrangeas. This mount of bright colours descended diagonally from the first floor to the carpet that covered the sidewalk. Rare objects arrested one's eye. A golden sugar-bowl was crowned with violets, earrings set with Alencon stones were displayed on green moss, and two Chinese screens with their bright landscapes were near by. Loulou, hidden beneath roses, showed nothing but his blue head which looked like a piece of lapis-lazuli.

The singers, the canopy-bearers and the children lined up against the sides of the yard. Slowly the priest ascended the steps and placed his shining sun on the lace cloth. Everybody knelt. There was deep silence; and the censers slipping on their chains were swung high in the air. A blue vapour rose in Felicite's room. She opened her nostrils and inhaled with a mystic sensuousness; then she closed her lids. Her lips smiled. The beats of her heart grew fainter and fainter, and vaguer, like a fountain giving out, like an echo dying away; — and when she exhaled her last breath, she thought she saw in the half-opened heavens a gigantic parrot hovering above her head.

THE LEGEND OF SAINT JULIAN THE HOSPITALLER

CHAPTER I

THE CURSE

Julian's father and mother dwelt in a castle built on the slope of a hill, in the heart of the woods.

The towers at its four corners had pointed roofs covered with leaden tiles, and the foundation rested upon solid rocks, which descended abruptly to the bottom of the moat.

In the courtyard, the stone flagging was as immaculate as the floor of a church. Long rain-spouts, representing dragons with yawning jaws, directed the water towards the cistern, and on each window-sill of the castle a basil or a heliotrope bush bloomed, in painted flower-pots.

A second enclosure, surrounded by a fence, comprised a fruit-orchard, a garden decorated with figures wrought in bright-hued flowers, an arbour with several bowers, and a mall for the diversion of the pages. On the other side were the kennel, the stables, the bakery, the wine-press and the barns. Around these spread a pasture, also enclosed by a strong hedge.

Peace had reigned so long that the portcullis was never lowered; the moats were filled with water; swallows built their nests in the cracks of the battlements, and as soon as the sun shone too strongly, the archer who all day long paced to and fro on the curtain, withdrew to the watch-tower and slept soundly.

Inside the castle, the locks on the doors shone brightly; costly tapestries hung in the apartments to keep out the cold; the closets overflowed with linen, the cellar was filled with casks of wine, and the oak chests fairly groaned under the weight of money-bags.

In the armoury could be seen, between banners and the heads of wild beasts, weapons of all nations and of all ages, from the slings of the Amalekites and the javelins of the Garamantes, to the broad-swords of the Saracens and the coats of mail of the Normans.

The largest spit in the kitchen could hold an ox; the chapel was as gorgeous as a king's oratory. There was even a Roman bath in a secluded part of the castle, though the good lord of the manor refrained from using it, as he deemed it a heathenish practice.

Wrapped always in a cape made of fox-skins, he wandered about the castle, rendered justice among his vassals and settled his neighbours' quarrels. In the winter, he gazed dreamily at the falling snow, or had stories read aloud to him. But as soon as the fine weather returned, he would mount his mule and sally forth into the country roads, edged with ripening wheat, to talk with the peasants, to whom he distributed advice. After a number of adventures he took unto himself a wife of high lineage.

She was pale and serious, and a trifle haughty. The horns of her head-dress touched the top of the doors and the hem of her gown trailed far behind her. She conducted her household like a cloister. Every morning she distributed work to the maids, supervised the making of preserves and unguents, and afterwards passed her time in spinning, or in embroidering altar-cloths. In response to her fervent prayers, God granted her a son!

Then there was great rejoicing; and they gave a feast which lasted three days and four nights, with illuminations and soft music. Chickens as large as sheep, and the rarest spices were served; for the entertainment of the guests, a dwarf crept out of a pie; and when the bowls were too few, for the crowd swelled continuously, the wine was drunk from helmets and hunting-horns.

The young mother did not appear at the feast. She was quietly resting in bed. One night she awoke, and beheld in a moonbeam that crept through the window something that looked like a moving shadow. It was an old man clad in sackcloth, who resembled a hermit. A rosary dangled at his side and he carried a beggar's sack on his shoulder. He approached the foot of the bed, and without opening his lips said: "Rejoice, O mother! Thy son shall be a saint."

She would have cried out, but the old man, gliding along the moonbeam, rose through the air and disappeared. The songs of the banqueters grew louder. She could hear angels' voices, and her head sank back on the pillow, which was surmounted by the bone of a martyr, framed in precious stones.

The following day, the servants, upon being questioned, declared, to a man, that they had seen no hermit. Then, whether dream or fact, this must certainly have been a communication from heaven; but she took care not to speak of it, lest she should be accused of presumption.

The guests departed at daybreak, and Julian's father stood at the castle gate, where he had just bidden farewell to the last one, when a beggar suddenly emerged from the mist and confronted him. He was a gipsy — for he had a braided beard and wore silver bracelets on each arm. His eyes burned and, in an inspired way, he muttered some disconnected words: "Ah! Ah! thy son! — great bloodshed — great glory — happy always — an emperor's family."

Then he stooped to pick up the alms thrown to him, and disappeared in the tall grass.

The lord of the manor looked up and down the road and called as loudly as he could. But no one answered him! The wind only howled and the morning mists were fast dissolving.

He attributed his vision to a dullness of the brain resulting from too much sleep. "If I should speak of it," quoth he, "people would laugh at me." Still, the glory that was to be his son's dazzled him, albeit the meaning of the prophecy was not clear to him, and he even doubted that he had heard it.

The parents kept their secret from each other. But both cherished the child with equal devotion, and as they considered him marked by God, they had great regard for his person. His cradle was lined with the softest feathers, and lamp representing a dove burned continually over it; three nurses rocked him night and day, and with his pink cheeks and blue eyes, brocaded cloak and embroidered cap he looked like a little Jesus. He cut all his teeth without even a whimper.

When he was seven years old his mother taught him to sing, and his father lifted him upon a tall horse, to inspire him with courage. The child smiled with delight, and soon became familiar with everything pertaining to chargers. An old and very learned monk taught him the Gospel, the Arabic numerals, the Latin letters, and the art of painting delicate designs on vellum. They worked in the top of a tower, away from all noise and disturbance.

When the lesson was over, they would go down into the garden and study the flowers.

Sometimes a herd of cattle passed through the valley below, in charge of a man in Oriental dress. The lord of the manor, recognising him as a merchant, would despatch a servant after him. The stranger, becoming confident, would stop on his way and after being ushered into the castle-hall, would display pieces of velvet and silk, trinkets and strange objects whose use was unknown in those parts. Then, in due time, he would take leave, without having been molested and with a handsome profit.

At other times, a band of pilgrims would knock at the door. Their wet garments would be hung in front of the hearth and after they had been refreshed by food they would relate their travels, and discuss the uncertainty of vessels on the high seas, their long journeys across burning sands, the ferocity of the infidels, the caves of Syria, the Manger and the Holy Sepulchre. They made presents to the young heir of beautiful shells, which they carried in their cloaks.

The lord of the manor very often feasted his brothers-at-arms, and over the wine the old warriors would talk of battles and attacks, of war-machines and of the frightful wounds they had received, so that Julian, who was a listener, would scream with excitement; then his father felt convinced that some day he would be a conqueror. But in the evening, after the Angelus, when he passed through the crowd of beggars who clustered about the church-door, he distributed his alms with so much modesty and nobility that his mother fully expected to see him become an archbishop in time.

His seat in the chapel was next to his parents, and no matter how long the services lasted, he remained kneeling on his prie-dieu, with folded hands and his velvet cap lying close beside him on the floor.

One day, during mass, he raised his head and beheld a little white mouse crawling out of a hole in the wall. It scrambled to the first altar-step and then, after a few gambols, ran back in the same direction. On the following Sunday, the idea of seeing the mouse again worried him. It returned; and every Sunday after that he watched for it; and it annoyed him so much that he grew to hate it and resolved to do away with it.

So, having closed the door and strewn some crumbs on the steps of the altar, he placed himself in front of the hole with a stick. After a long while a pink snout appeared, and then whole mouse crept out. He struck it lightly with his stick and stood stunned at the sight of the little, lifeless body. A drop of blood stained the floor. He wiped it away hastily with his sleeve, and picking up the mouse, threw it away, without saying a word about it to anyone.

All sorts of birds pecked at the seeds in the garden. He put some peas in a hollow reed, and when he heard birds chirping in a tree, he would approach cautiously, lift the tube and swell his cheeks; then, when the little creatures dropped about him in multitudes, he could not refrain from laughing and being delighted with his own cleverness.

One morning, as he was returning by way of the curtain, he beheld a fat pigeon sunning itself on the top of the wall. He paused to gaze at it; where he stood the rampart was cracked and a piece of stone was near at hand; he gave his arm a jerk and the well-aimed missile struck the bird squarely, sending it straight into the moat below.

He sprang after it, unmindful of the brambles, and ferreted around the bushes with the liveness of a young dog.

The pigeon hung with broken wings in the branches of a privet hedge.

The persistence of its life irritated the boy. He began to strangle it, and its convulsions made his heart beat quicker, and filled him with a wild, tumultuous voluptuousness, the last throb of its heart making him feel like fainting.

At supper that night, his father declared that at his age a boy should begin to hunt; and he arose and brought forth an old writing-book which contained, in questions and answers, everything pertaining to the pastime. In it, a master showed a supposed pupil how to train dogs and falcons, lay traps, recognise a stag by its fumets, and a fox or a wolf by footprints. He also taught the best way of discovering their tracks, how to start them, where their refuges are usually to be found, what winds are the most favourable, and further enumerated the various cries, and the rules of the quarry.

When Julian was able to recite all these things by heart, his father made up a pack of hounds for him. There were twenty-four greyhounds of Barbary, speedier than gazelles, but liable to get out of temper; seventeen couples of Breton dogs, great barkers, with broad chests and russet coats flecked with white. For wild-boar hunting and perilous doublings, there were forty boarhounds as hairy as bears.

The red mastiffs of Tartary, almost as large as donkeys, with broad backs and straight legs, were destined for the pursuit of the wild bull. The black coats of the spaniels shone like satin; the barking of the setters equalled that of the beagles. In a special enclosure were eight growling bloodhounds that tugged at their chains and rolled their eyes, and these dogs leaped at men's throats and were not afraid even of lions.

All ate wheat bread, drank from marble troughs, and had high-sounding names.

Perhaps the falconry surpassed the pack; for the master of the castle, by paying great sums of money, had secured Caucasian hawks, Babylonian sakers, German gerfalcons, and pilgrim falcons captured on the cliffs edging the cold seas, in distant lands. They were housed in a thatched shed and were chained to the perch in the order of size. In front of them was a little grass-plot where, from time to time, they were allowed to disport themselves.

Bag-nets, baits, traps and all sorts of snares were manufactured.

Often they would take out pointers who would set almost immediately; then the whippers-in, advancing step by step, would cautiously spread a huge net over their motionless bodies. At the command, the dogs would bark and arouse the quails; and the ladies of the neighbourhood, with their husbands, children and hand-maids, would fall upon them and capture them with ease.

At other times they used a drum to start hares; and frequently foxes fell into the ditches prepared for them, while wolves caught their paws in the traps.

But Julian scorned these convenient contrivances; he preferred to hunt away from the crowd, alone with his steed and his falcon. It was almost always a large, snow-white, Scythian bird. His leather hood was ornamented with a plume, and on his blue feet were bells; and he perched firmly on his master's arm while they galloped across the plains. Then Julian would suddenly untie his tether and let him fly, and the bold bird would dart through the air like an arrow, One might perceive two spots circle around, unite, and then disappear in the blue heights. Presently the falcon would return with a mutilated bird, and perch again on his master's gauntlet with trembling wings.

Julian loved to sound his trumpet and follow his dogs over hills and streams, into the woods; and when the stag began to moan under their teeth, he would kill it deftly, and delight in the fury of the brutes, which would devour the pieces spread out on the warm hide.

On foggy days, he would hide in the marshes to watch for wild geese, otters and wild ducks.

At daybreak, three equerries waited for him at the foot of the steps; and though the old monk leaned out of the dormer-window and made signs to him to return, Julian would not look around.

He heeded neither the broiling sun, the rain nor the storm; he drank spring water and ate wild berries, and when he was tired, he lay down under a tree; and he would come home at night covered with earth and blood, with thistles in his hair and smelling of wild beasts. He grew to be like them. And when his mother kissed him, he responded coldly to her caress and seemed to be thinking of deep and serious things.

He killed bears with a knife, bulls with a hatchet, and wild boars with a spear; and once, with nothing but a stick, he defended himself against some wolves, which were gnawing corpses at the foot of a gibbet.

* * * * *

One winter morning he set out before daybreak, with a bow slung across his shoulder and a quiver of arrows attached to the pommel of his saddle. The hoofs of his steed beat the ground with regularity and his two beagles trotted close behind. The wind was blowing hard and icicles clung to his cloak. A part of the horizon cleared, and he beheld some rabbits playing around their burrows. In an instant, the two dogs were upon them, and seizing as many as they could, they broke their backs in the twinkling of an eye.

Soon he came to a forest. A woodcock, paralysed by the cold, perched on a branch, with its head hidden under its wing. Julian, with a lunge of his sword, cut off its feet, and without stopping to pick it up, rode away.

Three hours later he found himself on the top of a mountain so high that the sky seemed almost black. In front of him, a long, flat rock hung over a precipice, and at the end two wild goats stood gazing down into the abyss. As he had no arrows (for he had left his steed behind), he thought he would climb down to where they stood; and with bare feet and bent back he at last reached the first goat and thrust his dagger below its ribs. But the second animal, in its terror, leaped into the precipice. Julian threw himself forward to strike it, but his right foot slipped, and he fell, face downward and with outstretched arms, over the body of the first goat.

After he returned to the plains, he followed a stream bordered by willows. From time to time, some cranes, flying low, passed over his head. He killed them with his whip, never missing a bird. He beheld in the distance the gleam of a lake which appeared to be of lead, and in the middle of it was an animal he had never seen before, a beaver with a black muzzle. Notwithstanding the distance that separated them, an arrow ended its life and Julian only regretted that he was not able to carry the skin home with him.

Then he entered an avenue of tall trees, the tops of which formed a triumphal arch to the entrance of a forest. A deer sprang out of the thicket and a badger crawled out of its hole, a stag appeared in the road, and a peacock spread its fan-shaped tail on the grass — and after he had slain them all, other deer, other stags, other badgers, other peacocks, and jays, blackbirds, foxes, porcupines, polecats, and lynxes, appeared; in fact, a host of beasts that grew more and more numerous with every step he took. Trembling, and with a look of appeal in their eyes, they gathered around Julian, but he did not stop slaying them; and so intent was he on stretching his bow, drawing his sword and whipping out his knife, that he had little thought for aught else. He knew that he was hunting in some country since an indefinite time, through the very fact of his existence, as everything seemed to occur with the ease one experiences in dreams. But presently an extraordinary sight made him pause.

He beheld a valley shaped like a circus and filled with stags which, huddled together, were warming one another with the vapour of their breaths that mingled with the early mist.

For a few minutes, he almost choked with pleasure at the prospect of so great a carnage. Then he sprang from his horse, rolled up his sleeves, and began to aim.

When the first arrow whizzed through the air, the stags turned their heads simultaneously. They huddled closer, uttered plaintive cries, and a great agitation seized the whole herd. The edge of the valley was too high to admit of flight; and the animals ran around the enclosure in their efforts to escape. Julian aimed, stretched his bow and his arrows fell as fast and thick as raindrops in a shower.

Maddened with terror, the stags fought and reared and climbed on top of one another; their antlers and bodies formed a moving mountain which tumbled to pieces whenever it displaced itself. Finally the last one expired. Their bodies lay stretched out on the sand with foam gushing from the nostrils and the bowels protruding. The heaving of their bellies grew less and less noticeable, and presently all was still.

Night came, and behind the trees, through the branches, the sky appeared like a sheet of blood.

Julian leaned against a tree and gazed with dilated eyes at the enormous slaughter. He was now unable to comprehend how he had accomplished it.

On the opposite side of the valley, he suddenly beheld a large stag, with a doe and their fawn. The buck was black and of enormous size; he had a white beard and carried sixteen antlers. His mate was the color of dead leaves, and she browsed upon the grass, while the fawn, clinging to her udder, followed her step by step.

Again the bow was stretched, and instantly the fawn dropped dead, and seeing this, its mother raised her head and uttered a poignant, almost human wail of agony. Exasperated, Julian thrust his knife into her chest, and felled her to the ground.

The great stag had watched everything and suddenly he sprang forward. Julian aimed his last arrow at the beast. It struck him between his antlers and stuck there.

The stag did not appear to notice it; leaping over the bodies, he was coming nearer and nearer with the intention, Julian thought, of charging at him and ripping him open, and he recoiled with inexpressible horror. But presently the huge animal halted, and, with eyes aflame and the solemn air of a patriarch and a judge, repeated thrice, while a bell tolled in the distance: "Accursed! Accursed! Accursed! some day, ferocious soul, thou wilt murder thy father and thy mother!"

Then he sank on his knees, gently closed his lids and expired.

At first Julian was stunned, and then a sudden lassitude and an immense sadness came over him. Holding his head between his hands, he wept for a long time.

His steed had wandered away; his dogs had forsaken him; the solitude seemed to threaten him with unknown perils. Impelled by a sense of sickening terror, he ran across the fields, and choosing a path at random, found himself almost immediately at the gates of the castle.

That night he could not rest, for, by the flickering light of the hanging lamp, he beheld again the huge black stag. He fought against the obsession of the prediction and kept repeating: "No! No! No! I cannot slay them!" and then he thought: "Still, supposing I desired to? —" and he feared that the devil might inspire him with this desire.

During three months, his distracted mother prayed at his bedside, and his father paced the halls of the castle in anguish. He consulted the most celebrated physicians, who prescribed quantities of medicine. Julian's illness, they declared, was due to some injurious wind or to amorous desire. But in reply to their questions, the young man only shook his head. After a time, his strength returned, and he was able to take a walk in the courtyard, supported by his father and the old monk.

But after he had completely recovered, he refused to hunt.

His father, hoping to please him, presented him with a large Saracen sabre. It was placed on a panoply that hung on a pillar, and a ladder was required to reach it. Julian climbed up to it one day, but the heavy weapon slipped from his grasp, and in falling grazed his father and tore his cloak. Julian, believing he had killed him, fell in a swoon.

After that, he carefully avoided weapons. The sight of a naked sword made him grow pale, and this weakness caused great distress to his family.

In the end, the old monk ordered him in the name of God, and of his forefathers, once more to indulge in the sport's of a nobleman.

The equerries diverted themselves every day with javelins and Julian soon excelled in the practice.

He was able to send a javelin into bottles, to break the teeth of the weather-cocks on the castle and to strike door-nails at a distance of one hundred feet.

One summer evening, at the hour when dusk renders objects indistinct, he was in the arbour in the garden, and thought he saw two white wings in the background hovering around the espalier. Not for a moment did he doubt that it was a stork, and so he threw his javelin at it.

A heart-rending scream pierced the air.

He had struck his mother, whose cap and long streams remained nailed to the wall.

Julian fled from home and never returned.

CHAPTER II

THE CRIME

He joined a horde of adventurers who were passing through the place.

He learned what it was to suffer hunger, thirst, sickness and filth. He grew accustomed to the din of battles and to the sight of dying men. The wind tanned his skin. His limbs became hardened through contact with armour, and as he was very strong and brave, temperate and of good counsel, he easily obtained command of a company.

At the outset of a battle, he would electrify his soldiers by a motion of his sword. He would climb the walls of a citadel with a knotted rope, at night, rocked by the storm, while sparks of fire clung to his cuirass, and molten lead and boiling tar poured from the battlements.

Often a stone would break his shield. Bridges crowded with men gave way under him. Once, by turning his mace, he rid himself of fourteen horsemen. He defeated all those who came forward to fight him on the field of honour, and more than a score of times it was believed that he had been killed.

However, thanks to Divine protection, he always escaped, for he shielded orphans, widows, and aged men. When he caught sight of one of the latter walking ahead of him, he would call to him to show his face, as if he feared that he might kill him by mistake.

All sorts of intrepid men gathered under his leadership, fugitive slaves, peasant rebels, and penniless bastards; he then organized an army which increased so much that he became famous and was in great demand.

He succoured in turn the Dauphin of France, the King of England, the Templars of Jerusalem, the General of the Parths, the Negus of Abyssinia and the Emperor of Calicut. He fought against Scandinavians covered with fish-scales, against negroes mounted on red asses and armed with shields made of hippopotamus hide, against gold-coloured Indians who wielded great, shining swords above their heads. He conquered the Troglodytes and the cannibals. He travelled through regions so torrid that the heat of the sun would set fire to the hair on one's head; he journeyed through countries so glacial that one's arms would fall from the body; and he passed through places where the fogs were so dense that it seemed like being surrounded by phantoms.

Republics in trouble consulted him; when he conferred with ambassadors, he always obtained unexpected concessions. Also, if a monarch behaved badly, he would arrive on the scene and rebuke him. He freed nations. He rescued queens sequestered in towers. It was he and no other that killed the serpent of Milan and the dragon of Oberbirsbach.

Now, the Emperor of Occitania, having triumphed over the Spanish Mussulmans, had taken the sister of the Caliph of Cordova as a concubine, and had had one daughter by her, whom he brought up in the teachings of Christ. But the Caliph, feigning that he wished to become converted, made him a visit, and brought with him a numerous escort. He slaughtered the entire garrison and threw the Emperor into a dungeon, and treated him with great cruelty in order to obtain possession of his treasures.

Julian went to his assistance, destroyed the army of infidels, laid siege to the city, slew the Caliph, chopped off his head and threw it over the fortifications like a cannon-ball.

As a reward for so great a service, the Emperor presented him with a large sum of money in baskets; but Julian declined it. Then the Emperor, thinking that the amount was not sufficiently large, offered him three quarters of his fortune, and on meeting a second refusal, proposed to share his kingdom with his benefactor. But Julian only thanked him for it, and the Emperor felt like weeping with vexation at not being able to show his gratitude, when he suddenly tapped his forehead and whispered a few words in the ear of one of his courtiers; the tapestry curtains parted and a young girl appeared.

Her large black eyes shone like two soft lights. A charming smile parted her lips. Her curls were caught in the jewels of her half-opened bodice, and the grace of her youthful body could be divined under the transparency of her tunic.

She was small and quite plump, but her waist was slender.

Julian was absolutely dazzled, all the more since he had always led a chaste life.

So he married the Emperor's daughter, and received at the same time a castle she had inherited from her mother; and when the rejoicings were over, he departed with his bride, after many courtesies had been exchanged on both sides.

The castle was of Moorish design, in white marble, erected on a promontory and surrounded by orange-trees.

Terraces of flowers extended to the shell-strewn shores of a beautiful bay. Behind the castle spread a fan-shaped forest. The sky was always blue, and the trees were swayed in turn by the ocean-breeze and by the winds that blew from the mountains that closed the horizon.

Light entered the apartments through the incrustations of the walls. High, reed-like columns supported the ceiling of the cupolas, decorated in imitation of stalactites.

Fountains played in the spacious halls; the courts were inlaid with mosaic; there were festooned partitions and a great profusion of architectural fancies; and everywhere reigned a silence so deep that the swish of a sash or the echo of a sigh could be distinctly heard.

Julian now had renounced war. Surrounded by a peaceful people, he remained idle, receiving every day a throng of subjects who came and knelt before him and kissed his hand in Oriental fashion.

Clad in sumptuous garments, he would gaze out of the window and think of his past exploits; and wish that he might again run in the desert in pursuit of ostriches and gazelles, hide among the bamboos to watch for leopards, ride through forests filled with rhinoceroses, climb the most inaccessible peaks in order to have a better aim at the eagles, and fight the polar bears on the icebergs of the northern sea.

Sometimes, in his dreams, he fancied himself like Adam in the midst of Paradise, surrounded by all the beasts; by merely extending his arm, he was able to kill them; or else they filed past him, in pairs, by order of size, from the lions and the elephants to the ermines and the ducks, as on the day they entered Noah's Ark.

Hidden in the shadow of a cave, he aimed unerring arrows at them; then came others and still others, until he awoke, wild-eyed.

Princes, friends of his, invited him to their meets, but he always refused their invitations, because he thought that by this kind of penance he might possibly avert the threatened misfortune; it seemed to him that the fate of his parents depended on his refusal to slaughter animals. He suffered because he could not see them, and his other desire was growing well-nigh unbearable.

In order to divert his mind, his wife had dancers and jugglers come to the castle.

She went abroad with him in an open litter; at other times, stretched out on the edge of a boat, they watched for hours the fish disport themselves in the water, which was as clear as the sky. Often she playfully threw flowers at him or nestling at his feet, she played melodies on an old mandolin; then, clasping her hands on his shoulder, she would inquire tremulously: "What troubles thee, my dear lord?"

He would not reply, or else he would burst into tears; but at last, one day, he confessed his fearful dread.

His wife scorned the idea and reasoned wisely with him: probably his father and mother were dead; and even if he should ever see them again, through what chance, to what end, would he arrive at this abomination? Therefore, his fears were groundless, and he should hunt again.

Julian listened to her and smiled, but he could not bring himself to yield to his desire.

One August evening when they were in their bed-chamber, she having just retired and he being about to kneel in prayer, he heard the yelping of a fox and light footsteps under the window; and he thought he saw things in the dark that looked like animals. The temptation was too strong. He seized his quiver.

His wife appeared astonished.

"I am obeying you," quoth he, "and I shall be back at sunrise."

However, she feared that some calamity would happen. But he reassured her and departed, surprised at her illogical moods.

A short time afterwards, a page came to announce that two strangers desired, in the absence of the lord of the castle, to see its mistress at once.

Soon a stooping old man and an aged woman entered the room; their coarse garments were covered with dust and each leaned on a stick.

They grew bold enough to say that they brought Julian news of his parents. She leaned out of the bed to listen to them. But after glancing at each other, the old people asked her whether he ever referred to them and if he still loved them.

“Oh! yes!” she said.

Then they exclaimed:

“We are his parents!” and they sat themselves down, for they were very tired.

But there was nothing to show the young wife that her husband was their son.

They proved it by describing to her the birthmarks he had on his body. Then she jumped out of bed, called a page, and ordered that a repast be served to them.

But although they were very hungry, they could scarcely eat, and she observed surreptitiously how their lean fingers trembled whenever they lifted their cups.

They asked a hundred questions about their son, and she answered each one of them, but she was careful not to refer to the terrible idea that concerned them.

When he failed to return, they had left their château; and had wandered for several years, following vague indications but without losing hope.

So much money had been spent at the tolls of the rivers and in inns, to satisfy the rights of princes and the demands of highwaymen, that now their purse was quite empty and they were obliged to beg. But what did it matter, since they were about to clasp again their son in their arms? They lauded his happiness in having such a beautiful wife, and did not tire of looking at her and kissing her.

The luxuriousness of the apartment astonished them; and the old man, after examining the walls, inquired why they bore the coat-of-arms of the Emperor of Occitania.

“He is my father,” she replied.

And he marvelled and remembered the prediction of the gipsy, while his wife meditated upon the words the hermit had spoken to her. The glory of their son was undoubtedly only the dawn of eternal splendours, and the old people remained awed while the light from the candelabra on the table fell on them.

In the heyday of youth, both had been extremely handsome. The mother had not lost her hair, and bands of snowy whiteness framed her cheeks; and the father, with his stalwart figure and long beard, looked like a carved image.

Julian's wife prevailed upon them not to wait for him. She put them in her bed and closed the curtains; and they both fell asleep. The day broke and outdoors the little birds began to chirp.

Meanwhile, Julian had left the castle grounds and walked nervously through the forest, enjoying the velvety softness of the grass and the balminess of the air.

The shadow of the trees fell on the earth. Here and there, the moonlight flecked the glades and Julian feared to advance, because he mistook the silvery light for water and the tranquil surface of the pools for grass. A great stillness reigned everywhere, and he failed to see any of the beasts that only a moment ago were prowling around the castle. As he walked on, the woods grew thicker, and the darkness more impenetrable. Warm winds, filled with enervating perfumes, caressed him; he sank into masses of dead leaves, and after a while he leaned against an oak-tree to rest and catch his breath.

Suddenly a body blacker than the surrounding darkness sprang from behind the tree. It was a wild boar. Julian did not have time to stretch his bow, and he bewailed the fact as if it were some great misfortune. Presently, having left the woods, he beheld a wolf slinking along a hedge.

He aimed an arrow at him. The wolf paused, turned his head and quietly continued on his way. He trotted along, always keeping at the same distance, pausing now and then to look around and resuming his flight as soon as an arrow was aimed in his direction.

In this way Julian traversed an apparently endless plain, then sand-hills, and at last found himself on a plateau, that dominated a great stretch of land. Large flat stones were interspersed among crumbling vaults; bones and skeletons covered the ground, and here and there some mouldy crosses stood desolate. But presently, shapes moved in the darkness of the tombs, and from them came panting, wild-eyed hyenas. They approached him and smelled him, grinning hideously and disclosing their gums. He whipped out his sword, but they scattered in every direction and continuing their swift, limping gallop, disappeared in a cloud of dust.

Some time afterwards, in a ravine, he encountered a wild bull, with threatening horns, pawing the sand with his hoofs. Julian thrust his lance between his dewlaps. But his weapon snapped as if the beast were made of bronze; then he closed his eyes in anticipation of his death. When he opened them again, the bull had vanished.

Then his soul collapsed with shame. Some supernatural power destroyed his strength, and he set out for home through the forest. The woods were a tangle of creeping plants that he had to cut with his sword, and while he was thus engaged, a weasel slid between his feet, a panther jumped over his shoulder, and a serpent wound itself around the ash-tree.

Among its leaves was a monstrous jackdaw that watched Julian intently, and here and there, between the branches, appeared great, fiery sparks as if the sky were raining all its stars upon the forest. But the sparks were the eyes of wild-cats, owls, squirrels, monkeys and parrots.

Julian aimed his arrows at them, but the feathered weapons lighted on the leaves of the trees and looked like white butterflies. He threw stones at them; but the missiles did not strike, and fell to the ground. Then he cursed himself, and howled imprecations, and in his rage he could have struck himself.

Then all the beasts he had pursued appeared, and formed a narrow circle around him. Some sat on their hindquarters, while others stood at full height. And Julian remained among them, transfixed with terror and absolutely unable to move. By a supreme effort of his will-power, he took a step forward; those that perched in the trees opened their wings, those that trod the earth moved their limbs, and all accompanied him.

The hyenas strode in front of him, the wolf and the wild boar brought up the rear. On his right, the bull swung its head and on his left the serpent crawled through the grass; while the panther, arching its back, advanced with velvety footfalls and long strides. Julian walked as slowly as possible, so as not to irritate them, while in the depth of bushes he could distinguish porcupines, foxes, vipers, jackals, and bears.

He began to run; the brutes followed him. The serpent hissed, the malodorous beasts frothed at the mouth, the wild boar rubbed his tusks against his heels, and the wolf scratched the palms of his hands with the hairs of his snout. The monkeys pinched him and made faces, the weasel tolled over his feet. A bear knocked his cap off with its huge paw, and the panther disdainfully dropped an arrow it was about to put in its mouth.

Irony seemed to incite their sly actions. As they watched him out of the corners of their eyes, they seemed to meditate a plan of revenge, and Julian, who was deafened by the buzzing of the insects, bruised by the wings and tails of the birds, choked by the stench of animal breaths, walked with outstretched arms and closed lids, like a blind man, without even the strength to beg for mercy.

The crowing of a cock vibrated in the air. Other cocks responded; it was day; and Julian recognised the top of his palace rising above the orange-trees.

Then, on the edge of a field, he beheld some red partridges fluttering around a stubble-field. He unfastened his cloak and threw it over them like a net. When he lifted it, he found only a bird that had been dead a long time and was decaying.

This disappointment irritated him more than all the others. The thirst for carnage stirred afresh within him; animals failing him, he desired to slaughter men.

He climbed the three terraces and opened the door with a blow of his fist; but at the foot of the staircase, the memory of his beloved wife softened his heart. No doubt she was asleep, and he would go up and surprise her. Having removed his sandals, he unlocked the door softly and entered.

The stained windows dimmed the pale light of dawn. Julian stumbled over some garment's lying on the floor and a little further on, he knocked against a table covered with dishes. "She must have eaten," he thought; so he advanced cautiously towards the bed which was concealed by the darkness in the back of the room. When he reached the edge, he leaned over the pillow where the two heads were resting close together and stooped to kiss his wife. His mouth encountered a man's beard.

He fell back, thinking he had become crazed; then he approached the bed again and his searching fingers discovered some hair which seemed to be very long. In order to convince himself that he was mistaken, he once more passed his hand slowly over the pillow. But this time he was sure that it was a beard and that a man was there! a man lying beside his wife!

Flying into an ungovernable passion, he sprang upon them with his drawn dagger, foaming, stamping and howling like a wild beast. After a while he stopped.

The corpses, pierced through the heart, had not even moved. He listened attentively to the two death-rattles, they were almost alike, and as they grew fainter, another voice, coming from far away, seemed to continue them. Uncertain at first, this plaintive voice came nearer and nearer, grew louder and louder and presently he recognised, with a feeling of abject terror, the bellowing of the great black stag.

And as he turned around, he thought he saw the spectre of his wife standing at the threshold with a light in her hand.

The sound of the murder had aroused her. In one glance she understood what had happened and fled in horror, letting the candle drop from her hand. Julian picked it up.

His father and mother lay before him, stretched on their backs, with gaping wounds in their breasts; and their faces, the expression of which was full of tender dignity, seemed to hide what might be an eternal secret.

Splashes and blotches of blood were on their white skin, on the bed-clothes, on the floor, and on an ivory Christ which hung in the alcove. The scarlet reflection of the stained window, which just then was struck by the sun, lighted up the bloody spots and appeared to scatter them around the whole room. Julian walked toward the corpses, repeating to himself and trying to believe that he was mistaken, that it was not possible, that there are often inexplicable likenesses.

At last he bent over to look closely at the old man and he saw, between the half-closed lids, a dead pupil that scorched him like fire. Then he went over to the other side of the bed, where the other corpse lay, but the face was partly hidden by bands of white hair. Julian slipped his finger beneath them and raised the head, holding it at arm's length to study its features, while, with his other hand he lifted the torch. Drops of blood oozed from the mattress and fell one by one upon the floor.

At the close of the day, he appeared before his wife, and in a changed voice commanded her first not to answer him, not to approach him, not even to look at him, and to obey, under the penalty of eternal damnation, every one of his orders, which were irrevocable.

The funeral was to be held in accordance with the written instructions he had left on a chair in the death-chamber.

He left her his castle, his vassals, all his worldly goods, without keeping even his clothes or his sandals, which would be found at the top of the stairs.

She had obeyed the will of God in bringing about his crime, and accordingly she must pray for his soul, since henceforth he should cease to exist.

The dead were buried sumptuously in the chapel of a monastery which it took three days to reach from the castle. A monk wearing a hood that covered his head followed the procession alone, for nobody dared to speak to him. And during the mass, he lay flat on the floor with his face downward and his arms stretched out at his sides.

After the burial, he was seen to take the road leading into the mountains. He looked back several times, and finally passed out of sight.

CHAPTER III

THE REPARATION

He left the country and begged his daily bread on his way.

He stretched out his hand to the horsemen he met in the roads, and humbly approached the harvesters in the fields; or else remained motionless in front of the gates of castles; and his face was so sad that he was never turned away.

Obedying a spirit of humility, he related his history to all men, and they would flee from him and cross themselves. In villages through which he had passed before, the good people bolted the doors, threatened him, and threw stones at him as soon as they recognised him. The more charitable ones placed a bowl on the window-sill and closed the shutters in order to avoid seeing him.

Repelled and shunned by everyone, he avoided his fellow-men and nourished himself with roots and plants, stray fruits and shells which he gathered along the shores.

Often, at the bend of a hill, he could perceive a mass of crowded roofs, stone spires, bridges, towers and narrow streets, from which arose a continual murmur of activity.

The desire to mingle with men impelled him to enter the city. But the gross and beastly expression of their faces, the noise of their industries and the indifference of their remarks, chilled his very heart. On holidays, when the cathedral bells rang out at daybreak and filled the people's hearts with gladness, he watched the inhabitants coming out of their dwellings, the dancers in the public squares, the fountains of ale, the damask hangings spread before the houses of princes; and then, when night came, he would peer through the windows at the long tables where families gathered and where grandparents held little children on their knees; then sobs would rise in his throat and he would turn away and go back to his haunts.

He gazed with yearning at the colts in the pastures, the birds in their nests, the insects on the flowers; but they all fled from him at his approach and hid or flew away. So he sought solitude. But the wind brought to his ears sounds resembling death-rattles; the tears of the dew reminded him of heavier drops, and every evening, the sun would spread blood in the sky, and every night, in his dreams, he lived over his parricide.

He made himself a hair-cloth lined with iron spikes. On his knees, he ascended every hill that was crowned with a chapel. But the unrelenting thought spoiled the splendour of the tabernacles and tortured him in the midst of his penances.

He did not rebel against God, who had inflicted his action, but he despaired at the thought that he had committed it.

He had such a horror of himself that he took all sorts of risks. He rescued paralytics from fire and children from waves. But the ocean scorned him and the flames spared him. Time did not allay his torment, which became so intolerable that he resolved to die.

One day, while he was stooping over a fountain to judge of its depth, an old man appeared on the other side. He wore a white beard and his appearance was so lamentable that Julian could not keep back his tears. The old man also was weeping. Without recognising him, Julian remembered confusedly a face that resembled his. He uttered a cry; for it was his father who stood before him; and he gave up all thought of taking his own life.

Thus weighted down by his recollections, he travelled through many countries and arrived at a river which was dangerous, because of its violence and the slime that covered its shores. Since a long time nobody had ventured to cross it.

The bow of an old boat, whose stern was buried in the mud, showed among the reeds. Julian, on examining it closely, found a pair of oars and hit upon the idea of devoting his life to the service of his fellow-men.

He began by establishing on the bank of the river a sort of road which would enable people to approach the edge of the stream; he broke his nails in his efforts to lift enormous stones which he pressed against the pit of his stomach in order to transport them from one point to another; he slipped in the mud, he sank into it, and several times was on the very brink of death.

Then he took to repairing the boat with debris of vessels, and afterwards built himself a hut with putty and trunks of trees.

When it became known that a ferry had been established, passengers flocked to it. They hailed him from the opposite side by waving flags, and Julian would jump into the boat and row over. The craft was very heavy, and the people loaded it with all sorts of baggage, and beasts of burden, who reared with fright, thereby adding greatly to the confusion. He asked nothing for his trouble; some gave him left-over victuals which they took from their sacks or worn-out garments which they could no longer use.

The brutal ones hurled curses at him, and when he rebuked them gently they replied with insults, and he was content to bless them.

A little table, a stool, a bed made of dead leaves and three earthen bowls were all he possessed. Two holes in the wall served as windows. On one side, as far as the eye could see, stretched barren wastes studded here and there with pools of water; and in front of him flowed the greenish waters of the wide river. In the spring, a putrid odour arose from the damp sod. Then fierce gales lifted clouds of dust that blew everywhere, even settling in the water and in one's mouth. A little later swarms of mosquitoes appeared, whose buzzing and stinging continued night and day. After that, came frightful frosts which communicated a stone-like rigidity to everything and inspired one with an insane desire for meat. Months passed when Julian never saw a human being. He often closed his lids and endeavored to recall his youth; — he beheld the courtyard of a castle, with greyhounds stretched out on a terrace, an armoury filled with valets, and under a bower of vines a youth with blond curls, sitting between an old man wrapped in furs and a lady with a high cap; presently the corpses rose before him, and then he would throw himself face downward on his cot and sob:

“Oh! poor father! poor mother! poor mother!” and would drop into a fitful slumber in which the terrible visions recurred.

One night he thought that some one was calling to him in his sleep. He listened intently, but could hear nothing save the roaring of the waters.

But the same voice repeated: “Julian!”

It proceeded from the opposite shore, fact which appeared extraordinary to him, considering the breadth of the river.

The voice called a third time: “Julian!”

And the high-pitched tones sounded like the ringing of a church-bell.

Having lighted his lantern, he stepped out of his cabin. A frightful storm raged. The darkness was complete and was illuminated here and there only by the white waves leaping and tumbling.

After a moment's hesitation, he untied the rope. The water presently grew smooth and the boat glided easily to the opposite shore, where a man was waiting.

He was wrapped in a torn piece of linen; his face was like a chalk mask, and his eyes were redder than glowing coals. When Julian held up his lantern he noticed that the stranger was covered with hideous sores; but notwithstanding this, there was in his attitude something like the majesty of a king.

As soon as he stepped into the boat, it sank deep into the water, borne downward by his weight; then it rose again and Julian began to row.

With each stroke of the oars, the force of the waves raised the bow of the boat. The water, which was blacker than ink, ran furiously along the sides. It formed abysses and then mountains, over which the boat glided, then it fell into yawning depths where, buffeted by the wind, it whirled around and around.

Julian leaned far forward and, bracing himself with his feet, bent backwards so as to bring his whole strength into play. Hail-stones cut his hands, the rain ran down his back, the velocity of the wind suffocated him. He stopped rowing and let the boat drift with the tide. But realising that an important matter was at stake, a command which could not be disregarded, he picked up the oars again; and the rattling of the tholes mingled with the clamourings of the storm.

The little lantern burned in front of him. Sometimes birds fluttered past it and obscured the light. But he could distinguish the eyes of the leper who stood at the stern, as motionless as a column.

And the trip lasted a long, long time.

When they reached the hut, Julian closed the door and saw the man sit down on the stool. The species of shroud that was wrapped around him had fallen below his loins, and his shoulders and chest and lean arms were hidden under blotches of scaly pustules. Enormous wrinkles crossed his forehead. Like a skeleton, he had a hole instead of a nose, and from his bluish lips came breath which was fetid and as thick as mist.

“I am hungry,” he said.

Julian set before him what he had, a piece of pork and some crusts of coarse bread.

After he had devoured them, the table, the bowl, and the handle of the knife bore the same scales that covered his body.

Then he said: “I thirst!”

Julian fetched his jug of water and when he lifted it, he smelled an aroma that dilated his nostrils and filled his heart with gladness. It was wine; what a boon! but the leper stretched out his arm and emptied the jug at one draught.

Then he said: “I am cold!”

Julian ignited a bundle of ferns that lay in the middle of the hut. The leper approached the fire and, resting on his heels, began to warm himself; his whole frame shook and he was failing visibly; his eyes grew dull, his sores began to break, and in a faint voice he whispered:

“Thy bed!”

Julian helped him gently to it, and even laid the sail of his boat over him to keep him warm.

The leper tossed and moaned. The corners of his mouth were drawn up over his teeth; an accelerated death-rattle shook his chest and with each one of his aspirations, his stomach touched his spine. At last, he closed his eyes.

“I feel as if ice were in my bones! Lay thyself beside me!” he commanded. Julian took off his garments; and then, as naked as on the day he was born, he got into the bed; against his thigh he could feel the skin of the leper, and it was colder than a serpent and as rough as a file.

He tried to encourage the leper, but he only whispered:

“Oh! I am about to die! Come closer to me and warm me! Not with thy hands! No! with thy whole body.”

So Julian stretched himself out upon the leper, lay on him, lips to lips, chest to chest.

Then the leper clasped him close and presently his eyes shone like stars; his hair lengthened into sunbeams; the breath of his nostrils had the scent of roses; a cloud of incense rose from the hearth, and the waters began to murmur harmoniously; an abundance of bliss, a superhuman joy, filled the soul of the swooning Julian, while he who clasped him to his breast grew and grew until his head and his feet touched the opposite walls of the cabin. The roof flew up in the air, disclosing the heavens, and Julian ascended into infinity face to face with our Lord Jesus Christ, who bore him straight to heaven.

And this is the story of Saint Julian the Hospitaller, as it is given on the stained-glass window of a church in my birthplace.

HERODIAS

CHAPTER I

In the eastern side of the Dead Sea rose the citadel of Machaerus. It was built upon a conical peak of basalt, and was surrounded by four deep valleys, one on each side, another in front, and the fourth in the rear. At the base of the citadel, crowding against one another, a group of houses stood within the circle of a wall, whose outlines undulated with the unevenness of the soil. A zigzag road, cutting through the rocks, joined the city to the fortress, the walls of which were about one hundred and twenty cubits high, having numerous angles and ornamental towers that stood out like jewels in this crown of stone overhanging an abyss.

Within the high walls stood a palace, adorned with many richly carved arches, and surrounded by a terrace that on one side of the building spread out below a wide balcony made of sycamore wood, upon which tall poles had been erected to support an awning.

One morning, just before sunrise, the tetrarch, Herod-Antipas, came out alone upon the balcony. He leaned against one of the columns and looked about him.

The crests of the hill-tops in the valley below the palace were just discernible in the light of the false dawn, although their bases, extending to the abyss, were still plunged in darkness. A light mist floated in the air; presently it lifted, and the shores of the Dead Sea became visible. The sun, rising behind Machaerus, spread a rosy flush over the sky, lighting up the stony shores, the hills, and the desert, and illuming the distant mountains of Judea, rugged and grey in the early dawn. En-gedi, the central point of the group, threw a deep black shadow; Hebron, in the background, was round-topped like a dome; Eschol had her pomegranates, Sorek her vineyards, Carmel her fields of sesame; and the tower of Antonia, with its enormous cube, dominated Jerusalem. The tetrarch turned his gaze from it to contemplate the palms of Jericho on his right; and his thoughts dwelt upon other cities of his beloved Galilee, — Capernaum, Endor, Nazareth, Tiberias — whither it might be he would never return.

The Jordan wound its way through the arid plains that met his gaze; white and glittering under the clear sky, it dazzled the eye like snow in the rays of the sun.

The Dead Sea now looked like a sheet of lapis-lazuli; and at its southern extremity, on the coast of Yemen, Antipas recognised clearly what at first he had been able only dimly to perceive. Several tents could now be plainly seen; men carrying spears were moving about among a group of horses; and dying camp-fires shone faintly in the beams of the rising sun.

This was a troop belonging to the sheikh of the Arabs, the daughter of whom the tetrarch had repudiated in order to wed Herodias, already married to one of his brothers, who lived in Italy but who had no pretensions to power.

Antipas was waiting for assistance and reinforcements from the Romans, but as Vitellius, the Governor of Syria, had not yet arrived, he was consumed with impatience and anxiety. Perhaps Agrippa had ruined his cause with the Emperor, he thought. Philip, his third brother, sovereign of Batania, was arming himself clandestinely. The Jews were becoming intolerant of the tetrarch's idolatries; he knew that many were weary of his rule; and he hesitated now between adopting one of two projects: to conciliate the Arabs and win back their allegiance, or to conclude an alliance with the Parthians. Under the pretext of celebrating his birthday, he had planned to bring together, at a grand banquet, the chiefs of his troops, the stewards of his domains, and the most important men from the region about Galilee.

Antipas threw a keen glance along all the roads leading to Machaerus. They were deserted. Eagles were sweeping through the air high above his head; the soldiers of the guard, placed at intervals along the ramparts, slept or dozed, leaning against the walls; all was silent within the castle.

Suddenly he heard the sound of a distant voice, seeming to come from the very depths of the earth. His cheek paled. After an instant's hesitation, he leaned far over the balcony railing, listening intently, but the voice had died away. Presently it rose again upon the quiet air;

Antipas clapped his hands together loudly, crying: "Mannaeus! Mannaeus!"

Instantly a man appeared, naked to the waist, after the fashion of a masseur at the bath. Although emaciated, and somewhat advanced in years, he was a giant in stature, and on his hip he wore a cutlass in a bronze scabbard. His bushy hair, gathered up and held in place by a kind of comb, exaggerated the apparent size of his massive head. His eyes were heavy with sleep, but his white teeth shone, his step was light on the flagstones, and his body had the suppleness of an ape, although his countenance was as impassive as that of a mummy.

"Where is he?" demanded the tetrarch of this strange being.

Mannaeus made a movement over his shoulder with his thumb, saying:

"Over there — still there!"

"I thought I heard him cry out."

And Antipas, after drawing a deep breath, asked for news of Iakannan, afterwards known as St. John the Baptist. Had he been allowed to see the two men who had asked permission to visit his dungeon a few days before, and since that time, had any one discovered for what purpose the men desired to see him?

"They exchanged some strange words with him," Mannaeus replied, "with the mysterious air of robbers conspiring at the cross-roads. Then they departed towards Upper Galilee, saying that they were the bearers of great tidings."

Antipas bent his head for a moment; then raising it quickly, said in a tone full of alarm:

"Guard him! watch him well! Do not allow any one else to see him. Keep the gates shut and the entrance to the dungeon closed fast. It must not even be suspected that he still lives!"

Mannaeus had already attended to all these details, because Iakannan was a Jew, and, like all the Samaritans, Mannaeus hated the Jews.

Their temple on the Mount of Gerizim, which Moses had designed to be the centre of Israel, had been destroyed since the reign of King Hyrcanus; and the temple at Jerusalem made the Samaritans furious; they regarded its presence as an outrage against themselves, and a permanent injustice. Mannaeus, indeed, had forcibly entered it, for the purpose of defiling its altar with the bones of corpses. Several of his companions, less agile than he, had been caught and beheaded.

From the tetrarch's balcony, the temple was visible through an opening between two hills. The sun, now fully risen, shed a dazzling splendour on its walls of snowy marble and the plates of purest gold that formed its roof. The structure shone like a luminous mountain, and its radiant purity indicated something almost superhuman, eclipsing even its suggestion of opulence and pride.

Mannaeus stretched out his powerful arm towards Zion, and, with clenched fist and his great body drawn to its full height, he launched a bitter anathema at the city, with perfect faith that eventually his curse must be effective.

Antipas listened, without appearing to be shocked at the strength of the invectives.

When the Samaritan had become somewhat calmer, he returned to the subject of the prisoner.

"Sometimes he grows excited," said he, "then he longs to escape or talks about a speedy deliverance. At other times he is as quiet as a sick animal, although I often find him pacing to and fro in his gloomy dungeon, murmuring, 'In order that His glory may increase, mine must diminish.'"

Antipas and Mannaëus looked at each other a moment in silence. But the tetrarch was weary of pondering on this troublesome matter.

The mountain peaks surrounding the palace, looking like great petrified waves, the black depths among the cliffs, the immensity of the blue sky, the rising sun, and the gloomy valley of the abyss, filled the soul of Antipas with a vague unrest; he felt an overwhelming sense of oppression at the sight of the desert, whose uneven piles of sand suggested crumbling amphitheaters or ruined palaces. The hot wind brought an odour of sulphur, as if it had rolled up from cities accursed and buried deeper than the river-bed of the slow-running Jordan.

These aspects of nature, which seemed to his troubled fancy signs of the wrath of the gods, terrified him, and he leaned heavily against the balcony railing, his eyes fixed, his head resting upon his hands.

Presently he felt a light touch upon his shoulder. He turned, and saw Herodias standing beside him. A purple robe enveloped her, falling to her sandaled feet. Having left her chamber hurriedly, she wore no jewels nor other ornaments. A thick tress of rippling black hair hung over her shoulder and hid itself in her bosom; her nostrils, a little too large for beauty, quivered with triumph, and her face was alight with joy. She gently shook the tetrarch's shoulder, and exclaimed exultantly:

“Caesar is our friend! Agrippa has been imprisoned!”

“Who told thee that?”

“I know it!” she replied, adding: “It was because he coveted the crown of Caligula.”

While living upon the charity of Antipas and Herodias, Agrippa had intrigued to become king, a title for which the tetrarch was as eager as he. But if this news were true, no more was to be feared from Agrippa's scheming.

“The dungeons of Tiberias are hard to open, and sometimes life itself is uncertain within their depths,” said Herodias, with grim significance.

Antipas understood her; and, although she was Agrippa's sister, her atrocious insinuation seemed entirely justifiable to the tetrarch. Murder and outrage were to be expected in the management of political intrigues; they were a part of the fatal inheritance of royal houses; and in the family of Herodias nothing was more common.

Then she rapidly unfolded to the tetrarch the secrets of her recent undertakings, telling him how many men had been bribed, what letters had been intercepted, and the number of spies stationed at the city gates. She did not hesitate even to tell him of her success in an attempt to befool and seduce Eutyches the denunciator.

“And why should I not?” she said; “it cost me nothing. For thee, my lord, have I not done more than that? Did I not even abandon my child?”

After her divorce from Philip, she had indeed left her daughter in Rome, hoping that, as the wife of the tetrarch, she might bear other children. Until that moment she had never spoken to Antipas of her daughter. He asked himself the reason for this sudden display of tenderness.

During their brief conversation several attendants had come out upon the balcony; one slave brought a quantity of large, soft cushions, and arranged them in a kind of temporary couch upon the floor behind his mistress. Herodias sank upon them, and turning her face away from Antipas, seemed to be weeping silently. After a few moments she dried her eyes, declared that she would dream no more, and that she was, in reality, perfectly happy. She reminded Antipas of their former long delightful interviews in the atrium; their meetings at the baths; their walks along the Sacred Way, and the sweet evening rendezvous at the villa, among the flowery groves, listening to the murmur of splashing fountains, within sight of the Roman Campagna. Her glances were as tender as in former days; she drew near to him, leaned against his breast and caressed him fondly.

But he repelled her soft advances. The love she sought to rekindle had died long ago. He thought instead of all his misfortunes, and of the twelve long years during which the war had continued. Protracted anxiety had visibly aged the tetrarch. His shoulders were bent beneath his violet-bordered toga; his whitening locks were long and mingled with his beard, and the sunlight revealed many lines upon his brow, as well as upon that of Herodias. After the tetrarch's repulse of his wife's tender overtures, the pair gazed morosely at each other.

The mountain paths began to show signs of life. Shepherds were driving their flocks to pasture; children urged heavy-laden donkeys along the roads; while grooms belonging to the palace led the horses to the river to drink. The wayfarers descending from the heights on the farther side of Machaerus disappeared behind the castle; others ascended from the valleys, and after arriving at the palace deposited their burdens in the courtyard. Many of these were purveyors to the tetrarch; others were the servants of his expected guests, arriving in advance of their masters.

Suddenly, at the foot of the terrace on the left, an Essene appeared; he wore a white robe, his feet were bare, and his demeanour indicated that he was a follower of the Stoics. Mannaëus instantly rushed towards the stranger, drawing the cutlass that he wore upon his hip.

"Kill him!" cried Herodias.

"Do not touch him!" the tetrarch commanded.

The two men stood motionless for an instant, then they descended the terrace, both taking a different direction, although they kept their eyes fixed upon each other.

"I know that man," said Herodias, after they had disappeared. "His name is Phanuel, and he will try to seek out Iaokanann, since thou wert so foolish as to allow him to live.”

Antipas said that the man might some day be useful to them. His attacks upon Jerusalem would gain them the allegiance of the rest of the Jews.

“No,” said Herodias, “the Jews will accept any master, and are incapable of feeling any true patriotism.” She added that, as for the man who was trying to influence the people with hopes cherished since the days of Nehemiah, the best policy was to suppress him.

The tetrarch replied that there was no haste about the matter, and expressed his doubt that any real danger was to be feared from Iaokanann even affecting to laugh at the idea.

“Do not deceive thyself!” exclaimed Herodias. And she retold the story of her humiliation one day when she was travelling towards Gilead, in order to purchase some of the balm for which that region was famous.

“A multitude was standing on the banks of the stream, my lord; many of the people were putting on their raiment. Standing on a hillock, a strange man was speaking to the gathering. A camel’s-skin was wrapped about his loins, and his head was like that of a lion. As soon as he saw me, he launched in my direction all the maledictions of the prophets. His eyes flamed, his voice shook, he raised his arms as if he would draw down lightning upon my head. I could not fly from him; the wheels of my chariot sank in the sand up to the middle; and I could only crawl along, hiding my head with my mantle, and frozen with terror at the curses that poured upon me like a storm from heaven!”

Continuing her harangue, she declared that the knowledge that this man still existed poisoned her very life. When he had been seized and bound with cords, the soldiers were prepared to stab him if he resisted, but he had been quite gentle and obedient. After he had been thrown into prison some one had put venomous serpents into his dungeon, but strange to say, after a time they had died, leaving him uninjured. The inanity of such tricks exasperated Herodias. Besides, she inquired, why did this man make war upon her? What interest moved him to such actions? His injurious words to her, uttered before a throng of listeners, had been repeated and widely circulated; she heard them whispered everywhere. Against a legion of soldiers she would have been brave; but this mysterious influence, more pernicious and powerful than the sword, but impossible to grasp, was maddening! Herodias strode to and fro upon the terrace, white with rage, unable to find words to express the emotions that choked her.

She had a haunting fear that the tetrarch might listen to public opinion after a time, and persuade himself it was his duty to repudiate her. Then, indeed, all would be lost! Since early youth she had cherished a dream that some day she would rule over a great empire. As an important step towards attaining this ambition, she had deserted Philip, her first husband, and married the tetrarch, who now she thought had duped her.

“Ah! I found a powerful support, indeed, when I entered thy family!” she sneered.

“It is at least the equal of thine,” Antipas replied.

Herodias felt the blood of the kings and priests, her ancestors, boiling in her veins.

“Thy grandfather was a servile attendant upon the temple of Ascalon!” she went on, with fury. “Thy other ancestors were shepherds, bandits, conductors of caravans, a horde of slaves offered as tribute to King David! My forefathers were the conquerors of thine! The first of the Maccabees drove thy people out of Hebron; Hyrcanus forced them to be circumcised!” Then, with all the contempt of the patrician for the plebeian, the hatred of Jacob for Esau, she reproached him for his indifference towards palpable outrages to his dignity, his weakness regarding the Phoenicians, who had been false to him, and his cowardly attitude towards the people who detested and insulted herself.

“But thou art like them!” she cried; “Dost regret the loss of the Arab girl who danced upon these very pavements? Take her back! Go and live with her — in her tent! Eat her bread, baked in the ashes! Drink curdled sheep’s-milk! Kiss her dark cheeks — and forget me!”

The tetrarch had already forgotten her presence, it appeared. He paid no further heed to her anger, but looked intently at a young girl who had just stepped out upon the balcony of a house not far away. At her side stood an elderly female slave, who held over the girl’s head a kind of parasol with a handle made of long, slender reeds. In the middle of the rug spread upon the floor of the balcony stood a large open travelling-hamper or basket, and girdles, veils, head-dresses, and gold and silver ornaments were scattered about in confusion. At intervals the young girl took one object or another in her hands, and held it up admiringly. She was dressed in the costume of the Roman ladies, with a flowing tunic and a peplum ornamented with tassels of emeralds; and blue silken bands confined her hair, which seemed almost too luxuriant, since from time to time she raised a small hand to push back the heavy masses. The parasol half hid the maiden from the gaze of Antipas, but now and then he caught a glimpse of her delicate neck, her large eyes, or a fleeting smile upon her small mouth. He noted that her figure swayed about with a singularly elastic grace and elegance. He leaned forward, his eyes kindled, his breath quickened. All this was not lost upon Herodias, who watched him narrowly.

“Who is that maiden?” the tetrarch asked at last.

Herodias replied that she did not know, and her fierce demeanour suddenly changed to one of gentleness and amiability.

At the entrance to the castle the tetrarch was awaited by several Galileans, the master of the scribes, the chief of the land stewards, the manager of the salt mines, and a Jew from Babylon, commanding his troops of horse. As the tetrarch approached the group, he was greeted with respectful enthusiasm. Acknowledging the acclamations with a grave salute, he entered the castle.

As he proceeded along one of the corridors, Phanuel suddenly sprang from a corner and intercepted him.

“What! Art thou still here?” said the tetrarch in displeasure. “Thou seekest Iaokanann, no doubt.”

“And thyself, my lord. I have something of great importance to tell thee.”

At a sign from Antipas, the Essene followed him into a somewhat dark and gloomy room.

The daylight came faintly through a grated window. The walls were of a deep shade of crimson, so dark as to look almost black. At one end of the room stood an ebony bed, ornamented with bands of leather. A shield of gold, hanging at the head of the bed, shone like a sun in the obscurity of the apartment. Antipas crossed over to the couch and threw himself upon it in a half-reclining attitude, while Phanuel remained standing before him. Suddenly he raised one hand, and striking a commanding attitude said:

“At times, my lord, the Most High sends a message to the people through one of His sons. Iaokanann is one of these. If thou oppress him, thou shalt be punished!”

“But it is he that persecutes me!” exclaimed Antipas. “He asked me to do a thing that was impossible. Since then he has done nothing but revile me. And I was not severe with him when he began his abuse of me. But he had the hardihood to send various men from Machaerus to spread dissension and discontent throughout my domain. A curse upon him! Since he attacks me, I shall defend myself.”

“Without doubt, he has expressed his anger with too much violence,” Phanuel replied calmly. “But do not heed that further. He must be set free.”

“One does not let loose a furious animal,” said the tetrarch.

“Have no fear of him now,” was the quick reply. “He will go straight to the Arabs, the Gauls, and the Scythians. His work must be extended to the uttermost ends of the earth.”

For a moment Antipas appeared lost in thought, as one who sees a vision. Then he said:

“His power over men is indeed great. In spite of myself, I admire him!”

“Then set him free!”

But the tetrarch shook his head. He feared Herodias, Mannaëus, and unknown dangers.

Phanuel tried to persuade him, promising, as a guaranty of the honesty of his projects, the submission of the Essenians to the King. These poor people, clad only in linen, untameable in spite of severe treatment, endowed with the power to divine the future by reading the stars, had succeeded in commanding a certain degree of respect.

“What is the important matter thou wouldst communicate to me?” Antipas inquired, with sudden recollection.

Before Phanuel could reply, a Negro entered the room in great haste. He was covered with dust, and panted so violently that he could scarcely utter the single word:

“Vitellus!”

“Has he arrived?” asked the tetrarch.

“I have seen him, my lord. Within three hours he will be here.”

Throughout the palace, doors were opening and closing and portieres were swaying as if in a high wind, with the coming and going of many persons; there was a murmur of voices; sounds of the moving of heavy furniture could be heard, and the rattle of silver plates and dishes. From the highest tower a loud blast upon a conch summoned from far and near all the slaves belonging to the castle.

CHAPTER II

The ramparts were thronged with people when at last Vitellius entered the castle gates, leaning on the arm of his interpreter. Behind them came an imposing red litter, decorated with plumes and mirrors. The proconsul wore a toga ornamented with the laticlave, a broad purple band extending down the front of the garment, indicating his rank; and his feet were encased in the kind of buskins worn by consuls. A guard of lictors surrounded him. Against the wall they placed their twelve fasces — a bundle of sticks with an axe in the centre. And the populace trembled before the insignia of Roman majesty.

The gorgeous litter, borne by eight men, came to a halt. From it descended a youth. He wore many pearls upon his fingers, but he had a protruding abdomen and his face was covered with pimples. A cup of aromatic wine was offered to him. He drank it, and asked for a second draught.

The tetrarch had fallen upon his knees before the proconsul, saying that he was grieved beyond words not to have known sooner of the favour of his presence within those domains; had he been aware of the approach of his distinguished guest, he would have issued a command that every person along the route should place himself at the proconsul's orders. Of a surety, the proconsul's family was descended direct from the goddess Vitellia. A highway, leading from the Janiculum to the sea, still bore their name. Questors and consuls were innumerable in that great family; and as for the noble Lucius, now his honoured guest, it was the duty of the whole people to thank him, as the conqueror of the Cliti and the father of the young Aulus, now returning to his own domain, since the East was the country of the gods. These hyperboles were expressed in Latin, and Vitellius accepted them impassively.

He replied that the great Herod was the honour and glory of the nation; that the Athenians had chosen him to direct the Olympian games; that he had built temples in the honour of Augustus; had been patient, ingenious, terrible; and was faithful to all the Caesars.

Between the two marble columns, with bronze capitals, Herodias could now be seen advancing with the air of an empress, in the midst of a group of women and eunuchs carrying perfumed torches set in sockets of silver-gilt.

The proconsul advanced three steps to meet her. She saluted him with an inclination of her head.

“How fortunate,” she exclaimed, “that henceforth Agrippa, the enemy of Tiberius, can work harm no longer!”

Vitellius did not understand her allusion, but he thought her a dangerous woman. Antipas immediately declared that he was ready to do anything for the emperor.

“Even to the injury of others?” Vitellius asked, significantly.

He had taken hostages from the king of the Parthians, but the emperor had given no further thought to the matter, because Antipas, who had been present at the conference, had, in order to gain favour, sent off despatches bearing the news. From that time he had borne a profound hatred towards the emperor and had delayed in sending assistance to him.

The tetrarch stammered in attempting to reply to the query of the proconsul. But Aulus laughed and said: “Do not be disturbed. I will protect thee!”

The proconsul feigned not to hear this remark. The fortune of the father depended, in a way, on the corrupt influence of the son; and through him it was possible that Antipas might be able to procure for the proconsul very substantial benefits, although the glances that he cast about him were defiant, and even venomous.

But now a new tumult arose just within the gates. A file of white mules entered the courtyard, mounted by men in priestly garb. These were the Sadducees and the Pharisees, who were drawn to Machaerus by the same ambition: the one party hoping to be appointed public sacrificers, the other determined to retain those offices. Their faces were dark, particularly those of the Pharisees, who were enemies of Rome and of the tetrarch. The flowing skirts of their tunics embarrassed their movements as they attempted to pass through the throng; and their tiaras sat unsteadily upon their brows, around which were bound small bands of parchment, showing lines of writing.

Almost at the same moment, the soldiers of the advance guard arrived. Cloth coverings had been drawn over their glittering shields to protect them from the dust. Behind them came Marcellus, the proconsul's lieutenant, followed by the publicans, carrying their tablets of wood under their arms.

Antipas named to Vitellius the principle personages surrounding them: Tolmai, Kanthera, Schon, Ammonius of Alexandria, who brought asphalt for Antipas; Naaman, captain of his troops of skirmishers, and Jacim, the Babylonian.

Vitellius had noticed Mannaesus.

"Who is that man?" he inquired.

The tetrarch by a significant gesture indicated that Mannaesus was the executioner. He then presented the Sadducees to the proconsul's notice.

Jonathas, a man of low stature, who spoke Greek, advanced with a firm step and begged that the great lord would honour Jerusalem with a visit. Vitellius replied that he should probably go to Jerusalem soon.

Eleazar, who had a crooked nose and a long beard, put forth a claim, in behalf of the Pharisees, for the mantle of the high priest, held in the tower of Antonia by the civil authorities.

Then the Galileans came forward and denounced Pontius Pilate. On one occasion, they said, a mad-man went seeking in a cave near Samaria for the golden vases that had belonged to King David, and Pontius Pilate had caused several inhabitants of that region to be executed. In their excitement all the Galileans spoke at once, Mannaesus's voice being heard above all others. Vitellius promised that the guilty ones should be punished.

Fresh vociferations now broke out in front of the great gates, where the soldiers had hung their shields. Their coverings having now been removed, on each shield a carving of the head of Caesar could be seen on the umbo, or central knob. To the Jews, this seemed an evidence of nothing short of idolatry. Antipas harangued them, while Vitellius, who occupied a raised seat within the shadow of the colonnade, was astonished at their fury. Tiberius had done well, he thought, to exile four hundred of these people to Sardinia. Presently the Jews became so violent that he ordered the shields to be removed.

Then the multitude surrounded the proconsul, imploring him to abolish certain unjust laws, asking for privileges, or begging for alms. They rent their clothing and jostled one another; and at last, in order to drive them back, several slaves, armed with long staves, charged upon them, striking right and left. Those nearest the gates made their escape and descended to the road; others rushed in to take their place, so that two streams of human beings flowed in and out, compressed within the limits of the gateway.

Vitellius demanded the reason for the assembling of so great a throng. Antipas explained that they had been invited to come to a feast in celebration of his birthday; and he pointed to several men who, leaning against the battlements, were hauling up immense basket-loads of food, fruits, vegetables, antelopes, and storks; large fish, of a brilliant shade of blue; grapes, melons, and pyramids of pomegranates. At this sight, Aulus left the courtyard and hastened to the kitchens, led by his taste for gormandizing, which later became the amazement of the world.

As they passed the opening to a small cellar, Vitellius perceived some objects resembling breast-plates hanging on a wall. He looked at them with interest, and then demanded that the subterranean chambers of the fortress be thrown open for his inspection. These chambers were cut into the rocky foundation of the castle, and had been formed into vaults, with pillars set at regular distances. The first vault opened contained old armour; the second was full of pikes, with long points emerging from tufts of feathers. The walls of the third chamber were hung with a kind of tapestry made of slender reeds, laid in perpendicular rows. Those of the fourth were covered with scimitars. In the middle of the fifth cell, rows of helmets were seen, the crests of which looked like a battalion of fiery serpents. The sixth cell contained nothing but empty quivers; the seventh, greaves for protecting the legs in battle; the eighth vault was filled with bracelets and armlets; and an examination of the remaining vaults disclosed forks, grappling-irons, ladders, cords, even catapults, and bells for the necks of camels; and as they descended deeper into the rocky foundation, it became evident that the whole mass was a veritable honeycomb of cells, and that below those already seen were many others.

Vitellius, Phineas, his interpreter, and Sisenna, chief of the publicans, walked among these gloomy cells, attended by three eunuchs bearing torches.

In the deep shadows hideous instruments, invented by barbarians, could be seen: tomahawks studded with nails; poisoned javelins; pincers resembling the jaws of crocodiles; in short, the tetrarch possessed in his castle munitions of war sufficient for forty thousand men.

He had accumulated these weapons in anticipation of an alliance against him among his enemies. But he bethought him that the proconsul might believe, or assert, that he had collected this armoury in order to attack the Romans; so he hastened to offer explanations of all that Vitellius had observed.

Some of these things did not belong to him at all, he said: many of them were necessary to defend the place against brigands and marauders, especially the Arabs. Many of the objects in the vault had been the property of his father, and he had allowed them to remain untouched. As he spoke, he managed to get in advance of the proconsul and preceded him along the corridors with rapid steps. Presently he halted and stood close against the wall as the party came up; he spoke quickly, standing with his hands on his hips, so that his voluminous mantle covered a wide space of the wall behind him. But just above his head the top of a door was visible. Vitellius remarked it instantly, and demanded to know what it concealed.

The tetrarch explained that the door was fastened, and that none could open it save the Babylonian, Jacim.

“Summon him, then!” was the command.

A slave was sent to find Jacim, while the group awaited his coming.

The father of Jacim had come from the banks of the Euphrates to offer his services, as well as those of five hundred horsemen, in the defence of the eastern frontier. After the division of the kingdom, Jacim had lived for a time with Philip, and was now in the service of Antipas.

Presently he appeared among the vaults, carrying an archer's bow on his shoulder and a whip in his hand. Cords of many colours were lashed tightly about his knotted legs; his massive arms were thrust through a sleeveless tunic, and a fur cap shaded his face. His chin was covered with a heavy, curling beard.

He appeared not to comprehend what the interpreter said to him at first. But Vitellius threw a meaning glance at Antipas, who quickly made the Babylonian understand the command of the proconsul. Jacim immediately laid both his hands against the door, giving it a powerful shove; whereupon it quietly slid out of sight into the wall.

A wave of hot air surged from the depths of the cavern. A winding path descended and turned abruptly. The group followed it, and soon arrived at the threshold of a kind of grotto, somewhat larger than the other subterranean cells.

An arched window at the back of this chamber gave directly upon a precipice, which formed a defence for one side of the castle. A honeysuckle vine, cramped by the low-studded ceiling, blossomed bravely. The sound of a running stream could be heard distinctly. In this place was a great number of beautiful white horses, perhaps a hundred. They were eating barley from a plank placed on a level with their mouths. Their manes had been coloured a deep blue; their hoofs were wrapped in coverings of woven grass, and the hair between their ears was puffed out like a peruke. As they stood quietly eating, they switched their tails gently to and fro. The proconsul regarded them in silent admiration.

They were indeed wonderful animals; supple as serpents, light as birds. They were trained to gallop rapidly, following the arrow of the rider, and dash into the midst of a group of the enemy, overturning men and biting them savagely as they fell. They were sure-footed among rocky passes, and would jump fearlessly over yawning chasms; and, while ready to gallop across the plains a whole day without tiring, they would stop instantly at the command of the rider.

As soon as Jacim entered their quarters, they trotted up to him, as sheep crowd around the shepherd; and, thrusting forward their sleek necks, they looked at him with a gaze like that of inquiring children. From force of habit, he emitted a raucous cry, which excited them; they pranced about, impatient at their confinement and longing to run.

Antipas, fearing that if Vitellius knew of the existence of these creatures, he would take them away, had shut them up in this place, made especially to accommodate animals in case of siege.

“This close confinement cannot be good for them,” said Vitellius, “and there is a risk of losing them by keeping them here. Make an inventory of their number, Sisenna.”

The publican drew a writing-tablet from the folds of his robe, counted the horses, and recorded the number carefully.

It was the habit of the agents of the fiscal companies to corrupt the governors in order to pillage the provinces. Sisenna was among the most flourishing of these agents, and was seen everywhere with his claw-like fingers and his eyelids continually blinking.

After a time the party returned to the court. Heavy, round bronze lids, sunk in the stones of the pavement, covered the cisterns of the palace. Vitellius noticed that one of these was larger than the others, and that when struck by his foot it had not their sonority. He struck them all, one after another; then stamped upon the ground and shouted:

“I have found it! I have found the buried treasure of Herod!”

Searching for buried treasure was a veritable mania among the Romans.

The tetrarch swore that no treasure was hidden in that spot.

“What is concealed there, then?” the proconsul demanded.

“Nothing — that is, only a man — a prisoner.”

“Show him to me!”

The tetrarch hesitated to obey, fearing that the Jews would discover his secret. His reluctance to lift the cover made Vitellius impatient.

“Break it in!” he cried to his lictors. Mannaëus heard the command, and, seeing a lictor step forward armed with a hatchet, he feared that the man intended to behead Iaokanann. He stayed the hand of the lictor after the first blow, and then slipped between the heavy lid and the pavement a kind of hook. He braced his long, lean arms, raised the cover slowly, and in a moment it lay flat upon the stones. The bystanders admired the strength of the old man.

Under the bronze lid was a wooden trap-door of the same size. At a blow of the fist it folded back, allowing a wide hole to be seen, the mouth of an immense pit, with a flight of winding steps leading down into the darkness. Those that bent over to peer into the cavern beheld a vague and terrifying shape in its depths.

This proved to be a human being, lying on the ground. His long locks hung over a camel's-hair robe that covered his shoulders. Slowly he rose to his feet. His head touched a grating embedded in the wall; and as he moved about he disappeared, from time to time, in the shadows of his dungeon.

The rich tiaras of the Romans sparkled brilliantly in the sunlight, and their glittering sword-hilts threw out glancing golden rays. The doves, flying from their cotes, circled above the heads of the multitude. It was the hour when Mannaëus was accustomed to feed them. But now he crouched beside the tetrarch, who stood near Vitellius. The Galileans, the priests, and the soldiers formed a group behind them; all were silent, waiting with painful anticipation for what might happen.

A deep groan, hollow and startling, rose from the pit.

Herodias heard it from the farther end of the palace. Drawn by an irresistible though terrible fascination, she made her way through the throng, and, reaching Mannaëus, she leant one hand on his shoulder and bent over to listen.

The hollow voice rose again from the depths of the earth.

“Woe to thee, Sadducees and Pharisees! Thy voices are like the tinkling of cymbals! O race of vipers, bursting with pride!”

The voice of Iaokanann was recognised. His name was whispered about. Spectators from a distance pressed closer to the open pit.

“Woe to thee, O people! Woe to the traitors of Judah, and to the drunkards of Ephraim, who dwelt in the fertile valleys and stagger with the fumes of wine!

“May they disappear like running water; like the slug that sinks into the sand as it moves; like an abortion that never sees the light!

“And thou too, Moab! hide thyself in the midst of the cypress, like the sparrow; in caverns, like the wild hare! The gates of the fortress shall be crushed more easily than nut-shells; the walls shall crumble; cities shall burn; and the scourge of God shall not cease! He shall cause your bodies to be bathed in your own blood, like wool in the dyer’s vat. He shall rend you, as with a harrow; He shall scatter the remains of your bodies from the tops of the mountains!”

Of which conqueror was he speaking? Was it Vitellius? Only the Romans could bring about such an extermination. The people began to cry out: “Enough! enough! let him speak no more!”

But the prisoner continued in louder tones:

“Beside the corpses of their mothers, thy little ones shall drag themselves over the ashes of the burned cities. At night men will creep from their hiding-places to seek a bit of food among the ruins, even at the risk of being cut down with the sword. Jackals shall pick thy bones in the public places, where at eventide the fathers were wont to gather. At the bidding of Gentiles, thy maidens shall be forced to cease their lamentations and to make music upon the zither, and the bravest of thy sons shall learn to bend their backs, chafed with heavy burdens.”

The listeners remembered the days of exile, and all the misfortunes and catastrophes of the past. These words were like the anathemas of the ancient prophets. The captive thundered them forth like bolts from heaven.

Presently his voice became almost as sweet and harmonious as if he were uttering a chant. He spoke of the world's redemption from sin and sorrow; of the glories of heaven; of gold in place of clay; of the desert blossoming like the rose. "That which is now worth sixty pieces of silver will not cost a single obol. Fountains of milk shall spring from the rocks; men shall sleep, well satisfied, among the wine-presses. The people shall prostrate themselves before Thee, and Thy reign shall be eternal, O Son of David!"

The tetrarch suddenly recoiled from the opening of the pit; the mention of the existence of a son of David seemed to him like a menace to himself.

Iaokanann then poured forth invectives against him for presuming to aspire to royalty.

"There is no other king than the Eternal God!" he cried; and he cursed Antipas for his luxurious gardens, his statues, his furniture of carved ivory and precious woods, comparing him to the impious Ahab.

Antipas broke the slender cord attached to the royal seal that he wore around his neck, and throwing the seal into the pit, he commanded his prisoner to be silent.

But Iaokanann replied: "I shall cry aloud like a savage bear, like the wild ass, like a woman in travail! The punishment of heaven has already visited itself upon thy incest! May God inflict thee with the sterility of mules!"

At these words, a sound of suppressed laughter arose here and there among the listeners.

Vitellius had remained close to the opening of the dungeon while Iaokanann was speaking. His interpreter, in impassive tones, translated into the Roman tongue all the threats and invectives that rolled up from the depths of the gloomy prison. The tetrarch and Herodias felt compelled to remain near at hand. Antipas listened, breathing heavily; while the woman, with parted lips, gazed into the darkness of the pit, her face drawn with an expression of fear and hatred.

The terrible man now turned towards her. He grasped the bars of his prison, pressed against them his bearded face, in which his eyes glowed like burning coals, and cried:

“Ah! Is it thou, Jezebel? Thou hast captured thy lord’s heart with the tinkling of thy feet. Thou didst neigh to him like a mare. Thou didst prepare thy bed on the mountain top, in order to accomplish thy sacrifices!

“The Lord shall take from thee thy sparkling jewels, thy purple robes and fine linen; the bracelets from thine arms, the anklets from thy feet; the golden ornaments that dangle upon thy brow, thy mirrors of polished silver, thy fans of ostrich plumes, thy shoes with their heels of mother-of-pearl, that serve to increase thy stature; thy glittering diamonds, the scent of thy hair, the tint of thy nails, — all the artifices of thy coquetry shall disappear, and missiles shall be found wherewith to stone the adulteress!”

Herodias looked around for some one to defend her. The Pharisees lowered their eyes hypocritically. The Sadducees turned away their heads, fearing to offend the proconsul should they appear to sympathise with her. Antipas was almost in a swoon.

Louder still rose the voice from the dungeon; the neighbouring hills gave back an echo with startling effect, and Machaerus seemed actually surrounded and showered with curses.

“Prostrate thyself in the dust, daughter of Babylon, and scourge thyself! Remove thy girdle and thy shoes, gather up thy garments and walk through the flowing stream; thy shame shall follow thee, thy disgrace shall be known to all men, thy bosom shall be rent with sobs. God execrates the stench of thy crimes! Accursed one! die like a dog!”

At that instant the trap-door was suddenly shut down and secured by Mannaëus, who would have liked to strangle Iakob then and there.

Herodias glided away and disappeared within the palace. The Pharisees were scandalised at what they had heard. Antipas, standing among them, attempted to justify his past conduct and to excuse his present situation.

“Without doubt,” said Eleazar, “it was necessary for him to marry his brother’s wife; but Herodias was not a widow, and besides, she had a child, which she abandoned; and that was an abomination.”

“You are wrong,” objected Jonathas the Sadducee; “the law condemns such marriages but does not actually forbid them.”

“What matters it? All the world shows me injustice,” said Antipas, bitterly; “and why? Did not Absalom lie with his father’s wives, Judah with his daughter-in-law, Ammon with his sister, and Lot with his daughters?”

Aulus, who had been reposing within the palace, now reappeared in the court. After he had heard how matters stood, he approved of the attitude of the tetrarch. “A man should never allow himself to be annoyed,” said he, “by such foolish criticism.” And he laughed at the censure of the priests and the fury of Iaokanann, saying that his words were of little importance.

Herodias, who also had reappeared, and now stood at the top of a flight of steps, called loudly:

“You are wrong, my lord! He ordered the people to refuse to pay the tax!”

“Is that true?” he demanded. The general response was affirmative, Antipas adding his word to the declaration of the others.

Vitellius had a misgiving that the prisoner might be able to escape; and as the conduct of Antipas appeared to him rather suspicious, he established his own sentinels at the gates, at intervals along the walls, and in the courtyard itself.

At last he retired to the apartments assigned to him, accompanied by the priests. Without touching directly upon the question of the coveted offices of public sacrificers, each one laid his own grievances before the proconsul. They fairly beset him with complaints and requests, but he soon dismissed them from his presence.

As Jonathas left the proconsul’s apartments he perceived Antipas standing under an arch, talking to an Essene, who wore a long white robe and flowing locks. Jonathas regretted that he had raised his voice in defence of the tetrarch.

One thought now consoled Herod-Antipas. He was no longer personally responsible for the fate of Iaokanann. The Romans had assumed that charge. What a relief! He had noticed Phanuel pacing slowly through the court, and calling him to his side, he pointed out the guards established by Vitellius, saying:

“They are stronger than I! I cannot now set the prisoner free! It is not my fault if he remains in his dungeon.”

The courtyard was empty. The slaves were sleeping. The day was drawing to a close, and the sunset spread a deep rosy glow over the horizon, against which the smallest objects stood out like silhouettes. Antipas was able to distinguish the excavations of the salt-mines at the farther end of the Dead Sea, but the tents of the Arabs were no longer visible. As the moon rose, the effect of the day's excitement passed away, and a feeling of peace entered his heart.

Phanuel, also wearied by the recent agitating scenes, remained beside the tetrarch. He sat in silence for some time, his chin resting on his breast. At last he spoke in confidence to Antipas, and revealed what he had wished to say.

From the beginning of the month, he said, he had been studying the heavens every morning before daybreak, when the constellation of Perseus was at the zenith; Agalah was scarcely visible; Algol was even less bright; Mira-Cetus had disappeared entirely; from all of which he augured the death of some man of great importance, to occur that very night in Machaerus.

Who was the man? Vitellius was too closely guarded to be reached. No one would kill Iaokanann.

"It is I!" thought the tetrarch.

It might be that the Arabs would return and make a successful attack upon him. Perhaps the proconsul would discover his relations with the Parthians. Several men whom Antipas had recognised as hired assassins from Jerusalem, had escorted the priests in the train of the proconsul; they all carried daggers concealed beneath their robes. The tetrarch had no doubt whatever of the exactness of Phanuel's skill in astrology.

Suddenly he bethought him of Herodias. He would consult her. He hated her, certainly, but she might give him courage; and besides, in spite of his dislike, not all the bonds were yet broken of that sorcery which once she had woven about him.

When he entered her chamber, he was met by the pungent odour of cinnamon burning in a porphyry vase and the perfume of powders, unguents, cloud-like gauzes and embroideries light as feathers, filled the air with fragrance.

He did not speak of Phanuel's prophecy, nor of his own fear of the Jews and the Arabs. Herodias had already accused him of cowardice. He spoke only of the Romans, and complained that Vitellius had not confided to him any of his military projects. He said he supposed the proconsul was the friend of Caligula, who often visited Agrippa; and expressed a surmise that he himself might be exiled, or that perhaps his throat would be cut.

Herodias, who now treated him with a kind of disdainful indulgence, tried to reassure him. At last she took from a small casket a curious medallion, ornamented with a profile of Tiberius. The sight of it, she said, as she gave it to Antipas, would make the lictors turn pale and silence all accusing voices.

Antipas, filled with gratitude, asked her how the medallion had come into her possession.

“It was given to me,” was her only answer.

At that moment Antipas beheld a bare arm slipping through a portiere hanging in front of him. It was the arm of a youthful woman, as graceful in outline as if carved from ivory by Polyclitus. With a movement a little awkward and at the same time charming, it felt about the wall an instant, as if seeking something, then took down a tunic hanging upon a hook near the doorway, and disappeared.

An elderly female attendant passed quietly through the room, lifted the portiere, and went out. A sudden recollection pierced the memory of the tetrarch.

“Is that woman one of thy slaves?” he asked.

“What matters that to thee?” was the disdainful reply.

CHAPTER III

The great banqueting-hall was filled with guests. This apartment had three naves, like a basilica, which were separated by columns of sandalwood, whose capitals were of sculptured bonze. On each side of the apartment was a gallery for spectators, and a third, with a facade of gold filigree, was at one end, opposite an immense arch at the other.

The candelabra burning on the tables, which were spread the whole length of the banqueting-hall, glowed like clusters of flaming flowers among the painted cups, the plates of shining copper, the cubes of snow and heaps of luscious grapes. Through the large windows the guests could see lighted torches on the terraces of the neighbouring houses; for this night Antipas was giving a feast to his friends, his own people, and to anyone that presented himself at the castle.

The slaves, alert as dogs, glided about noiselessly in felt sandals, carrying dishes to and fro.

The table of the proconsul was placed beneath the gilded balcony upon a platform of sycamore wood. Rich tapestries from Babylon were hung about the pavilion, giving a certain effect of seclusion.

Upon three ivory couches, one facing the great hall, and the other two placed one on either side of the pavilion, reclined Vitellius, his son Aulus, and Antipas; the proconsul being near the door, at the left, Aulus on the right, the tetrarch occupying the middle couch.

Antipas wore a heavy black mantle, the texture of which was almost hidden by coloured embroideries and glittering decorations; his beard was spread out like a fan; blue powder had been scattered over his hair, and on his head rested a diadem covered with precious stones. Vitellius still wore the purple band, the emblem of his rank, crossed diagonally over a linen toga.

Aulus had tied behind his back the sleeves of his violet robe, embroidered with silver. His clustering curls were laid in carefully arranged rows; a necklace of sapphires gleamed against his throat, plump and white as that of a woman. Crouched upon a rug near him, with legs crossed was a pretty white boy, upon whose face shone a perpetual smile. Aulus had found him somewhere among the kitchens and had taken a violent fancy to him. He had made the child one of his suite, but as he never could remember his protege's Chaldean name, called him simply "the Asiatic." From time to time the little fellow sprang up and played about the dining-table, and his antics appeared to amuse the guests.

At one side of the tetrarch's pavilion were the tables at which were seated his priests and officers; also a number of persons from Jerusalem, and the more important men from the Grecian cities. At the table on the left of the proconsul sat Marcellus with the publicans, several friends of the tetrarch, and various representatives from Cana, Ptolemais, and Jericho. Seated at other tables were mountaineers from Liban and many of the old soldiers of Herod's army; a dozen Thracians, a Greek and two Germans; besides huntsmen and herdsmen, the Sultan of Palmyra, and sailors from Eziongaber. Before each guest was placed a roll of soft bread, upon which to wipe the fingers. As soon as they were seated, hands were stretched out with the eagerness of a vulture's claws, seizing upon olives, pistachios, and almonds. Every face was joyous, every head was crowned with flowers, except those of the Pharisees, who refused to wear the wreaths, regarding them as a symbol of Roman voluptuousness and vice. They shuddered when the attendants sprinkled them with galburnum and incense, the use of which the Pharisees reserved strictly for services in the Temple.

Antipas observed that Aulus rubbed himself under the arms, as if annoyed by heat or chafing; and promised to give him three flasks of the same kind of precious balm that had been used by Cleopatra.

A captain from the garrison of Tiberias who had just arrived, placed himself behind the tetrarch as protection in case any unexpected trouble should arise. But his attention was divided between observing the movements of the proconsul and listening to the conversation of his neighbours.

There was, naturally, much talk of Iaokanann, and other men of his stamp.

"It is said," remarked one of the guests, "that Simon of Gitta washed away his sins in fire. And a certain man called Jesus — "

"He is the worst of them all!" interrupted Eleazar. "A miserable imposter!"

At this a man sprang up from a table near the tetrarch's pavilion, and made his way towards the place where Eleazar sat. His face was almost as pale as his linen robe, but he addressed the Pharisees boldly, saying: "That is a lie! Jesus has performed miracles!"

Antipas expressed a long-cherished desire to see the man Jesus perform some of his so-called miracles. "You should have brought him with you," he said to the last speaker, who was still standing. "Tell us what you know about him," he commanded.

Then the stranger said that he himself, whose name was Jacob, having a daughter who was very ill, had gone to Capernaum to implore the Master to heal his child. The Master had answered him, saying: "Return to thy home: she is healed!" And he had found his daughter standing at the threshold of his house, having risen from her couch when the gnomon had marked the third hour, the same moment when he had made his supplication to Jesus.

The Pharisees admitted that certain mysterious arts and powerful herbs existed that would heal the sick. It was said that the marvellous plant known as "baaras" grew even in Machaerus, the power of which rendered its consumer invulnerable against all attacks; but to cure disease without seeing or touching the afflicted person was clearly impossible, unless, indeed, the man Jesus called in the assistance of evil spirits.

The friends of Antipas and the men from Galilee nodded wisely, saying: "It is evident that he is aided by demons of some sort!"

Jacob, standing between their table and that of the priests, maintained a silence at once lofty and respectful.

Several voices exclaimed: "Prove his power to us!"

Jacob leaned over the priests' table, and said slowly, in a half-suppressed tone, as if awe-struck by his own words:

"Know ye not, then, that He is the Messiah?"

The priests stared at one another, and Vitellius demanded the meaning of the word. His interpreter paused a moment before translating it. Then he said that Messiah was the name to be given to one who was to come, bringing the enjoyment of all blessings, and giving them domination over all the peoples of the earth. Certain persons believed that there were to be two Messiahs; one would be vanquished by Gog and Magog, the demons of the North; but the other would exterminate the Prince of Evil; and for centuries the coming of this Saviour of mankind had been expected at any moment.

At this, the priests began to talk in low tones among themselves. Eleazar addressed Jacob, saying that it had always been understood that the Messiah would be a son of David, not of a carpenter; and that he would confirm the law, whereas this Nazarene attacked it. Furthermore, as a still stronger argument against the pretender, it had been promised that the Messiah should be preceded by Elias.

“But Elias has come!” Jacob answered.

“Elias! Elias!” was repeated from one end of the banqueting-hall to the other.

In imagination, all fancied that they could see an old man, a flight of ravens above his head, standing before an altar, which a flash of lightning illumined, revealing the idolatrous priests that were thrown into the torrent; and the women, sitting in the galleries, thought of the widow of Sarepta.

Jacob then declared that he knew Elias; that he had seen him, and that many of the guests there assembled had seen him!

“His name!” was the cry from all lips.

“Iaokanann!”

Antipas fell back in his chair as if a heavy blow had struck him on the breast. The Sadducees rose from their seats and rushed towards Jacob. Eleazar raised his voice to a shout in order to make himself heard. When order was finally restored, he draped his mantle about his shoulders, and, with the air of a judge, proceeded to put questions to Jacob.

“Since the prophet is dead — ” he began.

Murmurs interrupted him. Many persons believed that Elias was not dead, but had only disappeared.

Eleazar rebuked those who had interrupted him; and continuing, asked:

“And dost thou believe that he has indeed come to life again?”

“Why should I not believe it?” Jacob replied.

The Sadducees shrugged their shoulders. Jonathas, opening wide his little eyes, gave a forced, buffoon-like laugh. Nothing could be more absurd, said he, than the idea that a human body could have eternal life; and he declaimed, for the benefit of the proconsul, this line from a contemporaneous poet:

Nec crescit, nec post mortem durare videtur.

By this time Aulus was leaning over the side of the pavilion, with pale face, a perspiring brow, and both hands outspread on his stomach.

The Sadducees pretended to be deeply moved at the sight of his suffering, thinking that perhaps the next day the offices of sacrificers would be theirs. Antipas appeared to be in despair at his guest's agony. Vitellius preserved a calm demeanour, although he felt some anxiety, for the loss of his son would mean the loss of his fortune.

But Aulus, quickly recovering after he had relieved his overburdened stomach, was as eager to eat as before.

"Let some one bring me marble-dust," he commanded, "or clay of Naxos, sea-water — anything! Perhaps it would do me good to bathe."

He swallowed a quantity of snow; then hesitated between a ragout and a dish of blackbirds; and finally decided in favour of gourds served in honey. The little Asiatic gazed at his master in astonishment and admiration; to him this exhibition of gluttony denoted a wonderful being belonging to a superior race.

The feast went on. Slaves served the guests with kidneys, dormice, nightingales, mince-meat dressed with vine-leaves. The priests discoursed among themselves regarding the supposed resurrection. Ammonius, pupil of Philon, the Platonist, pronounced them stupid, and told the Greeks that he laughed at their oracles.

Marcellus and Jacob were seated side by side. Marcellus described the happiness he had felt under the baptism of Mithra, and Jacob made him promise to become a follower of Jesus.

The wines of the palm and the tamarisk, those of Safed and of Byblos, ran from the amphoras into the crateras, from the crateras into the cups, and from the cups down the guests' throats. Every one talked, all hearts expanding under the good cheer. Jacim, although a Jew, did not hesitate to express his admiration of the planets. A merchant from Aphaka amazed the nomads with his description of the marvels in the temple of Hierapolis; and they wished to know the cost of a pilgrimage to that place. Others held fast to the principles of their native religion. A German, who was nearly blind, sang a hymn celebrating that promontory in Scandinavia where the gods were wont to appear with halos around their heads. The people from Sichem declined to eat turtles, out of deference to the dove Azima.

Several groups stood talking near the middle of the banqueting-hall, and the vapour of their breath, mingled with the smoke from the candles, formed a light mist. Presently Phanuel slipped quietly into the room, keeping close to the wall. He had been out in the open courtyard, to make another survey of the heavens. He stopped when he reached the pavilion of the tetrarch, fearing he would be splashed with drops of oil if he approached the other tables, which, to an Essene, would be a great defilement.

Suddenly violent blows resounded upon the castle gates. The news of the imprisonment of Iaokanann had spread rapidly, and now it appeared that the whole surrounding population was flocking to the castle. Men with torches were hastening along the roads in all directions; a black mass of people swarmed in the ravine; and from all throats came the cry: "Iaokanann! Iaokanann!"

"That man will ruin everything," said Jonathas.

"We shall have no more money if this continues," said the Pharisees.

Accusations, recriminations, and pleadings were heard on all sides.

"Protect us!"

"Compel them to cease!"

"Thou didst abandon thy religion!"

"Impious as all the Herods!"

"Less impious than thou!" Antipas retorted. "Was it not my father that erected thy Temple?"

Then the Pharisees, children of the proscribed tribes, partisans of Mattathias, accused the tetrarch of all the crimes committed by his family.

The Pharisees had pointed skulls, bristling beards, feeble hands, snub noses, great round eyes, and their countenances bore a resemblance to that of a bull-dog. A dozen of these people, scribes and attendants upon the priests, who picked up their living from the refuse of holocausts, rushed to the foot of the pavilion and threatened Antipas with their knives. He attempted to speak to them, being only slightly protected by some of the Sadducees. Suddenly he perceived Mannaëus at a distance and made him a sign to approach. The expression on the face of Vitellius indicated that he regarded all this turmoil as no concern of his.

The Pharisees, leaning against the pavilion, were now beside themselves with demoniac fury. They broke plates and dashed them upon the floor. The attendants had served them with a ragout composed of the flesh of the wild ass, an unclean animal, and their anger knew no bounds. Aulus rallied them jeeringly apropos of the ass's head, which he declared they honoured. He flung other sarcasms at them, regarding their antipathy to the flesh of swine, intimating that no doubt their hatred arose from the fact that that beast had killed their beloved Bacchus, and saying it was to be feared they were too fond of wine, since a golden vine had been discovered in the Temple.

The priests did not understand his sneers, and Phineas, of Galilean origin, refused to translate them. Aulus suddenly became angry, the more so because the little Asiatic, frightened at the tumult, had disappeared. The feast no longer pleased the noble glutton; the dishes were vulgar, and not sufficiently disguised with delicate flavourings. After a time his displeasure abated, as he caught sight of a dish of Syrian lambs' tails, dressed with spices, a favourite dainty.

To Vitellius the character of the Jews seemed frightful. Their God was like Moloch, several altars to whom he had passed upon his route; and he recalled the stories he had heard of the mysterious Jew who fattened small children and offered them as a sacrifice. His Latin nature was filled with disgust at their intolerance, their iconoclastic rage, their brutal, stumbling bearing. The proconsul wished to depart, but Aulus refused to accompany him.

The exaltation of the people increased. They abandoned themselves to dreams of independence. They recalled the glory of Israel, and a Syrian spoke of all the great conquerors they had vanquished, — Antigone, Crassus, Varus.

"Miserable creatures!" cried the enraged proconsul, who had overheard the Syrian's words.

In the midst of the uproar Antipas remembered the medallion of the emperor that Herodias had given to him; he drew it forth and looked at it a moment, trembling, then held it up with its face turned towards the throng.

At the same moment, the panels of the gold-railed balcony were folded back, and, accompanied by slaves bearing wax tapers, Herodias appeared, her coiffure crowned with an Assyrian mitre, which was held in place by a band passing under the chin. Her dark hair fell in ringlets over a scarlet peplum with slashed sleeves. On either side of the door through which one stepped into the gallery, stood a huge stone monster, like those of Atrides; and as Herodias appeared between them, she looked like Cybele supported by her lions. In her hands she carried a patera, a shallow vessel of silver used by the Romans in pouring libations; and, advancing to the front of the balcony and pausing just above the tetrarch's chair, she cried:

"Long live Caesar!"

This homage was repeated by Vitellius, Antipas, and the priests.

But now, beginning at the farthest end of the banqueting-hall, a murmur of surprise and admiration swept through the multitude. A beautiful young girl had just entered the apartment, and stood motionless for an instant, while all eyes were turned upon her.

Through a drapery of filmy blue gauze that veiled her head and throat, her arched eyebrows, tiny ears, and ivory-white skin could be distinguished. A scarf of shot-silk fell from her shoulders, and was caught up at the waist by a girdle of fretted silver. Her full trousers, of black silk, were embroidered in a pattern of silver mandragoras, and as she moved forward with indolent grace, her little feet were seen to be shod with slippers made of the feathers of humming-birds.

When she arrived in front of the pavilion she removed her veil. Behold! she seemed to be Herodias herself, as she had appeared in the days of her blooming youth.

Immediately the damsel began to dance before the tetrarch. Her slender feet took dainty steps to the rhythm of a flute and a pair of Indian bells. Her round white arms seemed ever beckoning and striving to entice to her side some youth who was fleeing from her allurements. She appeared to pursue him, with movements light as a butterfly; her whole mien was like that of an inquisitive Psyche, or a floating spirit that might at any moment dissolve and disappear.

Presently the plaintive notes of the gingras, a small flute of Phoenician origin, replaced the tinkling bells. The attitudes of the dancing nymph now denoted overpowering lassitude. Her bosom heaved with sighs, and her whole being expressed profound languor, although it was not clear whether she sighed for an absent swain or was expiring of love in his embrace. With half-closed eyes and quivering form, she caused mysterious undulations to flow downward over her whole body, like rippling waves, while her face remained impassive and her twinkling feet still moved in their intricate steps.

Vitellius compared her to Mnester, the famous pantomimist. Aulus was overcome with faintness. The tetrarch watched her, lost in a voluptuous reverie, and thought no more of the real Herodias. In fancy he saw her again as she appeared when she had dwelt among the Sadducees. Then the vision faded.

But this beautiful thing before him was no vision. The dancer was Salome, the daughter of Herodias, who for many months her mother had caused to be instructed in dancing, and other arts of pleasing, with the sole idea of bringing her to Machaerus and presenting her to the tetrarch, so that he should fall in love with her fresh young beauty and feminine wiles. The plan had proved successful, it seemed; he was evidently fascinated, and Herodias felt that at last she was sure of retaining her power over him!

And now the graceful dancer appeared transported with the very delirium of love and passion. She danced like the priestesses of India, like the Nubians of the cataracts, or like the Bacchantes of Lydia. She whirled about like a flower blown by the tempest. The jewels in her ears sparkled, her swift movements made the colours of her draperies appear to run into one another. Her arms, her feet, her clothing even, seemed to emit streams of magnetism, that set the spectators' blood on fire.

Suddenly the thrilling chords of a harp rang through the hall, and the throng burst into loud acclamations. All eyes were fixed on Salome, who paused in her rhythmic dance, placed her feet wide apart, and without bending the knees, suddenly swayed her lithe body downward, so that her chin touched the floor; and her whole audience, — the nomads, accustomed to a life of privation and abstinence, the Roman soldiers, expert in debaucheries, the avaricious publicans, and even the crabbed, elderly priests — gazed upon her with dilated nostrils.

Next she began to whirl frantically around the table where Antipas the tetrarch was seated. He leaned towards the flying figure, and in a voice half choked with the voluptuous sighs of a mad desire, he sighed: "Come to me! Come!" But she whirled on, while the music of dulcimers swelled louder and the excited spectators roared their applause.

The tetrarch called again, louder than before: "Come to me! Come! Thou shalt have Capernaum, the plains of Tiberias! my citadels! yea, the half of my kingdom!"

Again the dancer paused; then, like a flash, she threw herself upon the palms of her hands, while her feet rose straight up into the air. In this bizarre pose she moved about upon the floor like a gigantic beetle; then stood motionless.

The nape of her neck formed a right angle with her vertebrae. The full silken skirts of pale hues that enveloped her limbs when she stood erect, now fell to her shoulders and surrounded her face like a rainbow. Her lips were tinted a deep crimson, her arched eyebrows were black as jet, her glowing eyes had an almost terrible radiance; and the tiny drops of perspiration on her forehead looked like dew upon white marble.

She made no sound; and the burning gaze of that multitude of men was concentrated upon her.

A sound like the snapping of fingers came from the gallery over the pavilion. Instantly, with one of her movements of bird-like swiftness, Salome stood erect. The next moment she rapidly passed up a flight of steps leading to the gallery, and coming to the front of it she leaned over, smiled upon the tetrarch, and, with an air of almost childlike naivete, pronounced these words:

"I ask my lord to give me, placed upon a charger, the head of — " She hesitated, as if not certain of the name; then said: "The head of Iaokanann!"

The tetrarch sank back in his chair as if stunned.

He had bound himself by his promise to her; and the people awaited his next movement. But the death that night of some conspicuous man that had been predicted to him by Phanuel, — what if, by bringing it upon another, he could avert it from himself, thought Antipas. If Iaokanann was in very truth the Elias so much talked of, he would have power to protect himself; and if he were only an ordinary man, his murder was of no importance.

Mannaëus stood beside his chair, and read his master's thoughts. Vitellius beckoned him to his side and gave him an order for the execution, to be transmitted to the soldiers placed on guard over the dungeon. This execution would be a relief, he thought. In a few moments all would be over!

But for once Mannaëus did not perform a commission satisfactorily. He left the hall but soon returned, in a state of great perturbation.

During forty years he had exercised the functions of the public executioner. It was he that had drowned Aristobulus, strangled Alexander, burned Mattathias alive, beheaded Zozimus, Pappus, Josephus, and Antipater; but he dared not kill Iaokanann! His teeth chattered and his whole body trembled.

He declared that he had seen, standing before the dungeon, the Angel of the Samaritans, covered with eyes and brandishing a great sword, glowing and quivering like a flame. He appealed to two of the guards, who had entered the hall with him, to corroborate his words. But they said they had seen nothing except a Jewish captain who had attacked them, and whom they had killed.

The fury of Herodias poured forth in a torrent of invective against the populace. She clenched the railing of the balcony so fiercely as to break her nails; the two stone lions at her back seemed to bite her shoulders and join their voices to hers.

Antipas followed her example; and priests, soldiers, and Pharisees cried aloud together for vengeance, echoed by the rest of the gathering, who were indignant that a mere slave should dare to delay their pleasures.

Again Mannaëus left the hall, covering his face with his hands.

The guests found the second delay longer than the first. It seemed tedious to every one.

Presently a sound of footsteps was heard in the corridor without; then silence fell again. The suspense was becoming intolerable.

Suddenly the door was flung open and Mannaëus entered, holding at arm's length, grasping it by the hair, the head of Iaokanann. His appearance was greeted with a burst of applause, which filled him with pride and revived his courage.

He placed the head upon a charger and offered it to Salome, who had descended the steps to receive it. She remounted to the balcony, with a light step; and in another moment the charger was carried about from one table to another by the elderly female slave whom the tetrarch had observed in the morning on the balcony of a neighbouring house, and later in the chamber of Herodias.

When she approached him with her ghastly burden, he turned away his head to avoid looking at it. Vitellius threw upon it an indifferent glance.

Mannaeus descended from the pavilion, took the charger from the woman, and exhibited the head to the Roman captains, then to all the guests on that side of the hall.

They looked at it curiously.

The sharp blade of the sword had cut into the jaw with a swift downward stroke. The corners of the mouth were drawn, as if by a convulsion. Clots of blood besprinkled the beard. The closed eyelids had a shell-like transparency, and the candelabra on every side lighted up the gruesome object with terrible distinctness.

Mannaeus arrived at the table where the priests were seated. One of them turned the charger about curiously, to look at the head from all sides. Then Mannaeus, having entirely regained his courage, placed the charger before Aulus, who had just awakened from a short doze; and finally he brought it again to Antipas and set it down upon the table beside him. Tears were running down the cheeks of the tetrarch.

The lights began to flicker and die out. The guests departed, and at last no one remained in the great hall save Antipas, who sat leaning his head upon his hands, gazing at the head of Iaokanann; and Phanuel, who stood in the centre of the largest nave and prayed aloud, with uplifted arms.

At sunrise the two men who had been sent on a mission by Iaokanann some time before, returned to the castle, bringing the answer so long awaited and hoped for.

They whispered the message to Phanuel, who received it with rapture.

Then he showed them the lugubrious object, still resting on the charger amid the ruins of the feast. One of the men said:

“Be comforted! He has descended among the dead in order to announce the coming of the Christ!”

And in that moment the Essene comprehended the words of Iaokanann: “In order that His glory may increase, mine must diminish!”

Then the three, taking with them the head of John the Baptist, set out upon the road to Galilee; and as the burden was heavy, each man bore it awhile in turn.

UN COEUR SIMPLE

I

Pendant un demi-siècle, les bourgeoises de Pont-l'Évêque envièrent à Mme Aubain sa servante Félicité.

Pour cent francs par an, elle faisait la cuisine et le ménage, cousait, lavait, repassait, savait brider un cheval, engraisser les volailles, battre le beurre, et resta fidèle à sa maîtresse, — qui cependant n'était pas une personne agréable.

Elle avait épousé un beau garçon sans fortune, mort au commencement de 1809, en lui laissant deux enfants très-jeunes avec une quantité de dettes. Alors elle vendit ses immeubles, sauf la ferme de Touques et la ferme de Geffosses, dont les rentes montaient à 8,000 francs tout au plus, et elle quitta sa maison de Saint-Melaine pour en habiter une autre moins dispendieuse, ayant appartenu à ses ancêtres et placée derrière les halles.

Cette maison, revêtue d'ardoises, se trouvait entre un passage et une ruelle aboutissant à la rivière. Elle avait intérieurement des différences de niveau qui faisaient trébucher. Un vestibule étroit séparait la cuisine de la salle où Mme Aubain se tenait tout le long du jour, assise près de la croisée dans un fauteuil de paille. Contre le lambris, peint en blanc, s'alignaient huit chaises d'acajou. Un vieux piano supportait, sous un baromètre, un tas pyramidal de boîtes et de cartons. Deux bergères de tapisserie flanquaient la cheminée en marbre jaune et de style Louis XV. La pendule, au milieu, représentait un temple de Vesta ; — et tout l'appartement sentait un peu le moisi, car le plancher était plus bas que le jardin.

Au premier étage, il y avait d'abord la chambre de « Madame », très-grande, tendue d'un papier à fleurs pâles, et contenant le portrait de « Monsieur » en costume de muscadin. Elle communiquait avec une chambre plus petite, où l'on voyait deux couchettes d'enfants, sans matelas. Puis venait le salon, toujours fermé, et rempli de meubles recouverts d'un drap. Ensuite un corridor menait à un cabinet d'étude ; des livres et des paperasses garnissaient les rayons d'une bibliothèque entourant de ses trois côtés un large bureau de bois noir. Les deux panneaux en retour disparaissaient sous des dessins à la plume, des paysages à la gouache et des gravures d'Audran, souvenirs d'un temps meilleur et d'un luxe évanoui. Une lucarne au second étage éclairait la chambre de Félicité, ayant vue sur les prairies.

Elle se levait dès l'aube, pour ne pas manquer la messe, et travaillait jusqu'au soir sans interruption ; puis, le dîner étant fini, la vaisselle en ordre et la porte bien close, elle enfouissait la bûche sous les cendres et s'endormait devant l'âtre, son rosaire à la main. Personne, dans les marchandages, ne montrait plus d'entêtement. Quant à la propreté, le poli de ses casseroles faisait le désespoir des autres servantes. Économe, elle mangeait avec lenteur, et recueillait du doigt sur la table les miettes de son pain, — un pain de douze livres, cuit exprès pour elle, et qui durait vingt jours.

En toute saison elle portait un mouchoir d'indienne fixé dans le dos par une épingle, un bonnet lui cachant les cheveux, des bas gris, un jupon rouge, et par-dessus sa camisole un tablier à bavette, comme les infirmières d'hôpital.

Son visage était maigre et sa voix aiguë. A vingt-cinq ans, on lui en donnait quarante. Dès la cinquantaine, elle ne marqua plus aucun âge ; — et, toujours silencieuse, la taille droite et les gestes mesurés, semblait une femme en bois, fonctionnant d'une manière automatique.

II

Elle avait eu, comme une autre, son histoire d'amour.

Son père, un maçon, s'était tué en tombant d'un échafaudage. Puis sa mère mourut, ses soeurs se dispersèrent, un fermier la recueillit, et l'employa toute petite à garder les vaches dans la campagne. Elle grelottait sous des haillons, buvait à plat ventre l'eau des mares, à propos de rien était battue, et finalement fut chassée pour un vol de trente sols, qu'elle n'avait pas commis. Elle entra dans une autre ferme, y devint fille de basse-cour, et, comme elle plaisait aux patrons, ses camarades la jalousaient.

Un soir du mois d'août (elle avait alors dix-huit ans), ils l'entraînèrent à l'assemblée de Colleville. Tout de suite elle fut étourdie, stupéfaite par le tapage des ménétriers, les lumières dans les arbres, la bigarrure des costumes, les dentelles, les croix d'or, cette masse de monde sautant à la fois. Elle se tenait à l'écart modestement, quand un jeune homme d'apparence cossue, et qui fumait sa pipe les deux coudes sur le timon d'un banneau, vint l'inviter à la danse. Il lui paya du cidre, du café, de la galette, un foulard, et, s'imaginant qu'elle le devinait, offrit de la reconduire. Au bord d'un champ d'avoine, il la renversa brutalement. Elle eut peur et se mit à crier. Il s'éloigna.

Un autre soir, sur la route de Beaumont, elle voulut dépasser un grand chariot de foin qui avançait lentement, et en frôlant les roues elle reconnut Théodore.

Il l'aborda d'un air tranquille, disant qu'il fallait tout pardonner, puisque c'était « la faute de la boisson ».

Elle ne sut que répondre et avait envie de s'enfuir.

Aussitôt il parla des récoltes et des notables de la commune, car son père avait abandonné Colleville pour la ferme des Écots, de sorte que maintenant ils se trouvaient voisins. — « Ah ! » dit-elle. Il ajouta qu'on désirait l'établir. Du reste, il n'était pas pressé, et attendait une femme à son goût. Elle baissa la tête. Alors il lui demanda si elle pensait au mariage. Elle reprit, en souriant, que c'était mal de se moquer. — « Mais non, je vous jure ! » et du bras gauche il lui entoura la taille ; elle marchait soutenue par son étreinte ; ils se ralentirent. Le vent était mou, les étoiles brillaient, l'énorme charretée de foin oscillait devant eux ; et les quatre chevaux, en traînant leurs pas, soulevaient de la poussière. Puis, sans commandement, ils tournèrent à droite. Il l'embrassa encore une fois. Elle disparut dans l'ombre.

Théodore, la semaine suivante, en obtint des rendez-vous.

Ils se rencontraient au fond des cours, derrière un mur, sous un arbre isolé. Elle n'était pas innocente à la manière des demoiselles, — les animaux l'avaient instruite ; — mais la raison et l'instinct de l'honneur l'empêchèrent de faillir. Cette résistance exaspéra l'amour de Théodore, si bien que pour le satisfaire (ou naïvement peut-être) il proposa de l'épouser. Elle hésitait à le croire. Il fit de grands serments.

Bientôt il avoua quelque chose de fâcheux : ses parents, l'année dernière, lui avaient acheté un homme ; mais d'un jour à l'autre on pourrait le reprendre ; l'idée de servir l'effrayait. Cette couardise fut pour Félicité une preuve de tendresse ; la sienne en redoubla. Elle s'échappait la nuit, et, parvenue au rendez-vous, Théodore la torturait avec ses inquiétudes et ses instances.

Enfin, il annonça qu'il irait lui-même à la Préfecture prendre des informations, et les apporterait dimanche prochain, entre onze heures et minuit.

Le moment arrivé, elle courut vers l'amoureux.

A sa place, elle trouva un de ses amis.

Il lui apprit qu'elle ne devait plus le revoir. Pour se garantir de la conscription, Théodore avait épousé une vieille femme très-riche, Mme Lehoussais, de Toucques.

Ce fut un chagrin désordonné. Elle se jeta par terre, poussa des cris, appela le bon Dieu, et gémit toute seule dans la campagne jusqu'au soleil levant. Puis elle revint à la ferme, déclara son intention d'en partir ; et, au bout du mois, ayant reçu ses comptes, elle enferma tout son petit bagage dans un mouchoir, et se rendit à Pont-l'Évêque.

Devant l'auberge, elle questionna une bourgeoise en capeline de veuve, et qui précisément cherchait une cuisinière. La jeune fille ne savait pas grand'chose, mais paraissait avoir tant de bonne volonté et si peu d'exigences, que Mme Aubain finit par dire :

« — Soit, je vous accepte ! »

Félicité, un quart d'heure après, était installée chez elle.

D'abord elle y vécut dans une sorte de tremblement que lui causaient « le genre de la maison » et le souvenir de « Monsieur », planant sur tout ! Paul et Virginie, l'un âgé de sept ans, l'autre de quatre à peine, lui semblaient formés d'une matière précieuse ; elle les portait sur son dos comme un cheval, et Mme Aubain lui défendit de les baiser à chaque minute, ce qui la mortifia. Cependant elle se trouvait heureuse. La douceur du milieu avait fondu sa tristesse.

Tous les jeudis, des habitués venaient faire une partie de boston. Félicité préparait d'avance les cartes et les chaufferettes. Ils arrivaient à huit heures bien juste, et se retiraient avant le coup de onze.

Chaque lundi matin, le brocanteur qui logeait sous l'allée étalait par terre ses ferrailles. Puis la ville se remplissait d'un bourdonnement de voix, où se mêlaient des hennissements de chevaux, des bêlements d'agneaux, des grognements de cochons, avec le bruit sec des carrioles dans la rue. Vers midi, au plus fort du marché, on voyait paraître sur le seuil un vieux paysan de haute taille, la casquette en arrière, le nez crochu, et qui était Robelin, le fermier de Geffosses. Peu de temps après, — c'était Liébard, le fermier de Toucques, petit, rouge, obèse, portant une veste grise et des housseaux armés d'éperons.

Tous deux offraient à leur propriétaire des poules ou des fromages.

Félicité invariablement déjouait leurs astuces ; et ils s'en allaient pleins de considération pour elle.

A des époques indéterminées, Mme Aubain recevait la visite du marquis de Gremanville, un de ses oncles, ruiné par la crapule et qui vivait à Falaise sur le dernier lopin de ses terres. Il se présentait toujours à l'heure du déjeuner, avec un affreux caniche dont les pattes salissaient tous les meubles. Malgré ses efforts pour paraître gentilhomme jusqu'à soulever son chapeau chaque fois qu'il disait : « Feu mon père, » l'habitude l'entraînant, il se versait à boire coup sur coup, et lâchait des gaillardises. Félicité le poussait dehors poliment : « Vous en avez assez, Monsieur de Gremanville ! A une autre fois ! » Et elle refermait la porte.

Elle l'ouvrait avec plaisir devant M. Bourais, ancien avoué. Sa cravate blanche et sa calvitie, le jabot de sa chemise, son ample redingote brune, sa façon de priser en arrondissant le bras, tout son individu lui produisait ce trouble où nous jette le spectacle des hommes extraordinaires.

Comme il gérait les propriétés de « Madame », il s'enfermait avec elle pendant des heures dans le cabinet de « Monsieur », et craignait toujours de se compromettre, respectait infiniment la magistrature, avait des prétentions au latin.

Pour instruire les enfants d'une manière agréable, il leur fit cadeau d'une géographie en estampes. Elles représentaient différentes scènes du monde, des anthropophages coiffés de plumes, un singe enlevant une demoiselle, des Bédouins dans le désert, une baleine qu'on harponnait, etc.

Paul donna l'explication de ces gravures à Félicité. Ce fut même toute son éducation littéraire.

Celle des enfants était faite par Guyot, un pauvre diable employé à la Mairie, fameux pour sa belle main, et qui repassait son canif sur sa botte.

Quand le temps était clair, on s'en allait de bonne heure à la ferme de Geffosses.

La cour est en pente, la maison dans le milieu ; et la mer, au loin, apparaît comme une tache grise.

Félicité retirait de son cabas des tranches de viande froide, et on déjeunait dans un appartement faisant suite à la laiterie. Il était le seul reste d'une habitation de plaisance, maintenant disparue. Le papier de la muraille en lambeaux tremblait aux courants d'air. Mme Aubain penchait son front, accablée de souvenirs ; les enfants n'osaient plus parler. « Mais jouez donc ! » disait-elle ; ils décampaient.

Paul montait dans la grange, attrapait des oiseaux, faisait des ricochets sur la mare, ou tapait avec un bâton les grosses futailles qui résonnaient comme des tambours.

Virginie donnait à manger aux lapins, se précipitait pour cueillir des bleuets, et la rapidité de ses jambes découvrait ses petits pantalons brodés.

Un soir d'automne, on s'en retourna par les herbages.

La lune à son premier quartier éclairait une partie du ciel, et un brouillard flottait comme une écharpe sur les sinuosités de la Touques. Des boeufs, étendus au milieu du gazon, regardaient tranquillement ces quatre personnes passer. Dans la troisième pâture quelques-uns se levèrent, puis se mirent en rond devant elles. — « Ne craignez rien ! » dit Félicité ; et, murmurant une sorte de complainte, elle flatta sur l'échine celui qui se trouvait le plus près ; il fit volte-face, les autres l'imitèrent. Mais, quand l'herbage suivant fut traversé, un beuglement formidable s'éleva. C'était un taureau, que cachait le brouillard. Il avança vers les deux femmes. Mme Aubain allait courir. — « Non ! non ! moins vite ! » Elles pressaient le pas cependant, et entendaient par derrière un souffle sonore qui se rapprochait. Ses sabots, comme des marteaux, battaient l'herbe de la prairie ; voilà qu'il galopait maintenant ! Félicité se retourna, et elle arrachait à deux mains des plaques de terre qu'elle lui jetait dans les yeux. Il baissait le muflle, secouait les cornes et tremblait de fureur en beuglant horriblement. Mme Aubain, au bout de l'herbage avec ses deux petits, cherchait éperdue comment franchir le haut bord. Félicité reculait toujours devant le taureau, et continuellement lançait des mottes de gazon qui l'aveuglaient, tandis qu'elle criait : — « Dépêchez-vous ! dépêchez-vous ! » Mme Aubain descendit le fossé, poussa Virginie, Paul ensuite, tomba plusieurs fois en tâchant de gravir le talus, et à force de courage y parvint.

Le taureau avait acculé Félicité contre une claire-voie ; sa bave lui rejaillissait à la figure, une seconde de plus il l'éventrait. Elle eut le temps de se couler entre deux barreaux, et la grosse bête, toute surprise, s'arrêta.

Cet événement, pendant bien des années, fut un sujet de conversation à Pont-l'Évêque. Félicité n'en tira aucun orgueil, ne se doutant même pas qu'elle eût rien fait d'héroïque.

Virginie l'occupait exclusivement ; — -car elle eut, à la suite de son effroi, une affection nerveuse, et M. Poupart, le docteur, conseilla les bains de mer de Trouville.

Dans ce temps-là, ils n'étaient pas fréquentés. Mme Aubain prit des renseignements, consulta Bourais, fit des préparatifs comme pour un long voyage.

Ses colis partirent la veille, dans la charrette de Liébard. Le lendemain, il amena deux chevaux dont l'un avait une selle de femme, munie d'un dossier de velours ; et sur la croupe du second un manteau roulé formait une manière de siège. Mme Aubain y monta, derrière lui. Félicité se chargea de Virginie, et Paul enfourcha l'âne de M. Lechaptois, prêté sous la condition d'en avoir grand soin.

La route était si mauvaise que ses huit kilomètres exigèrent deux heures. Les chevaux enfonçaient jusqu'aux paturons dans la boue, et faisaient pour en sortir de brusques mouvements des hanches ; ou bien ils buttaient contre les ornières ; d'autres fois, il leur fallait sauter. La jument de Liébard, à de certains endroits, s'arrêtait tout à coup. Il attendait patiemment qu'elle se remît en marche ; et il parlait des personnes dont les propriétés bordaient la route, ajoutant à leur histoire des réflexions morales. Ainsi, au milieu de Touques, comme on passait sous des fenêtres entourées de capucines, il dit, avec un haussement d'épaules : — « En voilà une Mme Lehoussais, qui au lieu de prendre un jeune homme... » Félicité n'entendit pas le reste ; les chevaux trottaient, l'âne galopait ; tous enfilèrent un sentier, une barrière tourna, deux garçons parurent, et l'on descendit devant le purin, sur le seuil même de la porte.

La mère Liébard, en apercevant sa maîtresse, prodigua les démonstrations de joie. Elle lui servit un déjeuner où il y avait un aloyau, des tripes, du boudin, une fricassée de poulet, du cidre mousseux, une tarte aux compotes et des prunes à l'eau-de-vie, accompagnant le tout de politesses à Madame qui paraissait en meilleure santé, à Mademoiselle devenue « magnifique », à M. Paul singulièrement « forci », sans oublier leurs grands-parents défunts que les Liébard avaient connus, étant au service de la famille depuis plusieurs générations. La ferme avait, comme eux, un caractère d'ancienneté. Les poutrelles du plafond étaient vermoulues, les murailles noires de fumée, les carreaux gris de poussière. Un dressoir en chêne supportait toutes sortes d'ustensiles, des brocs, des assiettes, des écuelles d'étain, des pièges à loup, des forces pour les moutons ; une seringue énorme fit rire les enfants. Pas un arbre des trois cours qui n'eût des champignons à sa base, ou dans ses rameaux une touffe de gui. Le vent en avait jeté bas plusieurs. Ils avaient repris par le milieu ; et tous fléchissaient sous la quantité de leurs pommes. Les toits de paille, pareils à du velours brun et inégaux d'épaisseur, résistaient aux plus fortes bourrasques. Cependant la charreterie tombait en ruines. Mme Aubain dit qu'elle aviserait, et commanda de reharnacher les bêtes.

On fut encore une demi-heure avant d'atteindre Trouville. La petite caravane mit pied à terre pour passer les Écores ; c'était une falaise surplombant des bateaux ; et trois minutes plus tard, au bout du quai, on entra dans la cour de l'Agneau d'or, chez la mère David.

Virginie, dès les premiers jours, se sentit moins faible, résultat du changement d'air et de l'action des bains. Elle les prenait en chemise, à défaut d'un costume ; et sa bonne la rhabillait dans une cabane de douanier qui servait aux baigneurs.

L'après-midi, on s'en allait avec l'âne au-delà des Roches-Noires, du côté d'Hennequeville. Le sentier, d'abord, montait entre des terrains vallonnés comme la pelouse d'un parc, puis arrivait sur un plateau où alternaient des pâturages et des champs en labour. A la lisière du chemin, dans le fouillis des ronces, des houx se dressaient ; ça et là, un grand arbre mort faisait sur l'air bleu des zigzags avec ses branches.

Presque toujours on se reposait dans un pré, ayant Deauville à gauche, le Havre à droite et en face la pleine mer. Elle était brillante de soleil, lisse comme un miroir, tellement douce qu'on entendait à peine son murmure ; des moineaux cachés pépiaient et la voûte immense du ciel recouvrait tout cela. Mme Aubain, assise, travaillait à son ouvrage de couture ; Virginie près d'elle tressait des joncs ; Félicité sarclait des fleurs de lavande ; Paul, qui s'ennuyait, voulait partir.

D'autres fois, ayant passé la Touques en bateau, ils cherchaient des coquilles. La marée basse laissait à découvert des oursins, des godefiches, des méduses ; et les enfants couraient, pour saisir des flocons d'écume que le vent emportait. Les flots endormis, en tombant sur le sable, se déroulaient le long de la grève ; elle s'étendait à perte de vue, mais du côté de la terre avait pour limite les dunes la séparant du Marais, large prairie en forme d'hippodrome. Quand ils revenaient par là, Trouville, au fond sur la pente du coteau, à chaque pas grandissait, et avec toutes ses maisons inégales semblait s'épanouir dans un désordre gai.

Les jours qu'il faisait trop chaud, ils ne sortaient pas de leur chambre. L'éblouissante clarté du dehors plaquait des barres de lumière entre les lames des jalousies. Aucun bruit dans le village. En bas, sur le trottoir, personne. Ce silence épandu augmentait la tranquillité des choses. Au loin, les marteaux des calfats tamponnaient des carènes, et une brise lourde apportait la senteur du goudron.

Le principal divertissement était le retour des barques. Dès qu'elles avaient dépassé les balises, elles commençaient à louvoyer. Leurs voiles descendaient aux deux tiers des mâts ; et, la misaine gonflée comme un ballon, elles avançaient, glissaient dans le clapotement des vagues, jusqu'au milieu du port, où l'ancre tout à coup tombait. Ensuite le bateau se plaçait contre le quai. Les matelots jetaient par-dessus le bordage des poissons palpitants ; une file de charrettes les attendait, et des femmes en bonnet de coton s'élançaient pour prendre les corbeilles et embrasser leurs hommes.

Une d'elles, un jour, aborda Félicité, qui peu de temps après entra dans la chambre, toute joyeuse. Elle avait retrouvé une soeur ; et Nastasie Barette, femme Leroux, apparut, tenant un nourrisson à sa poitrine, de la main droite un autre enfant, et à sa gauche un petit mousse les poings sur les hanches et le béret sur l'oreille.

Au bout d'un quart d'heure, Mme Aubain la congédia.

On les rencontrait toujours aux abords de la cuisine, ou dans les promenades que l'on faisait. Le mari ne se montrait pas.

Félicité se prit d'affection pour eux. Elle leur acheta une couverture, des chemises, un fourneau ; évidemment ils l'exploitaient. Cette faiblesse agaçait Mme Aubain, qui d'ailleurs n'aimait pas les familiarités du neveu, — car il tutoyait son fils ; — et, comme Virginie toussait et que la saison n'était plus bonne, elle revint à Pont-l'Évêque.

M. Bourais l'éclaira sur le choix d'un collège. Celui de Caen passait pour le meilleur. Paul y fut envoyé ; et fit bravement ses adieux, satisfait d'aller vivre dans une maison où il aurait des camarades.

Mme Aubain se résigna à l'éloignement de son fils, parce qu'il était indispensable. Virginie y songea de moins en moins. Félicité regrettait son tapage. Mais une occupation vint la distraire ; à partir de Noël, elle mena tous les jours la petite fille au catéchisme.

III

Quand elle avait fait à la porte une gémulation, elle s'avancait sous la haute nef entre la double ligne des chaises, ouvrait le banc de Mme Aubain, s'asseyait, et promenait ses yeux autour d'elle.

Les garçons à droite, les filles à gauche, emplissaient les stalles du chœur ; le curé se tenait debout près du lutrin ; sur un vitrail de l'abside, le Saint-Esprit dominait la Vierge ; un autre la montrait à genoux devant l'Enfant-Jésus, et, derrière le tabernacle, un groupe en bois représentait Saint-Michel terrassant le dragon.

Le prêtre fit d'abord un abrégé de l'Histoire-Sainte. Elle croyait voir le paradis, le déluge, la tour de Babel, des villes tout en flammes, des peuples qui mouraient, des idoles renversées ; et elle garda de cet éblouissement le respect du Très-Haut et la crainte de sa colère. Puis, elle pleura en écoutant la Passion. Pourquoi l'avaient-ils crucifié, lui qui chérissait les enfants, nourrissait les foules, guérissait les aveugles, et avait voulu, par douceur, naître au milieu des pauvres, sur le fumier d'une étable ? Les semailles, les moissons, les pressoirs, toutes ces choses familières dont parle l'Évangile, se trouvaient dans sa vie ; le passage de Dieu les avait sanctifiées ; et elle aima plus tendrement les agneaux par amour de l'Agneau, les colombes à cause du Saint-Esprit.

Elle avait peine à imaginer sa personne ; car il n'était pas seulement oiseau, mais encore un feu, et d'autres fois un souffle. C'est peut-être sa lumière qui voltige la nuit aux bords des marécages, son haleine qui pousse les nuées, sa voix qui rend les cloches harmonieuses ; et elle demeurait dans une adoration, jouissant de la fraîcheur des murs et de la tranquillité de l'église.

Quant aux dogmes, elle n'y comprenait rien, ne tâcha même pas de comprendre. Le curé discourait, les enfants récitaient, elle finissait par s'endormir ; et se réveillait tout à coup, quand ils faisaient en s'en allant claquer leurs sabots sur les dalles.

Ce fut de cette manière, à force de l'entendre, qu'elle apprit le catéchisme, son éducation religieuse ayant été négligée dans sa jeunesse ; et dès lors elle imita toutes les pratiques de Virginie, jeûnait comme elle, se confessait avec elle. A la Fête-Dieu, elles firent ensemble un reposoir.

La première communion la tourmentait d'avance. Elle s'agita pour les souliers, pour le chapelet, pour le livre, pour les gants. Avec quel tremblement elle aida sa mère à l'habiller !

Pendant toute la messe, elle éprouva une angoisse. M. Bourais lui cachait un côté du choeur ; mais juste en face, le troupeau des vierges portant des couronnes blanches par-dessus leurs voiles abaissés formait comme un champ de neige ; et elle reconnaissait de loin la chère petite à son cou plus mignon et son attitude recueillie. La cloche tinta. Les têtes se courbèrent ; il y eut un silence. Aux éclats de l'orgue, les chantres et la foule entonnèrent l'Agnus Dei ; puis le défilé des garçons commença ; et, après eux, les filles se levèrent. Pas à pas, et les mains jointes, elles allaient vers l'autel tout illuminé, s'agenouillaient sur la première marche, recevaient l'hostie successivement, et dans le même ordre revenaient à leurs prie-Dieu. Quand ce fut le tour de Virginie, Félicité se pencha pour la voir ; et, avec l'imagination que donnent les vraies tendresses, il lui sembla qu'elle était elle-même cette enfant ; sa figure devenait la sienne, sa robe l'habillait, son coeur lui battait dans la poitrine ; au moment d'ouvrir la bouche, en fermant les paupières, elle manqua s'évanouir.

Le lendemain, de bonne heure, elle se présenta dans la sacristie, pour que M. le curé lui donnât la communion. Elle la reçut dévotement, mais n'y goûta pas les mêmes délices.

Mme Aubain voulait faire de sa fille une personne accomplie ; et, comme Guyot ne pouvait lui montrer ni l'anglais ni la musique, elle résolut de la mettre en pension chez les Ursulines d'Honfleur.

L'enfant n'objecta rien. Félicité soupirait, trouvant Madame insensible. Puis elle songea que sa maîtresse, peut-être, avait raison. Ces choses dépassaient sa compétence.

Enfin, un jour, une vieille tapissière s'arrêta devant la porte ; et il en descendit une religieuse qui venait chercher Mademoiselle. Félicité monta les bagages sur l'impériale, fit des recommandations au cocher, et plaça dans le coffre six pots de confitures et une douzaine de poires, avec un bouquet de violettes.

Virginie, au dernier moment, fut prise d'un grand sanglot ; elle embrassait sa mère qui la baisait au front en répétant — : « Allons ! du courage ! du courage ! » Le marchepied se releva, la voiture partit.

Alors Mme Aubain eut une défaillance ; et le soir tous ses amis, le ménage Lormeau, Mme Lechaptois, ces demoiselles Rochefeuille, M. de Houppeville et Bourais se présentèrent pour la consoler.

La privation de sa fille lui fut d'abord très-douloureuse. Mais trois fois la semaine elle en recevait une lettre, les autres jours lui écrivait, se promenait dans son jardin, lisait un peu, et de cette façon comblait le vide des heures.

Le matin, par habitude, Félicité entraînait dans la chambre de Virginie, et regardait les murailles. Elle s'ennuyait de n'avoir plus à peigner ses cheveux, à lui lacer ses bottines, à la border dans son lit, — et de ne plus voir continuellement sa gentille figure, de ne plus la tenir par la main quand elles sortaient ensemble. Dans son désœuvrement, elle essaya de faire de la dentelle. Ses doigts trop lourds cassaient les fils ; elle n'entendait à rien, avait perdu le sommeil, suivant son mot, était « minée ».

Pour « se dissiper », elle demanda la permission de recevoir son neveu Victor.

Il arrivait le dimanche après la messe, les joues roses, la poitrine nue, et sentant l'odeur de la campagne qu'il avait traversée. Tout de suite, elle dressait son couvert. Ils déjeunaient l'un en face de l'autre ; et, mangeant elle-même le moins possible pour épargner la dépense, elle le bourrait tellement de nourriture qu'il finissait par s'endormir. Au premier coup des vêpres, elle le réveillait, brossait son pantalon, nouait sa cravate, et se rendait à l'église, appuyée sur son bras dans un orgueil maternel.

Ses parents le chargeaient toujours d'en tirer quelque chose, soit un paquet de cassonade, du savon, de l'eau-de-vie, parfois même de l'argent. Il apportait ses nippes à raccommoder ; et elle acceptait cette besogne, heureuse d'une occasion qui le forçait à revenir.

Au mois d'août, son père l'emmena au cabotage.

C'était l'époque des vacances. L'arrivée des enfants la consola. Mais Paul devenait capricieux, et Virginie n'avait plus l'âge d'être tutoyée, ce qui mettait une gêne, une barrière entre elles.

Victor alla successivement à Morlaix, à Dunkerque et à Brighton ; au retour de chaque voyage, il lui offrait un cadeau. La première fois, ce fut une boîte en coquilles ; la seconde, une tasse à café ; la troisième, un grand bonhomme en pain d'épices. Il embellissait, avait la taille bien prise, un peu de moustache, de bons yeux francs, et un petit chapeau de cuir, placé en arrière comme un pilote. Il l'amusait en lui racontant des histoires mêlées de termes marins.

Un lundi, 14 juillet 1819 (elle n'oublia pas la date), Victor annonça qu'il était engagé au long cours, et, dans la nuit du surlendemain, par le paquebot de Honfleur, irait rejoindre sa goëlette, qui devait démarrer du Havre prochainement. Il serait, peut-être, deux ans parti.

La perspective d'une telle absence désola Félicité ; et pour lui dire encore adieu, le mercredi soir, après le dîner de Madame, elle chaussa des galoches, et avala les quatre lieues qui séparent Pont-l'Évêque de Honfleur.

Quand elle fut devant le Calvaire, au lieu de prendre à gauche, elle prit à droite, se perdit dans des chantiers, revint sur ses pas ; des gens qu'elle accosta l'engagèrent à se hâter. Elle fit le tour du bassin rempli de navires, se heurtait contre des amarres ; puis le terrain s'abaissa, des lumières s'entre-croisèrent, et elle se crut folle, en apercevant des chevaux dans le ciel.

Au bord du quai, d'autres hennissaient, effrayés par la mer. Un palan qui les enlevait les descendait dans un bateau, où des voyageurs se bousculaient entre les barriques de cidre, les paniers de fromage, les sacs de grain ; on entendait chanter des poules, le capitaine jurait ; et un mousse restait accoudé sur le bossoir, indifférent à tout cela. Félicité, qui ne l'avait pas reconnu, criait : « Victor ! » il leva la tête ; elle s'élançait, quand on retira l'échelle tout à coup.

Le paquebot, que des femmes halaient en chantant, sortit du port. Sa membrure craquait, les vagues pesantes fouettaient sa proue. La voile avait tourné, on ne vit plus personne ; — -et, sur la mer argentée par la lune, il faisait une tache noire qui pâlisait toujours, s'enfonça, disparut.

Félicité, en passant près du Calvaire, voulut recommander à Dieu ce qu'elle chérissait le plus ; et elle pria pendant longtemps, debout, la face baignée de pleurs, les yeux vers les nuages. La ville dormait, des douaniers se promenaient ; et de l'eau tombait sans discontinuer par les trous de l'écluse, avec un bruit de torrent. Deux heures sonnèrent.

Le parloir n'ouvrirait pas avant le jour. Un retard, bien sûr, contrarierait Madame ; et, malgré son désir d'embrasser l'autre enfant, elle s'en retourna. Les filles de l'auberge s'éveillaient, comme elle entraient dans Pont-l'Évêque.

Le pauvre gamin durant des mois allait donc rouler sur les flots ! Ses précédents voyages ne l'avaient pas effrayée. De l'Angleterre et de la Bretagne, on revenait ; mais l'Amérique, les Colonies, les Iles, cela était perdu dans une région incertaine, à l'autre bout du monde.

Dès lors, Félicité pensa exclusivement à son neveu. Les jours de soleil, elle se tourmentait de la soif ; quand il faisait de l'orage, craignait pour lui la foudre. En écoutant le vent qui grondait dans la cheminée et emportait les ardoises, elle le voyait battu par cette même tempête, au sommet d'un mât fracassé, tout le corps en arrière, sous une nappe d'écume ; ou bien, — souvenirs de la géographie en estampes, — il était mangé par les sauvages, pris dans un bois par des singes, se mourait le long d'une plage déserte. Et jamais elle ne parlait de ses inquiétudes.

Mme Aubain en avait d'autres sur sa fille.

Les bonnes soeurs trouvaient qu'elle était affectueuse, mais délicate. La moindre émotion l'énervait. Il fallut abandonner le piano.

Sa mère exigeait du couvent une correspondance réglée. Un matin que le facteur n'était pas venu, elle s'impatienta ; et elle marchait dans la salle, de son fauteuil à la fenêtre. C'était vraiment extraordinaire ! depuis quatre jours, pas de nouvelles !

Pour qu'elle se consolât par son exemple, Félicité lui dit :

— « Moi, madame, voilà six mois que je n'en ai reçu !... »

— « De qui donc ?... »

La servante répliqua doucement :

— « Mais... de mon neveu ! »

— « Ah ! votre neveu ! » Et, haussant les épaules, Mme Aubain reprit sa promenade, ce qui voulait dire : « Je n'y pensais pas !... Au surplus, je m'en moque ! un mousse, un gueux, belle affaire !... tandis que ma fille... Songez donc !... »

Félicité, bien que nourrie dans la rudesse, fut indignée contre Madame, puis oubliée.

Il lui paraissait tout simple de perdre la tête à l'occasion de la petite.

Les deux enfants avaient une importance égale ; un lien de son coeur les unissait, et leurs destinées devaient être la même.

Le pharmacien lui apprit que le bateau de Victor était arrivé à la Havane. Il avait lu ce renseignement dans une gazette.

A cause des cigares, elle imaginait la Havane un pays où l'on ne fait pas autre chose que de fumer, et Victor circulait parmi des nègres dans un nuage de tabac. Pouvait-on « en cas de besoin » s'en retourner par terre ? A quelle distance était-ce de Pont-l'Évêque ? Pour le savoir, elle interrogea M. Bourais.

Il atteignit son atlas, puis commença des explications sur les longitudes ; et il avait un beau sourire de cuistre devant l'ahurissement de Félicité. Enfin, avec son porte-crayon, il indiqua dans les découpures d'une tache ovale un point noir, imperceptible, en ajoutant ; « Voici. » Elle se pencha sur la carte ; ce réseau de lignes coloriées fatiguait sa vue, sans lui rien apprendre ; et Bourais, l'invitant à dire ce qui l'embarrassait, elle le pria de lui montrer la maison où demeurait Victor. Bourais leva les bras, il éternua, rit énormément ; une candeur pareille excitait sa joie ; et Félicité n'en comprenait pas le motif, — elle qui s'attendait peut-être à voir jusqu'au portrait de son neveu, tant son intelligence était bornée !

Ce fut quinze jours après que Liébard, à l'heure du marché comme d'habitude, entra dans la cuisine, et lui remit une lettre qu'envoyait son beau-frère. Ne sachant lire aucun des deux, elle eut recours à sa maîtresse.

Mme Aubain, qui comptait les mailles d'un tricot, le posa près d'elle, décacheta la lettre, tressaillit, et, d'une voix basse, avec un regard profond :

— « C'est un malheur... qu'on vous annonce. Votre neveu... »

Il était mort. On n'en disait pas davantage.

Félicité tomba sur une chaise, en s'appuyant la tête à la cloison, et ferma ses paupières, qui devinrent roses tout à coup. Puis, le front baissé, les mains pendantes, l'oeil fixe, elle répétait par intervalles :

— « Pauvre petit gars ! pauvre petit gars ! »

Liébard la considérait en exhalant des soupirs. Mme Aubain tremblait un peu.

Elle lui proposa d'aller voir sa soeur, à Trouville.

Félicité répondit, par un geste, qu'elle n'en avait pas besoin.

Il y eut un silence. Le bonhomme Liébard jugea convenable de se retirer.

Alors elle dit :

— « Ça ne leur fait rien, à eux ! »

Sa tête retomba ; et machinalement elle soulevait, de temps à autre, les longues aiguilles sur la table à ouvrage.

Des femmes passèrent dans la cour avec un bard d'où dégouttait du linge.

En les apercevant par les carreaux, elle se rappela sa lessive ; l'ayant coulée la veille, il fallait aujourd'hui la rincer ; et elle sortit de l'appartement.

Sa planche et son tonneau étaient au bord de la Touques. Elle jeta sur la berge un tas de chemises, retroussa ses manches, prit son battoir ; et les coups forts qu'elle donnait s'entendaient dans les autres jardins à côté. Les prairies étaient vides, le vent agitait la rivière ; au fond, de grandes herbes s'y penchaient, comme des chevelures de cadavres flottant dans l'eau. Elle retenait sa douleur, jusqu'au soir fut très-brave ; mais, dans sa chambre, elle s'y abandonna, à plat ventre sur son matelas, le visage dans l'oreiller, et les deux poings contre les tempes.

Beaucoup plus tard, par le capitaine de Victor lui-même, elle connut les circonstances de sa fin. On l'avait trop saigné à l'hôpital, pour la fièvre jaune. Quatre médecins le tenaient à la fois. Il était mort immédiatement, et le chef avait dit :

— « Bon ! encore un ! »

Ses parents l'avaient toujours traité avec barbarie. Elle aimait mieux ne pas les revoir ; et ils ne firent aucune avance, par oubli, ou endurcissement de misérables.

Virginie s'affaiblissait.

Des oppressions, de la toux, une fièvre continue et des marbrures aux pommettes décelaient quelque affection profonde. M. Poupart avait conseillé un séjour en Provence. Mme Aubain s'y décida, et eût tout de suite repris sa fille à la maison, sans le climat de Pont-l'Évêque.

Elle fit un arrangement avec un loueur de voitures, qui la menait au couvent chaque mardi. Il y a dans le jardin une terrasse d'où l'on découvre la Seine. Virginie s'y promenait à son bras, sur les feuilles de pampro tombées. Quelquefois le soleil traversant les nuages la forçait à cligner ses paupières, pendant qu'elle regardait les voiles au loin et tout l'horizon, depuis le château de Tancarville jusqu'aux phares du Havre. Ensuite on se reposait sous la tonnelle. Sa mère s'était procuré un petit fût d'excellent vin de Malaga ; et, riant à l'idée d'être grise, elle en buvait deux doigts, pas davantage.

Ses forces reparurent. L'automne s'écoula doucement. Félicité rassurait Mme Aubain. Mais, un soir qu'elle avait été aux environs faire une course, elle rencontra devant la porte le cabriolet de M. Poupart ; et il était dans le vestibule. Mme Aubain nouait son chapeau.

— « Donnez-moi ma chaufferette, ma bourse, mes gants ; plus vite donc ! »

Virginie avait une fluxion de poitrine ; c'était peut-être désespéré.

— « Pas encore ! » dit le médecin ; et tous deux montèrent dans la voiture, sous des flocons de neige qui tourbillonnaient. La nuit allait venir. Il faisait très-froid.

Félicité se précipita dans l'église, pour allumer un cierge. Puis elle courut après le cabriolet, qu'elle rejoignit une heure plus tard, sauta légèrement par derrière, où elle se tenait aux torsades, quand une réflexion lui vint : « La cour n'était pas fermée ! si des voleurs s'introduisaient ? » Et elle descendit.

Le lendemain, dès l'aube, elle se présenta chez le docteur. Il était rentré, et reparti à la campagne. Puis elle resta dans l'auberge, croyant que des inconnus apporteraient une lettre. Enfin, au petit jour, elle prit la diligence de Lisieux.

Le couvent se trouvait au fond d'une ruelle escarpée. Vers le milieu, elle entendit des sons étranges, un glas de mort. « C'est pour d'autres, » pensa-t-elle ; et Félicité tira violemment le marteau.

Au bout de plusieurs minutes, des savates se traînèrent, la porte s'entre-bâilla, et une religieuse parut.

La bonne soeur avec un air de componction dit qu'« elle venait de passer ». En même temps, le glas de Saint-Léonard redoublait.

Félicité parvint au second étage.

Dès le seuil de la chambre, elle aperçut Virginie étalée sur le dos, les mains jointes, la bouche ouverte, et la tête en arrière sous une croix noire s'inclinant vers elle, entre les rideaux immobiles, moins pâles que sa figure. Mme Aubain, au pied de la couche qu'elle tenait dans ses bras, poussait des hoquets d'agonie. La supérieure était debout, à droite. Trois chandeliers sur la commode faisaient des taches rouges, et le brouillard blanchissait les fenêtres. Des religieuses emportèrent Mme Aubain.

Pendant deux nuits, Félicité ne quitta pas la morte. Elle répétait les mêmes prières, jetait de l'eau bénite sur les draps, revenait s'asseoir, et la contemplait. A la fin de la première veille, elle remarqua que la figure avait jauni, les lèvres bleuirent, le nez se pinçait, les yeux s'enfonçaient. Elle les baisa plusieurs fois ; et n'eût pas éprouvé un immense étonnement si Virginie les eût rouverts ; pour de pareilles âmes le surnaturel est tout simple. Elle fit sa toilette, l'enveloppa de son linceul, la descendit dans sa bière, lui posa une couronne, étala ses cheveux. Ils étaient blonds, et extraordinaires de longueur à son âge. Félicité en coupa une grosse mèche, dont elle glissa la moitié dans sa poitrine, résolue à ne jamais s'en dessaisir.

Le corps fut ramené à Pont-l'Évêque, suivant les intentions de Mme Aubain, qui suivait le corbillard, dans une voiture fermée.

Après la messe, il fallut encore trois quarts d'heure pour atteindre le cimetière. Paul marchait en tête et sanglotait. M. Bourais était derrière, ensuite les principaux habitants, les femmes, couvertes de mantes noires, et Félicité. Elle songeait à son neveu, et, n'ayant pu lui rendre ces honneurs, avait un surcroît de tristesse, comme si on l'eût enterré avec l'autre.

Le désespoir de Mme Aubain fut illimité.

D'abord elle se révolta contre Dieu, le trouvant injuste de lui avoir pris sa fille, — elle qui n'avait jamais fait de mal, et dont la conscience était si pure ! Mais non ! elle aurait dû l'emporter dans le Midi. D'autres docteurs l'auraient sauvée ! Elle s'accusait, voulait la rejoindre, criait en détresse au milieu de ses rêves. Un, surtout, l'obsédait. Son mari, costumé comme un matelot, revenait d'un long voyage, et lui disait en pleurant qu'il avait reçu l'ordre d'emmener Virginie. Alors ils se concertaient pour découvrir une cachette quelque part.

Une fois, elle rentra du jardin, bouleversée. Tout à l'heure (elle montrait l'endroit) le père et la fille lui étaient apparus l'un auprès de l'autre, et ils ne faisaient rien ; ils la regardaient.

Pendant plusieurs mois, elle resta dans sa chambre, inerte. Félicité la sermonnait doucement ; il fallait se conserver pour son fils, et pour l'autre, en souvenir « d'elle ».

— « Elle ? » reprenait Mme Aubain, comme se réveillant. « Ah ! oui !... oui !... Vous ne l'oubliez pas ! » Allusion au cimetière, qu'on lui avait scrupuleusement défendu.

Félicité tous les jours s'y rendait.

A quatre heures précises, elle passait au bord des maisons, montait la côte, ouvrait la barrière, et arrivait devant la tombe de Virginie. C'était une petite colonne de marbre rose, avec une dalle dans le bas, et des chaînes autour enfermant un jardinet. Les plates-bandes disparaissaient sous une couverture de fleurs. Elle arrosait leurs feuilles, renouvelait le sable, se mettait à genoux pour mieux labourer la terre. Mme Aubain, quand elle put y venir, en éprouva un soulagement, une espèce de consolation.

Puis des années s'écoulèrent, toutes pareilles et sans autres épisodes que le retour des grandes fêtes : Pâques, l'Assomption, la Toussaint. Des événements intérieurs faisaient une date, où l'on se reportait plus tard. Ainsi, en 1825, deux vitriers badigeonnèrent le vestibule ; en 1827, une portion du toit, tombant dans la cour, faillit tuer un homme. L'été de 1828, ce fut à Madame d'offrir le pain bénit ; Bourais, vers cette époque, s'absenta mystérieusement ; et les anciennes connaissances peu à peu s'en allèrent : Guyot, Liébard, Mme Lechaptois, Robelin, l'oncle Gremanville, paralysé depuis longtemps.

Une nuit, le conducteur de la malle-poste annonça dans Pont-l'Évêque la Révolution de Juillet. Un sous-préfet nouveau, peu de jours après, fut nommé : le baron de Larsonnière, ex-consul en Amérique, et qui avait chez lui, outre sa femme, sa belle-soeur avec trois demoiselles, assez grandes déjà. On les apercevait sur leur gazon, habillées de blouses flottantes ; elles possédaient un nègre et un perroquet. Mme Aubain eut leur visite, et ne manqua pas de la rendre. Du plus loin qu'elles paraissaient, Félicité accourait pour la prévenir. Mais une chose était seule capable de l'émouvoir, les lettres de son fils.

Il ne pouvait suivre aucune carrière, étant absorbé dans les estaminets. Elle lui payait ses dettes ; il en refaisait d'autres ; et les soupirs que poussait Mme Aubain, en tricotant près de la fenêtre, arrivaient à Félicité, qui tournait son rouet dans la cuisine.

Elles se promenaient ensemble le long de l'espalier ; et causaient toujours de Virginie, se demandant si telle chose lui aurait plu, en telle occasion ce qu'elle eût dit probablement.

Toutes ses petites affaires occupaient un placard dans la chambre à deux lits. Mme Aubain les inspectait le moins souvent possible. Un jour d'été, elle se résigna ; et des papillons s'envolèrent de l'armoire.

Ses robes étaient en ligne sous une planche où il y avait trois poupées, des cerceaux, un ménage, la cuvette qui lui servait. Elles retirèrent également les jupons, les bas, les mouchoirs, et les étendirent sur les deux couches, avant de les replier. Le soleil éclairait ces pauvres objets, en faisait voir les taches, et des plis formés par les mouvements du corps. L'air était chaud et bleu, un merle gazouillait, tout semblait vivre dans une douceur profonde. Elles retrouvèrent un petit chapeau de peluche, à longs poils, couleur marron ; mais il était tout mangé de vermine. Félicité le réclama pour elle-même. Leurs yeux se fixèrent l'une sur l'autre, s'emplirent de larmes ; enfin la maîtresse ouvrit ses bras, la servante s'y jeta ; et elles s'étreignirent, satisfaisant leur douleur dans un baiser qui les égalisait.

C'était la première fois de leur vie, Mme Aubain n'étant pas d'une nature expansive. Félicité lui en fut reconnaissante comme d'un bienfait, et désormais la chérit avec un dévouement bestial et une vénération religieuse.

La bonté de son coeur se développa.

Quand elle entendait dans la rue les tambours d'un régiment en marche, elle se mettait devant la porte avec une cruche de cidre, et offrait à boire aux soldats. Elle soigna des cholériques. Elle protégeait les Polonais ; et même il y en eut un qui déclarait la vouloir épouser. Mais ils se fâchèrent ; car un matin, en rentrant de l'angélus, elle le trouva dans sa cuisine, où il s'était introduit, et accommodé une vinaigrette qu'il mangeait tranquillement.

Après les Polonais, ce fut le père Colmiche, un vieillard passant pour avoir fait des horreurs en 93. Il vivait au bord de la rivière, dans les décombres d'une porcherie. Les gamins le regardaient par les fentes du mur, et lui jetaient des cailloux qui tombaient sur son grabat, où il gisait, continuellement secoué par un catarrhe, avec des cheveux très-longs, les paupières enflammées, et au bras une tumeur plus grosse que sa tête. Elle lui procura du linge, tâcha de nettoyer son bouge, rêvait à l'établir dans le fournil, sans qu'il gênât Madame. Quand le cancer eut crevé, elle le pansa tous les jours, quelquefois lui apportait de la galette, le plaçait au soleil sur une botte de paille ; et le pauvre vieux, en bavant et en tremblant, la remerciait de sa voix éteinte, craignait de la perdre, allongeait les mains dès qu'il la voyait s'éloigner. Il mourut ; elle fit dire une messe pour le repos de son âme.

Ce jour-là, il lui advint un grand bonheur : au moment du dîner, le nègre de Mme de Larsonnière se présenta, tenant le perroquet dans sa cage, avec le bâton, la chaîne et le cadenas. Un billet de la baronne annonçait à Mme Aubain que, son mari étant élevé à une préfecture, ils partaient le soir ; et elle la pria d'accepter cet oiseau, comme un souvenir, et en témoignage de ses respects.

Il occupait depuis longtemps l'imagination de Félicité, car il venait d'Amérique ; et ce mot lui rappelait Victor, si bien qu'elle s'en informait auprès du nègre. Une fois même elle avait dit : — « C'est Madame qui serait heureuse de l'avoir ! »

Le nègre avait redit le propos à sa maîtresse, qui, ne pouvant l'emmener, s'en débarrassait de cette façon.

IV

Il s'appelait Loulou. Son corps était vert, le bout de ses ailes rose, son front bleu, et sa gorge dorée.

Mais il avait la fatigante manie de mordre son bâton, s'arrachait les plumes, éparpillait ses ordures, répandait l'eau de sa baignoire ; Mme Aubain, qu'il ennuyait, le donna pour toujours à Félicité.

Elle entreprit de l'instruire ; bientôt il répéta : « Charmant garçon ! Serviteur, monsieur ! Je vous salue, Marie ! » Il était placé auprès de la porte, et plusieurs s'étonnaient qu'il ne répondît pas au nom de Jacquot, puisque tous les perroquets s'appellent Jacquot. On le comparait à une dinde, à une bûche : autant de coups de poignard pour Félicité ! Étrange obstination de Loulou, ne parlant plus du moment qu'on le regardait !

Néanmoins il recherchait la compagnie ; car le dimanche, pendant que ces demoiselles Rochefeuille, monsieur de Houppesville et de nouveaux habitués : Onfroy l'apothicaire, monsieur Varin et le capitaine Mathieu, faisaient leur partie de cartes, il cognait les vitres avec ses ailes, et se démenait si furieusement qu'il était impossible de s'entendre.

La figure de Bourais, sans doute, lui paraissait très-drôle. Dès qu'il l'apercevait, il commençait à rire, à rire de toutes ses forces. Les éclats de sa voix bondissaient dans la cour, l'écho les répétait, les voisins se mettaient à leurs fenêtres, riaient aussi ; et, pour n'être pas vu du perroquet, M. Bourais se coulait le long du mur, en dissimulant son profil avec son chapeau, atteignait la rivière, puis entraît par la porte du jardin ; et les regards qu'il envoyait à l'oiseau manquaient de tendresse.

Loulou avait reçu du garçon boucher une chiquenaude, s'étant permis d'enfoncer la tête dans sa corbeille ; et depuis lors il tâchait toujours de le pincer à travers sa chemise. Fabu menaçait de lui tordre le cou, bien qu'il ne fût pas cruel, malgré le tatouage de ses bras et ses gros favoris. Au contraire ! il avait plutôt du penchant pour le perroquet, jusqu'à vouloir, par humeur joviale, lui apprendre des jurons. Félicité, que ces manières effrayaient, le plaça dans la cuisine. Sa chaînette fut retirée, et il circulait par la maison.

Quand il descendait l'escalier, il appuyait sur les marches la courbe de son bec, levait la patte droite, puis la gauche ; et elle avait peur qu'une telle gymnastique ne lui causât des étourdissements. Il devint malade, ne pouvait plus parler ni manger. C'était sous sa langue une épaisseur, comme en ont les poules quelquefois. Elle le guérit, en arrachant cette pellicule avec ses ongles. M. Paul, un jour, eut l'imprudence de lui souffler aux narines la fumée d'un cigare ; une autre fois que Mme Lormeau l'agaçait du bout de son ombrelle, il en happa la virole ; enfin, il se perdit.

Elle l'avait posé sur l'herbe pour le rafraîchir, s'absenta une minute ; et, quand elle revint, plus de perroquet ! D'abord elle le chercha dans les buissons, au bord de l'eau et sur les toits, sans écouter sa maîtresse qui lui criait : — « Prenez donc garde ! vous êtes folle ! » Ensuite elle inspecta tous les jardins de Pont-l'Évêque ; et elle arrêtait les passants. — « Vous n'auriez pas vu, quelquefois, par hasard, mon perroquet ? » A ceux qui ne connaissaient pas le perroquet, elle en faisait la description. Tout à coup, elle crut distinguer derrière les moulins, au bas de la côte, une chose verte qui voltigeait. Mais au haut de la côte, rien ! Un porte-balle lui affirma qu'il l'avait rencontré tout à l'heure, à Saint-Melaine, dans la boutique de la mère Simon. Elle y courut. On ne savait pas ce qu'elle voulait dire. Enfin elle rentra, épuisée, les savates en lambeaux, la mort dans l'âme ; et, assise au milieu du banc, près de Madame, elle racontait toutes ses démarches, quand un poids léger lui tomba sur l'épaule, Loulou ! Que diable avait-il fait ? Peut-être qu'il s'était promené aux environs !

Elle eut du mal à s'en remettre, ou plutôt ne s'en remit jamais.

Par suite d'un refroidissement, il lui vint une angine ; peu de temps après, un mal d'oreilles. Trois ans plus tard, elle était sourde ; et elle parlait très-haut, même à l'église. Bien que ses péchés auraient pu sans déshonneur pour elle, ni inconvénient pour le monde, se répandre à tous les coins du diocèse, M. le curé jugea convenable de ne plus recevoir sa confession que dans la sacristie.

Des bourdonnements illusoires achevaient de la troubler. Souvent sa maîtresse lui disait : — « Mon Dieu ! comme vous êtes bête ! » elle répliquait : — « Oui, Madame, » en cherchant quelque chose autour d'elle.

Le petit cercle de ses idées se rétrécit encore, et le carillon des cloches, le mugissement des boeufs, n'existaient plus. Tous les êtres fonctionnaient avec le silence des fantômes. Un seul bruit arrivait maintenant à ses oreilles, la voix du perroquet.

Comme pour la distraire, il reproduisait le tic tac du tournebroche, l'appel aigu d'un vendeur de poisson, la scie du menuisier qui logeait en face ; et, aux coups de la sonnette, imitait Mme Aubain, — « Félicité ! la porte ! la porte ! »

Ils avaient des dialogues, lui, débitant à satiété les trois phrases de son répertoire, et elle, y répondant par des mots sans plus de suite, mais où son cœur s'épanchait. Loulou, dans son isolement, était presque un fils, un amoureux. Il escaladait ses doigts, mordillait ses lèvres, se cramponnait à son fichu ; et, comme elle penchait son front en branlant la tête à la manière des nourrices, les grandes ailes du bonnet et les ailes de l'oiseau frémissaient ensemble.

Quand des nuages s'amoncelaient et que le tonnerre grondait, il poussait des cris, se rappelant peut-être les ondées de ses forêts natales. Le ruissellement de l'eau excitait son délire ; il voletait éperdu, montait au plafond, renversait tout, et par la fenêtre allait barboter dans le jardin ; mais revenait vite sur un des chenets, et, sautillant pour sécher ses plumes, montrait tantôt sa queue, tantôt son bec.

Un matin du terrible hiver de 1837, qu'elle l'avait mis devant la cheminée, à cause du froid, elle le trouva mort, au milieu de sa cage, la tête en bas, et les ongles dans les fils de fer. Une congestion l'avait tué, sans doute ? Elle crut à un empoisonnement par le persil ; et, malgré l'absence de toutes preuves, ses soupçons portèrent sur Fabu. Elle pleura tellement que sa maîtresse lui dit : « Eh bien ! faites-le empailler ! »

Elle demanda conseil au pharmacien, qui avait toujours été bon pour le perroquet.

Il écrivit au Havre. Un certain Fellacher se chargea de cette besogne. Mais, comme la diligence égarait parfois les colis, elle résolut de le porter elle-même jusqu'à Honfleur.

Les pommiers sans feuilles se succédaient aux bords de la route. De la glace couvrait les fossés. Des chiens aboyaient autour des fermes ; et les mains sous son mantelet, avec ses petits sabots noirs et son cabas, elle marchait prestement, sur le milieu du pavé.

Elle traversa la forêt, dépassa le Haut-Chêne, atteignit Saint-Gatien.

Derrière elle, dans un nuage de poussière et emportée par la descente, une malle-poste au grand galop se précipitait comme une trombe. En voyant cette femme qui ne se dérangeait pas, le conducteur se dressa par-dessus la capote, et le postillon criait aussi, pendant que ses quatre chevaux qu'il ne pouvait retenir accéléraient leur train ; les deux premiers la frôlaient ; d'une secousse de ses guides, il les jeta dans le débord, mais furieux releva le bras, et à pleine volée, avec son grand fouet, lui cingla du ventre au chignon un tel coup qu'elle tomba sur le dos.

Son premier geste, quand elle reprit connaissance, fut d'ouvrir son panier. Loulou n'avait rien, heureusement. Elle sentit une brûlure à la joue droite ; ses mains qu'elle y porta étaient rouges. Le sang coulait.

Elle s'assit sur un mètre de cailloux, se tamponna le visage avec son mouchoir, puis elle mangea une croûte de pain, mise dans son panier par précaution, et se consolait de sa blessure en regardant l'oiseau.

Arrivée au sommet d'Équemauville, elle aperçut les lumières de Honfleur qui scintillaient dans la nuit comme une quantité d'étoiles ; la mer, plus loin, s'étalait confusément. Alors une faiblesse l'arrêta ; et la misère de son enfance, la déception du premier amour, le départ de son neveu, la mort de Virginie, comme les flots d'une marée, revinrent à la fois, et, lui montant à la gorge, l'étouffaient.

Puis elle voulut parler au capitaine du bateau ; et, sans dire ce qu'elle envoyait, lui fit des recommandations.

Fellacher garda longtemps le perroquet. Il le promettait toujours pour la semaine prochaine ; au bout de six mois, il annonça le départ d'une caisse ; et il n'en fut plus question. C'était à croire que jamais Loulou ne reviendrait. « Ils me l'auront volé ! » pensait-elle. Enfin il arriva, — et splendide, droit sur une branche d'arbre, qui se vissait dans un socle d'acajou, une patte en l'air, la tête oblique, et mordant une noix, que l'empailleur par amour du grandiose avait dorée.

Elle l'enferma dans sa chambre.

Cet endroit, où elle admettait peu de monde, avait l'air tout à la fois d'une chapelle et d'un bazar, tant il contenait d'objets religieux et de choses hétéroclites.

Une grande armoire gênait pour ouvrir la porte. En face de la fenêtre surplombant le jardin, un oeil de boeuf regardait la cour ; une table, près du lit de sangle, supportait un pot à l'eau, deux peignes et un cube de savon bleu dans une assiette ébréchée. On voyait contre les murs : des chapelets, des médailles, plusieurs bonnes Vierges, un bénitier en noix de coco ; sur la commode, couverte d'un drap comme un autel, la boîte en coquillages que lui avait donnée Victor ; puis un arrosoir et un ballon, des cahiers d'écriture, la géographie en estampes, une paire de bottines ; et au clou du miroir, accroché par ses rubans, le petit chapeau de peluche ! Félicité poussait même ce genre de respect si loin, qu'elle conservait une des redingotes de Monsieur. Toutes les vieilleries dont ne voulait plus Mme Aubain, elle les prenait pour sa chambre. C'est ainsi qu'il y avait des fleurs artificielles au bord de la commode, et le portrait du comte d'Artois dans l'enfoncement de la lucarne.

Au moyen d'une planchette, Loulou fut établi sur un corps de cheminée qui avançait dans l'appartement. Chaque matin, en s'éveillant, elle l'apercevait à la clarté de l'aube ; et se rappelait alors les jours disparus, et d'insignifiantes actions jusqu'en leurs moindres détails, sans douleur, pleine de tranquillité.

Ne communiquant avec personne, elle vivait dans une torpeur de somnambule. Les processions de la Fête-Dieu la ranimaient. Elle allait quêter chez les voisins des flambeaux et des paillassons, afin d'embellir le reposoir que l'on dressait dans la rue.

A l'église, elle contemplait toujours le Saint-Esprit, et observa qu'il avait quelque chose du perroquet. Sa ressemblance lui parut encore plus manifeste sur une image d'Épinal, représentant le baptême de Notre-Seigneur. Avec ses ailes de pourpre et son corps d'émeraude, c'était vraiment le portrait de Loulou.

L'ayant acheté, elle le suspendit à la place du comte d'Artois, — de sorte que, du même coup d'oeil, elle les voyait ensemble. Ils s'associèrent dans sa pensée, le perroquet se trouvant sanctifié par ce rapport avec le Saint-Esprit, qui devenait plus vivant à ses yeux et intelligible. Le Père, pour s'énoncer, n'avait pu choisir une colombe, puisque ces bêtes-là n'ont pas de voix, mais plutôt un des ancêtres de Loulou. Et Félicité priait en regardant l'image, mais de temps à autre se tournait un peu vers l'oiseau.

Elle eut envie de se mettre dans les demoiselles de la Vierge. Mme Aubain l'en dissuada.

Un événement considérable surgit : le mariage de Paul.

Après avoir été d'abord clerc de notaire, puis dans le commerce, dans la douane, dans les contributions, et même avoir commencé des démarches pour les eaux et forêts, à trente-six ans, tout à coup, par une inspiration du ciel, il avait découvert sa voie : l'enregistrement ! et y montrait de si hautes facultés qu'un vérificateur lui avait offert sa fille, en lui promettant sa protection.

Paul, devenu sérieux, l'amena chez sa mère.

Elle dénigra les usages de Pont-l'Évêque, fit la princesse, blessa Félicité. Mme Aubain, à son départ, sentit un allègement.

La semaine suivante, on apprit la mort de M. Bourais, en basse Bretagne, dans une auberge. La rumeur d'un suicide se confirma ; des doutes s'élevèrent sur sa probité. Mme Aubain étudia ses comptes, et ne tarda pas à connaître la kyrielle de ses noirceurs : détournements d'arrérages, ventes de bois dissimulées, fausses quittances, etc. De plus, il avait un enfant naturel, et « des relations avec une personne de Dozulé ».

Ces turpitudes l'affligèrent beaucoup. Au mois de mars 1853, elle fut prise d'une douleur dans la poitrine ; sa langue paraissait couverte de fumée, les sangsues ne calmèrent pas l'oppression ; et le neuvième soir elle expira, ayant juste soixante-douze ans.

On la croyait moins vieille, à cause de ses cheveux bruns, dont les bandeaux entouraient sa figure blême, marquée de petite vérole. Peu d'amis la regrettèrent, ses façons étant d'une hauteur qui éloignait.

Félicité la pleura, comme on ne pleure pas les maîtres. Que Madame mourût avant elle, cela troublait ses idées, lui semblait contraire à l'ordre des choses, inadmissible et monstrueux.

Dix jours après (le temps d'accourir de Besançon), les héritiers survinrent. La bru fouilla les tiroirs, choisit des meubles, vendit les autres, puis ils regagnèrent l'enregistrement.

Le fauteuil de Madame, son guéridon, sa chaufferette, les huit chaises, étaient partis ! La place des gravures se dessinait en carrés jaunes au milieu des cloisons. Ils avaient emporté les deux couchettes, avec leurs matelas, et dans le placard on ne voyait plus rien de toutes les affaires de Virginie ! Félicité remonta les étages, ivre de tristesse.

Le lendemain il y avait sur la porte une affiche ; l'apothicaire lui cria dans l'oreille que la maison était à vendre.

Elle chancela, et fut obligée de s'asseoir. Ce qui la désolait principalement, c'était d'abandonner sa chambre, — si commode pour le pauvre Loulou. En l'enveloppant d'un regard d'angoisse, elle implorait le Saint-Esprit, et contracta l'habitude idolâtre de dire ses oraisons agenouillée devant le perroquet. Quelquefois, le soleil entrant par la lucarne frappait son oeil de verre, et en faisait jaillir un grand rayon lumineux qui la mettait en extase.

Elle avait une rente de trois cent quatre-vingts francs, léguée par sa maîtresse. Le jardin lui fournissait des légumes. Quant aux habits, elle possédait de quoi se vêtir jusqu'à la fin de ses jours, et épargnait l'éclairage en se couchant dès le crépuscule.

Elle ne sortait guère, afin d'éviter la boutique du brocanteur, où s'étaient quelques-uns des anciens meubles. Depuis son étourdissement, elle traînait une jambe ; et, ses forces diminuant, la mère Simon, ruinée dans l'épicerie, venait tous les matins fendre son bois et pomper de l'eau.

Ses yeux s'affaiblirent. Les persiennes n'ouvraient plus. Bien des années se passèrent. Et la maison ne se louait pas, et ne se vendait pas.

Dans la crainte qu'on ne la renvoyât, Félicité ne demandait aucune réparation. Les lattes du toit pourrissaient ; pendant tout un hiver son traversin fut mouillé. Après Pâques, elle cracha du sang.

Alors la mère Simon eut recours à un docteur. Félicité voulut savoir ce qu'elle avait. Mais, trop sourde pour entendre, un seul mot lui parvint : « Pneumonie. » Il lui était connu, et elle répliqua doucement :

— « Ah ! comme Madame, » trouvant naturel de suivre sa maîtresse.

Le moment des reposoirs approchait.

Le premier était toujours au bas de la côte, le second devant la poste, le troisième vers le milieu de la rue. Il y eut des rivalités à propos de celui-là ; et les paroissiennes choisirent finalement la cour de Mme Aubain.

Les oppressions et la fièvre augmentaient. Félicité se chagrinait de ne rien faire pour le reposoir. Au moins, si elle avait pu y mettre quelque chose ! Alors elle songea au perroquet. Ce n'était pas convenable, objectèrent les voisines. Mais le curé accorda cette permission ; elle en fut tellement heureuse qu'elle le pria d'accepter, quand elle serait morte, Loulou, sa seule richesse.

Du mardi au samedi, veille de la Fête-Dieu, elle toussa plus fréquemment. Le soir son visage était grippé, ses lèvres se collaient à ses gencives, des vomissements parurent ; et le lendemain, au petit jour, se sentant très-bas, elle fit appeler un prêtre.

Trois bonnes femmes l'entouraient pendant l'extrême onction. Puis elle déclara qu'elle avait besoin de parler à Fabu.

Il arriva en toilette des dimanches, mal à son aise dans cette atmosphère lugubre.

— « Pardonnez-moi », dit-elle avec un effort pour étendre le bras, « je croyais que c'était vous qui l'aviez tué ! »

Que signifiaient des potins pareils ? L'avoir soupçonné d'un meurtre, un homme comme lui ! et il s'indignait, allait faire du tapage. — « Elle n'a plus sa tête, vous voyez bien ! »

Félicité de temps à autre parlait à des ombres. Les bonnes femmes s'éloignèrent. La Simonne déjeuna.

Un peu plus tard, elle prit Loulou, et, l'approchant de Félicité :

— « Allons ! dites-lui adieu ! »

Bien qu'il ne fût pas un cadavre, les vers le dévoraient ; une de ses ailes était cassée, l'étope lui sortait du ventre. Mais, aveugle à présent, elle le baisa au front, et le gardait contre sa joue. La Simonne le reprit, pour le mettre sur le reposoir.

Les herbages envoyaient l'odeur de l'été ; des mouches bourdonnaient ; le soleil faisait luire la rivière, chauffait les ardoises.

La mère Simon, revenue dans la chambre, s'endormait doucement.

Des coups de cloche la réveillèrent ; on sortait des vêpres. Le délire de Félicité tomba. En songeant à la procession, elle la voyait, comme si elle l'eût suivie.

Tous les enfants des écoles, les chantres et les pompiers marchaient sur les trottoirs, tandis qu'au milieu de la rue, s'avançaient premièrement : le suisse armé de sa hallebarde, le bedeau avec une grande croix, l'instituteur surveillant les gamins, la religieuse inquiète de ses petites filles ; trois des plus mignonnes, frisées comme des anges, jetaient dans l'air des pétales de roses ; le diacre, les bras écartés, modérait la musique ; et deux encenseurs se retournaient à chaque pas vers le Saint-Sacrement, que portait, sous un dais de velours ponceau tenu par quatre fabriciens, M. le curé, dans sa belle chasuble. Un flot de monde se poussait derrière, entre les nappes blanches couvrant le mur des maisons ; et l'on arriva au bas de la côte.

Une sueur froide mouillait les tempes de Félicité. La Simonne l'épongeait avec un linge, en se disant qu'un jour il lui faudrait passer par là.

Le murmure de la foule grossit, fut un moment très-fort, s'éloignait.

Une fusillade ébranla les carreaux. C'était les postillons saluant l'ostensoir. Félicité roula ses prunelles, et elle dit, le moins bas qu'elle put :

— « Est-il bien ? » tourmentée du perroquet.

Son agonie commença. Un râle, de plus en plus précipité, lui soulevait les côtes. Des bouillons d'écume venaient aux coins de sa bouche, et tout son corps tremblait.

Bientôt, on distingua le ronflement des ophicléides, les voix claires des enfants, la voix profonde des hommes. Tout se taisait par intervalles, et le battement des pas, que des fleurs amortissaient, faisait le bruit d'un troupeau sur du gazon.

Le clergé parut dans la cour. La Simonne grimpa sur une chaise pour atteindre à l'oeil-de-boeuf, et de cette manière dominait le reposoir.

Des guirlandes vertes pendaient sur l'autel, orné d'un falbala en point d'Angleterre, Il y avait au milieu un petit cadre enfermant des reliques, deux orangers dans les angles, et, tout le long, des flambeaux d'argent et des vases en porcelaine, d'où s'élançaient des tournesols, des lis, des pivoines, des digitales, des touffes d'hortensias. Ce monceau de couleurs éclatantes descendait obliquement, du premier étage jusqu'au tapis se prolongeant sur les pavés ; et des choses rares tiraient les yeux. Un sucrier de vermeil avait une couronne de violettes, des pendeloques en pierres d'Alençon brillaient sur de la mousse, deux écrans chinois montraient leurs paysages. Loulou, caché sous des roses, ne laissait voir que son front bleu, pareil à une plaque de lapis.

Les fabriciens, les chantres, les enfants se rangèrent sur les trois côtés de la cour. Le prêtre gravit lentement les marches, et posa sur la dentelle son grand soleil d'or qui rayonnait. Tous s'agenouillèrent. Il se fit un grand silence. Et les encensoirs, allant à pleine volée, glissaient sur leurs chaînettes.

Une vapeur d'azur monta dans la chambre de Félicité. Elle avança les narines, en la humant avec une sensualité mystique ; puis ferma les paupières. Ses lèvres souriaient. Les mouvements de son cœur se ralentirent un peu, plus vagues chaque fois, plus doux, comme une fontaine s'épuise, comme un écho disparaît ; et, quand elle exhala son dernier souffle, elle crut voir, dans les cieux entr'ouverts, un perroquet gigantesque, planant au-dessus de sa tête.

L'HOSPITALIER

Julien est le fils d'un petit seigneur local. À sa naissance, deux messagers surnaturels rendent visite indépendamment à ses géniteurs pour leur annoncer que leur fils est promis à un destin extraordinaire de conquérant et de saint. L'un et l'autre, enthousiasmés par la divination, se taisent cependant et se dévouent entièrement à l'éducation et la liberté de leur fils. Julien grandit au milieu de la nature et se découvre un goût enivrant pour la chasse. Ne pouvant plus contrôler son appétit de prédateur, il réalise de véritables tueries dans les forêts environnantes, décimant tout animal qui passe à sa portée sans le moindre discernement ou la moindre pitié. Alors qu'il massacre un cerf, sa biche, et leur faon, il se trouve soudainement défait de ses armes. Le cerf blessé se tourne face à lui pour l'encorner mais s'arrête mystérieusement et lui lance une malédiction :

LA LÉGENDE DE SAINT JULIEN L'HOSPITALIER

I

Le père et la mère de Julien habitaient un château, au milieu des bois, sur la pente d'une colline.

Les quatre tours aux angles avaient des toits pointus recouverts d'écailles de plomb, et la base des murs s'appuyait sur les quartiers de rocs, qui dévalaient abruptement jusqu'au fond des douves.

Les pavés de la cour étaient nets comme le dallage d'une église. De longues gouttières, figurant des dragons la gueule en bas, crachaient l'eau des pluies vers la citerne ; et sur le bord des fenêtres, à tous les étages, dans un pot d'argile peinte, un basilic ou un héliotrope s'épanouissait.

Une seconde enceinte, faite de pieux, comprenait d'abord un verger d'arbres à fruits, ensuite un parterre où des combinaisons de fleurs dessinaient des chiffres, puis une treille avec des berceaux pour prendre le frais, et un jeu de mail qui servait au divertissement des pages. De l'autre côté se trouvaient le chenil, les écuries, la boulangerie, le pressoir et les granges. Un pâturage de gazon vert se développait tout autour, enclos lui-même d'une forte haie d'épines.

On vivait en paix depuis si longtemps que la herse ne s'abaissait plus ; les fossés étaient pleins d'eau ; des hirondelles faisaient leur nid dans la fente des créneaux ; et l'archer qui tout le long du jour se promenait sur la courtine, dès que le soleil brillait trop fort rentrait dans l'échauguette, et s'endormait comme un moine.

On voyait dans la salle d'armes, entre des étendards et des mufles de bêtes fauves, des armes de tous les temps et de toutes les nations, depuis les frondes des Amalécites et les javelots des Garamantes jusqu'aux braquemarts des Sarrasins et aux cottes de mailles des Normands.

La maîtresse broche de la cuisine pouvait faire tourner un boeuf ; la chapelle était somptueuse comme l'oratoire d'un roi. Il y avait même, dans un endroit écarté, une étuve à la romaine ; mais le bon seigneur s'en privait, estimant que c'est un usage des idolâtres.

Toujours enveloppé d'une pelisse de renard, il se promenait dans sa maison, rendait la justice à ses vassaux, apaisait les querelles de ses voisins. Pendant l'hiver, il regardait les flocons de neige tomber, ou se faisait lire des histoires. Dès les premiers beaux jours, il s'en allait sur sa mule le long des petits chemins, au bord des blés qui verdoyaient, et causait avec les manants, auxquels il donnait des conseils. Après beaucoup d'aventures, il avait pris pour femme une demoiselle de haut lignage.

Elle était très-blanche, un peu fière et sérieuse. Les cornes de son hennin frôlaient le linteau des portes ; la queue de sa robe de drap traînait de trois pas derrière elle. Son domestique était réglé comme l'intérieur d'un monastère ; chaque matin elle distribuait la besogne à ses servantes, surveillait les confitures et les onguents, filait à la quenouille ou brodait des nappes d'autel. A force de prier Dieu, il lui vint un fils.

Alors il y eut de grandes réjouissances, et un repas qui dura trois jours et quatre nuits, dans l'illumination des flambeaux, au son des harpes, sur des jonchées de feuillages. On y mangea les plus rares épices, avec des poules grosses comme des moutons ; par divertissement, un nain sortit d'un pâté ; et, les écuelles ne suffisant plus, car la foule augmentait toujours, on fut obligé de boire dans les oliphants et dans les casques.

La nouvelle accouchée n'assista pas à ces fêtes. Elle se tenait dans son lit, tranquillement. Un soir, elle se réveilla, et elle aperçut, sous un rayon de la lune qui entrait par la fenêtre, comme une ombre mouvante. C'était un vieillard en froc de bure, avec un chapelet au côté, une besace sur l'épaule, toute l'apparence d'un ermite. Il s'approcha de son chevet et lui dit, sans desserrer les lèvres :

— « Réjouis-toi, ô mère ! ton fils sera un saint ! »

Elle allait crier ; mais, glissant sur le rais de la lune, il s'éleva dans l'air doucement, puis disparut. Les chants du banquet éclatèrent plus fort. Elle entendit les voix des anges ; et sa tête retomba sur l'oreiller, que dominait un os de martyr dans un cadre d'escarboucles.

Le lendemain, tous les serviteurs interrogés déclarèrent qu'ils n'avaient pas vu d'ermite. Songe ou réalité, cela devait être une communication du ciel ; mais elle eut soin de n'en rien dire, ayant peur qu'on ne l'accusât d'orgueil.

Les convives s'en allèrent au petit jour ; et le père de Julien se trouvait en dehors de la poterne, où il venait de reconduire le dernier, quand tout à coup un mendiant se dressa devant lui, dans le brouillard. C'était un Bohême à barbe tressée, avec des anneaux d'argent aux deux bras et les prunelles flamboyantes. Il bégaya d'un air inspiré ces mots sans suite :

— « Ah ! ah ! ton fils !... beaucoup de sang !... beaucoup de gloire !... toujours heureux ! la famille d'un empereur. »

Et, se baissant pour ramasser son aumône, il se perdit dans l'herbe, s'évanouit.

Le bon châtelain regarda de droite et de gauche, appela tant qu'il put. Personne ! Le vent sifflait, les brumes du matin s'envolaient.

Il attribua cette vision à la fatigue de sa tête pour avoir trop peu dormi. « Si j'en parle, on se moquera de moi, » se dit-il. Cependant les splendeurs destinées à son fils l'éblouissaient, bien que la promesse n'en fût pas claire et qu'il doutât même de l'avoir entendue.

Les époux se cachèrent leur secret. Mais tous deux chérissaient l'enfant d'un pareil amour ; et, le respectant comme marqué de Dieu, ils eurent pour sa personne des égards infinis. Sa couchette était rembourrée du plus fin duvet ; une lampe en forme de colombe brûlait dessus, continuellement ; trois nourrices le berçaient ; et, bien serré dans ses langes, la mine rose et les yeux bleus, avec son manteau de brocart et son béguin chargé de perles, il ressemblait à un petit Jésus. Les dents lui poussèrent sans qu'il pleurât une seule fois.

Quand il eut sept ans, sa mère lui apprit à chanter. Pour le rendre courageux, son père le hissa sur un gros cheval. L'enfant souriait d'aise, et ne tarda pas à savoir tout ce qui concerne les destriers.

Un vieux moine très-savant lui enseigna l'Écriture sainte, la numération des Arabes, les lettres latines, et à faire sur le vélin des peintures mignonnes. Ils travaillaient ensemble, tout en haut d'une tourelle, à l'écart du bruit.

La leçon terminée, ils descendaient dans le jardin, où, se promenant pas à pas, ils étudiaient les fleurs.

Quelquefois on apercevait, cheminant au fond de la vallée, une file de bêtes de somme, conduites par un piéton, accoutré à l'orientale. Le châtelain, qui l'avait reconnu pour un marchand, expédiait vers lui un valet. L'étranger, prenant confiance, se détournait de sa route ; et, introduit dans le parloir, il retirait de ses coffres des pièces de velours et de soie, des orfèvreries, des aromates, des choses singulières d'un usage inconnu ; à la fin le bonhomme s'en allait, avec un gros profit, sans avoir enduré aucune violence. D'autres fois, une troupe de pèlerins frappait à la porte. Leurs habits mouillés fumaient devant l'âtre ; et, quand ils étaient repus, ils racontaient leurs voyages : les erreurs des nefes sur la mer écumeuse, les marches à pied dans les sables brûlants, la férocité des païens, les cavernes de la Syrie, la Crèche et le Sépulcre. Puis ils donnaient au jeune seigneur des coquilles de leur manteau.

Souvent le châtelain festoyait ses vieux compagnons d'armes. Tout en buvant, ils se rappelaient leurs guerres, les assauts des forteresses avec le battement des machines et les prodigieuses blessures. Julien, qui les écoutait, en poussait des cris ; alors son père ne doutait pas qu'il ne fût plus tard un conquérant. Mais le soir, au sortir de l'angélus, quand il passait entre les pauvres inclinés, il puisait dans son escarcelle avec tant de modestie et d'un air si noble, que sa mère comptait bien le voir par la suite archevêque.

Sa place dans la chapelle était aux côtés de ses parents ; et, si longs que fussent les offices, il restait à genoux sur son prie-Dieu, la toque par terre et les mains jointes.

Un jour, pendant la messe, il aperçut, en relevant la tête, une petite souris blanche qui sortait d'un trou, dans la muraille. Elle trotтина sur la première marche de l'autel, et, après deux ou trois tours de droite et de gauche, s'enfuit du même côté. Le dimanche suivant, l'idée qu'il pourrait la revoir le troubla. Elle revint ; et, chaque dimanche il l'attendait, en était importuné, fut pris de haine contre elle, et résolut de s'en défaire.

Ayant donc fermé la porte, et semé sur les marches les miettes d'un gâteau, il se posta devant le trou, une baguette à la main.

Au bout de très-longtemps un museau rose parut, puis la souris tout entière. Il frappa un coup léger, et demeura stupéfait devant ce petit corps qui ne bougeait plus. Une goutte de sang tachait la dalle. Il l'essuya bien vite avec sa manche, jeta la souris dehors, et n'en dit rien à personne.

Toutes sortes d'oisillons picoraient les graines du jardin. Il imagina de mettre des pois dans un roseau creux. Quand il entendait gazouiller dans un arbre, il en approchait avec douceur, puis levait son tube, enflait ses joues ; et les bestioles lui pleuvaient sur les épaules si abondamment qu'il ne pouvait s'empêcher de rire, heureux de sa malice.

Un matin, comme il s'en retournait par la courtine, il vit sur la crête du rempart un gros pigeon qui se rengorgeait au soleil. Julien s'arrêta pour le regarder ; le mur en cet endroit ayant une brèche, un éclat de pierre se rencontra sous ses doigts. Il tourna son bras, et la pierre abattit l'oiseau qui tomba d'un bloc dans le fossé.

Il se précipita vers le fond, se déchirant aux broussailles, furetant partout, plus lesté qu'un jeune chien.

Le pigeon, les ailes cassées, palpitait, suspendu dans les branches d'un troëne.

La persistance de sa vie irrita l'enfant. Il se mit à l'étrangler ; et les convulsions de l'oiseau faisaient battre son cœur, l'emplissaient d'une volupté sauvage et tumultueuse. Au dernier roidisement, il se sentit défaillir.

Le soir, pendant le souper, son père déclara que l'on devait à son âge apprendre la vénerie ; et il alla chercher un vieux cahier d'écriture contenant, par demandes et réponses, tout le déduit des chasses. Un maître y démontrait à son élève l'art de dresser les chiens et d'affaïter les faucons, de tendre les pièges, comment reconnaître le cerf à ses fumées, le renard à ses empreintes, le loup à ses déchaussures, le bon moyen de discerner leurs voies, de quelle manière on les lance, où se trouvent ordinairement leurs refuges, quels sont les vents les plus propices, avec l'énumération des cris et les règles de la curée.

Quand Julien put réciter par cœur toutes ces choses, son père lui composa une meute.

D'abord on y distinguait vingt-quatre lévriers barbaresques, plus véloces que des gazelles, mais sujets à s'emporter ; puis dix-sept couples de chiens bretons, tachetés de blanc sur fond rouge, inébranlables dans leur créance, forts de poitrine et grands hurleurs. Pour l'attaque du sanglier et les refuites périlleuses, il y avait quarante griffons, poilus comme des ours. Des mâtins de Tartarie, presque aussi hauts que des ânes, couleur de feu, l'échine large et le jarret droit, étaient destinés à poursuivre les aurochs. La robe noire des épagneuls luisait comme du satin ; le jappement des talbots valait celui des bigles chanteurs. Dans une cour à part, grondaient, en secouant leur chaîne et roulant leurs prunelles, huit dogues alains, bêtes formidables qui sautent au ventre des cavaliers et n'ont pas peur des lions.

Tous mangeaient du pain de froment, buvaient dans des auges de pierre, et portaient un nom sonore.

La fauconnerie, peut-être, dépassait la meute ; le bon seigneur, à force d'argent, s'était procuré des tiercelets du Caucase, des sacres de Babylone, des gerfauts d'Allemagne, et des faucons-pèlerins, capturés sur les falaises, au bord des mers froides, en de lointains pays. Ils logeaient dans un hangar couvert de chaume, et, attachés par rang de taille sur le perchoir, avaient devant eux une motte de gazon, où de temps à autre on les posait afin de les dégourdir.

Des bourses, des hameçons, des chausse-trapes, toute sorte d'engins, furent confectionnés.

Souvent on menait dans la campagne des chiens d'oysel, qui tombaient bien vite en arrêt. Alors des piqueurs, s'avancant pas à pas, étendaient avec précaution sur leurs corps impassibles un immense filet. Un commandement les faisait aboyer ; des cailles s'envolaient ; et les dames des alentours conviées avec leurs maris, les enfants, les caméristes, tout le monde se jetait dessus, et les prenait facilement.

D'autres fois, pour débûcher les lièvres, on battait du tambour ; des renards tombaient dans des fosses, ou bien un ressort, se débandant, attrapait un loup par le pied.

Mais Julien méprisait ces commodes artifices ; il préférait chasser loin du monde, avec son cheval et son faucon. C'était presque toujours un grand tartaret de Scythie, blanc comme la neige. Son capuchon de cuir était surmonté d'un panache, des grelots d'or tremblaient à ses pieds bleus ; et il se tenait ferme sur le bras de son maître pendant que le cheval galopait, et que les plaines se déroulaient. Julien, dénouant ses longes, le lâchait tout à coup ; la bête hardie montait droit dans l'air comme une flèche ; et l'on voyait deux taches inégales tourner, se joindre, puis disparaître dans les hauteurs de l'azur. Le faucon ne tardait pas à descendre en déchirant quelque oiseau, et revenait se poser sur le gantelet, les deux ailes frémissantes.

Julien vola de cette manière le héron, le milan, la corneille et le vautour.

Il aimait, en sonnant de la trompe, à suivre ses chiens qui couraient sur le versant des collines, sautaient les ruisseaux, remontaient vers le bois ; et, quand le cerf commençait à gémir sous les morsures, il l'abattait prestement, puis se délectait à la furie des mâtins qui le dévoraient, coupé en pièces sur sa peau fumante.

Les jours de brume, il s'enfonçait dans un marais pour guetter les oies, les loutres et les halbrans.

Trois écuyers, dès l'aube, l'attendaient au bas du perron ; et le vieux moine, se penchant à sa lucarne, avait beau faire des signes pour le rappeler, Julien ne se retournait pas. Il allait à l'ardeur du soleil, sous la pluie, par la tempête, buvait l'eau des sources dans sa main, mangeait en trottant des pommes sauvages, s'il était fatigué se reposait sous un chêne ; et il rentrait au milieu de la nuit, couvert de sang et de boue, avec des épines dans les cheveux et sentant l'odeur des bêtes farouches. Il devint comme elles. Quand sa mère l'embrassait, il acceptait froidement son étreinte, paraissant rêver à des choses profondes.

Il tua des ours à coups de couteau, des taureaux avec la hache, des sangliers avec l'épieu ; et même une fois, n'ayant plus qu'un bâton, se défendit contre des loups qui rongeaient des cadavres au pied d'un gibet.

Un matin d'hiver, il partit avant le jour, bien équipé, une arbalète sur l'épaule et un trousseau de flèches à l'arçon de la selle.

Son genêt danois, suivi de deux bassets, en marchant d'un pas égal faisait résonner la terre. Des gouttes de verglas se collaient à son manteau, une brise violente soufflait. Un côté de l'horizon s'éclaircit ; et, dans la blancheur du crépuscule, il aperçut des lapins sautillant au bord de leurs terriers. Les deux bassets, tout de suite, se précipitèrent sur eux ; et, çà et là, vivement, leurs cassaient l'échine.

Bientôt, il entra dans un bois. Au bout d'une branche, un coq de bruyère engourdi par le froid dormait la tête sous l'aile. Julien, d'un revers d'épée, lui faucha les deux pattes, et sans le ramasser continua sa route.

Trois heures après, il se trouva sur la pointe d'une montagne tellement haute que le ciel semblait presque noir. Devant lui, un rocher pareil à un long mur s'abaissait, en surplombant un précipice ; et, à l'extrémité, deux boucs sauvages regardaient l'abîme. Comme il n'avait pas ses flèches (car son cheval était resté en arrière), il imagina de descendre jusqu'à eux ; à demi courbé, pieds nus, il arriva enfin au premier des boucs, et lui enfonça un poignard sous les côtes. Le second, pris de terreur, sauta dans le vide. Julien s'élança pour le frapper, et, glissant du pied droit, tomba sur le cadavre de l'autre, la face au-dessus de l'abîme et les deux bras écartés.

Redescendu dans la plaine, il suivit des saules qui bordaient une rivière. Des grues, volant très-bas, de temps à autre passaient au-dessus de sa tête. Julien les assommait avec son fouet, et n'en manquait pas une.

Cependant l'air plus tiède avait fondu le givre, de larges vapeurs flottaient, et le soleil se montra. Il vit reluire tout au loin un lac figé, qui ressemblait à du plomb. Au milieu du lac, il y avait une bête que Julien ne connaissait pas, un castor à museau noir. Malgré la distance, une flèche l'abattit ; et il fut chagrin de ne pouvoir emporter la peau.

Puis il s'avança dans une avenue de grands arbres, formant avec leurs cimes comme un arc de triomphe, à l'entrée d'une forêt. Un chevreuil bondit hors d'un fourré, un daim parut dans un carrefour, un blaireau sortit d'un trou, un paon sur le gazon déploya sa queue ; — et quand il les eut tous occis, d'autres chevreuils se présentèrent, d'autres daims, d'autres blaireaux, d'autres paons, et des merles, des geais, des putois, des renards, des hérissons, des lynx, une infinité de bêtes, à chaque pas plus nombreuses. Elles tournaient autour de lui, tremblantes, avec un regard plein de douceur et de supplication. Mais Julien ne se fatiguait pas de tuer, tour à tour bandant son arbalète, dégainant l'épée, pointant du coutelas, et ne pensait à rien, n'avait souvenir de quoi que ce fût. Il était en chasse dans un pays quelconque, depuis un temps indéterminé, par le fait seul de sa propre existence, tout s'accomplissant avec la facilité que l'on éprouve dans les rêves. Un spectacle extraordinaire l'arrêta. Des cerfs emplissaient un vallon ayant la forme d'un cirque ; et tassés, les uns près des autres, ils se réchauffaient avec leurs haleines que l'on voyait fumer dans le brouillard.

L'espoir d'un pareil carnage, pendant quelques minutes, le suffoqua de plaisir. Puis il descendit de cheval, retroussa ses manches, et se mit à tirer.

Au sifflement de la première flèche, tous les cerfs à la fois tournèrent la tête. Il se fit des enfonçures dans leur masse ; des voix plaintives s'élevaient, et un grand mouvement agita le troupeau.

Le rebord du vallon était trop haut pour le franchir. Ils bondissaient dans l'enceinte, cherchant à s'échapper. Julien visait, tirait ; et les flèches tombaient comme les rayons d'une pluie d'orage. Les cerfs rendus furieux se battirent, se cabraient, montaient les uns par-dessus les autres ; et leurs corps avec leurs ramures emmêlées faisaient un large monticule, qui s'écroulait, en se déplaçant.

Enfin ils moururent, couchés sur le sable, la bave aux naseaux, les entrailles sorties, et l'ondulation de leurs ventres s'abaissant par degrés. Puis tout fut immobile.

La nuit allait venir ; et derrière le bois, dans les intervalles des branches, le ciel était rouge comme une nappe de sang.

Julien s'adossa contre un arbre. Il contemplait d'un oeil béant l'énormité du massacre, ne comprenant pas comment il avait pu le faire.

De l'autre côté du vallon, sur le bord de la forêt, il aperçut un cerf, une biche et son faon.

Le cerf, qui était noir et monstrueux de taille, portait seize andouillers avec une barbe blanche. La biche, blonde comme les feuilles mortes, broutait le gazon ; et le faon tacheté, sans l'interrompre dans sa marche, lui tétait la mamelle.

L'arbalète encore une fois ronfla. Le faon, tout de suite, fut tué. Alors sa mère, en regardant le ciel, brama d'une voix profonde, déchirante, humaine. Julien exaspéré, d'un coup en plein poitrail, l'étendit par terre.

Le grand cerf l'avait vu, fit un bond. Julien lui envoya sa dernière flèche. Elle l'atteignit au front, et y resta plantée.

Le grand cerf n'eut pas l'air de la sentir ; en enjambant par-dessus les morts, il avançait toujours, allait fondre sur lui, l'éventrer ; et Julien reculait dans une épouvante indicible. Le prodigieux animal s'arrêta ; et les yeux flamboyants, solennel comme un patriarche et comme un justicier, pendant qu'une cloche au loin tintait, il répéta trois fois :

— « Maudit ! maudit ! maudit ! Un jour, coeur féroce, tu assassineras ton père et ta mère ! »

Il plia les genoux, ferma doucement ses paupières, et mourut.

Julien fut stupéfait, puis accablé d'une fatigue soudaine ; et un dégoût, une tristesse immense l'envahit. Le front dans les deux mains, il pleura pendant longtemps.

Son cheval était perdu ; ses chiens l'avaient abandonné ; la solitude qui l'enveloppait lui sembla toute menaçante de périls indéfinis. Alors, poussé par un effroi, il prit sa course à travers la campagne, choisit au hasard un sentier, et se trouva presque immédiatement à la porte du château.

La nuit, il ne dormit pas. Sous le vacillement de la lampe suspendue, il revoyait toujours le grand cerf noir. Sa prédiction l'obsédait ; il se débattait contre elle. « Non ! non ! non ! je ne peux pas les tuer ! » puis, il songeait : « Si je le voulais, pourtant ?... » et il avait peur que le Diable ne lui en inspirât l'envie.

Durant trois mois, sa mère en angoisse pria au chevet de son lit, et son père, en gémissant, marchait continuellement dans les couloirs. Il manda les maîtres mires les plus fameux, lesquels ordonnèrent des quantités de drogues. Le mal de Julien, disaient-ils, avait pour cause un vent funeste, ou un désir d'amour. Mais le jeune homme, à toutes les questions, secouait la tête.

Les forces lui revinrent ; et on le promenait dans la cour, le vieux moine et le bon seigneur le soutenant chacun par un bras.

Quand il fut rétabli complètement, il s'obstina à ne point chasser.

Son père, le voulant réjouir, lui fit cadeau d'une grande épée sarrasine.

Elle était au haut d'un pilier, dans une panoplie. Pour l'atteindre, il fallut une échelle. Julien y monta. L'épée trop lourde lui échappa des doigts, et en tombant frôla le bon seigneur de si près que sa houppe en fut coupée ; Julien crut avoir tué son père, et s'évanouit.

Dès lors, il redouta les armes. L'aspect d'un fer nu le faisait pâlir. Cette faiblesse était une désolation pour sa famille.

Enfin le vieux moine, au nom de Dieu, de l'honneur et des ancêtres, lui commanda de reprendre ses exercices de gentilhomme.

Les écuyers, tous les jours, s'amusaient au maniement de la javeline. Julien y excella bien vite. Il envoyait la sienne dans le goulot des bouteilles, cassait les dents des girouettes, frappait à cent pas les clous des portes.

Un soir d'été, à l'heure où la brume rend les choses indistinctes, étant sous la treille du jardin, il aperçut tout au fond deux ailes blanches qui voletaient à la hauteur de l'espalier. Il ne douta pas que ce ne fût une cigogne ; et il lança son javelot.

Un cri déchirant partit.

C'était sa mère, dont le bonnet à longues barbes restait cloué contre le mur.

Julien s'enfuit du château, et ne reparut plus.

II

Il s'engagea dans une troupe d'aventuriers qui passaient.

Il connut la faim, la soif, les fièvres et la vermine. Il s'accoutuma au fracas des mêlées, à l'aspect des moribonds. Le vent tanna sa peau. Ses membres se durcirent par le contact des armures ; et comme il était très-fort, courageux, tempérant, avisé, il obtint sans peine le commandement d'une compagnie.

Au début des batailles, il enlevait ses soldats d'un grand geste de son épée. Avec une corde à noeuds, il grimpait aux murs des citadelles, la nuit, balancé par l'ouragan, pendant que les flammèches du feu grégeois se collaient à sa cuirasse, et que la résine bouillante et le plomb fondu ruisselaient des créneaux. Souvent le heurt d'une pierre fracassa son bouclier. Des ponts trop chargés d'hommes croulèrent sous lui. En tournant sa masse d'armes, il se débarrassa de quatorze cavaliers. Il défit, en champ clos, tous ceux qui se proposèrent. Plus de vingt fois, on le crut mort.

Grâce à la faveur divine, il en réchappa toujours ; car il protégeait les gens d'église, les orphelins, les veuves, et principalement les vieillards. Quand il en voyait un marchant devant lui, il criait pour connaître sa figure, comme s'il avait eu peur de le tuer par méprise.

Des esclaves en fuite, des manants révoltés, des bâtards sans fortune, toutes sortes d'intrépides affluèrent sous son drapeau, et il se composa une armée.

Elle grossit. Il devint fameux. On le recherchait.

Tour à tour, il secourut le Dauphin de France et le roi d'Angleterre, les templiers de Jérusalem, le suréna des Parthes, le négud d'Abyssinie, et l'empereur de Calicut. Il combattit des Scandinaves recouverts d'écailles de poisson, des Nègres munis de rondaches en cuir d'hippopotame et montés sur des ânes rouges, des Indiens couleur d'or et brandissant par-dessus leurs diadèmes de larges sabres, plus clairs que des miroirs. Il vainquit les Troglodytes et les Anthropophages. Il traversa des régions si torrides que sous l'ardeur du soleil les chevelures s'allumaient d'elles-mêmes, comme des flambeaux ; et d'autres qui étaient si glaciales, que les bras, se détachant du corps, tombaient par terre ; et des pays où il y avait tant de brouillards que l'on marchait environné de fantômes.

Des républiques en embarras le consultèrent. Aux entrevues d'ambassadeurs, il obtenait des conditions inespérées. Si un monarque se conduisait trop mal, il arrivait tout à coup, et lui faisait des remontrances. Il affranchit des peuples. Il délivra des reines enfermées dans des tours. C'est lui, et pas un autre, qui assomma la guivre de Milan et le dragon d'Oberbirlbach.

Or l'empereur d'Occitanie, ayant triomphé des Musulmans espagnols, s'était joint par concubinage à la soeur du calife de Cordoue ; et il en conservait une fille, qu'il avait élevée chrétiennement. Mais le calife, faisant mine de vouloir se convertir, vint lui rendre visite, accompagné d'une escorte nombreuse, massacra toute sa garnison, et le plongea dans un cul de basse-fosse, où il le traitait durement, afin d'en extirper des trésors.

Julien accourut à son aide, détruisit l'armée des infidèles, assiégea la ville, tua le calife, coupa sa tête, et la jeta comme une boule par-dessus les remparts. Puis il tira l'empereur de sa prison, et le fit remonter sur son trône, en présence de toute sa cour.

L'empereur, pour prix d'un tel service, lui présenta dans des corbeilles beaucoup d'argent ; Julien n'en voulut pas. Croyant qu'il en désirait davantage, il lui offrit les trois quarts de ses richesses ; nouveau refus ; puis de partager son royaume ; Julien le remercia ; et l'empereur en pleurait de dépit, ne sachant de quelle manière témoigner sa reconnaissance, quand il se frappa le front, dit un mot à l'oreille d'un courtisan ; les rideaux d'une tapisserie se relevèrent, et une jeune fille parut.

Ses grands yeux noirs brillaient comme deux lampes très-douces. Un sourire charmant écartait ses lèvres. Les anneaux de sa chevelure s'accrochaient aux pierreries de sa robe entr'ouverte ; et, sous la transparence de sa tunique, on devinait la jeunesse de son corps. Elle était toute mignonne et potelée, avec la taille fine.

Julien fut ébloui d'amour, d'autant plus qu'il avait mené jusqu'alors une vie très-chaste.

Donc il reçut en mariage la fille de l'empereur, avec un château qu'elle tenait de sa mère ; et, les noces étant terminées, on se quitta, après des politesses infinies de part et d'autre.

C'était un palais de marbre blanc, bâti à la moresque, sur un promontoire, dans un bois d'orangers. Des terrasses de fleurs descendaient jusqu'au bord d'un golfe, où des coquilles roses craquaient sous les pas. Derrière le château, s'étendait une forêt ayant le dessin d'un éventail. Le ciel continuellement était bleu, et les arbres se penchaient tour à tour sous la brise de la mer et le vent des montagnes, qui fermaient au loin l'horizon.

Les chambres, pleines de crépuscule, se trouvaient éclairées par les incrustations des murailles. De hautes colonnettes, minces comme des roseaux, supportaient la voûte des coupoles, décorées de reliefs imitant les stalactites des grottes.

Il y avait des jets d'eau dans les salles, des mosaïques dans les cours, des cloisons festonnées, mille délicatesses d'architecture, et partout un tel silence que l'on entendait le frôlement d'une écharpe ou l'écho d'un soupir.

Julien ne faisait plus la guerre. Il se reposait, entouré d'un peuple tranquille ; et chaque jour, une foule passait devant lui, avec des génuflexions et des baise-mains à l'orientale.

Vêtu de pourpre, il restait accoudé dans l'embrasure d'une fenêtre, en se rappelant ses chasses d'autrefois ; et il aurait voulu courir sur le désert après les gazelles et les autruches, être caché dans les bambous à l'affût des léopards, traverser des forêts pleines de rhinocéros, atteindre au sommet des monts les plus inaccessibles pour viser mieux les aigles, et sur les glaçons de la mer combattre les ours blancs.

Quelquefois, dans un rêve, il se voyait comme notre père Adam au milieu du Paradis, entre toutes les bêtes ; en allongeant le bras, il les faisait mourir ; ou bien, elles défilaient, deux à deux, par rang de taille, depuis les éléphants et les lions jusqu'aux hermines et aux canards, comme le jour qu'elles entrèrent dans l'arche de Noé. A l'ombre d'une caverne, il dardait sur elles des javelots infailibles ; il en survenait d'autres ; cela n'en finissait pas ; et il se réveillait en roulant des yeux farouches.

Des princes de ses amis l'invitèrent à chasser. Il s'y refusa toujours, croyant, par cette sorte de pénitence, détourner son malheur ; car il lui semblait que du meurtre des animaux dépendait le sort de ses parents. Mais il souffrait de ne pas les voir, et son autre envie devenait insupportable.

Sa femme, pour le récréer, fit venir des jongleurs et des danseuses.

Elle se promenait avec lui, en litière ouverte, dans la campagne ; d'autres fois, étendus sur le bord d'une chaloupe, ils regardaient les poissons vagabonder dans l'eau, claire comme le ciel. Souvent elle lui jetait des fleurs au visage ; accroupie devant ses pieds, elle tirait des airs d'une mandoline à trois cordes ; puis, lui posant sur l'épaule ses deux mains jointes, disait d'une voix timide : — « Qu'avez-vous donc, cher seigneur ? »

Il ne répondait pas, ou éclatait en sanglots ; enfin, un jour, il avoua son horrible pensée.

Elle la combattit, en raisonnant très-bien : son père et sa mère, probablement, étaient morts ; si jamais il les revoyait, par quel hasard, dans quel but, arriverait-il à cette abomination ? Donc, sa crainte n'avait pas de cause, et il devait se remettre à chasser.

Julien souriait en l'écoutant, mais ne se décidait pas à satisfaire son désir.

Un soir du mois d'août qu'ils étaient dans leur chambre, elle venait de se coucher et il s'agenouillait pour sa prière quand il entendit le jappement d'un renard, puis des pas légers sous la fenêtre ; et il entrevit dans l'ombre comme des apparences d'animaux. La tentation était trop forte. Il décrocha son carquois.

Elle parut surprise.

— « C'est pour t'obéir ! » dit-il, « au lever du soleil, je serai revenu. »

Cependant elle redoutait une aventure funeste.

Il la rassura, puis sortit, étonné de l'inconséquence de son humeur.

Peu de temps après, un page vint annoncer que deux inconnus, à défaut du seigneur absent, réclamaient tout de suite la seigneuresse.

Et bientôt entrèrent dans la chambre un vieil homme et une vieille femme, courbés, poudreux, en habits de toile, et s'appuyant chacun sur un bâton.

Ils s'enhardirent et déclarèrent qu'ils apportaient à Julien des nouvelles de ses parents.

Elle se pencha pour les entendre.

Mais, s'étant concertés du regard, ils lui demandèrent s'il les aimait toujours, s'il parlait d'eux quelquefois.

— « Oh ! oui ! » dit-elle.

Alors, ils s'écrièrent :

— « Eh bien ! c'est nous ! » et ils s'assirent, étant fort las et recrus de fatigue.

Rien n'assurait à la jeune femme que son époux fût leur fils.

Ils en donnèrent la preuve, en décrivant des signes particuliers qu'il avait sur la peau.

Elle sauta hors sa couche, appela son page, et on leur servit un repas.

Bien qu'ils eussent grand'faim, ils ne pouvaient guère manger ; et elle observait à l'écart le tremblement de leurs mains osseuses, en prenant les gobelets.

Ils firent mille questions sur Julien. Elle répondait à chacune, mais eut soin de taire l'idée funèbre qui les concernait.

Ne le voyant pas revenir, ils étaient partis de leur château ; et ils marchaient depuis plusieurs années, sur de vagues indications, sans perdre l'espoir. Il avait fallu tant d'argent au péage des fleuves et dans les hôtelleries, pour les droits des princes et les exigences des voleurs, que le fond de leur bourse était vide, et qu'ils mendiaient maintenant. Qu'importe, puisque bientôt ils embrasseraient leur fils ? Ils exaltaient son bonheur d'avoir une femme aussi gentille, et ne se lassaient point de la contempler et de la baiser.

La richesse de l'appartement les étonnait beaucoup ; et le vieux, ayant examiné les murs, demanda pourquoi s'y trouvait le blason de l'empereur d'Occitanie.

Elle répliqua :

— « C'est mon père ! »

Alors il tressaillit, se rappelant la prédiction du Bohême ; et la vieille songeait à la parole de l'Ermite. Sans doute la gloire de son fils n'était que l'aurore des splendeurs éternelles ; et tous les deux restaient béants, sous la lumière du candélabre qui éclairait la table.

Ils avaient dû être très-beaux dans leur jeunesse. La mère avait encore tous ses cheveux, dont les bandeaux fins, pareils à des plaques de neige, pendaient jusqu'au bas de ses joues ; et le père, avec sa taille haute et sa grande barbe, ressemblait à une statue d'église.

La femme de Julien les engagea à ne pas l'attendre. Elle les coucha elle-même dans son lit, puis ferma la croisée ; ils s'endormirent. Le jour allait paraître, et, derrière le vitrail, les petits oiseaux commençaient à chanter.

Julien avait traversé le parc ; et il marchait dans la forêt d'un pas nerveux, jouissant de la mollesse du gazon et de la douceur de l'air.

Les ombres des arbres s'étendaient sur la mousse. Quelquefois la lune faisait des taches blanches dans les clairières, et il hésitait à s'avancer, croyant apercevoir une flaque d'eau, ou bien la surface des mares tranquilles se confondait avec la couleur de l'herbe. C'était partout un grand silence ; et il ne découvrait aucune des bêtes qui, peu de minutes auparavant, erraient à l'entour de son château.

Le bois s'épaissit, l'obscurité devint profonde. Des bouffées de vent chaud passaient, pleines de senteurs amollissantes. Il enfonçait dans des tas de feuilles mortes, et il s'appuya contre un chêne pour haleter un peu.

Tout à coup, derrière son dos, bondit une masse plus noire, un sanglier. Julien n'eut pas le temps de saisir son arc, et il s'en affligea comme d'un malheur.

Puis, étant sorti du bois, il aperçut un loup qui filait le long d'une haie.

Julien lui envoya une flèche. Le loup s'arrêta, tourna la tête pour le voir et reprit sa course. Il trottait en gardant toujours la même distance, s'arrêtait de temps à autre, et, sitôt qu'il était visé, recommençait à fuir.

Julien parcourut de cette manière une plaine interminable, puis des monticules de sable, et enfin il se trouva sur un plateau dominant un grand espace de pays. Des pierres plates étaient clair-semées entre des caveaux en ruines. On trébuchait sur des ossements de morts ; de place en place, des croix vermoulues se penchaient d'un air lamentable. Mais des formes remuèrent dans l'ombre indécise des tombeaux ; et il en surgit des hyènes, tout effarées, pantelantes. En faisant claquer leurs ongles sur les dalles, elles vinrent à lui et le flairaient avec un bâillement qui découvrait leurs gencives. Il dégaina son sabre. Elles partirent à la fois dans toutes les directions, et, continuant leur galop boiteux et précipité, se perdirent au loin sous un flot de poussière.

Une heure après, il rencontra dans un ravin un taureau furieux, les cornes en avant, et qui grattait le sable avec son pied. Julien lui pointa sa lance sous les fanons. Elle éclata, comme si l'animal eût été de bronze ; il ferma les yeux, attendant sa mort. Quand il les rouvrit, le taureau avait disparu.

Alors son âme s'affaissa de honte. Un pouvoir supérieur détruisait sa force ; et, pour s'en retourner chez lui, il rentra dans la forêt.

Elle était embarrassée de lianes ; et il les coupait avec son sabre quand une fouine glissa brusquement entre ses jambes, une panthère fit un bond par-dessus son épaule, un serpent monta en spirale autour d'un frêne.

Il y avait dans son feuillage un choucas monstrueux, qui regardait Julien ; et, çà et là, parurent entre les branches quantité de larges étincelles, comme si le firmament eût fait pleuvoir dans la forêt toutes ses étoiles. C'étaient des yeux d'animaux, des chats sauvages, des écureuils, des hiboux, des perroquets, des singes.

Julien darda contre eux ses flèches ; les flèches, avec leurs plumes, se posaient sur les feuilles comme des papillons blancs. Il leur jeta des pierres ; les pierres, sans rien toucher, retombaient. Il se maudit, aurait voulu se battre, hurla des imprécations, étouffait de rage.

Et tous les animaux qu'il avait poursuivis se représentèrent, faisant autour de lui un cercle étroit. Les uns étaient assis sur leur croupe, les autres dressés de toute leur taille. Il restait au milieu, glacé de terreur, incapable du moindre mouvement. Par un effort suprême de sa volonté, il fit un pas ; ceux qui perchaient sur les arbres ouvrirent leurs ailes, ceux qui foulaient le sol déplacèrent leurs membres ; et tous l'accompagnaient.

Les hyènes marchaient devant lui, le loup et le sanglier par derrière. Le taureau, à sa droite, balançait la tête ; et, à sa gauche, le serpent ondulait dans les herbes, tandis que la panthère, bombant son dos, avançait à pas de velours et à grandes enjambées. Il allait le plus lentement possible pour ne pas les irriter ; et il voyait sortir de la profondeur des buissons des porcs-épics, des renards, des vipères, des chacals et des ours.

Julien se mit à courir ; ils coururent. Le serpent sifflait, les bêtes puantes bavaient. Le sanglier lui frottait les talons avec ses défenses, le loup l'intérieur des mains avec les poils de son museau. Les singes le pinçaient en grimaçant, la fouine se roulait sur ses pieds. Un ours, d'un revers de patte, lui enleva son chapeau ; et la panthère, dédaigneusement, laissa tomber une flèche qu'elle portait à sa gueule.

Une ironie perçait dans leurs allures surnoises. Tout en l'observant du coin de leurs prunelles, ils semblaient méditer un plan de vengeance ; et, assourdi par le bourdonnement des insectes, battu par des queues d'oiseau, suffoqué par des haleines, il marchait les bras tendus et les paupières closes comme un aveugle, sans même avoir la force de crier « grâce ! »

Le chant d'un coq vibra dans l'air. D'autres y répondirent ; c'était le jour ; et il reconnut, au-delà des orangers, le faite de son palais.

Puis, au bord d'un champ, il vit, à trois pas d'intervalle, des perdrix rouges qui voletaient dans les chaumes. Il dégrafa son manteau, et l'abattit sur elles comme un filet. Quand il les eut découvertes, il n'en trouva qu'une seule, et morte depuis longtemps, pourrie.

Cette déception l'exaspéra plus que toutes les autres. Sa soif de carnage le reprenait ; les bêtes manquant, il aurait voulu massacrer des hommes.

Il gravit les trois terrasses, enfonça la porte d'un coup de poing ; mais, au bas de l'escalier, le souvenir de sa chère femme détendit son coeur. Elle dormait sans doute, et il allait la surprendre.

Ayant retiré ses sandales, il tourna doucement la serrure, et entra.

Les vitraux garnis de plomb obscurcissaient la pâleur de l'aube. Julien se prit les pieds dans des vêtements, par terre ; un peu plus loin, il heurta une crédence encore chargée de vaisselle. « Sans doute, elle aura mangé, » se dit-il ; et il avançait vers le lit, perdu dans les ténèbres au fond de la chambre. Quand il fut au bord, afin d'embrasser sa femme, il se pencha sur l'oreiller où les deux têtes reposaient l'une près de l'autre. Alors, il sentit contre sa bouche l'impression d'une barbe.

Il se recula, croyant devenir fou ; mais il revint près du lit, et ses doigts, en palpant, rencontrèrent des cheveux qui étaient très-longs. Pour se convaincre de son erreur, il repassa lentement sa main sur l'oreiller. C'était bien une barbe, cette fois, et un homme ! un homme couché avec sa femme !

Éclatant d'une colère démesurée, il bondit sur eux à coups de poignard ; et il trépidait, écumait, avec des hurlements de bête fauve. Puis il s'arrêta. Les morts, percés au coeur, n'avaient pas même bougé. Il écoutait attentivement leurs deux râles presque égaux, et, à mesure qu'ils s'affaiblissaient, un autre, tout au loin, les continuait. Incertaine d'abord, cette voix plaintive longuement poussée, se rapprochait, s'enfla, devint cruelle ; et il reconnut, terrifié, le brame du grand cerf noir.

Et comme il se retournait, il crut voir dans l'encadrure de la porte, le fantôme de sa femme, une lumière à la main.

Le tapage du meurtre l'avait attirée. D'un large coup d'oeil, elle comprit tout, et s'enfuyant d'horreur laissa tomber son flambeau.

Il le ramassa.

Son père et sa mère étaient devant lui, étendus sur le dos avec un trou dans la poitrine ; et leurs visages, d'une majestueuse douceur, avaient l'air de garder comme un secret éternel. Des éclaboussures et des flaques de sang s'épalaient au milieu de leur peau blanche, sur les draps du lit, par terre, le long d'un christ d'ivoire suspendu dans l'alcôve. Le reflet écarlate du vitrail, alors frappé par le soleil, éclairait ces taches rouges, et en jetait de plus nombreuses dans tout l'appartement. Julien marcha vers les deux morts en se disant, en voulant croire, que cela n'était pas possible, qu'il s'était trompé, qu'il y a parfois des ressemblances inexplicables. Enfin, il se baissa légèrement pour voir de tout près le vieillard ; et il aperçut, entre ses paupières mal fermées, une prunelle éteinte qui le brûla comme du feu. Puis il se porta de l'autre côté de la couche, occupé par l'autre corps, dont les cheveux blancs masquaient une partie de la figure. Julien lui passa les doigts sous ses bandeaux, leva sa tête ; — et il la regardait, en la tenant au bout de son bras roidi, pendant que de l'autre main il s'éclairait avec le flambeau. Des gouttes, suintant du matelas, tombaient une à une sur le plancher.

A la fin du jour, il se présenta devant sa femme ; et, d'une voix différente de la sienne, il lui commanda premièrement de ne pas lui répondre, de ne pas l'approcher, de ne plus même le regarder, et qu'elle eût à suivre, sous peine de damnation, tous ses ordres qui étaient irrévocables.

Les funérailles seraient faites selon les instructions qu'il avait laissées par écrit, sur un prie-Dieu, dans la chambre des morts. Il lui abandonnait son palais, ses vassaux, tous ses biens, sans même retenir les vêtements de son corps, et ses sandales, que l'on trouverait au haut de l'escalier.

Elle avait obéi à la volonté de Dieu, en occasionnant son crime, et devait prier pour son âme, puisque désormais il n'existait plus.

On enterra les morts avec magnificence, dans l'église d'un monastère à trois journées du château. Un moine en cagoule rabattue suivit le cortège, loin de tous les autres, sans que personne osât lui parler.

Il resta pendant la messe, à plat ventre au milieu du portail, les bras en croix, et le front dans la poussière.

Après l'ensevelissement, on le vit prendre le chemin qui menait aux montagnes. Il se retourna plusieurs fois, et finit par disparaître.

III

Il s'en alla, mendiant sa vie par le monde.

Il tendait sa main aux cavaliers sur les routes, avec des génuflexions s'approchait des moissonneurs, ou restait immobile devant la barrière des cours ; et son visage était si triste que jamais on ne lui refusait l'aumône.

Par esprit d'humilité, il racontait son histoire ; alors tous s'enfuyaient, en faisant des signes de croix. Dans les villages où il avait déjà passé, sitôt qu'il était reconnu, on fermait les portes, on lui criait des menaces, on lui jetait des pierres. Les plus charitables posaient une écuelle sur le bord de leur fenêtre, puis fermaient l'auvent pour ne pas l'apercevoir.

Repoussé de partout, il évita les hommes ; et il se nourrit de racines, de plantes, de fruits perdus, et de coquillages qu'il cherchait le long des grèves.

Quelquefois, au tournant d'une côte, il voyait sous ses yeux une confusion de toits pressés, avec des flèches de pierre, des ponts, des tours, des rues noires s'entre-croisant, et d'où montait jusqu'à lui un bourdonnement continu.

Le besoin de se mêler à l'existence des autres le faisait descendre dans la ville. Mais l'air bestial des figures, le tapage des métiers, l'indifférence des propos glaçaient son cœur. Les jours de fête, quand le bourdon des cathédrales mettait en joie dès l'aurore le peuple entier, il regardait les habitants sortir de leurs maisons, puis les danses sur les places, les fontaines de cervoise dans les carrefours, les tentures de damas devant le logis des princes, et le soir venu, par le vitrage des rez-de-chaussée, les longues tables de famille où des aïeux tenaient des petits enfants sur leurs genoux ; des sanglots l'étouffaient, et il s'en retournait vers la campagne.

Il contemplait avec des élancements d'amour les poulains dans les herbages, les oiseaux dans leurs nids, les insectes sur les fleurs ; tous, à son approche, couraient plus loin, se cachaient effarés, s'envolaient bien vite.

Il rechercha les solitudes. Mais le vent apportait à son oreille comme des râles d'agonie ; les larmes de la rosée tombant par terre lui rappelaient d'autres gouttes d'un poids plus lourd. Le soleil, tous les soirs, étalait du sang dans les nuages ; et chaque nuit, en rêve, son parricide recommençait.

Il se fit un cilice avec des pointes de fer. Il monta sur les deux genoux toutes les collines ayant une chapelle à leur sommet. Mais l'impitoyable pensée obscurcissait la splendeur des tabernacles, le torturait à travers les macérations de la pénitence.

Il ne se révoltait pas contre Dieu qui lui avait infligé cette action, et pourtant se désespérait de l'avoir pu commettre.

Sa propre personne lui faisait tellement horreur qu'espérant s'en délivrer il l'aventura dans des périls. Il sauva des paralytiques des incendies, des enfants du fond des gouffres. L'abîme le rejetait, les flammes l'épargnaient.

Le temps n'apaisa pas sa souffrance. Elle devenait intolérable. Il résolut de mourir.

Et un jour qu'il se trouvait au bord d'une fontaine, comme il se penchait dessus pour juger de la profondeur de l'eau, il vit paraître en face de lui un vieillard tout décharné, à barbe blanche et d'un aspect si lamentable qu'il lui fut impossible de retenir ses pleurs. L'autre, aussi, pleurait. Sans reconnaître son image, Julien se rappelait confusément une figure ressemblant à celle-là. Il poussa un cri ; c'était son père ; et il ne pensa plus à se tuer.

Ainsi, portant le poids de son souvenir, il parcourut beaucoup de pays ; et il arriva près d'un fleuve dont la traversée était dangereuse, à cause de sa violence et parce qu'il y avait sur les rives une grande étendue de vase. Personne depuis longtemps n'osait plus le passer.

Une vieille barque, enfouie à l'arrière, dressait sa proue dans les roseaux. Julien en l'examinant découvrit une paire d'avirons ; et l'idée lui vint d'employer son existence au service des autres.

Il commença par établir sur la berge une manière de chaussée qui permettrait de descendre jusqu'au chenal ; et il se brisait les ongles à remuer les pierres énormes, les appuyait contre son ventre pour les transporter, glissait dans la vase, y enfonçait, manqua périr plusieurs fois.

Ensuite, il répara le bateau avec des épaves de navires, et il se fit une cahute avec de la terre glaise et des troncs d'arbres.

Le passage étant connu, les voyageurs se présentèrent. Ils l'appelaient de l'autre bord, en agitant des drapeaux ; Julien bien vite sautait dans sa barque. Elle était très-lourde ; et on la surchargeait par toutes sortes de bagages et de fardeaux, sans compter les bêtes de somme, qui, ruant de peur, augmentaient l'encombrement. Il ne demandait rien pour sa peine ; quelques-uns lui donnaient des restes de victuailles qu'ils tiraient de leur bissac ou les habits trop usés dont ils ne voulaient plus. Des brutaux vociféraient des blasphèmes. Julien les reprenait avec douceur ; et ils ripostaient par des injures. Il se contentait de les bénir.

Une petite table, un escabeau, un lit de feuilles mortes et trois coupes d'argile, voilà tout ce qu'était son mobilier. Deux trous dans la muraille servaient de fenêtres. D'un côté, s'étendaient à perte de vue des plaines stériles ayant sur leur surface de pâles étangs, ça et là ; et le grand fleuve, devant lui, roulait ses flots verdâtres. Au printemps, la terre humide avait une odeur de pourriture. Puis, un vent désordonné soulevait la poussière en tourbillons. Elle entraînait partout, embourbait l'eau, craquait sous les gencives. Un peu plus tard, c'était des nuages de moustiques, dont la susurration et les piqures ne s'arrêtaient ni jour ni nuit. Ensuite, survenaient d'atroces gelées qui donnaient aux choses la rigidité de la pierre, et inspiraient un besoin fou de manger de la viande.

Des mois s'écoulaient sans que Julien vît personne. Souvent il fermait les yeux, tâchant, par la mémoire, de revenir dans sa jeunesse ; — et la cour d'un château apparaissait, avec des lévriers sur un perron, des valets dans la salle d'armes, et, sous un berceau de pampres, un adolescent à cheveux blonds entre un vieillard couvert de fourrures et une dame à grand hennin ; tout à coup, les deux cadavres étaient là. Il se jetait à plat ventre sur son lit, et répétait en pleurant :

— « Ah ! pauvre père ! pauvre mère ! pauvre mère ! » Et tombait dans un assoupissement où les visions funèbres continuaient.

Une nuit qu'il dormait, il crut entendre quelqu'un l'appeler. Il tendit l'oreille et ne distingua que le mugissement des flots.

Mais la même voix reprit :

— « Julien ! »

Elle venait de l'autre bord, ce qui lui parut extraordinaire, vu la largeur du fleuve.

Une troisième fois on appela :

— « Julien ! »

Et cette voix haute avait l'intonation d'une cloche d'église.

Ayant allumé sa lanterne, il sortit de la cahute. Un ouragan furieux emplissait la nuit. Les ténèbres étaient profondes, et çà et là déchirées par la blancheur des vagues qui bondissaient.

Après une minute d'hésitation, Julien dénoua l'amarre. L'eau, tout de suite, devint tranquille, la barque glissa dessus et toucha l'autre berge, où un homme attendait.

Il était enveloppé d'une toile en lambeaux, la figure pareille à un masque de plâtre et les deux yeux plus rouges que des charbons. En approchant de lui la lanterne, Julien s'aperçut qu'une lèpre hideuse le recouvrait ; cependant, il avait dans son attitude comme une majesté de roi.

Dès qu'il entra dans la barque, elle enfonça prodigieusement, écrasée par son poids ; une secousse la remonta ; et Julien se mit à ramer.

A chaque coup d'aviron, le ressac des flots la soulevait par l'avant. L'eau, plus noire que de l'encre, courait avec furie des deux côtés du bordage. Elle creusait des abîmes, elle faisait des montagnes, et la chaloupe sautait dessus, puis redescendait dans des profondeurs où elle tournoyait, ballottée par le vent.

Julien penchait son corps, déplaçait les bras, et, s'arc-boutant des pieds, se renversait avec une torsion de la taille, pour avoir plus de force. La grêle cinglait ses mains, la pluie coulait dans son dos, la violence de l'air l'étouffait, il s'arrêta. Alors le bateau fut emporté à la dérive. Mais, comprenant qu'il s'agissait d'une chose considérable, d'un ordre auquel il ne fallait pas désobéir, il reprit ses avirons ; et le claquement des tolets coupait la clameur de la tempête.

La petite lanterne brûlait devant lui. Des oiseaux, en voletant, la cachaient par intervalles. Mais toujours il apercevait les prunelles du Lépreux qui se tenait debout à l'arrière, immobile comme une colonne.

Et cela dura longtemps, très-longtemps !

Quand ils furent arrivés dans la cahute, Julien ferma la porte ; et il le vit siégeant sur l'escabeau. L'espèce de linceul qui le recouvrait était tombé jusqu'à ses hanches ; et ses épaules, sa poitrine, ses bras maigres disparaissaient sous des plaques de pustules écailleuses. Des rides énormes labouraient son front. Tel qu'un squelette, il avait un trou à la place du nez ; et ses lèvres bleuâtres dégageaient une haleine épaisse comme un brouillard, et nauséabonde.

— « J'ai faim ! » dit-il.

Julien lui donna ce qu'il possédait, un vieux quartier de lard et les croûtes d'un pain noir.

Quand il les eut dévorés, la table, l'écuelle et le manche du couteau portaient les mêmes taches que l'on voyait sur son corps.

Ensuite, il dit : — « J'ai soif ! »

Julien alla chercher sa cruche ; et, comme il la prenait, il en sortit un arôme qui dilata son coeur et ses narines. C'était du vin ; quelle trouvaille ! mais le Lépreux avança le bras, et d'un trait vida toute la cruche.

Puis il dit : — « J'ai froid ! »

Julien, avec sa chandelle, enflamma un paquet de fougères, au milieu de la cabane.

Le Lépreux vint s'y chauffer ; et, accroupi sur les talons, il tremblait de tous ses membres, s'affaiblissait ; ses yeux ne brillaient plus, ses ulcères coulaient, et d'une voix presque éteinte, il murmura :

— « Ton lit ! »

Julien l'aida doucement à s'y traîner, et même étendit sur lui, pour le couvrir, la toile de son bateau.

Le Lépreux gémissait. Les coins de sa bouche découvraient ses dents, un râle accéléré lui secouait la poitrine, et son ventre, à chacune de ses aspirations, se creusait jusqu'aux vertèbres.

Puis il ferma les paupières.

— « C'est comme de la glace dans mes os ! Viens près de moi ! »

Et Julien, écartant la toile, se coucha sur les feuilles mortes, près de lui, côte à côte.

Le Lépreux tourna la tête.

— « Déshabille-toi, pour que j'aie la chaleur de ton corps ! »

Julien ôta ses vêtements ; puis, nu comme au jour de sa naissance, se replaça dans le lit ; et il sentait contre sa cuisse la peau du Lépreux, plus froide qu'un serpent et rude comme une lime.

Il tâchait de l'encourager ; et l'autre répondait, en haletant :

— « Ah ! je vais mourir !... Rapproche-toi, réchauffe-moi ! Pas avec les mains ! non ! toute ta personne. »

Julien s'étala dessus complètement, bouche contre bouche, poitrine sur poitrine.

Alors le Lépreux l'étreignit ; et ses yeux tout à coup prirent une clarté d'étoiles ; ses cheveux s'allongèrent comme les rais du soleil ; le souffle de ses narines avait la douceur des roses ; un nuage d'encens s'éleva du foyer, les flots chantaient. Cependant une abondance de délices, une joie surhumaine descendait comme une inondation dans l'âme de Julien pâmé ; et celui dont les bras le serraient toujours grandissait, grandissait, touchant de sa tête et de ses pieds les deux murs de la cabane. Le toit s'envola, le firmament se déployait ; — et Julien monta vers les espaces bleus, face à face avec Notre-Seigneur Jésus, qui l'emportait dans le ciel.

Et voilà l'histoire de saint Julien l'Hospitalier, telle à peu près qu'on la trouve, sur un vitrail d'église, dans mon pays.

HERODIAS

Dans sa citadelle de Machearous, au bord de la Mer Morte, Antipas retient prisonnier Iaokannan (Jean le Baptiste), qui condamne publiquement son union incestueuse avec Hérodiad, sa nièce qui fut de plus précédemment la femme de son frère qu'elle a quitté. Celle-ci, qui n'était poussée que par l'intérêt, craint d'être répudiée.

HÉRODIAS

I

La citadelle de Machaerous se dressait à l'orient de la mer Morte, sur un pic de basalte ayant la forme d'un cône. Quatre vallées profondes l'entouraient, deux vers les flancs, une en face, la quatrième au delà. Des maisons se tassaient contre sa base, dans le cercle d'un mur qui ondulait suivant les inégalités du terrain ; et, par un chemin en zigzag tailladant le rocher, la ville se liait à la forteresse, dont les murailles étaient hautes de cent vingt coudées, avec des angles nombreux, des créneaux sur le bord, et, çà et là, des tours qui faisaient comme des fleurons à cette couronne de pierres, suspendue au-dessus de l'abîme.

Il y avait dans l'intérieur un palais orné de portiques, et couvert d'une terrasse que fermait une balustrade en bois de sycomore, où des mâts étaient disposés pour tendre un vélarium.

Un matin, avant le jour, le Tétrarque Hérode-Antipas vint s'y accouder, et regarda.

Les montagnes, immédiatement sous lui, commençaient à découvrir leurs crêtes, pendant que leur masse, jusqu'au fond des abîmes, était encore dans l'ombre. Un brouillard flottait, il se déchira, et les contours de la mer Morte apparurent. L'aube, qui se levait derrière Machaerous, épandait une rougeur. Elle illumina bientôt les sables de la grève, les collines, le désert, et, plus loin, tous les monts de la Judée, inclinant leurs surfaces raboteuses et grises, Engeddi, au milieu, traçait une barre noire ; Hébron, dans l'enfoncement, s'arrondissait en dôme ; Esquol avait des grenadiers, Sorek des vignes, karmel des champs de sésame ; et la tour Antonia, de son cube monstrueux, dominait Jérusalem. Le Tétrarque en détourna la vue pour contempler, à droite, les palmiers de Jéricho ; et il songea aux autres villes de sa Galilée : Capharnaüm, Endor, Nazareth, Tibérias où peut-être il ne reviendrait plus. Cependant le Jourdain coulait sur la plaine aride. Toute blanche, elle éblouissait comme une nappe de neige. Le lac, maintenant, semblait en lapis-lazuli ; et à sa pointe méridionale, du côté de l'Yémen, Antipas reconnut ce qu'il craignait d'apercevoir. Des tentes brunes étaient dispersées ; des hommes avec des lances circulaient entre les chevaux, et des feux s'éteignant brillaient comme des étincelles à ras du sol.

C'étaient les troupes du roi des Arabes, dont il avait répudié la fille pour prendre Hérodiad, mariée à l'un de ses frères, qui vivait en Italie, sans prétentions au pouvoir.

Antipas attendait les secours des Romains ; et Vitellius, gouverneur de la Syrie, tardant à paraître, il se rongait d'inquiétudes.

Agrippa, sans doute, l'avait ruiné chez l'Empereur ? Philippe, son troisième frère, souverain de la Batanée, s'armait clandestinement. Les Juifs ne voulaient plus de ses moeurs idolâtres, tous les autres de sa domination ; si bien qu'il hésitait entre deux projets : adoucir les Arabes ou conclure une alliance avec les Parthes ; et, sous le prétexte de fêter son anniversaire, il avait convié, pour ce jour même, à un grand festin, les chefs de ses troupes, les régisseurs de ses campagnes et les principaux de la Galilée.

Il fouilla d'un regard aigu toutes les routes. Elles étaient vides. Des aigles volaient au-dessus de sa tête ; les soldats, le long du rempart, donnaient contre les murs ; rien ne bougeait dans le château.

Tout à coup, une voix lointaine, comme échappée des profondeurs de la terre, fit pâlir le Tétrarque. Il se pencha pour écouter ; elle avait disparu. Elle reprit ; et en claquant dans ses mains, il cria —

« Mannaï ! Mannaï ! »

Un homme se présenta, nu jusqu'à la ceinture, comme les masseurs des bains. Il était très-grand, vieux, décharné, et portait sur la cuisse un coutelas dans une gaine de bronze. Sa chevelure, relevée par un peigne, exagérait la longueur de son front. Une somnolence décolorait ses yeux, mais ses dents brillaient, et ses orteils posaient légèrement sur les dalles, tout son corps ayant la souplesse d'un singe, et sa figure l'impassibilité d'une momie.

— « Où est-il ? » demanda le Tétrarque.

Mannaï répondit, en indiquant avec son pouce un objet derrière eux :

— « Là ! toujours ! »

— « J'avais cru l'entendre ! »

Et Antipas, quand il eut respiré largement, s'informa de Iakannan, le même que les Latins appellent saint Jean-Baptiste. Avait-on revu ces deux hommes, admis par indulgence, l'autre mois, dans son cachot, et savait-on, depuis lors, ce qu'ils étaient venus faire ?

Mannaëi répliqua :

— « Ils ont échangé avec lui des paroles mystérieuses, comme les voleurs, le soir, aux carrefours des routes. Ensuite ils sont partis vers la Haute Galilée, en annonçant qu'ils apporteraient une grande nouvelle. »

Antipas baissa la tête, puis d'un air d'épouvante :

« Garde-le ! garde-le ! Et ne laisse entrer personne ! Ferme bien la porte ! Couvre la fosse ! On ne doit pas même soupçonner qu'il vit ! »

Sans avoir reçu ces ordres, Mannaëi les accomplissait ; car Iaokanann était Juif, et il exécrait les Juifs comme tous les Samaritains.

Leur temple de Garizim, désigné par Moïse pour être le centre d'Israël, n'existait plus depuis le roi Hyrcan ; et celui de Jérusalem les mettait dans la fureur d'un outrage, et d'une injustice permanente. Mannaëi s'y était introduit, afin d'en souiller l'autel avec des os de morts. Ses compagnons, moins rapides, avaient été décapités.

Il l'aperçut dans l'écartement de deux collines. Le soleil faisait resplendir ses murailles de marbre blanc et les lames d'or de sa toiture. C'était comme une montagne lumineuse, quelque chose de surhumain, écrasant tout de son opulence et de son orgueil.

Alors il étendit les bras du côté de Sion ; et, la taille droite, le visage en arrière, les poings fermés, lui jeta un anathème, croyant que les mots avaient un pouvoir effectif.

Antipas écoutait, sans paraître scandalisé.

Le Samaritain dit encore :

— « Par moments il s'agite, il voudrait fuir, il espère une délivrance. D'autres fois, il a l'air tranquille d'une bête malade ; ou bien je le vois qui marche dans les ténèbres, en répétant :

« Qu'importe ? Pour qu'il grandisse, il faut que je diminue ! » Antipas et Mannaëi se regardèrent. Mais le Tétrarque était las de réfléchir.

Tous ces monts autour de lui, comme des étages de grands flots pétrifiés, les gouffres noirs sur le flanc des falaises, l'immensité du ciel bleu, l'éclat violent du jour, la profondeur des abîmes le troublaient ; et une désolation l'envahissait au spectacle du désert, qui figure, dans le bouleversement de ses terrains, des amphithéâtres et des palais abattus.

Le vent chaud apportait, avec l'odeur du soufre, comme l'exhalaison des villes maudites, ensevelies plus bas que le rivage sous les eaux pesantes. Ces marques d'une colère immortelle effrayaient sa pensée ; et il restait les deux coudes sur la balustrade, les yeux fixes et les tempes dans les mains. Quelqu'un l'avait touché. Il se retourna. Hérodiad était devant lui.

Une simarre de pourpre légère l'enveloppait jusqu'aux sandales. Sortie précipitamment de sa chambre, elle n'avait ni colliers ni pendants d'oreilles ; une tresse de ses cheveux noirs lui tombait sur un bras, et s'enfonçait, par le bout, dans l'intervalle de ses deux seins. Ses narines, trop remontées, palpitaient ; la joie d'un triomphe éclairait sa figure ; et, d'une voix forte, secouant le Tétrarque :

— « César nous aime ! Agrippa est en prison ! »

— « Qui te l'a dit ? »

— « Je le sais ! »

Elle ajouta :

— « C'est pour avoir souhaité l'empire à Caius ! »

Tout en vivant de leurs aumônes, il avait brigué le titre de roi, qu'ils ambitionnaient comme lui. Mais dans l'avenir, plus de craintes ! — « Les cachots de Tibère s'ouvrent difficilement, et quelquefois l'existence n'y est pas sûre ! »

Antipas la comprit ; et, bien qu'elle fût la soeur d'Agrippa, son intention atroce lui sembla justifiée. Ces meurtres étaient une conséquence des choses, une fatalité des maisons royales. Dans celle d'Hérode, on ne les comptait plus.

Puis elle étala son entreprise : les clients achetés, les lettres découvertes, des espions à toutes les portes, et comment elle était parvenue à séduire Eutychès le dénonciateur. — « Rien ne me coûtait ! Pour toi, n'ai-je pas fait plus ?... J'ai abandonné ma fille ! »

Après son divorce, elle avait laissé dans Rome cette enfant, espérant bien en avoir d'autres du Tétrarque. Jamais elle n'en parlait. Il se demanda pourquoi son accès de tendresse.

On avait déplié le vélarium et apporté vivement de larges coussins auprès d'eux. Hérodiad s'y affaissa, et pleurait, en tournant le dos. Puis elle se passa la main sur les paupières, dit qu'elle n'y voulait plus songer, qu'elle se trouvait heureuse ; et elle lui rappela leurs causeries là-bas, dans l'atrium, les rencontres aux étuves, leurs promenades le long de la voie Sacrée, et les soirs, dans les grandes villas, au murmure des jets d'eau, sous des arcs de fleurs, devant la campagne romaine. Elle le regardait comme autrefois, en se frôlant contre sa poitrine, avec des gestes câlins. — Il la repoussa. L'amour qu'elle tâchait de ranimer était si loin, maintenant ! Et tous ses malheurs en découlaient ; car, depuis douze ans bientôt, la guerre continuait. Elle avait vieilli le Tétrarque. Ses épaules se voûtaient dans une toge sombre, à bordure violette ; ses cheveux blancs se mêlaient à sa barbe, et le soleil, qui traversait la voile, baignait de lumière son front chagrin. Celui d'Hérodiad également avait des plis ; et, l'un en face de l'autre, ils se considéraient d'une manière farouche.

Les chemins dans la montagne commencèrent à se peupler. Des pasteurs piquaient des boeufs, des enfants tiraient des ânes, des palefreniers conduisaient des chevaux. Ceux qui descendaient les hauteurs au-delà de Machaerous disparaissaient derrière le château ; d'autres montaient le ravin en face, et, parvenus à la ville, déchargeaient leurs bagages dans les cours. C'étaient les pourvoyeurs du Tétrarque, et des valets, précédant ses convives.

Mais au fond de la terrasse, à gauche, un Essénien parut, en robe blanche, nu-pieds, l'air stoïque. Mannaï, du côté droit, se précipitait en levant son coutelas, Hérodiad lui cria : — « Tue-le ! » — « Arrête ! » dit le Tétrarque.

Il devint immobile ; l'autre aussi.

Puis ils se retirèrent, chacun par un escalier différent, à reculons, sans se perdre des yeux.

— « Je le connais ! » dit Hérodiad, « il se nomme Phanuel, et cherche à voir Iaokanann, puisque tu as l'aveuglement de le conserver ! »

Antipas objecta qu'il pouvait un jour servir. Ses attaques contre Jérusalem gagnaient à eux le reste des Juifs.

— « Non ! » reprit-elle, « ils acceptent tous les maîtres, et ne sont pas capables de faire une patrie ! » Quant à celui qui remuait le peuple avec des espérances conservées depuis Néhémias, la meilleure politique était de le supprimer.

Rien ne pressait, selon le Tétrarque. Iaokanann dangereux ! Allons donc ! Il affectait d'en rire.

— « Tais-toi ! » Et elle redit son humiliation, un jour qu'elle allait vers Galaad, pour la récolte du baume. Des gens, au bord du fleuve, remettaient leurs habits. Sur un monticule, à côté, un homme parlait. Il avait une peau de chameau autour des reins, et sa tête ressemblait à celle d'un lion. Dès qu'il m'aperçut, il cracha sur moi toutes les malédictions des prophètes. Ses prunelles flamboyaient ; sa voix rugissait ; il levait les bras, comme pour arracher le tonnerre. Impossible de fuir ! les roues de mon char avaient du sable jusqu'aux essieux ; et je m'éloignais lentement, m'abritant sous mon manteau, glacée par ces injures qui tombaient comme une pluie d'orage. »

Iaokanann l'empêchait de vivre. Quand on l'avait pris et lié avec des cordes, les soldats devaient le poignarder s'il résistait ; il s'était montré doux. On avait mis des serpents dans sa prison ; ils étaient morts.

L'inanité de ces embûches exaspérait Hérodiad. D'ailleurs, pourquoi sa guerre contre elle ? Quel intérêt le poussait ? Ses discours, criés à des foules, s'étaient répandus, circulaient ; elle les entendait partout, ils emplissaient l'air. Contre des légions elle aurait eu de la bravoure. Mais cette force plus pernicieuse que les glaives, et qu'on ne pouvait saisir, était stupéfiante ; et elle parcourait la terrasse, blémie par sa colère, manquant de mots pour exprimer ce qui l'étouffait.

Elle songeait aussi que le Tétrarque, cédant à l'opinion, s'aviserait peut-être de la répudier. Alors tout serait perdu ! Depuis son enfance, elle nourrissait le rêve d'un grand empire. C'était pour y atteindre que, délaissant son premier époux, elle s'était jointe à celui-là, qui l'avait dupée, pensait-elle.

— « J'ai pris un bon soutien, en entrant dans ta famille ! »

— « Elle vaut la tienne ! » dit simplement le Tétrarque.

Hérodiad sentit bouillonner dans ses veines le sang des prêtres et des rois ses aïeux.

— « Mais ton grand-père balayait le temple d'Ascalon ! Les autres étaient bergers, bandits, conducteurs de caravanes, une horde, tributaire de Juda depuis le roi David ! Tous mes ancêtres ont battu les tiens ! Le premier des Makkabi vous a chassés d'Hébron, Hyrcan forcés à vous circoncrire ! » Et, exhalant le mépris de la patricienne pour le plébéien, la haine de Jacob contre Édom, elle lui reprocha son indifférence aux outrages, sa mollesse envers les Pharisiens qui le trahissaient, sa lâcheté pour le peuple qui la détestait. « Tu es comme lui, avoue-le ! et tu regrettes la fille arabe qui danse autour des pierres. Reprends-la ! Va-t'en vivre avec elle, dans sa maison de toile ! dévore son pain cuit sous la cendre ! avale le lait caillé de ses brebis ! baise ses joues bleues ! et oublie-moi ! »

Le Tétrarque n'écoutait plus. Il regardait la plate-forme d'une maison, où il y avait une jeune fille, et une vieille femme tenant un parasol à manche de roseau, long comme la ligne d'un pêcheur. Au milieu du tapis, un grand panier de voyage restait ouvert. Des ceintures, des voiles, des pendeloques d'orfèvrerie en débordaient confusément. La jeune fille, par intervalles, se penchait vers ces choses, et les secouait à l'air. Elle était vêtue comme les Romaines, d'une tunique calamistrée avec un péplum à glands d'émeraude ; et des lanières bleues enfermaient sa chevelure, trop lourde, sans doute, car, de temps à autre, elle y portait la main. L'ombre du parasol se promenait au-dessus d'elle, en la cachant à demi. Antipas aperçut deux ou trois fois son col délicat, l'angle d'un oeil, le coin d'une petite bouche. Mais il voyait, des hanches à la nuque, toute sa taille qui s'inclinait pour se redresser d'une manière élastique. Il épiait le retour de ce mouvement, et sa respiration devenait plus forte ; des flammes s'allumaient dans ses yeux. Hérodias l'observait.

Il demanda : « — Qui est-ce ? »

Elle répondit n'en rien savoir, et s'en alla soudainement apaisée.

Le Tétrarque était attendu sous les portiques par des Galiléens, le maître des écritures, le chef des pâturages, l'administrateur des salines et un Juif de Babylone, commandant ses cavaliers. Tous le saluèrent d'une acclamation. Puis, il disparut vers les chambres intérieures.

Phanuel surgit à l'angle d'un couloir.

— « Ah ! encore ? Tu viens pour Iaokanann, sans doute ? »

— « Et pour toi ! j'ai à t'apprendre une chose considérable. »

Et, sans quitter Antipas, il pénétra, derrière lui, dans un appartement obscur.

Le jour tombait par un grillage, se développant tout du long sous la corniche. Les murailles étaient peintes d'une couleur grenat, presque noir. Dans le fond s'étalait un lit d'ébène, avec des sangles en peau de boeuf. Un bouclier d'or, au dessus, luisait comme un soleil.

Antipas traversa toute la salle, se coucha sur le lit.

Phanuel était debout. Il leva son bras, et dans une attitude inspirée :

— « Le Très-Haut envoie par moments un de ses fils. Iaokanann en est un. Si tu l'opprimes, tu seras châtié.

— « C'est lui qui me persécute ! » s'écria Antipas. « Il a voulu de moi une action impossible. Depuis ce temps-là, il me déchire. Et je n'étais pas dur, au commencement ! Il a même dépêché de Machaerous des hommes qui bouleversent mes provinces. Malheur à sa vie ! Puisqu'il m'attaque, je me défends !

— « Ses colères ont trop de violence, » répliqua Phanuel.
« N'importe ! Il faut le délivrer. »

— « On ne relâche pas les bêtes furieuses ! » dit le Tétrarque.

L'Essénien répondit :

— « Ne t'inquiète plus ! Il ira chez les Arabes, les Gaulois, les Scythes. Son oeuvre doit s'étendre jusqu'au bout de la terre ! » Antipas semblait perdu dans une vision.

— « Sa puissance est forte !... Malgré moi, je l'aime ! »

— « Alors, qu'il soit libre ? »

Le Tétrarque hocha la tête. Il craignait Hérodiade, Mannaï, et l'inconnu.

Phanuel tâcha de le persuader, en alléguant, pour garantie de ses projets, la soumission des Esséniens aux rois. On respectait ces hommes pauvres, indomptables par les supplices, vêtus de lin, et qui lisaient l'avenir dans les étoiles.

Antipas se rappela un mot de lui, tout à l'heure.

— « Quelle est cette chose, que tu m'annonçais comme importante ? »

Un nègre survint. Son corps était blanc de poussière. Il râlait et ne put que dire :

— « Vitellius ! »

— « Comment ? il arrive ? »

— « Je l'ai vu. Avant trois heures, il est ici ! »

Les portières des corridors furent agitées comme par le vent. Une rumeur emplit le château, un vacarme de gens qui couraient, de meubles qu'on traînait, d'argenteries s'écroulant ; et, du haut des tours, des buccins sonnaient, pour avertir les esclaves dispersés.

II

Les remparts étaient couverts de monde quand Vitellius entra dans la cour. Il s'appuyait sur le bras de son interprète, suivi d'une grande litière rouge ornée de panaches et de miroirs, ayant la toge, le laticlave, les brodequins d'un consul et des licteurs autour de sa personne.

Ils plantèrent contre la porte leurs douze faisceaux, des baguettes reliées par une courroie avec une hache dans le milieu. Alors, tous frémirent devant la majesté du peuple romain.

La litière, que huit hommes manoeuvraient, s'arrêta. Il en sortit un adolescent, le ventre gros, la face bourgeonnée, des perles le long des doigts. On lui offrit une coupe pleine de vin et d'aromates. Il la but, et en réclama une seconde.

Le Tétrarque était tombé aux genoux du Proconsul, chagrin, disait-il, de n'avoir pas connu plus tôt la faveur de sa présence. Autrement, il eût ordonné sur les routes tout ce qu'il fallait pour les Vitellius. Ils descendaient de la déesse Vitellia. Une voie, menant du Janicule à la mer, portait encore leur nom. Les questures, les consulats étaient innombrables dans la famille ; et quant à Lucius, maintenant son hôte, on devait le remercier comme vainqueur des Clites et père de ce jeune Aulus, qui semblait revenir dans son domaine, puisque l'Orient était la patrie des dieux. Ces hyperboles furent exprimées en latin. Vitellius les accepta impassiblement.

Il répondit que le grand Hérode suffisait à la gloire d'une nation. Les Athéniens lui avaient donné la surintendance des jeux Olympiques. Il avait bâti des temples en l'honneur d'Auguste, été patient, ingénieux, terrible, et fidèle toujours aux Césars.

Entre les colonnes à chapiteaux d'airain, on aperçut Hérodiade qui s'avancait d'un air d'impératrice, au milieu de femmes et d'eunuques tenant sur des plateaux de vermeil des parfums allumés.

Le Proconsul fit trois pas à sa rencontre ; et, l'ayant saluée d'une inclination de tête :

— « Quel bonheur ! » s'écria-t-elle, que désormais Agrippa, l'ennemi de Tibère, fût dans l'impossibilité de nuire !

Il ignorait l'événement, elle lui parut dangereuse ; et comme Antipas jurait qu'il ferait tout pour l'Empereur, Vitellius ajouta : — « Même au détriment des autres ? »

Il avait tiré des otages du roi des Parthes, et l'Empereur n'y songeait plus ; car Antipas, présent à la conférence, pour se faire valoir, en avait tout de suite expédié la nouvelle. De là, une haine profonde, et les retards à fournir des secours.

Le Tétrarque balbutia. Mais Aulus dit en riant :

— « Calme-toi, je te protège ! »

Le Proconsul feignit de n'avoir pas entendu. La fortune du père dépendait de la souillure du fils ; et cette fleur des fanges de Caprée lui procurait des bénéfices tellement considérables, qu'il l'entourait d'égards, tout en se méfiant, parce qu'elle était vénéneuse.

Un tumulte s'éleva sous la porte. On introduisait une file de mules blanches, montées par des personnages en costume de prêtres. C'étaient des Sadducéens et des Pharisiens, que la même ambition poussait à Machaerous, les premiers voulant obtenir la sacrificature, et les autres la conserver. Leurs visages étaient sombres, ceux des Pharisiens surtout, ennemis de Rome et du Tétrarque. Les pans de leur tunique les embarrassaient dans la cohue ; et leur tiare chancelait à leur front par-dessus des bandelettes de parchemin, où des écritures étaient tracées.

Presque en même temps, arrivèrent des soldats de l'avant-garde. Ils avaient mis leurs boucliers dans des sacs, par précaution contre la poussière ; et derrière eux était Marcellus, lieutenant du Proconsul, avec des publicains, serrant sous leurs aisselles des tablettes de bois.

Antipas nomma les principaux de son entourage : Tolmaï, Kanthera, Séhon, Ammonius d'Alexandrie, qui lui achetait de l'asphalte, Naâmann, capitaine de ses vélites, Iaçim le Babylonien.

Vitellius avait remarqué Mannaëï.

— « Celui-là, qu'est-ce donc ? »

Le Tétrarque fit comprendre, d'un geste, que c'était le bourreau.

Puis, il présenta les Sadducéens.

Jonathas, un petit homme libre d'allures et parlant grec, supplia le maître de les honorer d'une visite à Jérusalem. Il s'y rendrait probablement.

Éléazar, le nez crochu et la barbe longue, réclama pour les Pharisiens le manteau du grand prêtre détenu dans la tour Antonia par l'autorité civile.

Ensuite, les Galiléens dénoncèrent Ponce-Pilate. A l'occasion d'un fou qui cherchait les vases d'or de David dans une caverne, près de Samarie, il avait tué des habitants ; et tous parlaient à la fois, Mannaëï plus violemment que les autres. Vitellius affirma que les criminels seraient punis.

Des vociférations éclatèrent en face d'un portique, où les soldats avaient suspendu leurs boucliers. Les housses étant défaites, on voyait sur les umbo la figure de César. C'était pour les Juifs une idolâtrie. Antipas les harangua, pendant que Vitellius, dans la colonnade, sur un siège élevé, s'étonnait de leur fureur. Tibère avait eu raison d'en exiler quatre cents en Sardaigne. Mais chez eux ils étaient forts ; et il commanda de retirer les boucliers.

Alors, ils entourèrent le Proconsul, en implorant des réparations d'injustice, des privilèges, des aumônes. Les vêtements étaient déchirés, on s'écrasait ; et, pour faire de la place, des esclaves avec des bâtons frappaient de droite et de gauche. Les plus voisins de la porte descendirent sur le sentier, d'autres le montaient ; ils refluèrent ; deux courants se croisaient dans cette masse d'hommes qui oscillait, comprimée par l'enceinte des murs.

Vitellius demanda pourquoi tant de monde. Antipas en dit la cause : le festin de son anniversaire ; et il montra plusieurs de ses gens, qui, penchés sur les créneaux, halaient d'immenses corbeilles de viandes, de fruits, de légumes, des antilopes et des cigognes, de larges poissons couleur d'azur, des raisins, des pastèques, des grenades élevées en pyramides. Aulus n'y tint pas. Il se précipita vers les cuisines, emporté par cette goinfrie qui devait surprendre l'univers.

En passant près d'un caveau, il aperçut des marmites pareilles à des cuirasses. Vitellius vint les regarder ; et exigea qu'on lui ouvrît les chambres souterraines de la forteresse.

Elles étaient taillées dans le roc en hautes voûtes, avec des piliers de distance en distance. La première contenait de vieilles armures ; mais la seconde regorgeait de piques, et qui allongeaient toutes leurs pointes, émergeant d'un bouquet de plumes. La troisième semblait tapissée en nattes de roseaux, tant les flèches minces étaient perpendiculairement les unes à côté des autres. Des lames de cimenterres couvraient les parois de la quatrième. Au milieu de la cinquième, des rangs de casques faisaient, avec leurs crêtes, comme un bataillon de serpents rouges. On ne voyait dans la sixième que des carquois ; dans la septième, que des cnémides ; dans la huitième, que des brassards ; dans les suivantes, des fourches, des grappins, des échelles, des cordages, jusqu'à des mâts pour les catapultes, jusqu'à des grelots pour le poitrail des dromadaires ! et comme la montagne allait en s'élargissant vers sa base, évidée à l'intérieur telle qu'une ruche d'abeilles, au-dessous de ces chambres il y en avait de plus nombreuses, et d'encore plus profondes.

Vitellius, Phinéas son interprète, et Sisenna le chef des publicains, les parcouraient à la lumière des flambeaux, que portaient trois eunuques.

On distinguait dans l'ombre des choses hideuses inventées par les barbares ; casse-têtes garnis de clous, javelots empoisonnant les blessures, tenailles qui ressemblaient à des mâchoires de crocodiles ; enfin le Tétrarque possédait dans Machaerous des munitions de guerre pour quarante mille hommes.

Il les avait rassemblées en prévision d'une alliance de ses ennemis. Mais le Proconsul pouvait croire, ou dire, que c'était pour combattre les Romains, et il cherchait des explications.

Elles n'étaient pas à lui ; beaucoup servaient à se défendre des brigands ; d'ailleurs il en fallait contre les Arabes ; ou bien, tout cela avait appartenu à son père. Et, au lieu de marcher derrière le Proconsul, il allait devant, à pas rapides. Puis il se rangea le long du mur, qu'il masquait de sa toge, avec, ses deux coudes écartés ; mais le haut d'une porte dépassait sa tête. Vitellius la remarqua, et voulut savoir ce qu'elle enfermait.

Le Babylonien pouvait seul l'ouvrir.

— « Appelle le Babylonien ! »

On l'attendit.

Son père était venu des bords de l'Euphrate s'offrir au grand Hérode, avec cinq cents cavaliers, pour défendre les frontières orientales. Après le partage du royaume, Iaçim était demeuré chez Philippe, et maintenant servait Antipas.

Il se présenta, un arc sur l'épaule, un fouet à la main. Des cordons multicolores serraient étroitement ses jambes torsées. Ses gros bras sortaient d'une tunique sans manches, et un bonnet de fourrure ombrageait sa mine, dont la barbe était frisée en anneaux.

D'abord, il eut l'air de ne pas comprendre l'interprète. Mais Vitellius lança un coup d'oeil à Antipas, qui répéta tout de suite son commandement. Alors Iaçim appliqua ses deux mains contre la porte. Elle glissa dans le mur.

Un souffle d'air chaud s'exhala des ténèbres. Une allée descendait en tournant ; ils la prirent et arrivèrent au seuil d'une grotte, plus étendue que les autres souterrains.

Une arcade s'ouvrait au fond sur le précipice, qui de ce côté-là défendait la citadelle. Un chèvrefeuille, se cramponnant à la voûte, laissait retomber ses fleurs en pleine lumière. A ras du sol, un filet d'eau murmurait.

Des chevaux blancs étaient là, une centaine peut-être, et qui mangeaient de l'orge sur une planche au niveau de leur bouche. Ils avaient tous la crinière peinte en bleu, les sabots dans des mitaines de sparterie, et les poils d'entre les oreilles bouffant sur le frontal, comme une perruque. Avec leur queue très-longue, ils se battaient mollement les jarrets. Le Proconsul en resta muet d'admiration.

C'étaient de merveilleuses bêtes, souples comme des serpents, légères comme des oiseaux. Elles partaient avec la flèche du cavalier, renversaient les hommes en les mordant au ventre, se tiraient de l'embarras des rochers, sautaient par-dessus des abîmes, et pendant tout un jour continuaient dans les plaines leur galop frénétique ; un mot les arrêtait. Dès que Iaçim entra, elles vinrent à lui, comme des moutons quand paraît le berger ; et, avançant leur encolure, elles le regardaient inquiètes avec leurs yeux d'enfant. Par habitude, il lança du fond de sa gorge un cri rauque qui les mit en gaieté ; et elles se cabraient, affamées d'espace, demandant à courir.

Antipas, de peur que Vitellius ne les enlevât, les avait emprisonnées dans cet endroit, spécial pour les animaux, en cas de siège.

— « L'écurie est mauvaise, » dit le Proconsul, « et tu risques de les perdre ! Fais l'inventaire, Sisenna ! »

Le publicain retira une tablette de sa ceinture, compta les chevaux et les inscrivit.

Les agents des compagnies fiscales corrompaient les gouverneurs, pour piller les provinces. Celui-là flairait partout, avec sa mâchoire de fouine et ses paupières clignotantes.

Enfin, on remonta dans la cour.

Des rondelles de bronze au milieu des pavés, çà et là, couvraient les citernes. Il en observa une, plus grande que les autres, et qui n'avait pas sous les talons leur sonorité. Il les frappa toutes alternativement, puis hurla, en piétinant :

— « Je l'ai ! je l'ai ! C'est ici le trésor d'Hérode ! »

La recherche de ses trésors était une folie des Romains.

Ils n'existaient pas, jura le Tétrarque.

Cependant, qu'y avait-il là-dessous ?

— « Rien ! un homme, un prisonnier.

— « Montre-le ! » dit Vitellius.

Le Tétrarque n'obéit pas ; les Juifs auraient connu son secret. Sa répugnance à ouvrir la rondelle impatientait Vitellius.

— « Enfoncez-la ! » cria-t-il aux licteurs.

Mannaï avait deviné ce qui les occupait. Il crut, en voyant une hache, qu'on allait décapiter Iaokanann ; et il arrêta le licteur au premier coup sur la plaque, insinua entre elle et les pavés une manière de crochet, puis, roidissant ses longs bras maigres, la souleva doucement, elle s'abattit ; tous admirèrent la force de ce vieillard. Sous le couvercle doublé de bois, s'étendait une trappe de même dimension. D'un coup de poing, elle se replia en deux panneaux ; on vit alors un trou, une fosse énorme que contournait un escalier sans rampe ; et ceux qui se penchèrent sur le bord aperçurent au fond quelque chose de vague et d'effrayant.

Un être humain était couché par terre, sous de longs cheveux se confondant avec les poils de bête qui garnissaient son dos. Il se leva. Son front touchait à une grille horizontalement scellée ; et, de temps à autre, il disparaissait dans les profondeurs de son antre.

Le soleil faisait briller la pointe des tiaras, le pommeau des glaives, chauffait à outrance les dalles ; et des colombes, s'envolant des frises, tournoyaient au-dessus de la cour. C'était l'heure où Mannaï, ordinairement, leur jetait du grain. Il se tenait accroupi devant le Tétrarque, qui était debout près de Vitellius. Les Galiléens, les prêtres, les soldats, formaient un cercle par derrière ; tous se taisaient, dans l'angoisse de ce qui allait arriver.

Ce fut d'abord un grand soupir, poussé d'une voix caverneuse.

Hérodiadès l'entendit à l'autre bout du palais. Vaincue par une fascination, elle traversa la foule ; et elle écoutait, une main sur l'épaule de Mannaï, le corps incliné.

La voix s'éleva :

— « Malheur à vous, Pharisiens et Sadducéens, race de vipères, outres gonflées, cymbales retentissantes ! »

On avait reconnu Iaokanann. Son nom circulait. D'autres accoururent.

« Malheur à toi, ô peuple ! et aux traîtres de Juda, aux ivrognes d'Éphraïm, à ceux qui habitent la vallée grasse, et que les vapeurs du vin font chanceler !

« Qu'ils se dissipent comme l'eau qui s'écoule, comme la limace qui se fond en marchant, comme l'avorton d'une femme qui ne voit pas le soleil.

De quel conquérant parlait-il ? Était-ce de Vitellius ? Les Romains seuls pouvaient produire cette extermination. Des plaintes s'échappaient : — « Assez ! assez ! qu'il finisse ! »

Il continua, plus haut :

— « Auprès du cadavre de leurs mères, les petits enfants se traîneront sur les cendres. On ira, la nuit, chercher son pain à travers les décombres, au hasard des épées. Les chacals s'arracheront des ossements sur les places publiques, où le soir les vieillards causaient. Tes vierges, en avalant leurs pleurs, joueront de la cithare dans les festins de l'étranger, et tes fils les plus braves baisseront leur échine, écorchée par des fardeaux trop lourds ! »

Le peuple revoyait les jours de son exil, toutes les catastrophes de son histoire. C'étaient les paroles des anciens prophètes. Iaokanann les envoyait, comme de grands coups, l'une après l'autre.

Mais la voix se fit douce, harmonieuse, chantante. Il annonçait un affranchissement, des splendeurs au ciel, le nouveau-né un bras dans la caverne du dragon, l'or à la place de l'argile, le désert s'épanouissant comme une rose : — « Ce qui maintenant vaut soixante kiccars ne coûtera pas une obole. Des fontaines de lait jailliront des rochers ; on s'endormira dans les pressoirs le ventre plein ! Quand viendras-tu, toi que j'espère ? D'avance, tous les peuples s'agenouillent, et ta domination sera éternelle, Fils de David ! »

Le Tétrarque se rejeta en arrière, l'existence d'un Fils de David l'outrageant comme une menace.

Jaokanann l'invectiva pour sa royauté.

— « Il n'y a pas d'autre roi que l'Éternel ! » et pour ses jardins, pour ses statues, pour ses meubles d'ivoire, comme l'impie Achab !

Antipas brisa la cordelette du cachet suspendu à sa poitrine, et le lança dans la fosse, en lui commandant de se taire.

La voix répondit :

— « Je crierai comme un ours, comme un âne sauvage, comme une femme qui enfante !

« Le châtiment est déjà dans ton inceste, Dieu t'afflige de la stérilité du mulet ! »

Et des rires s'élevèrent, pareils au clapotement des flots.

Vitellius s'obstinait à rester. L'interprète, d'un ton impassible, redisait, dans la langue des Romains, toutes les injures que Jaokanann rugissait dans la sienne. Le Tétrarque et Hérodiad étaient forcés de les subir deux fois. Il haletait, pendant qu'elle observait béante le fond du puits.

L'homme effroyable se renversa la tête ; et, empoignant les barreaux, y colla son visage, qui avait l'air d'une broussaille, où étincelaient deux charbons :

— « Ah ! c'est toi, Iézabel !

« Tu as pris son coeur avec le craquement de ta chaussure. Tu hennissais comme une cavale. Tu as dressé ta couche sur les monts, pour accomplir tes sacrifices !

Elle chercha du regard une défense autour d'elle. Les Pharisiens baissaient hypocritement leurs yeux. Les Sadducéens tournaient la tête, craignant d'offenser le Proconsul. Antipas paraissait mourir.

La voix grossissait, se développait, roulait avec des déchirements de tonnerre, et, l'écho dans la montagne la répétant, elle foudroyait

Machaerous d'éclats multipliés.

— « Étale-toi dans la poussière, fille de Babylone ! Fais moudre la farine ! Ote ta ceinture, détache ton soulier, trousse-toi, passe les fleuves ! ta honte sera découverte, ton opprobre sera vu ! tes sanglots te briseront les dents ! L'Éternel exècre la puanteur de tes crimes ! Maudite ! maudite ! Crève comme une chienne ! »

La trappe se ferma, le couvercle se rabattit. Mannaëi voulait étrangler Iaokanann.

Hérodiad disparut. Les Pharisiens étaient scandalisés. Antipas, au milieu d'eux, se justifiait.

— « Sans doute, » reprit Éléazar, « il faut épouser la femme de son frère, mais Hérodiad n'était pas veuve, et de plus elle avait un enfant, ce qui constituait l'abomination. »

— « Erreur ! erreur ! » objecta le Sadducéen Jonathas. « La Loi condamne ces mariages, sans les proscrire absolument. »

— « N'importe ! On est pour moi bien injuste ! » disait Antipas, « car, enfin, Absalom a couché avec les femmes de son père, Juda avec sa bru, Ammon avec sa soeur, Lot avec ses filles. »

Aulus, qui venait de dormir, reparut à ce moment-là. Quand il fut instruit de l'affaire, il approuva le Tétrarque. On ne devait point se gêner pour de pareilles sottises ; et il riait beaucoup du blâme des prêtres, et de la fureur de Iaokanann.

Hérodiad, au milieu du perron, se retourna vers lui.

— « Tu as tort, mon maître ! Il ordonne au peuple de refuser l'impôt. »

— « Est-ce vrai ? » demanda tout de suite le Publicain.

Les réponses furent généralement affirmatives. Le Tétrarque les renforçait.

Vitellius songea que le prisonnier pouvait s'enfuir ; et comme la conduite d'Antipas lui semblait douteuse, il établit des sentinelles aux portes, le long des murs et dans la cour.

Ensuite, il alla vers son appartement. Les députations des prêtres l'accompagnèrent.

Sans aborder la question de la sacrificature, chacune émettait ses griefs.

Tous l'obsédaient. Il les congédia.

Jonathas le quittait, quand il aperçut, dans un créneau, Antipas causant avec un homme à longs cheveux et en robe blanche, un Essénien ; et il regretta de l'avoir soutenu.

Une réflexion avait consolé le Tétrarque. Iaokanann ne dépendait plus de lui ; les Romains s'en chargeaient. Quel soulagement ! Phanuel se promenait alors sur le chemin de ronde.

Il l'appela, et, désignant les soldats :

— « Ils sont les plus forts ! je ne peux le délivrer ! ce n'est pas ma faute ! »

La cour était vide. Les esclaves se reposaient. Sur la rougeur du ciel, qui enflammait l'horizon, les moindres objets perpendiculaires se détachaient en noir. Antipas distingua les salines à l'autre bout de la mer Morte, et ne voyait plus les tentes des Arabes. Sans doute ils étaient partis ? La lune se levait ; un apaisement descendait dans son cœur.

Phanuel, accablé, restait le menton sur la poitrine. Enfin, il révéla ce qu'il avait à dire.

Depuis le commencement du mois, il étudiait le ciel avant l'aube, la constellation de Persée se trouvant au zénith. Agalah se montrait à peine, Algol brillait moins, Mira-Coeti avait disparu ; d'où il augurait la mort d'un homme considérable, cette nuit même, dans Machaërous.

Lequel ? Vitellius était trop bien entouré. On n'exécuterait pas Iaokanann. « C'est donc moi ! » pensa le Tétrarque.

Peut-être que les Arabes allaient revenir ? Le Proconsul découvrirait ses relations avec les Parthes ! Des sicaires de Jérusalem escortaient les prêtres ; ils avaient sous leurs vêtements des poignards ; et le Tétrarque ne doutait pas de la science de Phanuel.

Il eut l'idée de recourir à Hérodiade. Il la haïssait pourtant. Mais elle lui donnerait du courage ; et tous les liens n'étaient pas rompus de l'ensorcellement qu'il avait autrefois subi.

Quand il entra dans sa chambre, du cinnamome fumait sur une vasque de porphyre ; et des poudres, des onguents, des étoffes pareilles à des nuages, des broderies plus légères que des plumes, étaient dispersées.

Il ne dit pas la prédiction de Phanuel, ni sa peur des Juifs et des Arabes ; elle l'eût accusé d'être lâche. Il parla seulement des Romains ; Vitellius ne lui avait rien confié de ses projets militaires. Il le supposait ami de Caïus, que fréquentait Agrippa ; et il serait envoyé en exil, ou peut-être on l'égorgerait.

Hérodiad, avec une indulgence d'indifférence, tâcha de le rassurer. Enfin, elle tira d'un petit coffre une médaille bizarre, ornée du profil de Tibère. Cela suffisait à faire pâlir les licteurs et fondre les accusations.

Antipas, ému de reconnaissance, lui demanda comment elle l'avait.

— « On me l'a donnée, » reprit-elle.

Sous une portière en face, un bras nu s'avança, un bras jeune, charmant et comme tourné dans l'ivoire par Polyclète. D'une façon un peu gauche, et cependant gracieuse, il ramait dans l'air, pour saisir une tunique oubliée sur une escabelle près de la muraille.

Une vieille femme la passa doucement, en écartant le rideau.

Le Tétrarque eut un souvenir, qu'il ne pouvait préciser.

— « Cette esclave est-elle à toi ? »

— « Que t'importe ? » répondit Hérodiad.

III

Les convives emplissaient la salle du festin.

Elle avait trois nefs, comme une basilique, et que séparaient des colonnes en bois d'alumim, avec des chapiteaux de bronze couverts de sculptures. Deux galeries à claire-voie s'appuyaient dessus ; et une troisième en filigrane d'or se bombait au fond, vis-à-vis d'un cintre énorme, qui s'ouvrait à l'autre bout.

Des candélabres, brûlant sur les tables alignées dans toute la longueur du vaisseau, faisaient des buissons de feux, entre les coupes de terre peinte et les plats de cuivre, les cubes de neige, les monceaux de raisin ; mais ces clartés rouges se perdaient progressivement, à cause de la hauteur du plafond, et des points lumineux brillaient, comme des étoiles, la nuit, à travers des branches. Par l'ouverture de la grande baie, on apercevait des flambeaux sur les terrasses des maisons ; car Antipas fêtait ses amis, son peuple, et tous ceux qui s'étaient présentés.

Des esclaves, alertes comme des chiens et les orteils dans des sandales de feutre, circulaient, en portant des plateaux.

La table proconsulaire occupait, sous la tribune dorée, une estrade en planches de sycomore. Des tapis de Babylone l'enfermaient dans une espèce de pavillon.

Trois lits d'ivoire, un en face et deux sur les flancs, contenaient Vitellius, son fils et Antipas ; le Proconsul étant près de la porte, à gauche, Aulus à droite, le Tétrarque au milieu.

Il avait un lourd manteau noir, dont la trame disparaissait sous des applications de couleur, du fard aux pommettes, la barbe en éventail, et de la poudre d'azur dans ses cheveux, serrés par un diadème de pierreries. Vitellius gardait son baudrier de pourpre, qui descendait en diagonale sur une toge de lin. Aulus s'était fait nouer dans le dos les manches de sa robe en soie violette, lamée d'argent. Les boudins de sa chevelure formaient des étages, et un collier de saphirs étincelait à sa poitrine, grasse et blanche comme celle d'une femme. Près de lui, sur une natte et jambes croisées, se tenait un enfant très-beau, qui souriait toujours. Il l'avait vu dans les cuisines, ne pouvait plus s'en passer, et, ayant peine à retenir son nom chaldéen, l'appelait simplement : « l'Asiatique. » De temps à autre, il s'étalait sur le triclinium. Alors, ses pieds nus dominaient l'assemblée.

De ce côté-là, il y avait les prêtres et les officiers d'Antipas, des habitants de Jérusalem, les principaux des villes grecques ; et, sous le Proconsul : Marcellus avec les publicains, des amis du Tétrarque, les personnages de Kana, Ptolémaïde, Jéricho ; puis, pêle-mêle, des montagnards du Liban, et les vieux soldats d'Hérode : douze Thraces, un Gaulois, deux Germains, des chasseurs de gazelles, des pâtres de l'Idumée, le sultan de Palmyre, des marins d'Éziongaber. Chacun avait devant soi une galette de pâte molle, pour s'essuyer les doigts ; et les bras, s'allongeant comme des cous de vautour, prenaient des olives, des pistaches, des amandes. Toutes les figures étaient joyeuses, sous des couronnes de fleurs.

Les Pharisiens les avaient repoussées comme indécence romaine. Ils frissonnèrent quand on les aspergea de galbanum et d'encens, composition réservée aux usages du Temple.

Aulus en frotta son aisselle ; et Antipas lui en promit tout un chargement, avec trois couffes de ce véritable baume, qui avait fait convoiter la Palestine à Cléopâtre.

Un capitaine de sa garnison de Tibériade, survenu tout à l'heure, s'était placé derrière lui, pour l'entretenir d'événements extraordinaires. Mais son attention était partagée entre le Proconsul et ce qu'on disait aux tables voisines.

On y causait de Iaokanann et des gens de son espèce ; Simon de Gittoï lavait les péchés avec du feu. Un certain Jésus...

— « Le pire de tous, » s'écria Éléazar. « Quel infâme bateleur ! »

Derrière le Tétrarque, un homme se leva, pâle comme la bordure de sa chlamyde. Il descendit l'estrade, et, interpellant les Pharisiens :

— « Mensonge ! Jésus fait des miracles ! »

Antipas désirait en voir.

— « Tu aurais dû l'amener ! Renseigne-nous ! »

Alors il conta que lui, Jacob, ayant une fille malade, s'était rendu à Capharnaüm, pour supplier le Maître de vouloir la guérir. Le Maître avait répondu : « Retourne chez toi, elle est guérie ! » Et il l'avait trouvée sur le seuil, étant sortie de sa couche quand le gnomon du palais marquait la troisième heure, l'instant même où il abordait Jésus.

Certainement, objectèrent les Pharisiens, il existait des pratiques, des herbes puissantes ! Ici même, à Machaerous, quelquefois on trouvait le baaras qui rend invulnérable ; mais guérir sans voir ni toucher était une chose impossible, à moins que Jésus n'employât les démons.

Et les amis d'Antipas, les principaux de la Galilée, reprirent, en hochant la tête :

— « Les démons, évidemment. »

Jacob, debout entre leur table et celle des prêtres, se taisait d'une manière hautaine et douce.

Ils le sommaient de parler : — « Justifie son pouvoir ! »

Il courba les épaules, et à voix basse, lentement, comme effrayé de lui-même :

— « Vous ne savez donc pas que c'est le Messie ? »

Tous les prêtres se regardèrent ; et Vitellius demanda l'explication du mot. Son interprète fut une minute avant de répondre.

Ils appelaient ainsi un libérateur qui leur apporterait la jouissance de tous les biens et la domination de tous les peuples. Quelques-uns même soutenaient qu'il fallait compter sur deux. Le premier serait vaincu par Gog et Magog, des démons du Nord ; mais l'autre exterminerait le Prince du Mal ; et, depuis des siècles, ils l'attendaient à chaque minute.

Les prêtres s'étant concertés, Éléazar prit la parole.

D'abord le Messie serait enfant de David, et non d'un charpentier ; il confirmerait la Loi. Ce Nazaréen l'attaquait ; et, argument plus fort, il devait être précédé de la venue d'Élie.

Jacob répliqua :

« Mais il est venu, Élie !

— « Élie ! Élie ! » répéta la foule, jusqu'à l'autre bout de la salle.

Tous, par l'imagination, apercevaient un vieillard sous un vol de corbeaux, la foudre allumant un autel, des pontifes idolâtres jetés aux torrents ; et les femmes, dans les tribunes, songeaient à la veuve de Sarepta.

Jacob s'épuisait à redire qu'il le connaissait ! Il l'avait vu ! et le peuple aussi !

— « Son nom ? »

Alors, il cria de toutes ses forces :

— « Iaokanann ! »

Antipas se renversa comme frappé en pleine poitrine. Les Sadducéens avaient bondi sur Jacob. Éléazar pérorait, pour se faire écouter.

Quand le silence fut établi, il drapa son manteau, et comme un juge posa des questions.

— « Puisque le prophète est mort... »

Des murmures l'interrompirent. On croyait Élie disparu seulement.

Il s'emporta contre la foule, et, continuant son enquête :

— « Tu penses qu'il est ressuscité ?

— « Pourquoi pas ? » dit Jacob.

Les Sadducéens haussèrent les épaules ; Jonathas, écarquillant ses petits yeux, s'efforçait de rire comme un bouffon. Rien de plus sot que la prétention du corps à la vie éternelle ; et il déclama, pour le Proconsul, ce vers d'un poète contemporain :

Nec crescit, nec post mortem durare videtur.

Mais Aulus était penché au bord du triclinium, le front en sueur, le visage vert, les poings sur l'estomac.

Les Sadducéens feignirent un grand émoi ; — le lendemain, la sacrificature leur fut rendue ; — Antipas étalait du désespoir ; Vitellius demeurait impassible. Ses angoisses étaient pourtant violentes ; avec son fils il perdait sa fortune.

Aulus n'avait pas fini de se faire vomir, qu'il voulut remanger.

— « Qu'on me donne de la râpure de marbre, du schiste de Naxos, de l'eau de mer, n'importe quoi ! Si je prenais un bain ? »

Il croqua de la neige, puis, ayant balancé entre une terrine de

Commagène et des merles roses, se décida pour des courges au miel. L'Asiatique le contemplait, cette faculté d'engloutissement dénotant un être prodigieux et d'une race supérieure.

On servit des rognons de taureau, des loirs, des rossignols, des hachis dans des feuilles de pampre ; et les prêtres discutaient sur la résurrection. Ammonius, élève de Philon le Platonicien, les jugeait stupides, et le disait à des Grecs qui se moquaient des oracles. Marcellus et Jacob s'étaient joints. Le premier narrait au second le bonheur qu'il avait ressenti sous le baptême de Mithra, et Jacob l'engageait à suivre Jésus. Les vins de palme et de tamaris, ceux de Safet et de Byblos, coulaient des amphores dans les cratères, des cratères dans les coupes, des coupes dans les gosiers ; on bavardait, les coeurs s'épanchaient. Iaçim, bien que Juif, ne cachait plus son adoration des planètes. Un marchand d'Aphaka ébahissait des nomades, en détaillant les merveilles du temple d'Hiéropolis ; et ils demandaient combien coûterait le pèlerinage. D'autres tenaient à leur religion natale. Un Germain presque aveugle chantait un hymne célébrant ce promontoire de la Scandinavie, où les dieux apparaissent avec les rayons de leurs figures ; et des gens de Sichem ne mangèrent pas de tourterelles, par déférence pour la colombe Azima.

Plusieurs causaient debout, au milieu de la salle ; et la vapeur des haleines avec les fumées des candélabres faisait un brouillard dans l'air. Phanuel passa le long des murs.

Il venait encore d'étudier le firmament, mais n'avancait pas jusqu'au Tétrarque, redoutant les taches d'huile qui, pour les Esséniens, étaient une grande souillure.

Des coups retentirent contre la porte du château.

On savait maintenant que Iaokanann s'y trouvait détenu. Des hommes avec des torches grimpaient le sentier ; une masse noire fourmillait dans le ravin ; et ils hurlaient de temps à autre : —

« Iaokanann ! Iaokanann ! »

— « Il dérange tout ! » dit Jonathas.

— « On n'aura plus d'argent, s'il continue ! » ajoutèrent les Pharisiens.

Et des récriminations portaient :

— « Protège-nous !

— « Qu'on en finisse !

— « Tu abandonnes la religion !

— « Impie comme les Hérode !

— « Moins que vous ! » répliqua Antipas. « C'est mon père qui a édifié votre temple ! »

Alors les Pharisiens, les fils des proscrits, les partisans des Matathias, accusèrent le Tétrarque des crimes de sa famille.

Ils avaient des crânes pointus, la barbe hérissée, des mains faibles et méchantes, ou la face camuse, de gros yeux ronds, l'air de bouledogues. Une douzaine, scribes et valets des prêtres, nourris par le rebut des holocaustes, s'élancèrent jusqu'au bas de l'estrade ; et avec des couteaux ils menaçaient Antipas, qui les haranguait pendant que les Sadducéens le défendaient mollement. Il aperçut Mannaï, et lui fit signe de s'en aller, Vitellius indiquant par sa contenance que ces choses ne le regardaient pas.

Les Pharisiens, restés sur leur triclinium, se mirent dans une fureur démoniaque. Ils brisèrent les plats devant eux. On leur avait servi le ragoût chéri de Mécène : de l'âne sauvage, une viande immonde.

Aulus les railla à propos de la tête d'âne, qu'ils honoraient, disait-on, et débita d'autres sarcasmes sur leur antipathie du pourceau. C'était sans doute parce que cette grosse bête avait tué leur Bacchus ; et ils aimaient trop le vin, puisqu'on avait découvert dans le Temple une vigne d'or.

Les prêtres ne comprenaient pas ses paroles. Phinée, Galiléen d'origine, refusa de les traduire. Alors sa colère fut démesurée, d'autant plus que l'Asiatique, pris de peur, avait disparu ; et le repas lui déplaisait, les mets étant vulgaires point déguisés suffisamment ! Il se calma, en voyant des queues de brebis syriennes, qui sont des paquets de graisse.

Le caractère des Juifs semblait hideux à Vitellius. Leur dieu pouvait bien être Moloch, dont il avait rencontré des autels sur la route ; et les sacrifices d'enfants lui revinrent à l'esprit, avec l'histoire de l'homme qu'ils engraisaient mystérieusement. Son cœur de Latin était soulevé de dégoût par leur intolérance, leur rage iconoclaste, leur achoppement de brute. Le Proconsul voulait partir. Aulus s'y refusa.

La robe abaissée jusqu'aux hanches, il gisait derrière un monceau de victuailles, trop repu pour en prendre, mais s'obstinant à ne point les quitter.

L'exaltation du peuple grandit. Ils s'abandonnèrent à des projets d'indépendance. On rappelait la gloire d'Israël. Tous les conquérants avaient été châtiés : Antigone, Crassus, Varus...

— « Misérables ! » dit le Proconsul ; car il entendait le syriaque. Son interprète ne servait qu'à lui donner du loisir pour répondre.

Antipas, bien vite, tira la médaille de l'Empereur, et, l'observant avec tremblement il la présentait du côté de l'image.

Les panneaux de la tribune d'or se déployèrent tout à coup ; et à la splendeur des cierges, entre ses esclaves et des festons d'anémones, Hérodiad apparut, — coiffée d'une mitre assyrienne qu'une mentonnière attachait à son front ; ses cheveux en spirales s'épandaient sur un péplos d'écarlate, fendu dans la longueur des manches. Deux monstres en pierre, pareils à ceux du trésor des Atrides se dressant contre la porte, elle ressemblait à Cybèle accotée de ses lions ; et du haut de la balustrade qui dominait Antipas, avec une patère à la main, elle cria :

— « Longue vie à César ! »

Cet hommage fut répété par Vitellius, Antipas et les prêtres.

Mais il arriva du fond de la salle un bourdonnement de surprise et d'admiration. Une jeune fille venait d'entrer.

Sous un voile bleuâtre lui cachant la poitrine et la tête, on distinguait les arcs de ses yeux, les calcédoines de ses oreilles, la blancheur de sa peau. Un carré de soie gorge-de-pigeon, en couvrant les épaules, tenait aux reins par une ceinture d'orfèvrerie. Ses caleçons noirs étaient semés de mandragores, et d'une manière indolente elle faisait claquer de petites pantoufles en duvet de colibri.

Sur le haut de l'estrade, elle retira son voile. C'était Hérodiad, comme autrefois dans sa jeunesse. Puis elle se mit à danser.

Ses pieds passaient l'un devant l'autre, au rythme de la flûte et d'une paire de crotales. Ses bras arrondis appelaient quelqu'un, qui s'enfuyait toujours. Elle le poursuivait, plus légère qu'un papillon, comme une Psyché curieuse, comme une âme vagabonde et semblait prête à s'envoler.

Les sons funèbres de la gingras remplacèrent les crotales. L'accablement avait suivi l'espoir. Ses attitudes exprimaient des soupirs, et toute sa personne une telle langueur qu'on ne savait pas si elle pleurait un dieu, ou se mourait dans sa caresse. Les paupières entre-closes, elle se tordait la taille, balançait son ventre avec des ondulations de houle, faisait trembler ses deux seins, et son visage demeurait immobile, et ses pieds n'arrêtaient pas.

Vitellius la compara à Mnester, le pantomime. Aulus vomissait encore. Le Tétrarque se perdait dans un rêve, et ne songeait plus à Hérodiad. Il crut la voir près des Sadducéens. La vision s'éloigna.

Ce n'était pas une vision. Elle avait fait instruire, loin de Machaerous, Salomé sa fille, que le Tétrarque aimerait ; et l'idée était bonne. Elle en était sûre, maintenant.

Puis ce fut l'emportement de l'amour qui veut être assouvi. Elle dansa comme les prêtresses des Indes, comme les Nubiennes des cataractes, comme les Bacchantes de Lydie. Elle se renversait de tous les côtés, pareille à une fleur que la tempête agite. Les brillants de ses oreilles sautaient, l'étoffe de son dos chatoyait ; de ses bras, de ses pieds, de ses vêtements jaillissaient d'invisibles étincelles qui enflammaient les hommes. Une harpe chanta ; la multitude y répondit par des acclamations. Sans fléchir ses genoux en écartant les jambes, elle se courba si bien que son menton frôlait le plancher ; et les nomades habitués à l'abstinence, les soldats de Rome experts en débauches, les avars publicains, les vieux prêtres aigris par les disputes, tous, dilatant leurs narines, palpitaient de convoitise.

Ensuite elle tourna autour de la table d'Antipas, frénétiquement, comme le rhombe des sorcières ; et d'une voix que des sanglots de volupté entrecoupaient, il lui disait — « Viens ! viens ! » — Elle tournait toujours ; les tympanons sonnaient à éclater, la foule hurlait. Mais le Tétrarque criait plus fort « Viens ! viens ! Tu auras Capharnaüm ! la plaine de Tibérias ! mes citadelles ! la moitié de mon royaume ! »

Elle se jeta sur les mains, les talons en l'air, parcourut ainsi l'estrade comme un grand scarabée ; et s'arrêta brusquement.

Sa nuque et ses vertèbres faisaient un angle droit. Les fourreaux de couleur qui enveloppaient ses jambes, lui passant par-dessus l'épaule, comme des arcs-en-ciel, accompagnaient sa figure, à une coudée du sol. Ses lèvres étaient peintes, ses sourcils très noirs, ses yeux presque terribles, et des gouttelettes à son front semblaient une vapeur sur du marbre blanc.

Elle ne parlait pas. Ils se regardaient.

Un claquement de doigts se fit dans la tribune. Elle y monta, reparut ; et, en zézayant un peu, prononça ces mots, d'un air enfantin.

— « Je veux que tu me donnes dans un plat... la tête... » Elle avait oublié le nom, mais reprit en souriant : « La tête de Iaokanann ! »

Le Tétrarque s'affaissa sur lui-même, écrasé.

Il était contraint par sa parole, et le peuple attendait. Mais la mort qu'on lui avait prédite, en s'appliquant à un autre, peut-être détournerait la sienne ? Si Iaokanann était véritablement Elie, il pourrait s'y soustraire ; s'il ne l'était pas, le meurtre n'avait plus d'importance.

Mannaëi était à ses côtés, et comprit son intention.

Vitellius le rappela pour lui confier le mot d'ordre des sentinelles gardant la fosse.

Ce fut un soulagement. Dans une minute, tout serait fini !

Cependant, Mannaëi n'était guère prompt en besogne.

Il rentra, mais bouleversé.

Depuis quarante ans il exerçait la fonction de bourreau. C'était lui qui avait noyé Aristobule, étranglé Alexandre, brûlé vif Matathias, décapité Zosime, Pappus, Joseph et Antipater, et il n'osait tuer Iaokanann ! Ses dents claquaient, tout son corps tremblait.

Il avait aperçu devant la fosse le Grand Ange des Samaritains, tout couvert d'yeux et brandissant un immense glaive, rouge et dentelé comme une flamme. Deux soldats amenés en témoignage pouvaient le dire.

Ils n'avaient rien vu, sauf un capitaine juif, qui s'était précipité sur eux et qui n'existait plus.

La fureur d'Hérodiade dégorgea en un torrent d'injures populacières et sanglantes. Elle se cassa les ongles au grillage de la tribune, et les deux lions sculptés semblaient mordre ses épaules et rugir comme elle.

Antipas l'imita, les prêtres, les soldats, les Pharisiens, tous réclamant une vengeance, et les autres, indignés qu'on retardât leur plaisir.

Mannaëi sortit, en se cachant la face.

Les convives trouvèrent le temps encore plus long que la première fois. On s'ennuyait.

Tout à coup, un bruit de pas se répercuta dans les couloirs. Le malaise devenait intolérable.

La tête entra ; — et Mannaëi la tenait par les cheveux, au bout de son bras, fier des applaudissements.

Quand il l'eut mise sur un plat, il l'offrit à Salomé.

Elle monta lestement dans la tribune : plusieurs minutes après, la tête fut rapportée par cette vieille femme que le Tétrarque avait distinguée le matin sur la plate-forme d'une maison, et tantôt dans la chambre d'Hérodiad.

Il se reculait pour ne pas la voir. Vitellius y jeta un regard indifférent.

Mannaëi descendit l'estrade, et l'exhiba aux capitaines romains, puis à tous ceux qui mangeaient de ce côté.

Ils l'examinèrent.

La lame aiguë de l'instrument, glissant du haut en bas, avait entamé la mâchoire. Une convulsion tirait les coins de la bouche. Du sang, caillé déjà, parsemait la barbe. Les paupières closes étaient blêmes comme des coquilles ; et des candélabres à l'entour envoyaient des rayons.

Elle arriva à la table des prêtres. Un Pharisien la retourna curieusement ; et Mannaëi, l'ayant remise d'aplomb, la posa devant Aulus, qui en fut réveillé. Par l'ouverture de leurs cils, les prunelles mortes et les prunelles éteintes semblaient se dire quelque chose.

Ensuite Mannaëi la présenta à Antipas. Des pleurs coulèrent sur les joues du Tétrarque.

Les flambeaux s'éteignaient. Les convives partirent ; et il ne resta plus dans la salle qu'Antipas, les mains contre ses tempes, et regardant toujours la tête coupée, tandis que Phanuel, debout au milieu de la grande nef, murmurait des prières, les bras étendus.

A l'instant où se levait le Soleil, deux hommes, expédiés autrefois par Iaokanann, survinrent, avec la réponse si longtemps espérée.

Ils la confièrent à Phanuel, qui en eut un ravissement.

Puis il leur montra l'objet lugubre, sur le plateau, entre les débris du festin. Un des hommes lui dit :

— « Console-toi ! il est descendu chez les morts annoncer le Christ ! »

L'Essénien comprenait maintenant ces paroles : « Pour qu'il croisse, il faut que je diminue. »

Et tous les trois, ayant pris la tête de Iaokanann, s'en allèrent du côté de la Galilée.

Comme elle était très lourde, ils la portaient alternativement.

“Many words for few things!”

“Death ends all; judgment comes to all.”

[This work may be called a prose poem. It is impregnated with the spirit of romanticism, which at the time of writing had a temporary but powerful hold on the mind of Gustave Flaubert.]

DEATH SPEAKS

At night, in winter, when the snow-flakes fall slowly from heaven like great white tears, I raise my voice; its resonance thrills the cypress trees and makes them bud anew.

I pause an instant in my swift course over earth; throw myself down among cold tombs; and, while dark-plumaged birds rise suddenly in terror from my side, while the dead slumber peacefully, while cypress branches droop low o’er my head, while all around me weeps or lies in deep repose, my burning eyes rest on the great white clouds, gigantic winding-sheets, unrolling their slow length across the face of heaven.

How many nights, and years, and ages have I journeyed thus! A witness of the universal birth and of a like decay; Innumerable are the generations I have garnered with my scythe. Like God, I am eternal! The nurse of Earth, I cradle it each night upon a bed both soft and warm. The same recurring feasts; the same unending toil! Each morning I depart, each evening I return, bearing within my mantle’s ample folds all that my scythe has gathered. And then I scatter them to the four winds of Heaven!

* * * * *

When the high billows run, when the heavens weep, and shrieking winds lash ocean into madness, then in the turmoil and the tumult do I fling myself upon the surging waves, and lo! the tempest softly cradles me, as in her hammock sways a queen. The foaming waters cool my weary feet, burning from bathing in the falling tears of countless generations that have clung to them in vain endeavour to arrest my steps.

Then, when the storm has ceased, after its roar has calmed me like a lullaby, I bow my head: the hurricane, raging in fury but a moment earlier dies instantly. No longer does it live, but neither do the men, the ships, the navies that lately sailed upon the bosom of the waters.

‘Mid all that I have seen and known, — peoples and thrones, loves, glories, sorrows, virtues — what have I ever loved? Nothing — except the mantling shroud that covers me!

My horse! ah, yes! my horse! I love thee too! How thou rushest o’er the world! thy hoofs of steel resounding on the heads bruised by thy speeding feet. Thy tail is straight and crisp, thine eyes dart flames, the mane upon thy neck flies in the wind, as on we dash upon our maddened course. Never art thou weary! Never do we rest! Never do we sleep! Thy neighing portends war; thy smoking nostrils spread a pestilence that, mist-like, hovers over earth. Where’er my arrows fly, thou overturnest pyramids and empires, trampling crowns beneath thy hoofs; All men respect thee; nay, adore thee! To invoke thy favour, popes offer thee their triple crowns, and kings their sceptres; peoples, their secret sorrows; poets, their renown. All cringe and kneel before thee, yet thou rushest on over their prostrate forms.

Ah, noble steed! Sole gift from heaven! Thy tendons are of iron, thy head is of bronze. Thou canst pursue thy course for centuries as swiftly as if borne up by eagle’s wings; and when, once in a thousand years, resistless hunger comes, thy food is human flesh, thy drink, men’s tears. My steed! I love thee as Pale Death alone can love!

* * * * *

Ah! I have lived so long! How many things I know! How many mysteries of the universe are shut within my breast!

Sometimes, after I have hurled a myriad of darts, and, after coursing o’er the world on my pale horse, have gathered many lives, a weariness assails me, and I long to rest.

But on my work must go; my path I must pursue; it leads through infinite space and all the worlds. I sweep away men's plans together with their triumphs, their loves together with their crimes, their very all.

I rend my winding-sheet; a frightful craving tortures me incessantly, as if some serpent stung continually within.

I throw a backward glance, and see the smoke of fiery ruins left behind; the darkness of the night; the agony of the world. I see the graves that are the work of these, my hands; I see the background of the past — 'tis nothingness! My weary body, heavy head, and tired feet, sink, seeking rest. My eyes turn towards a glowing horizon, boundless, immense, seeming to grow increasingly in height and depth. I shall devour it, as I have devoured all else.

When, O God! shall I sleep in my turn? When wilt Thou cease creating? When may I, digging my own grave, stretch myself out within my tomb, and, swinging thus upon the world, list the last breath, the death-gasp, of expiring nature?

When that time comes, away my darts and shroud I'll hurl. Then shall I free my horse, and he shall graze upon the grass that grows upon the Pyramids, sleep in the palaces of emperors, drink the last drop of water from the sea, and snuff the odour of the last slow drop of blood! By day, by night, through the countless ages, he shall roam through fields eternal as the fancy takes him; shall leap with one great bound from Atlas to the Himalayas; shall course, in his insolent pride, from heaven to earth; disport himself by caracoling in the dust of crumbled empires; shall speed across the beds of dried-up oceans; shall bound o'er ruins of enormous cities; inhale the void with swelling chest, and roll and stretch at ease.

Then haply, faithful one, weary as I, thou finally shalt seek some precipice from which to cast thyself; shalt halt, panting before the mysterious ocean of infinity; and then, with foaming mouth, dilated nostrils, and extended neck turned towards the horizon, thou shalt, as I, pray for eternal sleep; for repose for thy fiery feet; for a bed of green leaves, whereon reclining thou canst close thy burning eyes forever. There, waiting motionless upon the brink, thou shalt desire a power stronger than thyself to kill thee at a single blow — shalt pray for union with the dying storm, the faded flower, the shrunken corpse. Thou shalt seek sleep, because eternal life is torture, and the tomb is peace.

Why are we here? What hurricane has hurled us into this abyss? What tempest soon shall bear us away towards the forgotten planets whence we came?

Till then, my glorious steed, thou shalt run thy course; thou mayst please thine ear with the crunching of the heads crushed under thy feet. Thy course is long, but courage! Long time hast thou carried me: but longer time still must elapse, and yet we shall not age.

Stars may be quenched, the mountains crumble, the earth finally wear away its diamond axis; but we two, we alone are immortal, for the impalpable lives forever!

But to-day them canst lie at my feet, and polish thy teeth against the moss-grown tombs, for Satan has abandoned me, and a power unknown compels me to obey his will. Lo! the dead seek to rise from their graves.

* * * * *

Satan, I love thee! Thou alone canst comprehend my joys and my deliriums. But, more fortunate than I, thou wilt some day, when earth shall be no more, recline and sleep within the realms of space.

But I, who have lived so long, have worked so ceaselessly, with only virtuous loves and solemn thoughts, — I must endure immortality. Man has his tomb, and glory its oblivion; the day dies into night but I — !

And I am doomed to lasting solitude upon my way, strewn with the bones of men and marked by ruins. Angels have fellow-angels; demons their companions of darkness; but I hear only sounds of a clanking scythe, my whistling arrows, and my speeding horse. Always the echo of the surging billows that sweep over and engulf mankind!

SATAN.

Dost thou complain, — thou, the most fortunate creature under heaven? The only, splendid, great, unchangeable, eternal one — like God, who is the only Being that equals thee! Dost thou repine, who some day in thy turn shalt disappear forever, after thou hast crushed the universe beneath thy horse's feet?

When God's work of creating has ceased; when the heavens have disappeared and the stars are quenched; when spirits rise from their retreats and wander in the depths with sighs and groans; then, what unpicturable delight for thee! Then shalt thou sit on the eternal thrones of heaven and of hell — shalt overthrow the planets, stars, and worlds — shalt loose thy steed in fields of emeralds and diamonds — shalt make his litter of the wings torn from the angels, — shalt cover him with the robe of righteousness! Thy saddle shall be brodered with the stars of the empyrean, — and then thou wilt destroy it! After thou hast annihilated everything, — when naught remains but empty space, — thy coffin shattered and thine arrows broken, then make thyself a crown of stone from heaven's highest mount, and cast thyself into the abyss of oblivion. Thy fall may last a million aeons, but thou shalt die at last. Because the world must end; all, all must die, — except Satan! Immortal more than God! I live to bring chaos into other worlds!

DEATH.

But thou hast not, as I, this vista of eternal nothingness before thee; thou dost not suffer with this death-like cold, as I.

SATAN.

Nay, but I quiver under fierce and unrelaxing hearts of molten lava, which burn the doomed and which e'en I cannot escape.

For thou, at least, hast only to destroy. But I bring birth and I give life. I direct empires and govern the affairs of States and of hearts.

I must be everywhere. The precious metals flow, the diamonds glitter, and men's names resound at my command. I whisper in the ears of women, of poets, and of statesmen, words of love, of glory, of ambition. With Messalina and Nero, at Paris and at Babylon, within the self-same moment do I dwell. Let a new island be discovered, I fly to it ere man can set foot there; though it be but a rock encircled by the sea, I am there in advance of men who will dispute for its possession. I lounge, at the same instant, on a courtesan's couch and on the perfumed beds of emperors. Hatred and envy, pride and wrath, pour from my lips in simultaneous utterance. By night and day I work. While men ate burning Christians, I luxuriate voluptuously in baths perfumed with roses; I race in chariots; yield to deep despair; or boast aloud in pride.

At times I have believed that I embodied the whole world, and all that I have seen took place, in verity, within my being.

Sometimes I weary, lose my reason, and indulge in such mad follies that the most worthless of my minions ridicule me while they pity me.

No creature cares for me; nowhere am I loved, — neither in heaven, of which I am a son, nor yet in hell, where I am lord, nor upon earth, where men deem me a god. Naught do I see but paroxysms of rage, rivers of blood, or maddened frenzy. Ne'er shall my eyelids close in slumber, never my spirit find repose, whilst thou, at least, canst rest thy head upon the cool, green freshness of the grave. Yea, I must ever dwell amid the glare of palaces, must listen to the curses of the starving, or inhale the stench of crimes that cry aloud to heaven.

God, whom I hate, has punished me indeed! But my soul is greater even than His wrath; in one deep sigh I could the whole world draw into my breast, where it would burn eternally, even as I.

When, Lord, shall thy great trumpet sound? Then a great harmony shall hover over sea and hill. Ah! would that I could suffer with humanity; their cries and sobs should drown the sound of mine!

[Innumerable skeletons, riding in chariots, advance at a rapid pace, with cries of joy and triumph. They drag broken branches and crowns of laurel, from which the dried and yellow leaves fall continually in the wind and the dust.]

Lo, a triumphal throng from Rome, the Eternal City! Her Coliseum and her Capitol are now two grains of sands that served once as a pedestal; but Death has swung his scythe: the monuments have fallen. Behold! At their head comes Nero, pride of my heart, the greatest poet earth has known!

[Nero advances in a chariot drawn by twelve skeleton horses. With the sceptre in his hand, he strikes the bony backs of his steeds. He stands erect, his shroud flapping behind him in billowy folds. He turns, as if upon a racecourse; his eyes are flaming and he cries loudly:]

NERO.

Quick! Quick! And faster still, until your feet dash fire from the flinty stones and your nostrils fleck your breasts with foam. What! do not the wheels smoke yet? Hear ye the fanfares, whose sound reached even to Ostia; the clapping of the hands, the cries of joy? See how the populace shower saffron on my head! See how my pathway is already damp with sprayed perfume! My chariot whirls on; the pace is swifter than the wind as I shake the golden reins! Faster and faster! The dust clouds rise; my mantle floats upon the breeze, which in my ears sings “Triumph! triumph!” Faster and faster! Harken to the shouts of joy, list to the stamping feet and the plaudits of the multitude. Jupiter himself looks down on us from heaven. Faster! yea, faster still!

[Nero’s chariot now seems to be drawn by demons: a black cloud of dust and smoke envelops him; in his erratic course he crashes into tombs, and the re-awakened corpses are crushed under the wheels of the chariot, which now turns, comes forward, and stops.]

NERO.

Now, let six hundred of my women dance the Grecian Dances silently before me, the while I lave myself with roses in a bath of porphyry. Then let them circle me, with interlacing arms, that I may see on all sides alabaster forms in graceful evolution, swaying like tall reeds bending over an amorous pool.

And I will give the empire and the sea, the Senate, the Olympus, the Capitol, to her who shall embrace me the most ardently; to her whose heart shall throb beneath my own; to her who shall enmesh me in her flowing hair, smile on me sweetest, and enfold me in the warmest clasp; to her who soothing me with songs of love shall waken me to joy and heights of rapture! Rome shall be still this night; no barque shall cleave the waters of the Tiber, since ‘tis my wish to see the mirrored moon on its untroubled face and hear the voice of woman floating over it. Let perfumed breezes pass through all my draperies! Ah, I would die, voluptuously intoxicated.

Then, while I eat of some rare meat, that only I may taste, let some one sing, while damsels, lightly draped, serve me from plates of gold and watch my rest. One slave shall cut her sister’s throat, because it is my pleasure — a favourite with the gods — to mingle the perfume of blood with that of food, and cries of victims soothe my nerves.

This night I shall burn Rome. The flames shall light up heaven, and Tiber shall roll in waves of fire!

Then, I shall build of aloes wood a stage to float upon the Italian sea, and the Roman populace shall throng thereto chanting my praise. Its draperies shall be of purple, and on it I shall have a bed of eagles’ plumage. There I shall sit, and at my side shall be the loveliest woman in the empire, while all the universe applauds the achievements of a god! And though the tempest roar round me, its rage shall be extinguished ‘neath my feet, and sounds of music shall o’ercome the clamor of the waves!

* * * * *

What didst thou say? Vindex revolts, my legions fly, my women flee in terror? Silence and tears alone remain, and I hear naught but the rolling of thunder. Must I die, now?

DEATH.

Instantly!

NERO.

Must I give up my days of feasting and delight, my spectacles, my triumphs, my chariots and the applause of multitudes?

DEATH.

All! All!

SATAN.

Haste, Master of the World! One comes — One who will put thee to the sword. An emperor knows how to die!

NERO.

Die! I have scarce begun to live! Oh, what great deeds I should accomplish — deeds that should make Olympus tremble! I would fill up the bed of hoary ocean and speed across it in a triumphal car. I would still live — would see the sun once more, the Tiber, the Campagna, the Circus on the golden sands. Ah! let me live!

DEATH.

I will give thee a mantle for the tomb, and an eternal bed that shall be softer and more peaceful than the Imperial couch.

NERO.

Yet, I am loth to die.

DEATH.

Die, then!

[He gathers up the shroud, lying beside him on the ground, and bears away Nero — wrapped in its folds.]

NOVEMBRE

A Fantastic Trifle

I.

ANON, in desperation, devoured by burning passions, the wine of life pulsating madly in my veins, and frenzied by the sweet, the secret mysteries of love, sighing after magnificent but vanished dreams, tempted by the voluptuous aspirations of an ardent mind, seeking to comprehend all poetry, all harmony and art, yet staggering 'neath the crushing weight of a heavy heart and an unbounded pride, I fell bewildered into grief's abyss, the rushing blood suffused my face, my veins throbbed, and my bosom swelled with sighs. I saw no more; I felt no more; I was intoxicated, mad. Illusion made me great and told me I contained supreme within myself an incarnation which, revealed, would dazzle men; and even assumed my very dreams to be the emanations of the god that dwelt within me.

To this self-deification all the hours of youth were given. I dreamed my body was a fane in which to worship the divine. The shrine is empty; nettles spring between the stones; its columns now have crumbled, and in its desolation owls have made their nests.

At last no longer did I fret away my life; existence now consumed me. My dreams fatigued me more than the severest labour; a whole creation, immobile, unknown, even to itself, formed a secret undercurrent of the life within me. My soul was chaos, wherein whirled a thousand impulses that knew not how to manifest themselves, yet always sought new ways to mould themselves into some powerful force.

The varying phases of my character were akin to Indian jungles where nature palpitates in every growth, monstrous or adorable, wherever revealed by the sun. A jungle where the air is filled at once with perfumes and with poisons; where tigers bound and through the shadows elephants pace proudly on, like living black pagodas; where sinuous serpents glide through bamboo thickets and mysterious and misshapen gods hide in hollow caverns among heaps of gold. Through this strange region runs a broad stream, where yawning crocodiles at gruesome play disport themselves and drag their scales among the lotus flowers growing near the banks, and over flowery islets often strewn with rotting corpses of the victims of the plague.

Nevertheless, I loved my life, but asked that it expand and radiate. I loved it in the enjoyment of mad gallops on a fiery steed; I loved it in the scintillation of the stars, and in the lulling movement of the waves. I loved it in the throbbing of those fair, smooth bosoms, palpitating under amorous eyes; in the vibrations of the violins; in quivering oak-leaves; in the setting sun, gilding the window panes, and bringing dreams of terraced balconies in Babylon, whereon queens leaned fair arms and gazed out upon Asia.

II.

It rained. I listened to the sound of falling drops and to the breathing of my Marie sleeping.

The candles, nigh exhausted, flickered in their crystal sconces. Dawn now appeared, a yellow line that crept along the horizon's rim, then swiftly upward spread, growing each instant more like glints of golden wine. It threw faint light into the room, tinting the shadows with its purple hues, and mingling in the mirror with the rays of the dying lights.

And Marie lay supine, — parts of her body in the light and others in the shade. Her attitude was careless; her head lay lower than her breast; the right arm, with a bracelet on drooped o'er the side of the bed and almost touched the floor. On the small table near her stood a vase containing violets. I reached out, took the flowers, and broke the cord that tied them; then inhaled their fragrance. They were a little withered; perhaps the room was warm, or possibly some time had fled since they were plucked. I found their odour exquisitely sweet and penetrating. I drank their fragrance, one by one, and as they still were damp, I laid them on my aching eyelids, for my blood was burning and my weary limbs recoiled from touch of draperies as if from fire.

Then, not knowing what to do, not wishing to awaken Marie — for it gave me a strange joy to watch her slumbering — I laid the violets softly, one by one, upon her round, white throat, until they covered it. Somehow, the fading blossoms, under which she slept, brought Marie's self to mind. Like them, in spite of vanished youth — perhaps because of it — she seemed to shed a keener, more provocative aroma. The sorrows she had tasted lent her mouth a certain bitterness, not without beauty, which remained upon her lips even while she slept. There were two wrinkles on her neck, which day no doubt would hide beneath her hair. Gazing upon this girl, so sad amid caresses, whose very claspings had in them a kind of melancholy joy, I knew that myriad passions must have seared her past, consuming her like levin-belts.

Just then she shivered slightly; all the violets dropped from her fair throat. She smiled, with half-closed eyes; clasping her arms around my neck she pressed upon my lips a long, long kiss of morning greeting, like the kiss of an awakening dove.

THE TEMPTATION OF SAINT ANTOINE

Translated by M. Walter Dunne

Finally published in 1874, this is a prose poem that Flaubert spent almost his whole life working on. It concerns the famous temptation faced by Saint Anthony the Great in the Egyptian desert, a theme often repeated in medieval and modern art. Written in the form of a play script, it details one night in the life of Anthony the Great, when the saint is faced with great temptations.

CHAPTER I.

A Holy Saint.

IT is in the Thebaïd, on the heights of a mountain, where a platform, shaped like a crescent, is surrounded by huge stones.

The Hermit's cell occupies the background. It is built of mud and reeds, flat-roofed and doorless. Inside are seen a pitcher and a loaf of black bread; in the centre, on a wooden support, a large book; on the ground, here and there, bits of rush-work, a mat or two, a basket and a knife.

Some ten paces or so from the cell a tall cross is planted in the ground; and, at the other end of the platform, a gnarled old palm-tree leans over the abyss, for the side of the mountain is scarped; and at the bottom of the cliff the Nile swells, as it were, into a lake.

To right and left, the view is bounded by the enclosing rocks; but, on the side of the desert, immense undulations of a yellowish ash-colour rise, one above and one beyond the other, like the lines of a sea-coast; while, far off, beyond the sands, the mountains of the Libyan range form a wall of chalk-like whiteness faintly shaded with violet haze. In front, the sun is going down. Towards the north, the sky has a pearl-grey tint; while, at the zenith, purple clouds, like the tufts of a gigantic mane, stretch over the blue vault. These purple streaks grow browner; the patches of blue assume the paleness of mother-of-pearl. The bushes, the pebbles, the earth, now wear the hard colour of bronze, and through space floats a golden dust so fine that it is scarcely distinguishable from the vibrations of light.

Saint Antony, who has a long beard, unshorn locks, and a tunic of goatskin, is seated, cross-legged, engaged in making mats. No sooner has the sun disappeared than he heaves a deep sigh, and gazing towards the horizon:

“Another day! Another day gone! I was not so miserable in former times as I am now! Before the night was over, I used to begin my prayers; then I would go down to the river to fetch water, and would reascend the rough mountain pathway, singing a hymn, with the water-bottle on my shoulder. After that, I used to amuse myself by arranging everything in my cell. I used to take up my tools, and examine the mats, to see whether they were evenly cut, and the baskets, to see whether they were light; for it seemed to me then that even my most trifling acts were duties which I performed with ease. At regulated hours I left off my work and prayed, with my two arms extended. I felt as if a fountain of mercy were flowing from Heaven above into my heart. But now it is dried up. Why is this? ...”

He proceeds slowly into the rocky enclosure.

“When I left home, everyone found fault with me. My mother sank into a dying state; my sister, from a distance, made signs to me to come back; and the other one wept, Ammonaria, that child whom I used to meet every evening, beside the cistern, as she was leading away her cattle. She ran after me. The rings on her feet glittered in the dust, and her tunic, open at the hips, fluttered in the wind. The old ascetic who hurried me from the spot addressed her, as we fled, in loud and menacing tones. Then our two camels kept galloping continuously, till at length every familiar object had vanished from my sight.

“At first, I selected for my abode the tomb of one of the Pharaohs. But some enchantment surrounds those subterranean palaces, amid whose gloom the air is stifled with the decayed odour of aromatics. From the depths of the sarcophagi I heard a mournful voice arise, that called me by name — or rather, as it seemed to me, all the fearful pictures on the walls started into hideous life. Then I fled to the borders of the Red Sea into a citadel in ruins. There I had for companions the scorpions that crawled amongst the stones, and, overhead, the eagles who were continually whirling across the azure sky. At night, I was torn by talons, bitten by beaks, or brushed with light wings; and horrible demons, yelling in my ears, hurled me to the earth. At last, the drivers of a caravan, which was journeying towards Alexandria, rescued me, and carried me along with them.

“After this, I became a pupil of the venerable Didymus. Though he was blind, no one equalled him in knowledge of the Scriptures. When our lesson was ended, he used to take my arm, and, with my aid, ascend the Panium, from whose summit could be seen the Pharos and the open sea. Then we would return home, passing along the quays, where we brushed against men of every nation, including the Cimmerians, clad in bearskin, and the Gymnosophists of the Ganges, who smear their bodies with cow-dung. There were continual conflicts in the streets, some of which were caused by the Jews' refusal to pay taxes, and others by the attempts of the seditious to drive out the Romans. Besides, the city is filled with heretics, the followers of Manes, of Valentinus, of Basilides, and of Arius, all of them eagerly striving to discuss with you points of doctrine and to convert you to their views.

"Their discourses sometimes come back to my memory; and, though I try not to dwell upon them, they haunt my thoughts.

"I next took refuge in Colzin, and, when I had undergone a severe penance, I no longer feared the wrath of God. Many persons gathered around me, offering to become anchorites. I imposed on them a rule of life in antagonism to the vagaries of Gnosticism and the sophistries of the philosophers. Communications now reached me from every quarter, and people came a great distance to see me.

"Meanwhile, the populace continued to torture the confessors; and I was led back to Alexandria by an ardent thirst for martyrdom. I found on my arrival that the persecution had ceased three days before. Just as I was returning, my path was blocked by a great crowd in front of the Temple of Serapis. I was told that the Governor was about to make one final example. In the centre of the portico, in the broad light of day, a naked woman was fastened to a pillar, while two soldiers were scourging her. At each stroke her entire frame writhed. Suddenly, she cast a wild look around, her trembling lips parted; and, above the heads of the multitude, her figure wrapped, as it were, in her flowing hair, methought I recognised Ammonaria. ... Yet this one was taller — and beautiful, exceedingly!"

He draws his hand across his brow.

"No! no! I must not think upon it!

"On another occasion, Athanasius asked me to assist him against the Arians. At that time, they had confined themselves to attacking him with invectives and ridicule. Since then, however, he has been calumniated, deprived of his see, and banished. Where is he now? I know not! People concern themselves so little about bringing me any news! All my disciples have abandoned me, Hilarion like the rest.

“He was, perhaps, fifteen years of age when he came to me, and his mind was so much filled with curiosity that every moment he was asking me questions. Then he would listen with a pensive air; and, without a murmur, he would run to fetch whatever I wanted — more nimble than a kid, and gay enough, moreover, to make even a patriarch laugh. He was a son to me!”

The sky is red; the earth completely dark. Agitated by the wind, clouds of sand rise, like winding-sheets, and then fall again. All at once, in a clear space in the heavens, a flock of birds flits by, forming a kind of triangular battalion, resembling a piece of metal with its edges alone vibrating.

Antony glances at them.

“Ah! how I should like to follow them! How often, too, have I not wistfully gazed at the long boats with their sails resembling wings, especially when they bore away those who had been my guests! What happy times I used to have with them! What outpourings! None of them interested me more than Ammon. He described to me his journey to Rome, the Catacombs, the Coliseum, the piety of illustrious women, and a thousand other things. And yet I was unwilling to go away with him! How came I to be so obstinate in clinging to this solitary life? It might have been better for me had I stayed with the monks of Nitria when they besought me to do so. They occupy separate cells, and yet communicate with one another. On Sunday the trumpet calls them to the church, where you may see three whips hung up, which are reserved for the punishment of thieves and intruders, for they maintain very severe discipline.

“Nevertheless, they do not stand in need of gifts, for the faithful bring them eggs, fruit, and even instruments for removing thorns from their feet. There are vineyards around Pisperi, and those of Pabenum have a raft, in which they go forth to seek provisions.

“But I should have served my brethren more effectually by being a simple priest. I might succour the poor, administer the sacraments, and guard the purity of domestic life. Besides, all the laity are not lost, and there was nothing to prevent me from being, for example, a grammarian or a philosopher. I should have had in my room a sphere made of reeds, tablets always in my hand, young people around me, and a crown of laurel suspended as an emblem over my door.

“But there is too much pride in such triumphs! Better be a soldier. I was strong and courageous enough to manage engines of war, to traverse gloomy forests, or, with helmet on head, to enter smoking cities. More than this, there would be nothing to hinder me from purchasing with my earnings the office of toll-keeper of some bridge, and travellers would relate to me their histories, pointing out to me heaps of curious objects which they had stowed away in their baggage.

“On festival days the merchants of Alexandria sail along the Canopic branch of the Nile and drink wine from cups of lotus, to the sound of tambourines, which make all the taverns near the river shake. Beyond, trees, cut cone-fashion, protect the peaceful farmsteads against the south wind. The roof of each house rests on slender columns running close to one another, like the framework of a lattice, and, through these spaces, the owner, stretched on a long seat, can gaze out upon his grounds and watch his servants thrashing corn or gathering in the vintage, and the cattle trampling on the straw. His children play along the grass; his wife bends forward to kiss him.”

Through the deepening shadows of the night pointed snouts reveal themselves here and there with ears erect and glittering eyes. Antony advances towards them. Scattering the wind in their wild rush, the animals take flight. It was a troop of jackals.

One of them remains behind, and, resting on two paws, with his body bent and his head on one side, he places himself in an attitude of defiance.

“How pretty he looks! I should like to pass my hand softly over his back.”

Antony whistles to make him come near. The jackal disappears.

“Ah! he is gone to join his fellows. Oh! this solitude! this weariness!”

Laughing bitterly:

He stamps his foot, and makes his way through the rocks with rapid step, then stops, out of breath, bursts into sobs, and flings himself upon the ground.

The night is calm; millions of stars are trembling in the sky. No sound is heard save the chattering of the tarantula.

The two arms of the cross cast a shadow on the sand. Antony, who is weeping, perceives it.

“Am I so weak, my God? Courage! Let us arise!”

He enters his cell, finds there the embers of a fire, lights a torch, and places it on the wooden stand, so as to illumine the big book.

“Suppose I take — the ‘Acts of the Apostles’ — yes, no matter where!

“He saw the sky opened with a great linen sheet which was let down by its four corners, wherein were all kinds of terrestrial animals and wild beasts, reptiles and birds. And a voice said to him: Arise, Peter! Kill and eat!”

“So, then, the Lord wished that His apostle should eat every kind of food? ... whilst I ...”

Antony lets his chin sink on his breast. The rustling of the pages, which the wind scatters, causes him to lift his head, and he reads:

“The Jews slew all their enemies with swords, and made a great carnage of them, so that they disposed at will of those whom they hated.”

“There follows the enumeration of the people slain by them — seventy-five thousand. They had endured so much! Besides, their enemies were the enemies of the true God. And how they must have enjoyed their vengeance, completely slaughtering the idolaters! No doubt the city was gorged with the dead! They must have been at the garden gates, on the staircases, and packed so closely together in the various rooms that the doors could not be closed! But here am I plunging into thoughts of murder and bloodshed!”

He opens the book at another passage.

“Nebuchadnezzar prostrated himself with his face on the ground and adored Daniel.”

“Ah! that is good! The Most High exalts His prophets above kings. This monarch spent his life in feasting, always intoxicated with sensuality and pride. But God, to punish him, changed him into a beast, and he walked on four paws!”

Antony begins to laugh; and, while stretching out his arms, disarranges the leaves of the book with the tips of his fingers. Then his eyes fall on these words:

“Ezechias felt great joy in coming to them. He showed them his perfumes, his gold and silver, all his aromatics, his sweet-smelling oils, all his precious vases, and the things that were in his treasures.”

“I can imagine how they beheld, heaped up to the very ceiling, gems, diamonds, darics. A man who possesses such an accumulation of these things is not the same as others. While handling them, he assumes that he holds the result of innumerable exertions, and that he has absorbed, and can again diffuse, the very life of the people. This is a useful precaution for kings. The wisest of them all was not wanting in it. His fleets brought him ivory — and apes. Where is this? It is — — ”

He rapidly turns over the leaves.

“Ah! this is the place:

“The Queen of Sheba, being aware of the glory of Solomon, came to tempt him, propounding enigmas.”

“How did she hope to tempt him? The Devil was very desirous to tempt Jesus. But Jesus triumphed because He was God, and Solomon owing, perhaps, to his magical science. It is sublime, this science; for — as a philosopher has explained to me — the world forms a whole, all whose parts have an influence on one another, like the different organs of a single body. It is interesting to understand the affinities and antipathies implanted in everything by Nature, and then to put them into play. In this way one might be able to modify laws that appear to be unchangeable.”

At this point the two shadows traced behind him by the arms of the cross project themselves in front of him. They form, as it were, two great horns. Antony exclaims:

“Help, my God!”

The shadows resume their former position.

“Ah! it was an illusion — nothing more. It is useless for me to torment my soul, I have no need to do so — absolutely no need!”

He sits down and crosses his arms.

“And yet methought I felt the approach ... But why should he come? Besides, do I not know his artifices? I have repelled the monstrous anchorite who, with a laugh, offered me little hot loaves; the centaur who tried to take me on his back; and that vision of a beautiful dusky maid amid the sands, which revealed itself to me as the spirit of voluptuousness.”

Antony walks up and down rapidly.

“It is by my direction that all these holy retreats have been built, full of monks wearing hair-cloths beneath their goatskins, and numerous enough to furnish forth an army. I have healed diseases at a distance. I have banished demons. I have waded through the river in the midst of crocodiles. The Emperor Constantine has written me three letters; and Balacius, who treated with contempt the letter I sent him, has been torn by his own horses. The people of Alexandria, whenever I reappeared amongst them, fought to get a glimpse of me; and Athanasius was my guide when I took my departure. But what toils, too, I have had to undergo! Here, for more than thirty years, have I been constantly groaning in the desert! I have carried on my loins eighty pounds of bronze, like Eusebius; I have exposed my body to the stings of insects, like Macarius; I have remained fifty-three nights without closing an eye, like Pachomius; and those who are decapitated, torn with pincers, or burnt, possess less virtue, perhaps, inasmuch as my life is a continual martyrdom!”

Antony slackens his pace.

“Certainly there is no one who undergoes so much mortification. Charitable hearts are growing fewer, and people never give me anything now. My cloak is worn out, and I have no sandals, nor even a porringer; for I gave all my goods and chattels to the poor and my own family, without keeping a single obolus for myself. Should I not need a little money to get the tools that are indispensable for my work? Oh! not much — a little sum! ... I would husband it.

“The Fathers of Nicæa were ranged in purple robes on thrones along the wall, like the Magi; and they were entertained at a banquet, while honours were heaped upon them, especially on Paphnutius, merely because he has lost an eye and is lame since Dioclesian’s persecution! Many a time the Emperor has kissed his injured eye. What folly! Moreover, the Council had such worthless members! Theophilus, a bishop of Scythia; John, another, in Persia; Spiridion, a cattle-drover. Alexander was too old. Athanasius ought to have made himself more agreeable to the Arians in order to get concessions from them!

“How is it they dealt with me? They would not even give me a hearing! He who spoke against me — a tall young man with a curling beard — coolly launched out captious objections; and while I was trying to find words to reply to him, they kept looking at me with malignant glances, barking at me like hyenas. Ah! if I could only get them all sent into exile by the Emperor, or rather smite them, crush them, behold them suffering. I have much to suffer myself!”

He sinks swooning against the wall of his cell.

“This is what it is to have fasted overmuch! My strength is going. If I had eaten, only once, a morsel of meat!”

He half-closes his eyes languidly.

“Ah! for some red flesh ... a bunch of grapes to nibble, some curds that would quiver on a plate!

“But what ails me now? What ails me now? I feel my heart dilating like the sea when it swells before the storm. An overwhelming weakness bows me down, and the warm atmosphere seems to waft towards me the odour of hair. Still, there is no trace of a woman here.”

He turns towards the little pathway amid the rocks.

“This is the way they come, poised in their litters on the black arms of eunuchs. They descend, and, joining together their hands, laden with rings, they kneel down. They tell me their troubles. The need of a superhuman voluptuousness tortures them. They would like to die; in their dreams they have seen gods who called them by name; and the edges of their robes fall round my feet. I repel them. ‘Oh! no,’ they say to me, ‘not yet! What must I do?’ Any penance will appear easy to them. They ask me for the most severe: to share in my own, to live with me.

“It is a long time now since I have seen any of them! Perhaps, though, this is what is about to happen? And why not? If suddenly I were to hear the mule-bells ringing in the mountains. It seems to me ...”

Antony climbs upon a rock, at the entrance of the path, and bends forward, darting his eyes into the darkness.

“Yes! down there, at the very end, there is a moving mass, like people who are trying to pick their way. Here it is! They are making a mistake.”

Calling out:

“On this side! Come! Come!”

The echo repeats:

“Come! Come!”

He lets his arms fall down, quite dazed.

“What a shame! Ah! poor Antony!”

And immediately he hears a whisper:

“Poor Antony.”

“Is that anyone? Answer!”

It is the wind passing through the spaces between the rocks that causes these intonations, and in their confused sonorities he distinguishes voices, as if the air were speaking. They are low and insinuating, a kind of sibilant utterance:

The first — “Do you wish for women?”

The second — “Nay; rather great piles of money.”

The third — “A shining sword.”

The others — “All the people admire you.”

“Go to sleep.”

“You will cut their throats. Yes! you will cut their throats.”

At the same time, visible objects undergo a transformation. On the edge of the cliff, the old palm-tree, with its cluster of yellow leaves, becomes the torso of a woman leaning over the abyss, and poised by her mass of hair.

Antony re-enters his cell, and the stool which sustains the big book, with its pages filled with black letters, seems to him a bush covered with swallows.

“Without doubt, it is the torch that is making this play of light. Let us put it out!”

He puts it out, and finds himself in profound darkness.

And, suddenly, through the midst of the air, passes first, a pool of water, then a prostitute, the corner of a temple, a figure of a soldier, and a chariot with two white horses prancing.

These images make their appearance abruptly, in successive shocks, standing out from the darkness like pictures of scarlet above a background of ebony.

Their motion becomes more rapid; they pass in a dizzy fashion. At other times they stop, and, growing pale by degrees, dissolve — or, rather, they fly away, and instantly others arrive in their stead.

Antony droops his eyelids.

They multiply, surround, besiege him. An unspeakable terror seizes hold of him, and he no longer has any sensation but that of a burning contraction in the epigastrium. In spite of the confusion of his brain, he is conscious of a tremendous silence which separates him from all the world. He tries to speak; impossible! It is as if the link that bound him to existence was snapped; and, making no further resistance, Antony falls upon the mat.

CHAPTER II.

The Temptation of Love and Power.

THEN, a great shadow — more subtle than an ordinary shadow, from whose borders other shadows hang in festoons — traces itself upon the ground.

It is the Devil, resting against the roof of the cell and carrying under his wings — like a gigantic bat that is suckling its young — the Seven Deadly Sins, whose grinning heads disclose themselves confusedly.

Antony, his eyes still closed, remains languidly passive, and stretches his limbs upon the mat, which seems to him to grow softer every moment, until it swells out and becomes a bed; then the bed becomes a shallop, with water rippling against its sides.

To right and left rise up two necks of black soil that tower above the cultivated plains, with a sycamore here and there. A noise of bells, drums, and singers resounds at a distance. These are caused by people who are going down from Canopus to sleep at the Temple of Serapis. Antony is aware of this, and he glides, driven by the wind, between the two banks of the canal. The leaves of the papyrus and the red blossoms of the water-lilies, larger than a man, bend over him. He lies extended at the bottom of the vessel. An oar from behind drags through the water. From time to time rises a hot breath of air that shakes the thin reeds. The murmur of the tiny waves grows fainter. A drowsiness takes possession of him. He dreams that he is an Egyptian Solitary.

Then he starts up all of a sudden.

“Have I been dreaming? It was so pleasant that I doubted its reality. My tongue is burning! I am thirsty!”

He enters his cell and searches about everywhere at random.

“The ground is wet! Has it been raining? Stop! Scraps of food! My pitcher broken! But the water-bottle?”

He finds it.

“Empty, completely empty! In order to get down to the river, I should need three hours at least, and the night is so dark I could not see well enough to find my way there. My entrails are writhing. Where is the bread?"

After searching for some time he picks up a crust smaller than an egg.

"How is this? The jackals must have taken it, curse them!"

And he flings the bread furiously upon the ground.

This movement is scarcely completed when a table presents itself to view, covered with all kinds of dainties. The table-cloth of byssus, striated like the fillets of sphinxes, seems to unfold itself in luminous undulations. Upon it there are enormous quarters of flesh-meat, huge fishes, birds with their feathers, quadrupeds with their hair, fruits with an almost natural colouring; and pieces of white ice and flagons of violet crystal shed glowing reflections. In the middle of the table Antony observes a wild boar smoking from all its pores, its paws beneath its belly, its eyes half-closed — and the idea of being able to eat this formidable animal rejoices his heart exceedingly. Then, there are things he had never seen before — black hashes, jellies of the colour of gold, ragoûts, in which mushrooms float like water-lilies on the surface of a pool, whipped creams, so light that they resemble clouds.

And the aroma of all this brings to him the odour of the ocean, the coolness of fountains, the mighty perfume of woods. He dilates his nostrils as much as possible; he drivels, saying to himself that there is enough there to last for a year, for ten years, for his whole life!

In proportion as he fixes his wide-opened eyes upon the dishes, others accumulate, forming a pyramid, whose angles turn downwards. The wines begin to flow, the fishes to palpitate; the blood in the dishes bubbles up; the pulp of the fruits draws nearer, like amorous lips; and the table rises to his breast, to his very chin — with only one seat and one cover, which are exactly in front of him.

He is about to seize the loaf of bread. Other loaves make their appearance.

"For me! ... all! but — — "

Antony draws back.

"In the place of the one which was there, here are others! It is a miracle, then, exactly like that the Lord performed! ... With what object? Nay, all the rest of it is not less incomprehensible! Ah! demon, begone! begone!"

He gives a kick to the table. It disappears.

“Nothing more? No!”

He draws a long breath.

“Ah! the temptation was strong. But what an escape I have had!”

He raises up his head, and stumbles against an object which emits a sound.

“What can this be?”

Antony stoops down.

“Hold! A cup! Someone must have lost it while travelling — nothing extraordinary! — --”

He wets his finger and rubs.

“It glitters! Precious metal! However, I cannot distinguish — — ”

He lights his torch and examines the cup.

“It is made of silver, adorned with ovolos at its rim, with a medal at the bottom.”

He makes the medal resound with a touch of his finger-nail.

“It is a piece of money which is worth from seven to eight drachmas — not more. No matter! I can easily with that sum get myself a sheepskin.”

The torch’s reflection lights up the cup.

“It is not possible! Gold! yes, all gold!”

He finds another piece, larger than the first, at the bottom, and, underneath that many others.

“Why, here’s a sum large enough to buy three cows — a little field!”

The cup is now filled with gold pieces.

“Come, then! a hundred slaves, soldiers, a heap wherewith to buy — — ”

Here the granulations of the cup’s rim, detaching themselves, form a pearl necklace.

“With this jewel here, one might even win the Emperor’s wife!”

With a shake Antony makes the necklace slip over his wrist. He holds the cup in his left hand, and with his right arm raises the torch to shed more light upon it. Like water trickling down from a basin, it pours itself out in continuous waves, so as to make a hillock on the sand — diamonds, carbuncles, and sapphires mingled with huge pieces of gold bearing the effigies of kings.

“What? What? Staters, shekels, darics, aryandics! Alexander, Demetrius, the Ptolemies, Cæsar! But each of them had not as much! Nothing impossible in it! More to come! And those rays which dazzle me! Ah! my heart overflows! How good this is! Yes! ... Yes! ... more! Never enough! It did not matter even if I kept flinging it into the sea; more would remain. Why lose any of it? I will keep it all, without telling anyone about it. I will dig myself a chamber in the rock, the interior of which will be lined with strips of bronze; and thither will I come to feel the piles of gold sinking under my heels. I will plunge my arms into it as if into sacks of corn. I would like to anoint my face with it — to sleep on top of it!”

He lets go the torch in order to embrace the heap, and falls to the ground on his breast. He gets up again. The place is perfectly empty!

“What have I done? If I died during that brief space of time, the result would have been Hell — irrevocable Hell!”

A shudder runs through his frame.

“So, then, I am accursed? Ah! no, this is all my own fault! I let myself be caught in every trap. There is no one more idiotic or more infamous. I would like to beat myself, or, rather, to tear myself out of my body. I have restrained myself too long. I need to avenge myself, to strike, to kill! It is as if I had a troop of wild beasts in my soul. I would like, with a stroke of a hatchet in the midst of a crowd — — Ah! a dagger! ...”

He flings himself upon his knife, which he has just seen. The knife slips from his hand, and Antony remains propped against the wall of his cell, his mouth wide open, motionless — like one in a trance.

All the surroundings have disappeared.

He finds himself in Alexandria on the Panium — an artificial mound raised in the centre of the city, with corkscrew stairs on the outside.

In front of it stretches Lake Mareotis, with the sea to the right and the open plain to the left, and, directly under his eyes, an irregular succession of flat roofs, traversed from north to south and from east to west by two streets, which cross each other, and which form, in their entire length, a row of porticoes with Corinthian capitals. The houses overhanging this double colonnade have stained-glass windows. Some have enormous wooden cages outside of them, in which the air from without is swallowed up.

Monuments in various styles of architecture are piled close to one another. Egyptian pylons rise above Greek temples. Obelisks exhibit themselves like spears between battlements of red brick. In the centres of squares there are statues of Hermes with pointed ears, and of Anubis with dogs' heads. Antony notices the mosaics in the court-yards, and the tapestries hung from the cross-beams of the ceiling.

With a single glance he takes in the two ports (the Grand Port and the Eunostus), both round like two circles, and separated by a mole joining Alexandria to the rocky island, on which stands the tower of the Pharos, quadrangular, five hundred cubits high and in nine storeys, with a heap of black charcoal flaming on its summit.

Small ports nearer to the shore intersect the principal ports. The mole is terminated at each end by a bridge built on marble columns fixed in the sea. Vessels pass beneath, and pleasure-boats inlaid with ivory, gondolas covered with awnings, triremes and biremes, all kinds of shipping, move up and down or remain at anchor along the quays.

Around the Grand Port there is an uninterrupted succession of Royal structures: the palace of the Ptolemies, the Museum, the Posideion, the Cæsarium, the Timonium where Mark Antony took refuge, and the Soma which contains the tomb of Alexander; while at the other extremity of the city, close to the Eunostus, might be seen glass, perfume, and paper factories.

Itinerant vendors, porters, and ass-drivers rush to and fro, jostling against one another. Here and there a priest of Osiris with a panther's skin on his shoulders, a Roman soldier, or a group of negroes, may be observed. Women stop in front of stalls where artisans are at work, and the grinding of chariot-wheels frightens away some birds who are picking up from the ground the sweepings of the shambles and the remnants of fish. Over the uniformity of white houses the plan of the streets casts, as it were, a black network. The markets, filled with herbage, exhibit green bouquets, the drying-sheds of the dyers, plates of colours, and the gold ornaments on the pediments of temples, luminous points — all this contained within the oval enclosure of the greyish walls, under the vault of the blue heavens, hard by the motionless sea. But the crowd stops and looks towards the eastern side, from which enormous whirlwinds of dust are advancing.

It is the monks of the Thebaïd who are coming, clad in goats' skins, armed with clubs, and howling forth a canticle of war and of religion with this refrain:

“Where are they? Where are they?”

Antony comprehends that they have come to kill the Arians.

All at once, the streets are deserted, and one sees no longer anything but running feet.

And now the Solitaries are in the city. Their formidable cudgels, studded with nails, whirl around like monstrosities of steel. One can hear the crash of things being broken in the houses. Intervals of silence follow, and then the loud cries burst forth again. From one end of the streets to the other there is a continuous eddying of people in a state of terror. Several are armed with pikes. Sometimes two groups meet and form into one; and this multitude, after rushing along the pavements, separates, and those composing it proceed to knock one another down. But the men with long hair always reappear.

Thin wreaths of smoke escape from the corners of buildings. The leaves of the doors burst asunder; the skirts of the walls fall in; the architraves topple over.

Antony meets all his enemies one after another. He recognises people whom he had forgotten. Before killing them, he outrages them. He rips them open, cuts their throats, knocks them down, drags the old men by their beards, runs over children, and beats those who are wounded. People revenge themselves on luxury. Those who cannot read, tear the books to pieces; others smash and destroy the statues, the paintings, the furniture, the cabinets — a thousand dainty objects whose use they are ignorant of, and which, for that very reason, exasperate them. From time to time they stop, out of breath, and then begin again. The inhabitants, taking refuge in the court-yards, utter lamentations. The women lift their eyes to Heaven, weeping, with their arms bare. In order to move the Solitaries they embrace their knees; but the latter only dash them aside, and the blood gushes up to the ceiling, falls back on the linen clothes that line the walls, streams from the trunks of decapitated corpses, fills the aqueducts, and rolls in great red pools along the ground.

Antony is steeped in it up to his middle. He steps into it, sucks it up with his lips, and quivers with joy at feeling it on his limbs and under his hair, which is quite wet with it.

The night falls. The terrible clamour abates.

The Solitaries have disappeared.

Suddenly, on the outer galleries lining the nine stages of the Pharos, Antony perceives thick black lines, as if a flock of crows had alighted there. He hastens thither, and soon finds himself on the summit.

A huge copper mirror turned towards the sea reflects the ships in the offing.

Antony amuses himself by looking at them; and as he continues looking at them, their number increases.

They are gathered in a gulf formed like a crescent. Behind, upon a promontory, stretches a new city built in the Roman style of architecture, with cupolas of stone, conical roofs, marble work in red and blue, and a profusion of bronze attached to the volutes of capitals, to the tops of houses, and to the angles of cornices. A wood, formed of cypress-trees, overhangs it. The colour of the sea is greener; the air is colder. On the mountains at the horizon there is snow.

Antony is about to pursue his way when a man accosts him, and says:

“Come! they are waiting for you!”

He traverses a forum, enters a court-yard, stoops under a gate, and he arrives before the front of the palace, adorned with a group in wax representing the Emperor Constantine hurling the dragon to the earth. A porphyry basin supports in its centre a golden conch filled with pistachio-nuts. His guide informs him that he may take some of them. He does so.

Then he loses himself, as it were, in a succession of apartments.

Along the walls may be seen, in mosaic, generals offering conquered cities to the Emperor on the palms of their hands. And on every side are columns of basalt, gratings of silver filigree, seats of ivory, and tapestries embroidered with pearls. The light falls from the vaulted roof, and Antony proceeds on his way. Tepid exhalations spread around; occasionally he hears the modest patter of a sandal. Posted in the ante-chambers, the custodians — who resemble automatons — bear on their shoulders vermilion-coloured truncheons.

At last, he finds himself in the lower part of a hall with hyacinth curtains at its extreme end. They divide, and reveal the Emperor seated upon a throne, attired in a violet tunic and red buskins with black bands.

A diadem of pearls is wreathed around his hair, which is arranged in symmetrical rolls. He has drooping eyelids, a straight nose, and a heavy and cunning expression of countenance. At the corners of the daïs, extended above his head, are placed four golden doves, and, at the foot of the throne, two enamelled lions are squatted. The doves begin to coo, the lions to roar. The Emperor rolls his eyes; Antony steps forward; and directly, without preamble, they proceed with a narrative of events.

“In the cities of Antioch, Ephesus, and Alexandria, the temples have been pillaged, and the statues of the gods converted into pots and porridge-pans.”

The Emperor laughs heartily at this. Antony reproaches him for his tolerance towards the Novatians. But the Emperor flies into a passion. “Novatians, Arians, Meletians — he is sick of them all!” However, he admires the episcopacy, for the Christians create bishops, who depend on five or six personages, and it is his interest to gain over the latter in order to have the rest on his side. Moreover, he has not failed to furnish them with considerable sums. But he detests the fathers of the Council of Nicæa. “Come, let us have a look at them.”

Antony follows him. And they are found on the same floor under a terrace which commands a view of a hippodrome full of people, and surmounted by porticoes wherein the rest of the crowd are walking to and fro. In the centre of the course there is a narrow platform on which stands a miniature temple of Mercury, a statue of Constantine, and three bronze serpents intertwined with each other; while at one end there are three huge wooden eggs, and at the other seven dolphins with their tails in the air.

Behind the Imperial pavilion, the prefects of the chambers, the lords of the household, and the Patricians are placed at intervals as far as the first story of a church, all whose windows are lined with women. At the right is the gallery of the Blue faction, at the left that of the Green, while below there is a picket of soldiers, and, on a level with the arena, a row of Corinthian pillars, forming the entrance to the stalls.

The races are about to begin; the horses fall into line. Tall plumes fixed between their ears sway in the wind like trees; and in their leaps they shake the chariots in the form of shells, driven by coachmen wearing a kind of many-coloured cuirass with sleeves narrow at the wrists and wide in the arms, with legs uncovered, full beard, and hair shaven above the forehead after the fashion of the Huns.

Antony is deafened by the murmuring of voices. Above and below he perceives nothing but painted faces, motley garments, and plates of worked gold; and the sand of the arena, perfectly white, shines like a mirror.

The Emperor converses with him, confides to him some important secrets, informs him of the assassination of his own son Crispus, and goes so far as to consult Antony about his health.

Meanwhile, Antony perceives slaves at the end of the stalls. They are the fathers of the Council of Nicæa, in rags, abject. The martyr Paphnutius is brushing a horse's mane; Theophilus is scrubbing the legs of another; John is painting the hoofs of a third; while Alexander is picking up their droppings in a basket.

Antony passes among them. They salaam to him, beg of him to intercede for them, and kiss his hands. The entire crowd hoots at them; and he rejoices in their degradation immeasurably. And now he has become one of the great ones of the Court, the Emperor's confidant, first minister! Constantine places the diadem on his forehead, and Antony keeps it, as if this honour were quite natural to him.

And presently is disclosed, beneath the darkness, an immense hall, lighted up by candelabra of gold.

Columns, half lost in shadow so tall are they, run in a row behind the tables, which stretch to the horizon, where appear, in a luminous haze, staircases placed one above another, successions of archways, colossi, towers; and, in the background, an unoccupied wing of the palace, which cedars overtop, making blacker masses above the darkness.

The guests, crowned with violets, lean upon their elbows on low-lying couches. Beside each one are placed amphorae, from which they pour out wine; and, at the very end, by himself, adorned with the tiara and covered with carbuncles, King Nebuchadnezzar is eating and drinking. To right and left of him, two theories of priests, with peaked caps, are swinging censers. Upon the ground are crawling captive kings, without feet or hands, to whom he flings bones to pick. Further down stand his brothers, with shades over their eyes, for they are perfectly blind.

A constant lamentation ascends from the depths of the ergastula. The soft and monotonous sounds of a hydraulic organ alternate with the chorus of voices; and one feels as if all around the hall there was an immense city, an ocean of humanity, whose waves were beating against the walls.

The slaves rush forward carrying plates. Women run about offering drink to the guests. The baskets groan under the load of bread, and a dromedary, laden with leathern bottles, passes to and fro, letting vervain trickle over the floor in order to cool it.

Belluarii lead forth lions; dancing-girls, with their hair in ringlets, turn somersaults, while squirting fire through their nostrils; negro-jugglers perform tricks; naked children fling snowballs, which, in falling, crash against the shining silver plate. The clamour is so dreadful that it might be described as a tempest, and the steam of the viands, as well as the respirations of the guests, spreads, as it were, a cloud over the feast. Now and then, flakes from the huge torches, snatched away by the wind, traverse the night like flying stars.

The King wipes off the perfumes from his visage with his hand. He eats from the sacred vessels, and then breaks them, and he enumerates, mentally, his fleets, his armies, his peoples. Presently, through a whim, he will burn his palace, along with his guests. He calculates on rebuilding the Tower of Babel, and dethroning God.

Antony reads, at a distance, on his forehead, all his thoughts. They take possession of himself — and he becomes Nebuchadnezzar.

Immediately, he is satiated with conquests and exterminations; and a longing seizes him to plunge into every kind of vileness. Moreover, the degradation wherewith men are terrified is an outrage done to their souls, a means still more of stupefying them; and, as nothing is lower than a brute beast, Antony falls upon four paws on the table, and bellows like a bull.

He feels a pain in his hand — a pebble, as it happened, has hurt him — and he again finds himself in his cell.

The rocky enclosure is empty. The stars are shining. All is silence.

“Once more I have been deceived. Why these things? They arise from the revolts of the flesh! Ah! miserable man that I am!”

He dashes into his cell, takes out of it a bundle of cords, with iron nails at the ends of them, strips himself to the waist, and raising his eyes towards Heaven:

“Accept my penance, O my God! Do not despise it on account of its insufficiency. Make it sharp, prolonged, excessive. It is time! To work!”

He proceeds to lash himself vigorously.

“Ah! no! no! No pity!”

He begins again.

“Oh! Oh! Oh! Each stroke tears my skin, cuts my limbs. This smarts horribly! Ah! it is not so terrible! One gets used to it. It seems to me even ...”

Antony stops.

“Come on, then, coward! Come on, then! Good! good! On the arms, on the back, on the breast, against the belly, everywhere! Hiss, thongs! bite me! tear me! I would like the drops of my blood to gush forth to the stars, to break my back, to strip my nerves bare! Pincers! wooden horses! molten lead! The martyrs bore more than that! Is that not so, Ammonaria?”

The shadows of the Devil’s horns reappear.

“I might have been fastened to the pillar next to yours, face to face with you, under your very eyes, responding to your shrieks with my sighs, and our griefs would blend into one, and our souls would commingle.”

He flogs himself furiously.

“Hold! hold! for your sake! once more! ... But this is a mere tickling that passes through my frame. What torture! What delight! Those are like kisses. My marrow is melting! I am dying!”

And in front of him he sees three cavaliers, mounted on wild asses, clad in green garments, holding lilies in their hands, and all resembling one another in figure.

Antony turns back, and sees three other cavaliers of the same kind, mounted on similar wild asses, in the same attitude.

He draws back. Then the wild asses, all at the same time, step forward a pace or two, and rub their snouts against him, trying to bite his garment. Voices exclaim, “This way! this way! Here is the place!” And banners appear between the clefts of the mountain, with camels’ heads in halters of red silk, mules laden with baggage, and women covered with yellow veils, mounted astride on piebald horses.

The panting animals lie down; the slaves fling themselves on the bales of goods, roll out the variegated carpets, and strew the ground with glittering objects.

A white elephant, caparisoned with a fillet of gold, runs along, shaking the bouquet of ostrich feathers attached to his head-band.

On his back, lying on cushions of blue wool, cross-legged, with eyelids half-closed and well-poised head, is a woman so magnificently attired that she emits rays around her. The attendants prostrate themselves, the elephant bends his knees, and the Queen of Sheba, gliding down by his shoulder, steps lightly on the carpet and advances towards Antony. Her robe of gold brocade, regularly divided by furbelows of pearls, jet and sapphires, is drawn tightly round her waist by a close-fitting corsage, set off with a variety of colours representing the twelve signs of the Zodiac. She wears high-heeled pattens, one of which is black and strewn with silver stars and a crescent, whilst the other is white and is covered with drops of gold, with a sun in their midst.

Her loose sleeves, garnished with emeralds and birds' plumes, exposes to view her little, rounded arms, adorned at the wrists with bracelets of ebony; and her hands, covered with rings, are terminated by nails so pointed that the ends of her fingers are almost like needles.

A chain of plate gold, passing under her chin, runs along her cheeks till it twists itself in spiral fashion around her head, over which blue powder is scattered; then, descending, it slips over her shoulders and is fastened above her bosom by a diamond scorpion, which stretches out its tongue between her breasts. From her ears hang two great white pearls. The edges of her eyelids are painted black. On her left cheek-bone she has a natural brown spot, and when she opens her mouth she breathes with difficulty, as if her bodice distressed her.

As she comes forward, she swings a green parasol with an ivory handle surrounded by vermilion bells; and twelve curly negro boys carry the long train of her robe, the end of which is held by an ape, who raises it every now and then.

She says:

“Ah! handsome hermit! handsome hermit! My heart is faint! By dint of stamping with impatience my heels have grown hard, and I have split one of my toe-nails. I sent out shepherds, who posted themselves on the mountains, with their bands stretched over their eyes, and searchers, who cried out your name in the woods, and scouts, who ran along the different roads, saying to each passer-by: ‘Have you seen him?’

“At night I shed tears with my face turned to the wall. My tears, in the long run, made two little holes in the mosaic-work — like pools of water in rocks — for I love you! Oh! yes; very much!”

She catches his beard.

“Smile on me, then, handsome hermit! Smile on me, then! You will find I am very gay! I play on the lyre, I dance like a bee, and I can tell many stories, each one more diverting than the last.

“You cannot imagine what a long journey we have made. Look at the wild asses of the green-clad couriers — dead through fatigue!”

The wild asses are stretched motionless on the ground.

“For three great moons they have journeyed at an even pace, with pebbles in their teeth to cut the wind, their tails always erect, their hams always bent, and always in full gallop. You will not find their equals. They came to me from my maternal grandfather, the Emperor Saharil, son of Jakhschab, son of Jaarab, son of Kastan. Ah! if they were still living, we would put them under a litter in order to get home quickly. But ... how now? ... What are you thinking of?”

She inspects him.

“Ah! when you are my husband, I will clothe you, I will fling perfumes over you, I will pick out your hairs.”

Antony remains motionless, stiffer than a stake, pale as a corpse.

“You have a melancholy air: is it at quitting your cell? Why, I have given up everything for your sake — even King Solomon, who has, no doubt, much wisdom, twenty thousand war-chariots, and a lovely beard! I have brought you my wedding presents. Choose.”

She walks up and down between the row of slaves and the merchandise.

“Here is balsam of Genesareth, incense from Cape Gardefan, ladanum, cinnamon and silphium, a good thing to put into sauces. There are within Assyrian embroideries, ivories from the Ganges, and the purple cloth of Elissa; and this case of snow contains a bottle of Chalybon, a wine reserved for the Kings of Assyria, which is drunk pure out of the horn of a unicorn. Here are collars, clasps, fillets, parasols, gold dust from Baasa, tin from Tartessus, blue wood from Pandion, white furs from Issidonia, carbuncles from the island of Palæsimundum, and tooth-picks made with the hair of the tachas — an extinct animal found under the earth. These cushions are from Emathia, and these mantle-fringes from Palmyra. Under this Babylonian carpet there are ... but come, then! Come, then!”

She pulls Saint Antony along by the beard. He resists. She goes on:

“This light tissue, which crackles under the fingers with the noise of sparks, is the famous yellow linen brought by the merchants from Bactriana. They required no less than forty-three interpreters during their voyage. I will make garments of it for you, which you will put on at home.

“Press the fastenings of that sycamore box, and give me the ivory casket in my elephant’s packing-case!”

They draw out of a box some round objects covered with a veil, and bring her a little case covered with carvings.

“Would you like the buckler of Dgian-ben-Dgian, the builder of the Pyramids? Here it is! It is composed of seven dragons’ skins placed one above another, joined by diamond screws, and tanned in the bile of a parricide. It represents, on one side, all the wars which have taken place since the invention of arms, and, on the other, all the wars that will take place till the end of the world. Above, the thunderbolt rebounds like a ball of cork. I am going to put it on your arm, and you will carry it to the chase.

“But if you knew what I have in my little case! Try to open it! Nobody has succeeded in doing that. Embrace me, and I will tell you.”

She takes Saint Antony by the two cheeks. He repels her with outstretched arms.

“It was one night when King Solomon had lost his head. At length, we had concluded a bargain. He arose, and, going out with the stride of a wolf ...”

She dances a pirouette.

“Ah! ah! handsome hermit! you shall not know it! you shall not know it!”

She shakes her parasol, and all the little bells begin to ring.

“I have many other things besides — there, now! I have treasures shut up in galleries, where they are lost as in a wood. I have summer palaces of lattice-reeds, and winter palaces of black marble. In the midst of great lakes, like seas, I have islands round as pieces of silver all covered with mother-of-pearl, whose shores make music with the beating of the liquid waves that roll over the sand. The slaves of my kitchen catch birds in my aviaries, and angle for fish in my ponds. I have engravers continually sitting to stamp my likeness on hard stones, panting workers in bronze who cast my statues, and perfumers who mix the juice of plants with vinegar and beat up pastes. I have dressmakers who cut out stuffs for me, goldsmiths who make jewels for me, women whose duty it is to select head-dresses for me, and attentive house-painters pouring over my panellings boiling resin, which they cool with fans. I have attendants for my harem, eunuchs enough to make an army. And then I have armies, subjects! I have in my vestibule a guard of dwarfs, carrying on their backs ivory trumpets.”

Antony sighs.

“I have teams of gazelles, quadrigæ of elephants, hundreds of camels, and mares with such long manes that their feet get entangled with them when they are galloping, and flocks with such huge horns that the woods are torn down in front of them when they are pasturing. I have giraffes who walk in my gardens, and who raise their heads over the edge of my roof when I am taking the air after dinner. Seated in a shell, and drawn by dolphins, I go up and down the grottoes, listening to the water flowing from the stalactites. I journey to the diamond country, where my friends the magicians allow me to choose the most beautiful; then I ascend to earth once more, and return home.”

She gives a piercing whistle, and a large bird, descending from the sky, alights on the top of her head-dress, from which he scatters the blue powder. His plumage, of orange colour, seems composed of metallic scales. His dainty head, adorned with a silver tuft, exhibits a human visage. He has four wings, a vulture’s claws, and an immense peacock’s tail, which he displays in a ring behind him. He seizes in his beak the Queen’s parasol, staggers a little before he finds his equilibrium, then erects all his feathers, and remains motionless.

“Thanks, fair Simorg-anka! You who have brought me to the place where the lover is concealed! Thanks! thanks! messenger of my heart! He flies like desire. He travels all over the world. In the evening he returns; he lies down at the foot of my couch; he tells me what he has seen, the seas he has flown over, with their fishes and their ships, the great empty deserts which he has looked down upon from his airy height in the skies, all the harvests bending in the fields, and the plants that shoot up on the walls of abandoned cities.”

She twists her arms with a languishing air.

"Oh! if you were willing! if you were only willing! ... I have a pavilion on a promontory, in the midst of an isthmus between two oceans. It is wainscotted with plates of glass, floored with tortoise-shells, and is open to the four winds of Heaven. From above, I watch the return of my fleets and the people who ascend the hill with loads on their shoulders. We should sleep on down softer than clouds; we should drink cool draughts out of the rinds of fruit, and we gaze at the sun through a canopy of emeralds. Come!"

Antony recoils. She draws close to him, and, in a tone of irritation:

"How so? Rich, coquettish, and in love? — is not that enough for you, eh? But must she be lascivious, gross, with a hoarse voice, a head of hair like fire, and rebounding flesh? Do you prefer a body cold as a serpent's skin, or, perchance, great black eyes more sombre than mysterious caverns? Look at these eyes of mine, then!"

Antony gazes at them, in spite of himself.

"All the women you ever have met, from the daughter of the cross-roads singing beneath her lantern to the fair patrician scattering leaves from the top of her litter, all the forms you have caught a glimpse of, all the imaginings of your desire, ask for them! I am not a woman — I am a world. My garments have but to fall, and you shall discover upon my person a succession of mysteries."

Antony's teeth chattered.

"If you placed your finger on my shoulder, it would be like a stream of fire in your veins. The possession of the least part of my body will fill you with a joy more vehement than the conquest of an empire. Bring your lips near! My kisses have the taste of fruit which would melt in your heart. Ah! how you will lose yourself in my tresses, caress my breasts, marvel at my limbs, and be scorched by my eyes, between my arms, in a whirlwind — —"

Antony makes the sign of the Cross.

"So, then, you disdain me! Farewell!"

She turns away weeping; then she returns.

"Are you quite sure? So lovely a woman?"

She laughs, and the ape who holds the end of her robe lifts it up.

"You will repent, my fine hermit! you will groan; you will be sick of life! but I will mock at you! la! la! la! oh! oh! oh!"

She goes off with her hands on her waist, skipping on one foot.

The slaves file off before Saint Antony's face, together with the horses, the dromedaries, the elephant, the attendants, the mules, once more covered with their loads, the negro boys, the ape, and the green-clad couriers holding their broken lilies in their hands — and the Queen of Sheba departs, with a spasmodic utterance which might be either a sob or a chuckle.

CHAPTER III.

The Disciple, Hilarion.

WHEN she has disappeared, Antony perceives a child on the threshold of his cell.

“It is one of the Queen’s servants,” he thinks.

This child is small, like a dwarf, and yet thickset, like one of the Cabiri, distorted, and with a miserable aspect. White hair covers his prodigiously large head, and he shivers under a sorry tunic, while he grasps in his hand a roll of papyrus. The light of the moon, across which a cloud is passing, falls upon him.

Antony observes him from a distance, and is afraid of him.

“Who are you?”

The child replies:

“Your former disciple, Hilarion.”

Antony — “You lie! Hilarion has been living for many years in Palestine.”

Hilarion — “I have returned from it! It is I, in good sooth!”

Antony, draws closer and inspects him — “Why, his figure was bright as the dawn, open, joyous. This one is quite sombre, and has an aged look.”

Hilarion — “I am worn out with constant toiling.”

Antony — “The voice, too, is different. It has a tone that chills you.”

Hilarion — “That is because I nourish myself on bitter fare.”

Antony — “And those white locks?”

Hilarion — “I have had so many griefs.”

Antony, aside — “Can it be possible? ...”

Hilarion — “I was not so far away as you imagined. The hermit, Paul, paid you a visit this year during the month of Schebar. It is just twenty days since the nomads brought you bread. You told a sailor the day before yesterday to send you three bodkins.”

Antony — “He knows everything!”

Hilarion — “Learn, too, that I have never left you. But you spend long intervals without perceiving me.”

Antony — “How is that? No doubt my head is troubled! To-night especially ...”

Hilarion — “All the deadly sins have arrived. But their miserable snares are of no avail against a saint like you!”

Antony — “Oh! no! no! Every minute I give way! Would that I were one of those whose souls are always intrepid and their minds firm — like the great Athanasius, for example!”

Hilarion — “He was unlawfully ordained by seven bishops!”

Antony — “What does it matter? If his virtue ...”

Hilarion — “Come, now! A haughty, cruel man, always mixed up in intrigues, and finally exiled for being a monopolist.”

Antony — “Calumny!”

Hilarion — “You will not deny that he tried to corrupt Eustatius, the treasurer of the bounties?”

Antony — “So it is stated, and I admit it.”

Hilarion — “He burned, for revenge, the house of Arsenius.”

Antony — “Alas!”

Hilarion — “At the Council of Nicæa, he said, speaking of Jesus, ‘The man of the Lord.’”

Antony — “Ah! that is a blasphemy!”

Hilarion — “So limited is he, too, that he acknowledges he knows nothing as to the nature of the Word.”

Antony, smiling with pleasure — “In fact, he has not a very lofty intellect.”

Hilarion — “If they had put you in his place, it would have been a great satisfaction for your brethren, as well as yourself. This life, apart from others, is a bad thing.”

Antony — “On the contrary! Man, being a spirit, should withdraw himself from perishable things. All action degrades him. I would like not to cling to the earth — even with the soles of my feet.”

Hilarion — “Hypocrite! who plunges himself into solitude to free himself the better from the outbreaks of his lusts! You deprive yourself of meat, of wine, of stoves, of slaves, and of honours; but how you let your imagination offer you banquets, perfumes, naked women, and applauding crowds! Your chastity is but a more subtle kind of corruption, and your contempt for the world is but the impotence of your hatred against it! This is the reason that persons like you are so lugubrious, or perhaps it is because they lack faith. The possession of the truth gives joy. Was Jesus sad? He used to go about surrounded by friends; He rested under the shade of the olive, entered the house of the publican, multiplied the cups, pardoned the fallen woman, healing all sorrows. As for you, you have no pity, save for your own wretchedness. You are so much swayed by a kind of remorse, and by a ferocious insanity, that you would repel the caress of a dog or the smile of a child."

Antony, bursts out sobbing — "Enough! Enough! You move my heart too much."

Hilarion — "Shake off the vermin from your rags! Get rid of your filth! Your God is not a Moloch who requires flesh as a sacrifice!"

Antony — "Still, suffering is blessed. The cherubim bend down to receive the blood of confessors."

Hilarion — "Then admire the Montanists! They surpass all the rest."

Antony — "But it is the truth of the doctrine that makes the martyr."

Hilarion — "How can he prove its excellence, seeing that he testifies equally on behalf of error?"

Antony — "Be silent, viper!"

Hilarion — "It is not perhaps so difficult. The exhortations of friends, the pleasure of outraging popular feeling, the oath they take, a certain giddy excitement — a thousand things, in fact, go to help them."

Antony draws away from Hilarion. Hilarion follows him — "Besides, this style of dying introduces great disorders. Dionysius, Cyprian, and Gregory avoided it. Peter of Alexandria has disapproved of it; and the Council of Elvira ..."

Antony, stops his ears — "I will listen to no more!"

Hilarion, raising his voice — "Here you are again falling into your habitual sin — laziness. Ignorance is the froth of pride. You say, 'My conviction is formed; why discuss the matter?' and you despise the doctors, the philosophers, tradition, and even the text of the law, of which you know nothing. Do you think you hold wisdom in your hand?"

Antony — "I am always hearing him! His noisy words fill my head."

Hilarion — "The endeavours to comprehend God are better than your mortifications for the purpose of moving him. We have no merit save our thirst for truth. Religion alone does not explain everything; and the solution of the problems which you have ignored might render it more unassailable and more sublime. Therefore, it is essential for each man's salvation that he should hold intercourse with his brethren — otherwise the Church, the assembly of the faithful, would be only a word — and that he should listen to every argument, and not disdain anything, or anyone. Balaam the soothsayer, Æschylus the poet, and the sybil of Cumæ, announced the Saviour. Dionysius the Alexandrian received from Heaven a command to read every book. Saint Clement enjoins us to study Greek literature. Hermas was converted by the illusion of a woman that he loved!"

Antony — "What an air of authority! It appears to me that you are growing taller ..."

In fact, Hilarion's height has progressively increased; and, in order not to see him, Antony closes his eyes.

Hilarion — "Make your mind easy, good hermit. Let us sit down here, on this big stone, as of yore, when, at the break of day, I used to salute you, addressing you as 'Bright morning star'; and you at once began to give me instruction. It is not finished yet. The moon affords us sufficient light. I am all attention."

He has drawn forth a calamus from his girdle, and, cross-legged on the ground, with his roll of papyrus in his hand, he raises his head towards Antony, who, seated beside him, keeps his forehead bent.

"Is not the word of God confirmed for us by the miracles? And yet the sorcerers of Pharaoh worked miracles. Other impostors could do the same; so here we may be deceived. What, then, is a miracle? An occurrence which seems to us outside the limits of Nature. But do we know all Nature's powers? And, from the mere fact that a thing ordinarily does not astonish us, does it follow that we comprehend it?"

Antony — "It matters little; we must believe in the Scripture."

Hilarion — "Saint Paul, Origen, and some others did not interpret it literally; but, if we explain it allegorically, it becomes the heritage of a limited number of people, and the evidence of its truth vanishes. What are we to do, then?"

Antony — "Leave it to the Church."

Hilarion — "Then the Scripture is useless?"

Antony — "Not at all. Although the Old Testament, I admit, has — well, obscurities ... But the New shines forth with a pure light."

Hilarion — "And yet the Angel of the Annunciation, in Matthew, appears to Joseph, whilst in Luke it is to Mary. The anointing of Jesus by a woman comes to pass, according to the First Gospel, at the beginning of his public life, but according to the three others, a few days before his death. The drink which they offer him on the Cross is, in Matthew, vinegar and gall, in Mark, wine and myrrh. If we follow Luke and Matthew, the Apostles ought to take neither money nor bag — in fact, not even sandals or a staff; while in Mark, on the contrary, Jesus forbids them to carry with them anything except sandals and a staff. Here is where I get lost ..."

Antony, in amazement — "In fact ... in fact ..."

Hilarion — "At the contact of the woman with the issue of blood, Jesus turned round, and said, 'Who has touched me?' So, then, He did not know who touched Him? That is opposed to the omniscience of Jesus. If the tomb was watched by guards, the women had not to worry themselves about an assistant to lift up the stone from the tomb. Therefore, there were no guards there — or rather, the holy women were not there at all. At Emmaüs, He eats with His disciples, and makes them feel His wounds. It is a human body, a material object, which can be weighed, and which, nevertheless, passes through stone walls. Is this possible?"

Antony — "It would take a good deal of time to answer you."

Hilarion — "Why did He receive the Holy Ghost, although He was the Son? What need had He of baptism, if He were the Word? How could the Devil tempt Him — God?"

"Have these thoughts never occurred to you?"

Antony — "Yes! often! Torpid or frantic, they dwell in my conscience. I crush them out; they spring up again, they stifle me; and sometimes I believe that I am accursed."

Hilarion — "Then you have nothing to do but to serve God?"

Antony — "I have always need to adore Him."

After a prolonged silence, Hilarion resumes:

"But apart from dogma, entire liberty of research is permitted us. Do you wish to become acquainted with the hierarchy of Angels, the virtue of Numbers, the explanation of germs and metamorphoses?"

Antony — "Yes! yes! My mind is struggling to escape from its prison. It seems to me that, by gathering my forces, I shall be able to effect this. Sometimes — even for an interval brief as a lightning-flash — I feel myself, as it were, suspended in mid-air; then I fall back again!"

Hilarion — "The secret which you are anxious to possess is guarded by sages. They live in a distant country, sitting under gigantic trees, robed in white, and calm as gods. A warm atmosphere nourishes them. All around leopards stride through the plains. The murmuring of fountains mingles with the neighing of unicorns. You shall hear them; and the face of the Unknown shall be unveiled!"

Antony, sighing — "The road is long and I am old!"

Hilarion — "Oh! oh! men of learning are not rare! There are some of them even very close to you here! Let us enter!"

CHAPTER IV.

The Fiery Trial.

AND Antony sees in front of him an immense basilica. The light projects itself from the lower end with the magical effect of a many-coloured sun. It lights up the innumerable heads of the multitude which fills the nave and surges between the columns towards the side-aisles, where one can distinguish in the wooden compartments altars, beds, chainlets of little blue stones, and constellations painted on the walls.

In the midst of the crowd groups are stationed here and there; men standing on stools are discoursing with lifted fingers; others are praying with arms crossed, or lying down on the ground, or singing hymns, or drinking wine. Around a table the faithful are carrying on the love-feasts; martyrs are unswathing their limbs to show their wounds; old men, leaning on their staffs, are relating their travels.

Amongst them are people from the country of the Germans, from Thrace, Gaul, Scythia and the Indies — with snow on their beards, feathers in their hair, thorns in the fringes of their garments, sandals covered with dust, and skins burnt by the sun. All costumes are mingled — mantles of purple and robes of linen, embroidered dalmatics, woollen jackets, sailors' caps and bishops' mitres. Their eyes gleam strangely. They have the appearance of executioners or of eunuchs.

Hilarion advances among them. Antony, pressing against his shoulder, observes them. He notices a great many women. Several of them are dressed like men, with their hair cut short. He is afraid of them.

Hilarion — "These are the Christian women who have converted their husbands. Besides, the women are always for Jesus — even the idolaters — as witness Procula, the wife of Pilate, and Poppæa, the concubine of Nero. Don't tremble any more! Come on!"

There are fresh arrivals every moment.

They multiply; they separate, swift as shadows, all the time making a great uproar, or intermingling yells of rage, exclamations of love, canticles, and upbraidings.

Antony, in a low tone — "What do they want?"

Hilarion — "The Lord said, 'I may still have to speak to you about many things.' They possess those things."

And he pushes him towards a throne of gold, five paces off, where, surrounded by ninety-five disciples, all anointed with oil, pale and emaciated, sits the prophet Manes — beautiful as an archangel, motionless as a statue — wearing an Indian robe, with carbuncles in his plaited hair, a book of coloured pictures in his left hand, and a globe under his right. The pictures represent the creatures who are slumbering in chaos. Antony bends forward to see him. Then Manes makes his globe revolve, and, attuning his words to the music of a lyre, from which bursts forth crystalline sounds, he says:

"The celestial earth is at the upper extremity, the mortal earth at the lower. It is supported by two angels, the Splenditenens and the Omophorus, with six faces.

"At the summit of Heaven, the Impassible Divinity occupies the highest seat; underneath, face to face, are the Son of God and the Prince of Darkness.

"The darkness having made its way into His kingdom, God extracted from His essence a virtue which produced the first man; and He surrounded him with five elements. But the demons of darkness deprived him of one part, and that part is the soul.

"There is but one soul, spread through the universe, like the water of a stream divided into many channels. This it is that sighs in the wind, grinds in the marble which is sawn, howls in the voice of the sea; and it sheds milky tears when the leaves are torn off the fig-tree.

"The souls that leave this world emigrate towards the stars, which are animated beings."

Antony begins to laugh:

"Ah! ah! what an absurd hallucination!"

A man, beardless, and of austere aspect — "Why?"

Antony is about to reply. But Hilarion tells him in an undertone, that this man is the mighty Origen; and Manes resumes:

"At first, they stay in the moon, where they are purified. After that, they ascend to the sun."

Antony, slowly — "I know nothing to prevent us from believing it."

Manes — "The end of every creature is the liberation of the celestial ray shut up in matter. It makes its escape more easily through perfumes, spices, the aroma of old wine, the light substances that resemble thought. But the actions of daily life withhold it. The murderer will be born again in the body of a eunuch; he who slays an animal will become that animal. If you plant a vine-tree, you will be fastened in its branches. Food absorbs those who use it. Therefore, mortify yourselves! fast!"

Hilarion — "They are temperate, as you see!"

Manes — "There is a great deal of it in flesh-meats, less in herbs. Besides, the Pure, by the force of their merits, despoil vegetables of that luminous spark, and it flies towards its source. The animals, by generation, imprison it in the flesh. Therefore, avoid women!"

Hilarion — "Admire their countenance!"

Manes — "Or, rather, act so well that they may not be prolific. It is better for the soul to sink on the earth than to languish in carnal fetters."

Antony — "Ah! abomination!"

Hilarion — "What matters the hierarchy of iniquities? The Church has done well to make marriage a sacrament!"

Saturninus, in Syrian costume — "He propagates a dismal order of things! The Father, in order to punish the rebel angels, commanded them to create the world. Christ came in order that the God of the Jews, who was one of those angels — —"

Antony — "An angel? He! the Creator?"

Gerdon — "Did He not desire to kill Moses and deceive the prophets? and did He not lead the people astray, spreading lying and idolatry?"

Marcion — "Certainly, the Creator is not the true God!"

Saint Clement of Alexandria — "Matter is eternal!"

Bardesanes, as one of the Babylonian Magi — "It was formed by the seven planetary spirits."

The Hernians — "The angels have made the souls!"

The Priscillianists — "The world was made by the Devil."

Antony, falls backward — "Horror!"

Hilarion, holding him up — "You drive yourself to despair too quickly! You don't rightly comprehend their doctrine. Here is one who has received his from Theodas, the friend of Saint Paul. Harken to him!"

And, at a signal from Hilarion, Valentinus, in a tunic of silver cloth, with a hissing voice and a pointed skull, cries:

"The world is the work of a delirious God!"

Antony, hangs down his head — "The work of a delirious God!"

After a long silence:

"How is that?"

Valentinus — "The most perfect of the Æons, the Abyss, reposed on the bosom of Profundity together with Thought. From their union sprang Intelligence, who had for his consort Truth.

"Intelligence and Truth engendered the Word and Life, which in their turn engendered Man and the Church; and this makes eight Æons."

He reckons on his fingers:

"The Word and Truth produced ten other Æons, that is to say, five couples. Man and the Church produced twelve others, amongst whom were the Paraclete and Faith, Hope and Charity, Perfection and Wisdom, Sophia.

"The entire of those thirty Æons constitutes the Pleroma, or Universality of God. Thus, like the echoes of a voice that is dying away, like the exhalations of a perfume that is evaporating, like the fires of a sun that is setting, the Powers that have emanated from the Highest Powers are always growing feeble.

"But Sophia, desirous of knowing the Father, rushed out of the Pleroma; and the Word then made another pair, Christ and the Holy Ghost, who bound together all the Æons, and all together they formed Jesus, the flower of the Pleroma. Meanwhile, the effort of Sophia to escape had left in the void an image of her, an evil substance, Achamoth. The Saviour took pity on her, and delivered her from her passions; and from the smile of Achamoth on being set free Light was born; her tears made the waters, and her sadness engendered gloomy Matter. From Achamoth sprang the Demiurge, the fabricator of the worlds, the heavens, and the Devil. He dwells much lower down than the Pleroma, without even beholding it, so that he imagines he is the true God, and repeats through the mouths of his prophets: 'Besides me there is no God.' Then he made man, and cast into his soul the immaterial seed, which was the Church, the reflection of the other Church placed in the Pleroma.

"Acharamoth, one day, having reached the highest region, shall unite with the Saviour; the fire hidden in the world shall annihilate all matter, shall then consume itself, and men, having become pure spirits, shall espouse the angels!"

Origen — "Then the Demon shall be conquered, and the reign of God shall begin!"

Antony represses an exclamation, and immediately Basilides, catching him by the elbow:

"The Supreme Being, with his infinite emanations, is called Abraxas, and the Saviour with all his virtues, Kaulakau, otherwise rank-upon-rank, rectitude-upon-rectitude. The power of Kaulakau is obtained by the aid of certain words inscribed on this calcedony to facilitate memory."

And he shows on his neck a little stone on which fantastic lines are engraved.

"Then you shall be transported into the invisible; and, unfettered by law, you shall despise everything, including virtue itself. As for us, the Pure, we must avoid sorrow, after the example of Kaulakau."

Antony — "What! and the Cross?"

The Elkhesaites, in hyacinthine robes, reply to him:

"The sadness, the vileness, the condemnation, and the oppression of my fathers are effaced, thanks to the new Gospel. We may deny the inferior Christ, the man-Jesus; but we must adore the other Christ generated in his person under the wing of the Dove. Honour marriage! The Holy Spirit is feminine!"

Hilarion has disappeared; and Antony, pressed forward by the crowd, finds himself facing the Carpocratians, stretched with women upon scarlet cushions:

"Before re-entering the centre of unity, you will have to pass through a series of conditions and actions. In order to free yourself from the Powers of Darkness, do their works for the present! The husband goes to his wife and says, 'Act with charity towards your brother,' and she will kiss you."

The Nicolaites, assembled around a smoking dish:

“This is meat offered to idols; let us take it! Apostacy is permitted when the heart is pure. Glut your flesh with what it asks for. Try to destroy it by means of debaucheries. Prounikos, the mother of Heaven, wallows in iniquity.”

The Marcosians, with rings of gold and dripping with balsam:

“Come to us, in order to be united with the Spirit! Come to us, in order to drink immortality!”

And one of them points out to him, behind some tapestry, the body of a man with an ass’s head. This represents Sabaoth, the father of the Devil. As a mark of hatred he spits upon it.

Another discloses a very low bed strewn with flowers, saying as he does so:

“The spiritual nuptials are about to be consummated.”

A third holds forth a goblet of glass while he utters an invocation. Blood appears in it:

“Ah! there it is! there it is! the blood of Christ!”

Antony turns aside; but he is splashed by the water, which leaps out of a tub.

The Helvidians cast themselves into it head foremost, muttering:

“Man regenerated by baptism is incapable of sin!”

Then he passes close to a great fire, where the Adamites are warming themselves completely naked to imitate the purity of Paradise; and he jostles up against the Messalians wallowing on the stone floor half-asleep, stupid:

“Oh! run over us, if you like; we shall not budge! Work is a sin; all occupation is evil!”

Behind those, the abject Paternians, men, women, and children, pell-mell, on a heap of filth, lift up their hideous faces, besmeared with wine:

“The inferior parts of the body, having been made by the Devil, belong to him. Let us eat, drink, and enjoy!”

Ætius — “Crimes come from the need here below of the love of God!”

But all at once a man, clad in a Carthaginian mantle, jumps among them, with a bundle of thongs in his hand; and striking at random to right and left of him violently:

“Ah! imposters, brigands, simoniacs, heretics, and demons! the vermin of the schools! the dregs of Hell! This fellow here, Marcion, is a sailor from Sinope excommunicated for incest. Carpocras has been banished as a magician; Ætius has stolen his concubine; Nicolas prostituted his own wife; and Manes, who describes himself as the Buddha, and whose name is Cubricus, was flayed with the sharp end of a cane, so that his tanned skin swings at the gates of Ctesiphon."

Antony has recognised Tertullian, and rushes forward to meet him.

"Help, master! help!"

Tertullian, continuing — "Break the images! Veil the virgins! Pray, fast, weep, mortify yourselves! No philosophy! no books! After Jesus, science is useless!"

All have fled; and Antony sees, instead of Tertullian, a woman seated on a stone bench. She sobs, her head resting against a pillar, her hair hanging down, and her body wrapped in a long brown simar.

Then they find themselves close to each other far from the crowd; and a silence, an extraordinary peacefulness, ensues, such as one feels in a wood when the wind ceases and the leaves flutter no longer. This woman is very beautiful, though faded and pale as death. They stare at each other, and their eyes mutually exchange a flood of thoughts, as it were, a thousand memories of the past, bewildering and profound. At last Priscilla begins to speak:

"I was in the lowest chamber of the baths, and I was lulled to sleep by the confused murmurs that reached me from the streets. All at once I heard loud exclamations. The people cried, 'It is a magician! it is the Devil!' And the crowd stopped in front of our house opposite to the Temple of Æsculapius. I raised myself with my wrists to the height of the air-hole. On the peristyle of the temple was a man with an iron collar around his neck. He placed lighted coals on a chafing-dish, and with them made large furrows on his breast, calling out, 'Jesus! Jesus!' The people said, 'That is not lawful! let us stone him!' But he did not desist. The things that were occurring were unheard of, astounding. Flowers, large as the sun, turned around before my eyes, and I heard a harp of gold vibrating in mid-air. The day sank to its close. My arms let go the iron bars; my strength was exhausted; and when he bore me away to his house — "

Antony — "Whom are you talking about?"

Priscilla — "Why, of Montanus!"

Antony — "But Montanus is dead."

Priscilla — "That is not true."

A voice — "No, Montanus is not dead!"

Antony comes back; and near him, on the other side upon a bench, a second woman is seated — this one being fair, and paler still, with swellings under her eyelids, as if she had been a long time weeping. Without waiting for him to question her, she says:

Maximilla — "We were returning from Tarsus by the mountains, when, at a turn of the road, we saw a man under a fig-tree. He cried from a distance, 'Stop!' and he sprang forward, pouring out abuse on us. The slaves rushed up to protect us. He burst out laughing. The horses pranced. The mastiffs all began to howl. He was standing up. The perspiration fell down his face. The wind made his cloak flap.

"While addressing us by name, he reproached us for the vanity of our actions, the impurity of our bodies; and he raised his fist towards the dromedaries on account of the silver bells which they wore under their jaws. His fury filled my very entrails with terror; nevertheless, it was a voluptuous sensation, which soothed, intoxicated me. At first, the slaves drew near. 'Master,' said they, 'our beasts are fatigued'; then there were the women: 'We are frightened'; and the slaves ran away. After that, the children began to cry, 'We are hungry.' And, as no answer was given to the women, they disappeared. And now he began to speak. I perceived that there was some one close beside me. It was my husband: I listened to the other. The first crawled between the stones, exclaiming, 'Do you abandon me?' and I replied, 'Yes! begone!' in order to accompany Montanus."

Antony — "A eunuch!"

Priscilla — "Ah! coarse heart, you are astonished at this! Yet Magdalen, Jane, Martha and Susanna did not enter the couch of the Saviour. Souls can be madly embraced more easily than bodies. In order to retain Eustolia with impunity, the Bishop Leontius mutilated himself — cherishing his love more than his virility. And, then, it is not my own fault. A spirit compels me to do it; Eotas cannot cure me. Nevertheless, he is cruel. What does it matter? I am the last of the prophetesses; and, after me, the end of the world will come."

Maximilla — "He has loaded me with his gifts. None of the others loved me so much, nor is any of them better loved."

Priscilla — "You lie! I am the person he loves!"

Maximilla — "No: it is I!"

They fight.

Between their shoulders appears a negro's head.

Montanus, covered with a black cloak, fastened by two dead men's bones:

"Be quiet, my doves! Incapable of terrestrial happiness, we by this union attain to spiritual plenitude. After the age of the Father, the age of the Son; and I inaugurate the third, that of the Paraclete. His light came to me during the forty nights when the heavenly Jerusalem shone in the firmament above my house at Pepuza.

"Ah! how you cry out with anguish when the thongs flagellate you! How your aching limbs offer themselves to my burning caresses! How you languish upon my breast with an inconceivable love! It is so strong that it has revealed new worlds to you, and you can now behold spirits with your mortal eyes."

Antony makes a gesture of astonishment.

Tertullian, coming up close to Montanus — "No doubt, since the soul has a body, that which has no body exists not."

Montanus — "In order to render it less material I have introduced numerous mortifications — three Lents every year, and, for each night, prayers, in saying which the mouth is kept closed, for fear the breath, in escaping, should sully the mental act. It is necessary to abstain from second marriages — or, rather, from marriage altogether! The angels sinned with women."

The Archontics, in hair-shirts:

"The Saviour said, 'I came to destroy the work of the woman.'"

The Tatianists, in hair-cloths of rushes:

"She is the tree of evil! Our bodies are the garments of skin."

And, ever advancing on the same side, Antony encounters the Valesians, stretched on the ground, with red plates below their stomachs, beneath their tunics.

They present to him a knife.

"Do like Origen and like us! Is it the pain you fear, coward? Is it the love of your flesh that restrains you, hypocrite?"

And while he watches them struggling, extended on their backs swimming in their own blood, the Cainites, with their hair fastened by vipers, pass close to him, shouting in his ears:

“Glory to Cain! Glory to Sodom! Glory to Judas!

“Cain begot the race of the strong; Sodom terrified the earth with its chastisement, and it is through Judas that God saved the world! Yes, Judas! without him no death and no Redemption!”

They pass out through the band of Circoncellions, clad in wolf-skin, crowned with thorns, and carrying iron clubs.

“Crush the fruit! Attack the fountain-head! Drown the child!

Plunder the rich man who is happy, and who eats overmuch! Strike down the poor man who casts an envious glance at the ass’s saddle-cloth, the dog’s meal, the bird’s nest, and who is grieved at not seeing others as miserable as himself.

“As for us — the Saints — in order to hasten the end of the world, we poison, burn, massacre. The only salvation is in martyrdom. We give ourselves up to martyrdom. We take off with pincers the skin of our heads; we spread our limbs under the ploughs; we cast ourselves into the mouths of furnaces. Shame on baptism! Shame on the Eucharist! Shame on marriage! Universal damnation!”

Then, throughout the basilica, there is a fresh accession of frenzy. The Audians draw arrows against the Devil; the Collyridians fling blue veils to the ceiling; the Ascitians prostrate themselves before a wineskin; the Marcionites baptise a corpse with oil. Close beside Appelles, a woman, the better to explain her idea, shows a round loaf of bread in a bottle; another, surrounded by the Sampsons, distributes like a host the dust of her sandals. On the bed of the Marcosians, strewn with roses, two lovers embrace each other. The Circoncellions cut one another’s throats; the Velesians make a rattling sound; Bardesanes sings; Carpocras dances; Maximilla and Priscilla utter loud groans; and the false prophetess of Cappadocia, quite naked, resting on a lion and brandishing three torches, yells forth the Terrible Invocation.

The pillars are poised like trunks of trees; the amulets round the necks of the Heresiarchs have lines of flame crossing each other; the constellations in the chapels move to and fro, and the walls recede under the alternate motion of the crowd, in which every head is a wave which leaps and roars.

Meanwhile, from the very depths of the uproar rises a song with bursts of laughter, in which the name of Jesus recurs. These outbursts come from the common people, who all clap their hands in order to keep time with the music. In the midst of them is Arius, in the dress of a deacon:

“The fools who declaim against me pretend to explain the absurd; and, in order to destroy them entirely, I have composed little poems so comical that they are known by heart in the mills, the taverns, and the ports.

“A thousand times no! the Son is not co-eternal with the Father, nor of the same substance. Otherwise He would not have said, ‘Father, remove from Me this chalice! Why do ye call Me good? God alone is good! I go to my God, to your God!’ and other expressions, proving that He was a created being. It is demonstrated to us besides by all His names: lamb, shepherd, fountain, wisdom, Son of Man, prophet, good way, corner-stone.”

Sabellius — “As for me, I maintain that both are identical.”

Arius — “The Council of Antioch has decided the other way.”

Antony — “Who, then, is the Word? Who was Jesus?”

The Valentinians — “He was the husband of Acharamoth when she had repented!”

The Sethianians — “He was Sem, son of Noah!”

The Theodotians — “He was Melchisidech!”

The Merinthians — “He was nothing but a man!”

The Apollonarists — “He assumed the appearance of one! He simulated the Passion!”

Marcellus of Ancyra — “He is a development of the Father!”

Pope Calixtus — “Father and Son are the two forms of a single God!”

Methadius — “He was first in Adam, and then in man!”

Cerinthus — “And He will come back to life again!”

Valentinus — “Impossible — His body is celestial.”

Paul of Samosta — “He is God only since His baptism.”

Hermogenes — “He dwells in the sun.”

And all the heresiarchs form a circle around Antony, who weeps, with his head in his hands.

A Jew, with red beard, and his skin spotted with leprosy, advances close to him, and chuckling horribly:

“His soul was the soul of Esau. He suffered from the disease of Bellerophon; and his mother, the woman who sold perfumes, surrendered herself to Pantherus, a Roman soldier, under the corn-sheaves, one harvest evening.”

Antony eagerly lifts up his head, and gazes at them without uttering a word; then, treading right over them:

“Doctors, magicians, bishops and deacons, men and phantoms, back! back! Ye are all lies!”

The Heresiarchs — “We have martyrs, more martyrs than yours, prayers more difficult, higher outbursts of love, and ecstasies quite as protracted.”

Antony — “But no revelation. No proofs.”

Then all brandish in the air rolls of papyrus, tablets of wood, pieces of leather; and strips of cloth; and pushing them one before the other:

The Corinthians — “Here is the Gospel of the Hebrews!”

The Marcionites — “The Gospel of the Lord! The Gospel of Eve!”

The Encratites — “The Gospel of Thomas!”

The Cainites — “The Gospel of Judas!”

Basilides — “The treatise of the spirit that has come!”

Manes — “The prophecy of Barcouf!”

Antony makes a struggle and escapes them, and he perceives, in a corner filled with shadows, the old Ebionites, dried up like mummies, their glances dull, their eyebrows white.

They speak in a quavering tone:

“We have known, we ourselves have known, the carpenter’s son. We were of his own age; we lived in his street. He used to amuse himself by modelling little birds with mud; without being afraid of cutting the benches, he assisted his father in his work, or rolled up, for his mother, balls of dyed wool. Then he made a journey into Egypt, whence he brought back wonderful secrets. We were in Jericho when he discovered the eater of grasshoppers. They talked together in a low tone, without anyone being able to hear them. But it was since that occurrence that he made a noise in Galilee and that many stories have been circulated concerning him.”

They repeat, tremulously:

“We have known, we ourselves; we have known him.”

Antony — “One moment! Tell me! pray tell me, what was his face like?"

Tertullian — "Fierce and repulsive in its aspect; for he was laden with all the crimes, all the sorrows, and all the deformities of the world."

Antony — "Oh! no! no! I imagine, on the contrary, that there was about his entire person a superhuman beauty."

Eusebius of Caesarea — "There is at Paneadæ, close to an old ruin, in the midst of a rank growth of weeds, a statue of stone, raised, as it is pretended, by the woman with the issue of blood. But time has gnawed away the face, and the rain has obliterated the inscription."

A woman comes forth from the group of Carpocratians.

Marcellina — "I was formerly a deaconess in a little church at Rome, where I used to show the faithful images, in silver, of St. Paul, Homer, Pythagoras and Jesus Christ.

"I have kept only his."

She draws aside the folds of her cloak.

"Do you wish it?"

A voice — "He reappears himself when we invoke him. It is the hour. Come!"

And Antony feels a brutal hand laid on him, which drags him along.

He ascends a staircase in complete darkness, and, after proceeding for some time, arrives in front of a door. Then his guide (is it Hilarion? he cannot tell) says in the ear of a third person, "The Lord is about to come," — and they are introduced into an apartment with a low ceiling and no furniture. What strikes him at first is, opposite him, a long chrysalis of the colour of blood, with a man's head, from which rays escape, and the word Knouphis written in Greek all around. It rises above a shaft of a column placed in the midst of a pedestal. On the other walls of the apartment, medallions of polished brass represent heads of animals — that of an ox, of a lion, of an eagle, of a dog, and again, an ass's head! The argil lamps, suspended below these images, shed a flickering light. Antony, through a hole in the wall, perceives the moon, which shines far away on the waves, and he can even distinguish their monotonous ripple, with the dull sound of a ship's keel striking against the stones of a pier.

Men, squatting on the ground, their faces hidden beneath their cloaks, give vent at intervals to a kind of stifled barking. Women are sleeping, with their foreheads clasped by both arms, which are supported by their knees, so completely shrouded by their veils that one would say they were heaps of clothes arranged along the wall. Beside them, children, half-naked, and half devoured with vermin, watch the lamps burning, with an idiotic air; — and they are doing nothing; they are awaiting something.

They speak in low voices about their families, or communicate to one another remedies for their diseases. Many of them are going to embark at the end of the day, the persecution having become too severe. The Pagans, however, are not hard to deceive. “They believe, the fools, that we adore Knouphis!”

But one of the brethren, suddenly inspired, places himself in front of the column, where they have laid a loaf of bread, which is on the top of a basket full of fennel and hartwort.

The others have taken their places, forming, as they stand, three parallel lines.

The inspired one unrolls a paper covered with cylinders joined together, and then begins:

“Upon the darkness the ray of the Word descended, and a violent cry burst forth, which seemed like the voice of light.”

All responding, while they sway their bodies to and fro:

“Kyrie eleison!”

The inspired one — “Man, then, was created by the infamous God of Israel, with the assistance of those here,” — pointing towards the medallions — “Aristophaïos, Oraïos, Sabaoth, Adonai, Eloï and Iaô!

“And he lay on the mud, hideous, feeble, shapeless, without the power of thought.”

All, in a plaintive tone:

“Kyrie eleison!”

The inspired one — “But Sophia, taking pity on him, quickened him with a portion of her spirit. Then, seeing man so beautiful, God was seized with anger, and imprisoned him in His kingdom, interdicting him from the tree of knowledge. Still, once more, the other one came to his aid. She sent the serpent, who, with its sinuous advances, prevailed on him to disobey this law of hate. And man, when he had tasted knowledge, understood heavenly matters.”

All, with energy:

“Kyrie eleison!”

The inspired one — “But Jaldalaoth, in order to be revenged, plunged man into matter, and the serpent along with him!”

All, in very low tones:

“Kyrie eleison!”

They close their mouths and then become silent.

The odours of the harbour mingle in the warm air with the smoke of the lamps. Their wicks, spluttering, are on the point of being extinguished, and long mosquitoes flutter around them. Antony gasps with anguish. He has the feeling that some monstrosity is floating around him — the horror of a crime about to be perpetrated.

But the inspired one, stamping with his feet, snapping his fingers, tossing his head, sings a psalm, with a wild refrain, to the sound of cymbals and of a shrill flute:

“Come! come! come! come forth from thy cavern!”

“Swift One, that runs without feet, captor that takes without hands! Sinuous as the waves, round as the sun, darkened with spots of gold; like the firmament, strewn with stars! like the twistings of the vine-tree and the windings of entrails!

“Unbegotten! earth-devourer! ever young! perspicacious! honoured at Epidaurus! good for men! who cured King Ptolemy, the soldiers of Moses, and Glaucus, son of Minos!

“Come! come! come! come forth from thy cavern!”

All repeat:

“Come! come! come! come forth from thy cavern!”

However, there is no manifestation.

“Why, what is the matter with him?”

They proceed to deliberate, and to make suggestions. One old man offers a clump of grass. Then there is a rising in the basket. The green herbs are agitated; the flowers fall, and the head of a python appears.

He passes slowly over the edge of the loaf, like a circle turning round a motionless disc; then he develops, lengthens; he becomes of enormous weight. To prevent him from grazing the ground, the men support him with their breasts, the women with their heads, and the children with the tips of their fingers; and his tail, emerging through the hole in the wall, stretches out indefinitely, even to the depths of the sea. His rings unfold themselves, and fill the apartment. They wind themselves round Antony.

The Faithful, pressing their mouths against his skin, snatch the bread which he has nibbled.

“It is thou! it is thou!

“Raised at first by Moses, crushed by Ezechias, re-established by the Messiah. He drank thee in the waters of baptism; but thou didst quit him in the Garden of Olives, and then he felt all his weakness.

“Writhing on the bar of the Cross, and higher than his head, slavering above the crown of thorns, thou didst behold him dying; for thou art Jesus! yes, thou art the Word! thou art the Christ!”

Antony swoons in horror, and falls in his cell, upon the splinters of wood, where the torch, which had slipped from his hand, is burning mildly. This commotion causes him to half-open his eyes; and he perceives the Nile, undulating and clear, under the light of the moon, like a great serpent in the midst of the sands — so much so that the hallucination again takes possession of him. He has not quitted the Ophites; they surround him, address him by name, carry off baggages, and descend towards the port. He embarks along with them.

A brief period of time flows by. Then the vault of a prison encircles him. In front of him, iron bars make black lines upon a background of blue; and at its sides, in the shade, are people weeping and praying, surrounded by others who are exhorting and consoling them.

Without, one is attracted by the murmuring of a crowd, as well as by the splendour of a summer's day. Shrill voices are crying out watermelons, water, iced drinks, and cushions of grass to sit down on. From time to time, shouts of applause burst forth. He observes people walking on their heads.

Suddenly, comes a continuous roaring, strong and cavernous, like the noise of water in an aqueduct: and, opposite him, he perceives, behind the bars of another cage, a lion, who is walking up and down; then a row of sandals, of naked legs, and of purple fringes.

Overhead, groups of people, ranged symmetrically, widen out from the lowest circle, which encloses the arena, to the highest, where masts have been raised to support a veil of hyacinth hung in the air on ropes. Staircases, which radiate towards the centre, intersect, at equal distances, those great circles of stone. Their steps disappear from view, owing to the vast audience seated there — knights, senators, soldiers, common people, vestals and courtesans, in woollen hoods, in silk maniples, in tawny tunics with aigrettes of precious stones, tufts of feathers and lictors' rods; and all this assemblage, muttering, exclaiming, tumultuous and frantic, stuns him like an immense tub boiling over. In the midst of the arena, upon an altar, smokes a vessel of incense.

The people who surround him are Christians, delivered up to the wild beasts. The men wear the red cloak of the high-priests of Saturn, the women the fillets of Ceres. Their friends distribute fragments of their garments and rings. In order to gain admittance into the prison, they require, they say, a great deal of money; but what does it matter? They will remain till the end.

Amongst these consolers Antony observes a bald man in a black tunic, a portion of whose face is plainly visible. He discourses with them on the nothingness of the world, and the happiness of the Elect. Antony is filled with transports of Divine love. He longs for the opportunity of sacrificing his life for the Saviour, not knowing whether he is himself one of these martyrs. But, save a Phrygian, with long hair, who keeps his arms raised, they all have a melancholy aspect. An old man is sobbing on a bench, and a young man, who is standing, is musing with downcast eyes.

The old man has refused to pay tribute at the angle of a cross-road, before a statue of Minerva; and he regards his companions with a look which signifies:

“You ought to succour me! Communities sometimes make arrangements by which they might be left in peace. Many amongst you have even obtained letters falsely declaring that you have offered sacrifice to idols.”

He asks:

“Is it not Peter of Alexandria who has regulated what one ought to do when one is overcome by tortures?”

Then, to himself:

“Ah! this is very hard at my age! my infirmities render me so feeble! Perchance, I might have lived to another winter!”

The recollection of his little garden moves him to tears; and he contemplates the side of the altar.

The young man, who had disturbed by violence a feast of Apollo, murmurs:

“My only chance was to fly to the mountains!”

“The soldiers would have caught you,” says one of the brethren.

“Oh! I could have done like Cyprian; I should have come back; and the second time I should have had more strength, you may be sure!”

Then he thinks of the countless days he should have lived, with all the pleasures which he will not have known; — and he, likewise, contemplates the side of the altar.

But the man in the black tunic rushes up to him:

“How scandalous! What? You a victim of election? Think of all these women who are looking at you! And then, God sometimes performs a miracle. Pionius benumbed the hands of his executioners; and the blood of Polycarp extinguished the flames of his funeral-pile.”

He turns towards the old man. “Father, father! You ought to edify us by your death. By deferring it, you will, without doubt, commit some bad action which will destroy the fruit of your good deeds. Besides, the power of God is infinite. Perhaps your example will convert the entire people.”

And, in the den opposite, the lions stride up and down, without stopping, rapidly, with a continuous movement. The largest of them all at once fixes his eyes on Antony and emits a roar, and a mass of vapour issues from his jaws.

The women are jammed up against the men.

The consoler goes from one to another:

“What would ye say — what would any of you say — if they burned you with plates of iron; if horses tore you asunder; if your body, coated with honey, was devoured by insects? You will have only the death of a hunter who is surprised in a wood.”

Antony would much prefer all this than the horrible wild beasts; he imagines he feels their teeth and their talons, and that he hears his back cracking under their jaws.

A belluarius enters the dungeon; the martyrs tremble. One alone amongst them is unmoved — the Phrygian, who has gone into a corner to pray. He had burned three temples. He now advances with lifted arms, open mouth, and his head towards Heaven, without seeing anything, like a somnambulist.

The consoler exclaims:

“Keep back! Keep back! The Spirit of Montanus will destroy ye!”

All fall back, vociferating:

“Damnation to the Montanist!”

They insult him, spit upon him, would like to strike him. The lions, prancing, bite one another’s manes. The people yell:

“To the beasts! To the beasts!”

The martyrs, bursting into sobs, catch hold of one another. A cup of narcotic wine is offered to them. They quickly pass it from hand to hand.

Near the door of the den another belluarius awaits the signal. It opens; a lion comes out.

He crosses the arena with great irregular strides. Behind him in a row appear the other lions, then a bear, three panthers, and leopards. They scatter like a flock in a prairie.

The cracking of a whip is heard. The Christians stagger, and, in order to make an end of it, their brethren push them forward.

Antony closes his eyes.

He opens them again. But darkness envelops him. Ere long, it grows bright once more; and he is able to trace the outlines of a plain, arid and covered with knolls, such as may be seen around a deserted quarry. Here and there a clump of shrubs lifts itself in the midst of the slabs, which are on a level with the soil, and above which white forms are bending, more undefined than clouds. Others rapidly make their appearance. Eyes shine through the openings of long veils. By their indolent gait and the perfumes which exhale from them, Antony knows they are ladies of patrician rank. There are also men, but of inferior condition, for they have visages at the same time simple and coarse.

One of the women, with a long breath:

“Ah! how pleasant is the air of the chilly night in the midst of sepulchres! I am so fatigued with the softness of couches, the noise of day, and the oppressiveness of the sun!”

A woman, panting — “Ah! at last, here I am! But how irksome to have wedded an idolater!”

Another — “The visits to the prisons, the conversations with our brethren, all excite the suspicions of our husbands! And we must even hide ourselves from them when making the sign of the Cross; they would take it for a magical conjuration."

Another — "With mine, there was nothing but quarrelling all day long. I did not like to submit to the abuses to which he subjected my person; and, for revenge, he had me persecuted as a Christian."

Another — "Recall to your memory that young man of such striking beauty who was dragged by the heels behind a chariot, like Hector, from the Esquiline Gate to the Mountains of Tibur; and his blood stained the bushes on both sides of the road. I collected the drops — here they are!"

She draws from her bosom a sponge perfectly black, covers it with kisses, and then flings herself upon the slab, crying:

"Ah! my friend! my friend!"

A man — "It is just three years to-day since Domitilla's death. She was stoned at the bottom of the Wood of Proserpine. I gathered her bones, which shone like glow-worms in the grass. The earth now covers them."

He flings himself upon a tombstone.

"O my betrothed! my betrothed!"

And all the others, scattered through the plain:

"O my sister!" "O my brother!" "O my daughter!" "O my mother!"

They are on their knees, their foreheads clasped with their hands, or their bodies lying flat with both arms extended; and the sobs which they repress make their bosoms swell almost to bursting. They gaze up at the sky, saying:

"Have pity on her soul, O my God! She is languishing in the abode of shadows. Deign to admit her into the Resurrection, so that she may rejoice in Thy light!"

Or, with eyes fixed on the flagstones, they murmur:

"Be at rest — suffer no more! I have brought thee wine and meat!"

A widow — "Here is pudding, made by me, according to his taste, with many eggs, and a double measure of flour. We are going to eat together as of yore, is not that so?"

She puts a little of it on her lips, and suddenly begins to laugh in an extravagant fashion, frantically.

The others, like her, nibble a morsel and drink a mouthful; they tell one another the history of their martyrs; their sorrow becomes vehement; their libations increase; their eyes, swimming with tears, are fixed on one another; they stammer with inebriety and desolation. Gradually their hands touch; their lips meet; their veils are torn away, and they embrace one another upon the tombs in the midst of the cups and the torches.

The sky begins to brighten. The mist soaks their garments; and, as if they were strangers to one another, they take their departure by different roads into the country.

The sun shines forth. The grass has grown taller; the plain has become transformed. Across the bamboos, Antony sees a forest of columns of a bluish-grey colour. Those are trunks of trees springing from a single trunk. From each of its branches descend other branches which penetrate into the soil; and the whole of those horizontal and perpendicular lines, indefinitely multiplied, might be compared to a gigantic framework were it not that here and there appears a little fig-tree with a dark foliage like that of a sycamore. Between the branches he distinguishes bunches of yellow flowers and violets, and ferns as large as birds' feathers. Under the lowest branches may be seen at different points the horns of a buffalo, or the glittering eyes of an antelope. Parrots sit perched, butterflies flutter, lizards crawl upon the ground, flies buzz; and one can hear, as it were, in the midst of the silence, the palpitation of an all-permeating life.

At the entrance of the wood, on a kind of pile, is a strange sight — a man coated over with cows' dung, completely naked, more dried-up than a mummy. His joints form knots at the extremities of his bones, which are like sticks. He has clusters of shells in his ears, his face is very long, and his nose is like a vulture's beak. His left arm is held erect in the air, crooked, and stiff as a stake; and he has remained there so long that birds have made a nest in his hair.

At the four corners of his pile four fires are blazing. The sun is right in his face. He gazes at it with great open eyes, and without looking at Antony.

“Brahmin of the banks of the Nile, what sayest thou?”

Flames start out on every side through the partings of the beams; and the gymnosophist resumes:

“Like a rhinoceros, I am plunged in solitude. I dwelt in the tree that was behind me.”

In fact, the large fig-tree presents in its flutings a natural excavation of the shape of a man.

“And I fed myself on flowers and fruits with such an observance of precepts that not even a dog has seen me eat.

“As existence proceeds from corruption, corruption from desire, desire from sensation, and sensation from contact, I have avoided every kind of action, every kind of contact, and — without stirring any more than the pillar of a tombstone — exhaling my breath through my two nostrils, fixing my glances upon my nose; and, observing the ether in my spirit, the world in my limbs, the moon in my heart, I pondered on the essence of the great soul, whence continually escape, like sparks of fire, the principles of life. I have, at last, grasped the supreme soul in all beings, all beings in the supreme soul; and I have succeeded in making my soul penetrate the place into which my senses used to penetrate.

“I receive knowledge directly from Heaven, like the bird Tchataka, who quenches his thirst only in the droppings of the rain. From the very fact of my having knowledge of things, things no longer exist. For me now there is no hope and no anguish, no goodness, no virtue, neither day nor night, neither thou nor I — absolutely nothing.

“My frightful austerities have made me superior to the Powers. A contraction of my brain can kill a hundred kings’ sons, dethrone gods, overrun the world.”

He utters all this in a monotonous voice. The leaves all around him are withered. The rats fly over the ground.

He slowly lowers his eyes towards the flames, which are rising, then adds:

“I have become disgusted with form, disgusted with perception, disgusted even with knowledge itself — for thought does not outlive the transitory fact that gives rise to it; and the spirit, like the rest, is but an illusion.

“Everything that is born will perish; everything that is dead will come to life again. The beings that have actually disappeared will sojourn in wombs not yet formed, and will come back to earth to serve with sorrow other creatures. But, as I have resolved through an infinite number of existences, under the guise of gods, men, and animals, I give up travelling, and no longer wish for this fatigue. I abandon the dirty inn of my body, walled in with flesh, reddened with blood, covered with hideous skin, full of uncleanness; and, for my reward, I shall, finally, sleep in the very depths of the absolute, in annihilation.”

The flames rise to his breast, then envelop him. His head stretches across as if through the hole of a wall. His eyes are perpetually fixed in a vacant stare.

Antony gets up again. The torch on the ground has set fire to the splinters of wood, and the flames have singed his beard. Bursting into an exclamation, Antony tramples on the fire; and, when only a heap of cinders is left:

“Where, then, is Hilarion? He was here just now. I saw him! Ah! no; it is impossible! I am mistaken! How is this? My cell, those stones, the sand, have not, perhaps, any more reality. I must be going mad. Stay! where was I? What was happening here?

“Ah! the gymnosophist! This death is common amongst the Indian sages. Kalanos burned himself before Alexander; another did the same in the time of Augustus. What hatred of life they must have had! — unless, indeed, pride drove them to it. No matter, it is the intrepidity of martyrs! As to the others, I now believe all that has been told me of the excesses they have occasioned.

“And before this? Yes, I recollect! the crowd of heresiarchs ... What shrieks! what eyes! But why so many outbreaks of the flesh and wanderings of the spirit?

“It is towards God they pretend to direct their thoughts in all these different ways. What right have I to curse them, I who stumble in my own path? When they have disappeared, I shall, perhaps, learn more. This one rushed away too quickly; I had not time to reply to him. Just now it is as if I had in my intellect more space and more light. I am tranquil. I feel myself capable ... But what is this now? I thought I had extinguished the fire.”

A flame flutters between the rocks; and, speedily, a jerky voice makes itself heard from the mountains in the distance.

“Are those the barkings of a hyena, or the lamentations of some lost traveller?”

Antony listens. The flame draws nearer.

And he sees approaching a woman who is weeping, resting on the shoulder of a man with a white beard. She is covered with a purple garment all in rags. He, like her, is bare-headed, with a tunic of the same colour, and carries a bronze vase, whence arises a small blue flame.

Antony is filled with fear, — and yet he would fain know who this woman is.

The stranger (Simon) — "This is a young girl, a poor child, whom I take everywhere with me."

He raises the bronze vase. Antony inspects her by the light of this flickering flame. She has on her face marks of bites, and traces of blows along her arms. Her scattered hair is entangled in the rents of her rags; her eyes appear insensible to the light.

Simon — "Sometimes she remains thus a long time without speaking or eating, and utters marvellous things."

Antony — "Really?"

Simon — "Eunoia! Eunoia! relate what you have to say!"

She turns around her eyeballs, as if awakening from a dream, passes her fingers slowly across her two lids, and in a mournful voice:

Helena (Eunoia) — "I have a recollection of a distant region, of the colour of emerald. There is only a single tree there."

Antony gives a start.

"At each step of its huge branches a pair of spirits stand. The branches around them cross each other, like the veins of a body, and they watch the eternal life circulating from the roots, where it is lost in shadow up to the summit, which reaches beyond the sun. I, on the second branch, illumined with my face the summer nights."

Antony, touching his forehead — "Ah! ah! I understand! the head!"

Simon, with his finger on his lips — "Hush! Hush!"

Helena — "The vessel remained convex: her keel clave the foam. He said to me, 'What does it matter if I disturb my country, if I lose my kingdom! You will be mine, in my own house!'

"How pleasant was the upper chamber of his palace! He would lie down upon the ivory bed, and, smoothing my hair, would sing in an amorous strain. At the end of the day, I could see the two camps and the lanterns which they were lighting; Ulysses at the edge of his tent; Achilles, armed from head to foot, driving a chariot along the seashore."

Antony — "Why, she is quite mad! Wherefore? ..."

Simon — "Hush! Hush!"

Helena — "They rubbed me with unguents, and sold me to the people to amuse them. One evening, standing with the sistrum in my hand, I was coaxing Greek sailors to dance. The rain, like a cataract, fell upon the tavern, and the cups of hot wine were smoking. A man entered without the door having been opened."

Simon — "It was I! I found you. Here she is, Antony; she who is called Sigehe, Eunoia, Barbelo, Prounikos! The Spirits who govern the world were jealous of her, and they bound her in the body of a woman. She was the Helen of the Trojans, whose memory the poet Stesichorus had rendered infamous. She has been Lucretia, the patrician lady violated by the kings. She was Delilah, who cut off the hair of Samson. She was that daughter of Israel who surrendered herself to he-goats. She has loved adultery, idolatry, lying and folly. She was prostituted by every nation. She has sung in all the cross-ways. She has kissed every face. At Tyre, she, the Syrian, was the mistress of thieves. She drank with them during the nights, and she concealed assassins amid the vermin of her tepid bed."

Antony — "Ah! what is coming over me?"

Simon, with a furious air —

"I have redeemed her, I tell you, and re-established her in all her splendour, such as Caius Cæsar Agricola became enamoured of when he desired to sleep with the Moon!"

Antony — -"Well! well!"

Simon — "But she really is the Moon! Has not Pope Clement written that she was imprisoned in a tower? Three hundred persons came to surround the tower; and on each of the murderers, at the same time, the moon was seen to appear, — though there are not many moons in the world, or many Eunoias!"

Antony — "Yes! ... I think I recollect ..."

And he falls into a reverie.

Simon — "Innocent as Christ, who died for men, she has devoted herself to women. For the powerlessness of Jehovah is demonstrated by the transgression of Adam, and we must shake off the old law, opposed, as it is, to the order of things. I have preached the new Gospel in Ephraim and in Issachar, along the torrent of Bizzor, behind the lake of Houleh, in the valley of Mageddo, and beyond the mountains, at Bostra and at Damas. Let those who are covered with wine-dregs, those who are covered with dirt, those who are covered with blood, come to me; and I will wash out their defilement with the Holy Spirit, called by the Greeks, Minerva. She is Minerva! She is the Holy Spirit! I am Jupiter Apollo, the Christ, the Paraclete, the great power of God incarnated in the person of Simon!"

Antony — "Ah! it is you! ... it is you! But I know your crimes! You were born at Gittha on the borders of Samaria. Dositheus, your first master, dismissed you! You execrate Saint Paul for having converted one of your women; and, vanquished by Saint Peter, in your rage and terror, you flung into the waves the bag which contained your magical instruments!"

Simon — "Do you desire them?"

Antony looks at him, and an inner voice murmurs in his breast, "Why not?"

Simon resumes:

"He who understands the powers of Nature and the substance of spirits ought to perform miracles. It is the dream of all sages — and the desire of which gnaws you; confess it!

"Amongst the Romans I flew so high in the circus that they saw me no more. Nero ordered me to be decapitated; but it was a sheep's head that fell to the ground instead of mine. Finally, they buried me alive; but I came back to life on the third day. The proof of it is that I am here!"

He gives him his hands to smell. They have the odour of a corpse. Antony recoils.

"I can make bronze serpents move, marble statues laugh, and dogs speak. I will show you an immense quantity of gold, I will set up kings, you shall see nations adoring me. I can walk on the clouds and on the waves; pass through mountains; assume the appearance of a young man, or of an old man; of a tiger, or of an ant; take your face, give you mine; and drive the thunderbolt. Do you hear?"

The thunder rolls, followed by flashes of lightning.

"It is the voice of the Most High, 'for the Eternal, thy God, is a fire,' and all creations operate by the emanations of this central fire. You are about to receive the baptism of it — that second baptism, announced by Jesus, which fell on the Apostles one stormy day when the window was open!”

And all the while stirring the flame with his hand, slowly, as if to sprinkle Antony with it:

“Mother of Mercies, thou who discoverest secrets in order that we may have rest in the eighth house ...”

Antony exclaims:

“Ah! if I had holy water!”

The flame goes out, producing much smoke.

Eunioia and Simon have disappeared.

An extremely cold fog, opaque and f[oe]tid, fills the atmosphere.

Antony, extending his arms like a blind man —

“Where am I? ... I am afraid of falling into the abyss. And the cross, no doubt, is too far away from me. Ah! what a night! what a night!”

A sudden gust of wind cleaves the fog asunder; and he perceives two men covered with long white tunics. The first is of tall stature, with a sweet expression of countenance and grave deportment. His white hair, parted like that of Christ, descends regularly over his shoulders. He has thrown down a wand which he was carrying in his hand, and which his companion has taken up, making a respectful bow after the fashion of Orientals. The other is small, coarse-looking, flat-nosed, with a thick neck, curly hair, and an air of simplicity. Both of them are bare-footed, bare-headed, and covered with dust, like people who have come on a long journey.

Antony, with a start — “What do ye seek? Speak! Go on!”

Damis — He is the little man —

“La, la! ... worthy hermit! what do you say? I know nothing about it. Here is the Master!”

He sits down; the other remains standing. Silence.

Antony, resumes — “Ye come in this fashion? ...”

Damis — “Oh! a great distance — a very great distance!”

Antony — “And ye are going? ...”

Damis, pointing at his companion — “Wherever he wishes.”

Antony — “Who, then, is he?”

Damis — “Look at him.”

Antony — “He has the appearance of a saint. If I dared ...”

The fog by this time is quite gone. The atmosphere has become perfectly clear. The moon shines out.

Damis — "What are you thinking of now that you say nothing more?"

Antony — "I am thinking of — — Oh! nothing."

Damis draws close to Apollonius, makes many turns round him, with his figure bent, and without moving his head.

"Master, this is a Galilean hermit who wishes to know the sources of your wisdom."

Apollonius — "Let him approach."

Antony hesitates.

Damis — "Approach!"

Apollonius, in a voice of thunder —

"Approach! You would like to know who I am, what I have done, what I am thinking of? Is that not so, child?"

Antony — "... If at the same time those things contribute to my salvation."

Apollonius — "Rejoice! I am about to tell them to you!"

Damis, in a low tone to Antony —

"Is it possible? He must have, at the first glance, recognised your extraordinary inclinations for philosophy! I shall profit by it also myself."

Apollonius — "I will first describe to you the long road I travelled to gain doctrine; and, if you find in all my life one bad action, you will stop me — for he must scandalise by his words who has offended by his actions."

Damis to Antony:

"What a just man! eh?"

Antony — "Decidedly, I believe he is sincere."

Apollonius — "The night of my birth, my mother thought she saw herself gathering flowers on the border of a lake. A flash of lightning appeared; and she brought me into the world amid the cries of swans who were singing in her dream. Up to my fifteenth year, they plunged me three times a day into the fountain Asbadeus, whose waters render perjurers dropsical; and they rubbed my body with leaves of cnyza, to make me chaste. A princess from Palmyra sought me out, one evening, and offered me treasures, which she knew were hidden in tombs. A priest of the temple of Diana cut his throat in despair with the sacrificial knife; and the Governor of Cilicia, after repeated promises, declared before my family that he would put me to death; but it was he who died three days after, assassinated by the Romans."

Damis, to Antony, striking him on the elbow — "Eh? Just as I told you! What a man!"

Apollonius — "I have for four years in succession observed the complete silence of the Pythagoreans. The most unforeseen calamity did not draw one sigh from me; and, at the theatre, when I entered, they turned aside from me as from a phantom."

Damis — "Would you have done that — you?"

Apollonius — "The time of my ordeal ended, I undertook to instruct the priests who had lost the tradition."

Antony — "What tradition?"

Damis — "Let him continue. Be silent!"

Apollonius — "I have conversed with the Samaneans of the Ganges, with the astrologers of Chaldea, with the magi of Babylon, with the Gaulish druids, with the priests of the negroes. I have climbed the fourteen Olympi; I have sounded the Lakes of Sythia; I have measured the vastness of the desert!"

Damis — "All this is undoubtedly true. I was there myself!"

Apollonius — "At first, I went as far as the Hyrcanian Sea. I have gone all round it, and through the country of the Baraomataë, where Bucephalus is buried. I have gone down to Nineveh. At the gates of the city a man came up to me."

Damis — "I! I! my good Master! I loved you from the very beginning. You were sweeter than a girl, and more beautiful than a god!"

Apollonius, without listening to him — "He wished to accompany me, in order to act as an interpreter for me."

Damis — "But you replied that you understood every language, and that you divined all thoughts. Then I kissed the end of your mantle, and I walked behind you."

Apollonius — "After Ctesiphon, we entered into the land of Babylon."

Damis — "And the satrap uttered an exclamation on seeing a man so pale."

Antony, to himself — "Which signifies — — ?"

Apollonius — "The King received me standing near a throne of silver, in a circular hall studded with stars, and from a cupola hung, from unseen threads, four great golden birds, with both wings extended."

Antony, musing — "Are there such things on the earth?"

Damis — "That is, indeed, a city — Babylon! Everyone is rich there! The houses, painted blue, have gates of bronze, with staircases that lead down to the river."

Making a sketch with his stick on the ground:

"Like that, do you see? And then there are temples, squares, baths, aqueducts! The palaces are covered with copper! and then the interior, if you only saw it!"

Apollonius — "On the northern wall rises a tower, which supports a second, a third, a fourth, a fifth; and there are three others besides! The eighth is a chapel with a bed in it. Nobody enters there but the woman chosen by the priests for the God Belus. The King of Babylon made me take up my quarters in it."

Damis — "They scarcely paid any heed to me. I was left, too, to walk about the streets by myself. I enquired into the customs of the people; I visited the workshops; I examined the huge machines which bring water into the gardens. But it annoyed me to be separated from the Master."

Apollonius — "At last, we left Babylon; and, by the light of the moon, we suddenly saw a wild mare."

Damis — "Yes, indeed! she sprang forth on her iron hoofs; she neighed like an ass; she galloped amongst the rocks. He burst into angry abuse of her; and she disappeared."

Antony, aside — "Where can they have come from?"

Apollonius — "At Taxilla, capital of five thousand fortresses, Phraortes, King of the Ganges, showed us his guard of tall black men, five cubits high, and in the gardens of his palace, under a pavilion of green brocade, an enormous elephant, whom the queens used to amuse themselves in perfuming. This was the elephant of Porus, who fled after the death of Alexander."

Damis — "And which was found again in a forest."

Antony — "They talk a great deal, like drunken people."

Apollonius — "Phraortes made us sit down at his table."

Damis — "What an odd country! The noblemen, while drinking, amuse themselves by flinging arrows under the feet of a child who is dancing. But I do not approve ..."

Apollonius — "When I was ready to depart, the King gave me a parasol, and said to me: 'I have, on the Indus, a stud of white camels. When you do not want them any longer, blow into their ears, and they will return.' We proceeded along the river, walking in the night by the gleaming of the glow-worms, who emitted their radiance through the bamboos. The slave whistled an air to keep off the serpents; and our camels bent the reins while passing under the trees, as if under doors that were too low. One day, a black child, who held in his hand a caduceus of gold, conducted us to the College of Sages. Iarchas, their chief, spoke to me of my ancestors, of all my thoughts, of all my actions, and all my existences. He had been the river Indus, and he recalled to my mind that I had conducted the boats on the Nile in the time of King Sesostrius."

Damis — "As for me, they told me nothing, so that I do not know what I was."

Antony — "They have the unsubstantial air of shadows."

Apollonius — "We met on the seashore the cynocephali, glutted with milk, who were returning from their expedition in the Island of Taprobane. The tepid waves pushed white pearls before us. The amber cracked under our footsteps. Whales' skeletons were bleaching in the crevices of the cliffs. In short, the earth grew more contracted than a sandal; — and, after casting towards the sun drops from the ocean, we turned to the right to go back. We returned through the region of the Aromataë, through the country of the Gangaridæ, the promontory of Comaria, the land of the Sachalitæ, of the Aramitæ, and the Homeritæ; then across the Cassanian mountains, the Red Sea, and the Island of Topazes, we penetrated into Ethiopia, through the kingdom of the Pygmæi."

Antony, aside — "How large the earth is!"

Damis — "And when we got home again, all those whom we had known in former days were dead."

Antony hangs his head. Silence.

Apollonius goes on:

"Then they began talking about me in the world. The plague ravaged Ephesus; I made them stone an old mendicant."

Damis — "And the plague was gone!"

Antony — "What! He banishes diseases?"

Apollonius — "At Cnidus, I cured the lover of Venus."

Damis — "Yes, a madman, who had even promised to marry her. To love a woman is bad enough; but a statue — what idiocy! The Master placed his hand on this man's heart, and immediately the love was extinguished."

Antony — "What! He drives out demons?"

Apollonius — "At Tarentum, they brought to the stake a young girl who was dead."

Damis — "The Master touched her lips; and she arose, calling on her mother."

Antony — "Can it be? He brings the dead back to life?"

Apollonius — "I foretold that Vespasian would be Emperor."

Antony — "What! He divines the future?"

Damis — "There was at Corinth — —"

Apollonius — "While I was supping with him at the waters of Baia — —"

Antony — "Excuse me, strangers; it is late!"

Damis — " — — A young man named Menippus."

Antony — "No! no! go away!"

Apollonius — " — — A dog entered, carrying in its mouth a hand that had been cut off."

Damis — " — — One evening, in one of the suburbs, he met a woman."

Antony — "You do not hear me. Take yourselves off!"

Damis — " — — He prowled vacantly around the couches."

Antony — "Enough!"

Apollonius — " — — They wanted to drive him away."

Damis — " — — Menippus, then, surrendered himself to her; and they became lovers."

Apollonius — " — — And, beating the mosaic floor with his tail, he deposited this hand on the knees of Flavius."

Damis — " — — But, in the morning, at the school-lectures, Menippus was pale."

Antony, with a bound — "Still at it! Well, let them go on, since there is not ..."

Damis — "The Master said to him: 'O beautiful young man, you are caressing a serpent; and a serpent is caressing you. For how long are these nuptials?' Every one of us went to the wedding."

Antony — "I am doing wrong, surely, in listening to this!"

Damis — "Servants were busily engaged at the vestibule; the doors flew open; nevertheless, one could hear neither the noise of footsteps, nor the sound of opening doors. The Master seated himself beside Menippus. Immediately, the bride was seized with anger against the philosophers. But the vessels of gold, the cup-bearers, the cooks, the attendants, disappeared; the roof flew away; the walls fell in; and Apollonius remained alone, standing with this woman all in tears at his feet. It was a vampire, who satisfied the handsome young men in order to devour their flesh — because nothing is better for phantoms of this kind than the blood of lovers."

Apollonius — "If you wish to know the art — —"

Antony — "I wish to know nothing."

Apollonius — "On the evening of our arrival at the gates of Rome — —"

Antony — "Oh! yes, tell me about the City of the Popes."

Apollonius — " — — A drunken man accosted us who sang with a sweet voice. It was an epithalamium of Nero; and he had the power of causing the death of anyone who heard him with indifference. He carried on his back in a box a string taken from the cithara of the Emperor. I shrugged my shoulders. He threw mud in our faces. Then I unfastened my girdle and placed it in his hands."

Damis — "In this instance you were quite wrong!"

Apollonius — "The Emperor, during the night, made me call at his residence. He played at ossicles with Sporus, leaning with his left arm on a table of agate. He turned round, and, knitting his fair brows: 'Why are you not afraid of me?' he asked. 'Because the God who made you terrible has made me intrepid,' I replied."

Antony, to himself — "Something unaccountable fills me with fear."

Silence.

Damis resumes, in a shrill voice — "All Asia, moreover, could tell you ...”

Antony, starting up — ”I am sick. Leave me!”

Damis — ”Listen now. At Ephesus, he witnessed the death of Domitian, who was at Rome.”

Antony making an effort to laugh — ”Is this possible?”

Damis — ”Yes, at the theatre, in broad daylight, on the fourteenth of the Kalends of October, he suddenly exclaimed: ‘They are murdering Cæsar!’ and he added, every now and then, ‘He rolls on the ground! Oh! how he struggles! He gets up again; he attempts to fly; the gates are shut. Ah! it is finished. He is dead!’ And that very day, in fact, Titus Flavius Domitianus was assassinated, as you are aware.”

Antony — ”Without the aid of the Devil ... No doubt ...”

Apollonius — ”He wished to put me to death, this Domitian. Damis fled by my direction, and I remained alone in my prison.”

Damis — ”It was a terrible bit of daring, I must confess!”

Apollonius — ”About the fifth hour, the soldiers led me to the tribunal. I had my speech quite ready, which I kept under my cloak.”

Damis — ”The rest of us were on the bank of Puzzoli! We saw you die; we wept; when, towards the sixth hour, all at once, you appeared, and said to us, ‘It is I.’“

Antony, aside — ”Just like Him!”

Damis, very loudly — ”Absolutely!”

Antony — ”Oh, no! you are lying, are you not? You are lying!”

Apollonius — ”He came down from Heaven — I ascend there, thanks to my virtue, which has raised me even to the height of the Most High!”

Damis — ”Tyana, his native city, has erected a temple with priests in his honour!”

Apollonius draws close to Antony, and, bending towards his ear, says:

“The truth is, I know all the gods, all the rites, all the prayers, all the oracles. I have penetrated into the cavern of Trophonius, the son of Apollo. I have moulded for the Syracusans the cakes which they use on the mountains. I have undergone the eighty tests of Mithra. I have pressed against my heart the serpent of Sabacius. I have received the scarf of the Cabiri. I have bathed Cybele in the waves of the Campanian Gulf; and I have passed three moons in the caverns of Samothrace!"

Damis, laughing stupidly — "Ah! ah! ah! at the mysteries of the Bona Dea!"

Apollonius — "And now we are renewing our pilgrimage. We are going to the North, the side of the swans and the snows. On the white plain the blind hippopodes break with the ends of their feet the ultramarine plant."

Damis — "Come! it is morning! The cock has crowed; the horse has neighed; the ship is ready."

Antony — "The cock has not crowed. I hear the cricket in the sands, and I see the moon, which remains in its place."

Apollonius — "We are going to the South, behind the mountains and the huge waves, to seek in the perfumes for the cause of love. You shall inhale the odour of myrrhodon, which makes the weak die. You shall bathe your body in the lake of pink oil of the Island of Juno. You shall see sleeping under the primroses the lizard who awakens all the centuries when at his maturity the carbuncle falls from his forehead. The stars glitter like eyes, the cascades sing like lyres, an intoxicating fragrance arises from the opening flowers. Your spirit shall expand in this atmosphere, and it will show itself in your heart as well as in your face."

Damis — "Master, it is time! The wind is about to rise; the swallows are awakening; the myrtle-leaf is shed."

Apollonius — "Yes, let us go!"

Antony — "No — not I! I remain!"

Apollonius — "Do you wish me to show you the plant Balis, which resuscitates the dead?"

Damis — "Ask him rather for the bloodstone, which attracts silver, iron and bronze!"

Antony — "Oh! how sick I feel! how sick I feel!"

Damis — "You shall understand the voices of all creatures, the roarings, the cooings!"

Apollonius — "I will make you mount the unicorns, the dragons, and the dolphins!"

Antony, weeps — "Oh! oh! oh!"

Apollonius — "You shall know the demons who dwell in the caverns, those who speak in the woods, those who move about in the waves, those who drive the clouds.”

Damis — “Fasten your girdle! tie your sandals!”

Apollonius — “I will explain to you the reasons for the shapes of divinities; why it is that Apollo is upright, Jupiter sitting down, Venus black at Corinth, square at Athens, conical at Paphos.”

Antony, clasping his hands — “I wish they would go away! I wish they would go away!”

Apollonius — “I will snatch off before your eyes the armour of the Gods; we shall force the sanctuaries; I will make you violate the pythoness!”

Antony — “Help, Lord!”

He flings himself against the cross.

Apollonius — “What is your desire? your dream? There’s barely time to think of it ...”

Antony — “Jesus, Jesus, come to my aid!”

Apollonius — “Do you wish me to make Jesus appear?”

Antony — “What? How?”

Apollonius — “It shall be He — and no other! He shall cast off His crown, and we shall speak together face to face!”

Damis, in a low tone — “Say what you wish for most! Say what you wish for most!”

Antony, at the foot of the cross, murmurs prayers. Damis continues to run around him with wheedling gestures.

“See, worthy hermit, dear Saint Antony! pure man, illustrious man! man who cannot be sufficiently praised! Do not be alarmed; this is an exaggerated style of speaking, borrowed from the Orientals. It in no way prevents — ”

Apollonius — “Let him alone, Damis! He believes, like a brute, in the reality of things. The fear which he has of the gods prevents him from comprehending them; and he eats his own words, just like a jealous king! But you, my son, quit me not!”

He steps back to the verge of the cliffs, passes over it and remains there, hanging in mid-air:

“Above all forms, farther than the earth, beyond the skies, dwells the World of Ideas, entirely filled with the Word. With one bound we leap across Space, and you shall grasp in its infinity the Eternal, the Absolute Being! Come! give me your hand. Let us go!”

The pair, side by side, rise softly into the air.

Antony, embracing the cross, watches them ascending.

They disappear.

CHAPTER V.

All Gods, All Religions.

ANTONY, walking slowly — "That was really Hell!

"Nebuchadnezzar did not dazzle me so much. The Queen of Sheba did not bewitch me so thoroughly. The way in which he spoke about the gods filled me with a longing to know them.

"I recollect having seen hundreds of them at a time, in the Island of Elephantinum, in the reign of Dioclesian. The Emperor had given up to the nomads a large territory, on condition that they should protect the frontiers; and the treaty was concluded in the name of the invisible Powers. For the gods of every people were ignorant about other people. The Barbarians had brought forward theirs. They occupied the hillocks of sand which line the river. One could see them holding their idols between their arms, like great paralytic children, or else, sailing amid cataracts on trunks of palm-trees, they pointed out from a distance the amulets on their necks and the tattooings on their breasts; and that is not more criminal than the religion of the Greeks, the Asiatics, and the Romans.

"When I dwelt in the Temple of Heliopolis, I used often to contemplate all the objects on the walls: vultures carrying sceptres, crocodiles playing on lyres, men's faces joined to serpents' bodies, women with cows' heads prostrated before the ithyphallic deities; and their supernatural forms carried me away into other worlds. I wished to know what those calm eyes were gazing at. In order that matter should have so much power, it should contain a spirit. The souls of the gods are attached to their images. Those who possess external beauty may fascinate us; but the others, who are abject or terrible ... how to believe in them? ..."

And he sees moving past, close to the ground, leaves, stones, shells, branches of trees, vague representations of animals, then a species of dropsical dwarfs. These are gods. He bursts out laughing.

Behind him, he hears another outburst of laughter; and Hilarion presents himself, dressed like a hermit, much bigger than before — in fact, colossal.

Antony is not surprised at seeing him again.

“What a brute one must be to adore a thing like that!”

Hilarion — “Oh! yes; very much of a brute!”

Then advance before them, one by one, idols of all nations and all ages, in wood, in metal, in granite, in feathers, and in skins sewn together. The oldest of them, anterior to the Deluge, are lost to view beneath the seaweed which hangs from them like hair. Some, too long for their lower portions, crack in their joints and break their loins while walking. Others allow sand to flow out through holes in their bellies.

Antony and Hilarion are prodigiously amused. They hold their sides from sheer laughter.

After this, idols pass with faces like sheep. They stagger on their bandy legs, open wide their eyelids, and bleat out, like dumb animals: “Ba! ba! ba!”

In proportion as they approach the human type, they irritate Antony the more. He strikes them with his fist, kicks them, rushes madly upon them. They begin to present a horrible aspect, with high tufts, eyes like bulls, arms terminated with claws, and the jaws of a shark. And, before these gods, men are slaughtered on altars of stone, while others are pounded in vats, crushed under chariot-wheels, or nailed to trees. There is one of them, all in red-hot iron, with the horns of a bull, who devours children.

Antony — “Horror!”

Hilarion — “But the gods always demand sufferings. Your own, even, has wished — ”

Antony, weeping — “Say no more — hold your tongue!”

The enclosure of rocks changes into a valley. A herd of oxen pastures there on the shorn grass. The shepherd who has charge of them perceives a cloud; and in a sharp voice pierces the air with words of urgent entreaty.

Hilarion — “As he wants rain, he tries, by his strains, to coerce the King of Heaven to open the fruitful cloud.”

Antony, laughing — “This is too silly a form of presumption!”

Hilarion — “Why, then, do you perform exorcisms?”

The valley becomes a sea of milk, motionless and illimitable.

In the midst of it floats a long cradle, formed by the coils of a serpent, all whose heads, bending forward at the same time, overshadow a god who lies there asleep. He is young, beardless, more beautiful than a girl, and covered with diaphanous veils. The pearls of his tiara shine softly, like moons; a chaplet of stars winds itself many times above his breast, and, with one hand under his head and the other arm extended, he reposes with a dreamy and intoxicated air. A woman squatted before his feet awaits his awakening.

Hilarion — "This is the primordial duality of the Brahmins — the absolute not expressing itself by any form."

Upon the navel of the god a stalk of lotus has grown; and in its calyx appears another god with three faces.

Antony — "Hold! what an invention!"

Hilarion — "Father, Son and Holy Ghost, in the same way make only one person!"

The three heads are turned aside, and three immense gods appear. The first, who is of a rosy hue, bites the end of his toe. The second, who is blue, tosses four arms about. The third, who is green, weaves a necklace of human skulls. Immediately in front of them rise three goddesses, one wrapped in a net, another offering a cup, and the third brandishing a bow.

And these gods, these goddesses multiply, become tenfold. On their shoulders rise arms, and at the ends of their arms are hands holding banners, axes, bucklers, swords, parasols and drums. Fountains spring from their heads, grass hangs from their nostrils.

Riding on birds, cradled on palanquins, throned on seats of gold, standing in niches of ivory, they dream, travel, command, drink wine and inhale flowers. Dancing-girls whirl around; giants pursue monsters; at the entrances to the grottoes, solitaries meditate. Myriads of stars and clouds of streamers mingle in an indistinguishable throng. Peacocks drink from the streams of golden dust. The embroidery of the pavilions blends with the spots of the leopards. Coloured rays cross one another in the blue air, amid the flying of arrows and the swinging of censers. And all this unfolds itself, like a lofty frieze, leaning with its base on the rocks and mounting to the very sky.

Antony, dazzled — "What a number of them there are! What do they wish?"

Hilarion — "The one who is scratching his abdomen with his elephant's trunk is the solar god, the inspirer of wisdom. That other, whose six heads carry towers and fourteen handles of javelins, is the prince of armies, the fire-devourer. The old man riding on a crocodile is going to bathe the souls of the dead on the seashore. They will be tormented by this black woman with rotten teeth, the governess of hell. The chariot drawn by red mares, which a legless coachman is driving, is carrying about in broad daylight the master of the sun. The moon-god accompanies him in a litter drawn by three gazelles. On her knees, on the back of a parrot, the goddess of beauty is presenting her round breast to Love, her son. Here she is farther on; she leaps with joy in the prairies. Look! look! With a radiant mitre on her head, she runs over the cornfields, over the waves, mounts into the air, and exhibits herself everywhere. Between these gods sit the genii of the winds, of the planets, of the months, of the days, and a hundred thousand others! And their aspects are multiplied, their transformations rapid. Here is one who from a fish has become a tortoise, he assumes the head of a wild boar, the stature of a dwarf!"

Antony — "For what purpose?"

Hilarion — "To establish equilibrium, to combat evil. Life is exhausted, its forms are used up; and it is necessary to progress by metamorphoses of them."

Suddenly a naked man appears, seated in the middle of the sand with his legs crossed. A large circle vibrates, suspended behind him. The little curls of his black hair, deepening into an azure tint, twist symmetrically around a protuberance at the top of his head. His arms, of great length, fall straight down his sides. His two hands, with open palms, rest evenly on his thighs. The lower portions of his feet present the figures of two suns; and he remains completely motionless in front of Antony and Hilarion, with all the gods around him placed at intervals upon the rocks, as if on the seats of a circus. His lips open, and in a deep voice he says:

"I am the master of the great charity, the help of creatures, and I expound the law to believers and to the profane alike. To save the world I wished to be born amongst men; the gods wept when I went away. At first, I sought a woman suitable for the purpose — of warlike race, the spouse of a king, exceedingly virtuous and beautiful, with a deep navel, a body firm as a diamond; and at the time of the full moon, without the intervention of any male, I entered her womb. I came out through her right side. Then the stars stopped in their motions.”

Hilarion murmurs between his teeth:

““And when they saw the stars stop, they conceived a great joy!”“

Antony looks more attentively at the Buddha, who resumes:

“From the bottom of the Himalaya, a religious centenarian set forth to see me.”

Hilarion — ”“A man called Simeon, who was not to die before he had seen the Christ!”“

The Buddha — ”They brought me to the schools. I knew more than the doctors.”

Hilarion — ” ... ‘In the midst of the doctors; and all those who heard him were ravished by his wisdom.’“

Antony makes a sign to Hilarion to keep silent.

The Buddha — ”I went continually to meditate in the gardens. The shadows of the trees used to move; but the shadow of the one that sheltered me did not move. No one could equal me in the knowledge of the Sacred Writings, the enumeration of atoms, the management of elephants, waxworks, astronomy, poetry, boxing, all exercises and all arts. In compliance with custom, I took a wife; and I passed the days in my royal palace, arrayed in pearls, under a shower of perfumes, fanned by the fly-flappers of thirty-three thousand women, and gazing at my people from the tops of my terraces adorned with resounding bells. But the sight of the world’s miseries made me turn aside from pleasures. I fled. I went a-begging on high-ways, covered with rags collected in the sepulchres; and, as there was a very learned hermit, I offered myself as his servant. I guarded his door; I washed his feet. All sensation, all joy, all languor, were annihilated. Then, concentrating my thoughts on a larger field of meditation, I came to know the essence of things, the illusion of forms. I speedily abandoned the science of the Brakhmans. They are eaten up with lusts beneath their austere exterior; they anoint themselves with filth, and sleep upon thorns, believing that they arrive at happiness through the path of death!”

Hilarion — ”Pharisees, hypocrites, whited sepulchres, race of vipers!”

The Buddha — ”I, too, have done astonishing things — eating for a day only a single grain of rice — and at that time grains of rice were not bigger than they are now — my hair fell off; my body became black; my eyes, sunken in their sockets, seemed like stars seen at the bottom of a well. For six years I never moved, remaining exposed to flies, to lions, and to serpents; and I subjected myself to burning suns, heavy showers, snow, lightning, hail, and tempest, without even shielding myself with my hand. The travellers who passed, assuming that I was dead, flung clods of earth at me from a distance.

“There only remained for me to be tempted by the Devil.

“I invoked him.

“His sons came — hideous, covered with scales, nauseous as charcoal, howling, hissing, bellowing, flinging at each other armour and dead men’s bones. Some of them spirted out flames through their nostrils; others spread around darkness with their wings; others carried chaplets of fingers that had been cut off; others drank the venom of serpents out of the hollows of their hands. They have the heads of pigs, rhinoceroses, or toads — all kinds of figures calculated to inspire respect or terror.”

Antony, aside — “I endured that myself in former times.”

The Buddha — “Then he sent me his daughters — beautiful, well-attired with golden girdles, teeth white as the jasmine, and limbs round as an elephant’s trunk. Some of them stretched up their arms when they yawned to display the dimples in their elbows; others blinked their eyes; others began to laugh and others unfastened one another’s garments. Amongst them were blushing virgins, matrons full of pride, and queens with great trains of baggage and attendants.”

Antony, aside — “Ah! that also!”

The Buddha — “Having vanquished the demon. I passed twelve years in nourishing myself exclusively on perfumes, — and, as I had acquired the five virtues, the five faculties, the ten forces, the eighteen substances and penetrated into the four spheres of the invisible world, the Intelligence was mine, and I became the Buddha!”

All the gods bow down, those who have many heads lower them all at the same time. He raises his hand on high in the air, and resumes:

“In view of the deliverance of beings, I have made hundreds of thousands of sacrifices; I have given to the poor robes of silk, beds, chariots, houses, heaps of gold and diamonds. I have given my hands to the one-handed, my legs to the lame, my eyes to the blind; I have cut off my head for the decapitated. At the time when I was king, I distributed the provinces; at the time when I was Brakhman, I despised nobody. When I was a solitary I spoke words of tenderness to the thief who tried to cut my throat. When I was a tiger, I let myself die of hunger. And in this final stage of existence, having preached the law, I have nothing more to do. The great period is accomplished. The men, the animals, the gods, the bamboos, the oceans, the mountains, the grains of sand of the Ganges, with the myriads of myriads of stars, everything, must perish; and, until the new births, a flame will dance on the ruins of a world's overthrow."

Then a vertigo seizes the gods. They stagger, fall into convulsions, and vomit forth their existences. Their crowns break to pieces; their standards fly away. They get rid of their attributes and their sexes, fling over their shoulders the cups from which they drink immortality, strangle themselves with their serpents, and vanish in smoke; and, when they have all disappeared:

Hilarion, slowly — "You have just seen the creed of many hundreds of millions of men!"

Antony is on the earth, his face in his hands. Standing close to him, and turning his back to the cross, Hilarion watches him.

A rather lengthened period elapses.

Then a singular being appears, with the head of a man and the body of a fish. He advances straight through the air, tossing the sand with his tail; and his patriarchal face and his little arms make Antony laugh.

Oannes, in a plaintive voice — "Treat me with respect! I am the contemporary of the beginning of things.

"I have dwelt in the shapeless world, where slumbered hermaphrodite animals, under the weight of an opaque atmosphere, in the depths of gloomy waves — when the fingers, the fins, and the wings were confounded, and eyes without heads floated like molluscs amongst human-faced bulls and dog-footed serpents.

"Over the whole of those beings Omoroca, bent like a hoop, stretched her woman's body. But Belus cut her clean in two halves, made the earth with one, and the heavens with another; and the two worlds alike mutually contemplate each other. I, the first consciousness of chaos, I have arisen from the abyss to harden matter, to regulate forms; and I have taught men fishing, the sowing of seed, the scripture, and the history of the gods. Since then, I live in the ponds that remained after the Deluge. But the desert grows larger around them; the wind flings sand into them; the sun consumes them; and I expire on my bed of lemon while gazing across the water at the stars. Thither am I returning.”

He makes a plunge and disappears in the Nile.

Hilarion — ”This is an ancient god of the Chaldeans!”

Antony, ironically — ”Who, then, were the gods of Babylon?”

Hilarion — ”You can see them!”

And they find themselves upon the platform of a quadrangular tower rising above other towers, which, growing narrower in proportion as they rise, form a monstrous pyramid. You may distinguish below a great, black mass — the city, without doubt — stretching along the plain. The air is cold; the sky is of a sombre blue; the multitudinous stars palpitate.

In the middle of the platform stands a column of white stone. Priests in linen robes pass and return all round, so as to describe in their evolutions a moving circle, and, with heads raised, they contemplate the stars.

Hilarion points out several of them to Saint Antony:

“There are thirty chief priests. Fifteen gaze upon the region above the earth, and fifteen on the region below it. At regular intervals one of them rushes from the upper regions to the lower, whilst another abandons the lower to mount towards the empyrean.

“Of the seven planets, two are benevolent, two malevolent, and three ambiguous; everything in the world depends on these eternal fires. According to their position and their movements, one may draw prognostications, and you are now treading on the most sacred spot on earth. There Pythagoras and Zoroaster may be met. Two thousand years have these men been observing the sky, the better to comprehend the gods.”

Antony — ”The stars are not gods!”

Hilarion — ”Yes! say they; for, while things are continually passing around us, the sky, like eternity, remains unchangeable!”

Antony — ”Nevertheless, it has a master.”

Hilarion, pointing at the column — ”That is Belus, the first ray, the sun, the male! — the other, which is fruitful, is under him!”

Antony observes a garden lighted up with lamps. He is in the midst of the crowd in an avenue of cypress-trees. To right and left little paths lead towards huts erected in a wood of pomegranate-trees, which protect lattices of reeds. The men, for the most part, have pointed caps with laced robes, like the plumage of peacocks. There are people from the North clad in bearskins; nomads in brown woollen cloaks; pale Gangarides with long ear-rings; and the classes, like the nationalities, appear to be confused, for sailors and stone-cutters jostle against princes wearing tiaras of carbuncles and carrying large walking-sticks with carved heads. All hurry forward with dilated nostrils, filled with the same desire.

From time to time they got out of the way, in order to allow a long, covered chariot, drawn by oxen, to pass, or perhaps it is an ass jolting on his back a woman closely veiled, who also disappears in the direction of the huts.

Antony is frightened. He desires to turn back. However, an inexpressible curiosity leads him on.

Beneath the cypress-trees women are squatted in rows upon deerskins, each of them having for a diadem a plait of cords. Some of them, magnificently attired, address the passers-by in loud tones. The more timid keep their features hidden between their hands, whilst, from behind, a matron — no doubt, their mother — encourages them. Others, with heads enveloped in black shawls, and the rest of their bodies quite nude, seem, at a distance, like statues of flesh. As soon as a man flings money on their knees, they rise. And one can hear kisses amid the foliage, and sometimes a great, bitter cry.

Hilarion — "Those are the virgins of Babylon who prostitute themselves to the goddess."

Antony — "What goddess?"

Hilarion — "There she is!"

And he shows Antony, at the very end of the avenue, on the threshold of an illuminated grotto, a block of stone representing a woman.

Antony — "Infamy! What an abomination to give a sex to God!"

Hilarion — "You conceive Him, surely, as a living person!"

Once more Antony finds himself in darkness.

He perceives in the air a luminous circle placed on horizontal wings. This species of ring surrounds, like a girdle that is too loose, the figure of a small man with a mitre on his head and a crown in his hand, the lower part of whose body is shut out from view by the huge feathers exhibited in his kilt.

This is Ormuz, the God of the Persians. He flutters while he exclaims:

“I am terrified! I catch a glimpse of his mouth. I have vanquished thee, Ahriman! But thou art beginning again!

“At first, revolting against me, thou didst destroy the eldest of creatures, Kaiomortz, the man-bull. Then, thou didst seduce the first human pair, Meschia and Meschiana, and didst fill their hearts with darkness, and press forward thy battalions towards Heaven.

“I had my own, the inhabitants of the stars, and I gazed down from my throne on all the planets in their different spheres.

“Mithra, my son, dwelt in an inaccessible spot. There he received souls, and sent them forth, and, each morning he arose to pour out his riches.

“The splendour of the firmament was reflected by the earth. The fire shone on the mountains — image of the other fire with which I have created all beings. To secure it from defilement, they did not burn the dead, who were transported to Heaven on the beaks of birds.

“I have regulated pasturages, labours, the wood of sacrifice, the forms of cups, the words that must be uttered in insomnia; and my priests prayed continually in order that their worship should correspond to the eternity of God. They purified themselves with water; they offered up loaves on the altars; they confessed their sins in loud tones.

“Homa gave himself to men to drink in order to communicate his strength to them.

“While the genii of Heaven were fighting the demons, the children of Iran chased the serpents. The King, whom a countless train of courtiers served on bended knees, was attired so as to resemble me in person, and wore my head-dress. His gardens had the magnificence of a celestial earth; and his tomb represented him slaying a monster — emblem of the good which exterminates evil. For, one day, it came to pass — thanks to the endless course of time — that I triumphed over Ahriman. But the interval that separates us is disappearing; the night is rising! Help, Amschaspands, Irzeds, Ferouers! Come to my assistance, Mithra! take thy sword! Caosyac, who must come back to save the world, defend me! How is this? ... No one!

“Ah! I am dying! Ahriman, thou art the master!”

Hilarion, behind Antony, restrains an exclamation of joy, and Ormuz plunges into the darkness.

Then appears the great Diana of Ephesus, black, with enamelled eyes, elbows at her sides, forearms turned out, and hands open.

Lions crouch upon her shoulders; fruits, flowers and stars cross one another upon her chest; further down three rows of breasts exhibit themselves, and from the belly to the feet she is caught in a close sheath, from which sprout forth, in the centre of her body, bulls, stags, griffins and bees. She is seen in the white gleaming caused by a disc of silver, round as the full moon, placed behind her head.

“Where is my temple? Where are my amazons? How is it with me — me, the incorruptible — that I find myself so impotent?”

Her flowers wither; her fruits, over-ripe, hang loose; the lions and the bulls bow down their necks; the stags, exhausted, begin to pant; the bees, with a faint buzzing, fall dying upon the ground. She presses her breasts one after the other. They are empty! But, yielding to a desperate pressure, her sheath bursts open. She clutches the end of it, like the skirt of a dress, flings into it her animals and her flower-wreaths, then goes back into the darkness; and in the distance voices murmur, grumble, roar, cry, or bellow. The density of the night is increased by the winds. A warm shower begins to fall in heavy drops.

Antony — “How pleasant is this odour of palm-trees, this rustling of green leaves, this transparency of fountains! I would like to lie down flat upon the ground, in order to feel it close to my heart, and my life would be renewed in eternal youth!”

He hears the sound of castanets and cymbals, and, in the midst of a rustic crowd, men clad in white tunics, with red bands, lead out an ass, richly harnessed, his tail adorned with ribands and his hoofs painted. A box, covered with a saddle-cloth of yellow linen, sways to and fro upon his back, between two baskets, one of which receives the offerings deposited there — eggs, grapes, pears, cheeses, poultry, and small coins — while the second is full of roses, which the drivers of the ass scatter before him as they move along. The latter wear pendants in their ears, large cloaks, plaited tresses, and have their cheeks painted. Each of them has an olive crown fastened around his forehead by a figured medallion. They carry daggers in their girdles, and flourish whips with ebony handles, each having three thongs mounted with ossicles. The last in the procession fix in the ground erect, as a chandelier, a huge pine-tree, whose summit is on fire, and the lowest branches of which overshadow a little sheep.

The ass stops. The saddle-cloth is removed; and underneath appears a second covering of black felt. Then one of the men in a white tunic begins to dance, while playing upon castanets; while another, on his knees before the box, beats a tambourine; and the oldest of the band commences:

“Here is the Bona Dea, the divinity of the mountains, the great mother of Syria! Draw hither, honest people! She procures joy, heals the sick, bestows fortunes, and satisfies lovers. It is we who bring her out to walk in the country in fine weather and bad weather. We often sleep in the open air, and we have not a well-served table every day. The thieves dwell in the woods. The beasts rush forth from their dens. Slippery paths line the precipices. Look here! look here!”

They raise the coverlet and disclose a box incrustated with little pebbles.

“Higher than the cedar-trees she hovers in the blue ether. More circumambient than the winds, she surrounds the world. Her respiration is exhaled through the nostrils of tigers; her voice growls beneath the volcanoes; her anger is the storm; and the pallor of her face has made the moon white. She ripens the harvests; she swells out the rinds; she makes the beard grow. Give her something, for she hates the avaricious!”

The box flies open; and beneath an awning of blue silk is seen a little image of Cybele, glittering with spangles, crowned with towers, and seated on a chariot of red stone, drawn by two lions with raised paws.

The crowd presses forward to see.

The archi-gallus continues:

“She loves the sounds of dulcimers, the stamping of feet, the howling of wolves, the echoing mountains and the deep gorges, the flower of the almond-tree, the pomegranate and the green figs, the whirling dance, the high-sounding flute, the sweet sap, the salt tear, — blood! Help! help! Mother of mountains!”

They flagellate themselves with their whips, and the strokes resound on their breasts. The skins of the tambourines vibrate till they almost burst. They seize their knives and inflict gashes on their arms:

“She is sad: let us be sad! He who is doomed to suffer must weep! In that way your sins will be remitted. Blood washes out everything: shed drops of it around, then, like flowers. She demands that of another — of one who is pure!”

The archi-gallus raises his knife above the sheep,

Antony, seized with horror — ”Don’t slaughter the lamb!”

A purple flood gushes forth. The priests sprinkle the crowd with it; and all — including Antony and Hilarion — ranged around the burning tree, silently watch the last palpitations of the victim. From the midst of the priests comes a woman, exactly like the image enclosed in the little box. She stops on seeing a young man in a Phrygian cap.

His thighs are covered with tight-fitting breeches opened here and there by lozenges which are fastened with coloured bows. He rests his elbows against one of the branches of the tree, holding a flute in his hand, in a languishing attitude.

“To rejoin thee I have travelled through every region — and famine ravaged the fields. Thou hast deceived me! No matter, — I love thee! Warm my body! Let us unite!”

Atys — ”The spring-time will return no more, O eternal Mother! Despite my love, it is not possible to penetrate thy essence. I should like to cover myself with a coloured robe like thine. I envy thy breasts, swollen with milk, the length of thy tresses, thy mighty sides from which spring living creatures. Would that I were like thee! Would that I were woman! But no! that can never be! My virility fills me with horror!”

With a sharp stone he mutilates himself; then he begins to run madly around.

The priests imitate the god; the faithful, the priests. Men and women exchange their garments and embrace one another; and this whirlwind of blood-stained flesh hurries away, whilst the voices, ever continuing, become more clamorous and shrill, like those one hears at funerals.

A great catafalque hung with purple carries on its summit a bed of ebony, surrounded by torches and baskets of silver filigree, in which are contained green lettuces, mallows, and fennel. Upon the seats, above and below, are seated women, all attired in black, with girdles undone and naked feet, and holding with a melancholy air huge bouquets of flowers.

On the ground, at the corners of the platform, alabaster urns filled with myrrh are sending up light wreaths of smoke. On the bed may be seen the corpse of a man. Blood trickles from his thigh. His arm is hanging down, and a dog, who is howling, licks his nails. The line of torches placed too close to one another prevents his figure from being completely visible. Antony is seized with anguish. He is afraid of seeing the face of some one he knew.

The women cease their sobbing; and, after an interval of silence, all, at the same time, burst into a psalm:

“Beautiful! beautiful! he is beautiful! Enough of sleep — raise his head! Up! Inhale our bouquets! These are narcissi and anemones gathered in thy gardens to please thee. Return to life! thou fillest us with fear!

“Speak! What dost thou require? Dost thou wish to drink wine? Dost thou wish to sleep in our beds? Dost thou wish to eat the honey-cakes which have the form of little birds?

“Let us press close to his hips! let us kiss his breast! Hold! hold! feel thou our fingers covered with rings which are stealing over thy body, and our lips which are seeking thy mouth, and our hair which is sweeping thy legs, insensible god, deaf to our prayers!”

They burst into shrieks, tearing their faces with their nails, then become silent; and only the howling of the dog is heard.

“Alas! alas! The dark blood rushes over his snowy flesh. See how his knees writhe, how his sides give way! The flowers upon his face have soaked the gore. He is dead! Let us weep! let us lament!”

They come all in a row to fling down between the torches their flowing locks, resembling at a distance black or yellow serpents; and the catafalque is softly lowered to the level of a cave — a gloomy sepulchre, which is yawning in the background.

Then a woman bends over the corpse. Her hair, which never has been cut, covers her from head to foot. She sheds so many tears that her grief does not seem to be like that of others, but superhuman, infinite.

Antony thinks of the mother of Jesus.

She says:

“Thou didst escape from the East, and thou didst press me in thy arms all quivering with dew, O sun! Doves fluttered above the azure of thy mantle, our kisses caused breezes amid the foliage, and I abandoned myself to thy love, delighting in the exquisite sensation of my own weakness.

“Alas! alas! Why art thou about to rush away over the mountains? At the autumnal equinox a wild boar wounded thee! Thou art dead, and the fountains weep and the trees droop, and the winter wind is whistling through the leafless branches.

“My eyes are about to close, seeing that darkness is covering thee. By this time thou art dwelling on the other side of the world, near my more powerful rival.

“O Persephone, all that is beautiful goes down to thee and returns no more!”

While she has been speaking, her companions have taken the dead body to lower it into the sepulchre. It remains in their hands. It was only a corpse of wax!

Antony experiences a kind of relief. The whole scene vanishes, and the cell, the rocks, and the cross reappear! And now he distinguishes on the other side of the Nile a woman standing in the middle of the desert. She holds with her hand the end of a long black veil, which conceals her figure; while she carries on her left arm a little child, which she is suckling. At her side a huge ape is squatted on the sand. She lifts her head towards the sky, and, in spite of the distance, her voice can be heard.

Isis — “O Neith, beginning of things! Ammon, lord of eternity! Ptha, demiurgus! Thoth, his intelligence! Gods of Amenthi! Special Triads of the Nomes! Sparrow-hawks in the azure! Sphinxes on the outsides of temples! Ibises standing between the horns of oxen! Planets! Constellations! River-banks! Murmurs of wind! Reflections of light! Tell me where to find Osiris!

“I have sought for him through all the water-courses and all the lakes, and, farther still, in the Ph[oe]nician Byblos. Anubis, with ears erect, jumped round me, barking, and with his nose scenting out the clumps of tamarind. Thanks, good Cynocephalus, thanks!”

She gives the ape two or three friendly little slaps on the head.

“The hideous red-haired Typhon killed him and tore him to pieces. We have found all his members. But I have not got that which made me fruitful!”

She utters bitter lamentations.

Antony is seized with rage. He casts pebbles at her insultingly:

“Impure one! begone, begone!”

Hilarion — “Respect her! This is the religion of your ancestors! You have worn her amulets in your cradle!”

Isis — “In former times, when the summer returned, the inundation drove to the desert the impure beasts. The dykes flew open; the boats dashed against one another; the panting earth drank the stream till it was glutted. O god! with horns of bull, thou didst stretch thyself upon my breast, and the lowing of the eternal cow was heard!

“The new-sown crops, the harvests, the thrashing of corn, and the vintages succeeded each other regularly in unison with the changes of the seasons. In the nights, ever clear, the great stars shed forth their beams. The days were steeped in an unchanging splendour. The sun and the moon were seen like a royal pair on either side of the horizon.

“We were enthroned in a world more sublime — twin monarchs, spouses from the bosom of eternity; he holding a sceptre with the head of a conchoupha, and I a sceptre with a lotus-flower, we stood with hands joined; — and the crash of empires did not change our attitude.

“Egypt lay stretched beneath us, monumental and solemn, long, like the corridor of a temple, with obelisks at the right, pyramids at the left, its labyrinth in the middle; and everywhere avenues of monsters, forests of columns, massive archways flanking gates which have for their summit the earth’s sphere between two wings.

“The animals of her zodiac found their counterparts in her plains, and with their forms and colours filled her mysterious writings. Divided into twelve regions, as the year is into twelve months — each month, each day, having its god — she reproduced the immutable order of the heavens; and man, though he died, did not lose his lineaments, but, saturated with perfumes and becoming imperishable, he went to sleep for three thousand years in a silent Egypt.

“The latter, greater than the other, spread out beneath the earth. Thither one descended by means of staircases leading to halls where were reproduced the joys of the good, the tortures of the wicked, everything that takes place in the third invisible world. Ranged along the walls, the dead, in painted coffins, awaited each their turn; and the soul, free from migrations, continued its sleep till it awakened in another life.

“Meanwhile, Osiris sometimes came back to see me. His shade made me the mother of Harpocrates.”

She gazes on the child:

“It is he! Those are his eyes; those are his tresses, curling like a ram’s horns. Thou shalt begin his works over again. We shall bloom afresh, like the lotus. I am always the great Isis! Nobody has ever yet lifted my veil! My offspring is the sun!

“Sun of spring, let the clouds obscure thy face! The breath of Typhon devours the pyramids. Just now I have seen the Sphinx fly away. He galloped off like a jackal.

“I am seeking for my priests — my priests in their linen robes, with great harps, carrying along a mystic skiff ornamented with pateræ of silver. No more feasts on the lakes! no more illuminations in my Delta! no more cups of milk at Philæ! For a long time Apis has not reappeared.

“Egypt! Egypt! Thy great immovable gods have their shoulders whitened by the dung of birds, and the wind, as it passes along the desert, carries with it the ashes of the dead! — Anubis, protector of shadows, do not leave me!”

The Cynocephalus vanishes.

She gives her child a shaking.

“But what aileth thee? ... thy hands are cold, thy head fallen back!”

Harpocrates has just died. Then she utters a cry so bitter, mournful, and heartrending, that Antony replies to it by another cry, while he opens his arms to support her.

She is no longer there. He hangs his head, overwhelmed with shame.

All that he has just seen becomes confused in his mind. It is like the stunning effect of a voyage, the uncomfortable sensation of drunkenness. Fain would he hate; and yet a vague pity softens his heart. He begins to weep abundantly.

Hilarion — "What is it now that makes you sad?"

Antony, after questioning himself for a long time — "I am thinking of all the souls lost through these false gods!"

Hilarion — "Do you not find that they have — in some respects — resemblances to the true?"

Antony — "This is a trick of the Devil the better to seduce the faithful. He attacks the strong through the spirit, and the others through the flesh."

Hilarion — "But lust, in its furies, possesses the disinterestedness of penitence. The frantic love of the body accelerates its destruction — and by its weakness proclaims the extent of the impossible."

Antony — "How is it that this affects me? My heart revolts with disgust against those brutish gods, always occupied with carnage and incest."

Hilarion — "Recall to yourself in the Scriptures all the things that scandalise you because you cannot understand them. In the same way, these gods, under the outward form of criminals, may contain the truth. There are some of them left to see. Turn aside!"

Antony — "No! no! it is a peril!"

Hilarion — "A moment ago you wished to make their acquaintance. Do falsehoods make your faith totter? What do you fear?"

The rocks in front of Antony have become a mountain.

A range of clouds intersects it half-way from the top; and overhead appears another mountain, enormous, quite green, which hollows out the valley unevenly, having on its summit, in a wood of laurels, a palace of bronze, with tiles of gold and ivory capitals.

In the midst of the peristyle, upon a throne, Jupiter, colossal, and with a naked torso, holds victory in one hand, and the thunderbolt in the other; and his eagle, between his legs, erects its head.

Juno, close to him, rolls her great eyes, surmounted by a diadem, from which escapes, like a vapour, a veil floating in the wind.

Behind, Minerva, standing on a pedestal, leans upon her spear. The Gorgon's skin covers her breast, and a linen peplum descends in regular folds even to her toe-nails. Her grey eyes, which shine beneath her vizor, gaze intently into the distance.

At the right of the palace the aged Neptune is riding on a dolphin beating with its fins a vast expanse of azure, which is the sky or the sea, for the perspective of the ocean prolongs the blue ether; the two elements become mingled in one.

On the other side, Pluto, fierce, in a mantle black as night, with a tiara of diamonds and a sceptre of ebony, is in the midst of an isle enclosed by the windings of the Styx; — and this ghostly stream rushes into the darkness, which forms under the cliff a great black gap, a shapeless abyss.

Mars, clad in bronze, brandishes, with an air of fury, his huge sword and shield.

Hercules, standing lower, gazes up at him, leaning on his club.

Apollo, with radiant face, is driving, with his right arm extended, four white horses at a gallop; and Ceres, in a chariot drawn by oxen, is advancing towards him with a sickle in her hand.

Bacchus goes before her on a very low car slowly drawn along by lynxes. Erect, beardless, with vine-branches over his forehead, he passes, holding a goblet from which wine is flowing. Silenus, at his side, is dangling upon an ass. Pan, with pointed ears, is blowing his pipe; the Mimiagones beat drums; Mænads scatter flowers; the Bacchantes throw back their heads with hair dishevelled.

Diana, with her tunic tucked up, sets out from the wood with her nymphs.

At the bottom of a cavern, Vulcan is hammering the iron between the Cabiri; here and there, the old river-gods, resting upon green stones, water their urns; and the Muses, standing up, are singing in the dales.

The Hours, of equal height, hold each other by the hand; and Mercury is placed in a slanting posture, upon a rainbow, with his magic wand, his winged sandals and his broad-brimmed hat.

But at the top of the staircase of the gods, amid clouds soft as feathers, whose folds as they wind around let fall roses, Venus Anadyomene is gazing at her image in a mirror; her pupils cast languishing glances underneath her rather heavy eyelashes. She has long, fair tresses, which spread out over her shoulders, her dainty breasts, her slender figure, her hips widening like the curves of a lyre, her two rounded thighs, the dimples around her knees, and her delicate feet. Not far from her mouth a butterfly is fluttering. The splendour of her body sheds around her a halo of brilliant mother-of-pearl; and all the rest of Olympus is bathed in a rosy dawn, which, by insensible degrees, reaches the heights of the azure sky.

Antony — "Ah! my bosom dilates. A joy, which I cannot analyse, descends into the depths of my soul. How beautiful it is! how beautiful it is!"

Hilarion — "They stooped down from the height of the clouds to direct the swords. You might meet them on the roadsides. You kept them in your home; and this familiarity made life divine.

"Her only aim was to be free and beautiful. Her ample robes rendered her movements more graceful. The orator's voice, exercised beside the sea, struck the marble porticoes in unison with the sonorous waves. The stripling, rubbed with oil, wrestled, quite naked, in the full light of day. The most religious action was to expose pure forms.

"Those men, too, respected spouses, the aged and suppliants. Behind the Temple of Hercules, an altar was raised to Pity.

"They used to immolate victims with flowers around their fingers. Memory was not even troubled by the decay of the dead, for there remained of them only a handful of ashes. The soul, mingled with the boundless ether, ascended to the gods!"

Bending towards Antony's ear:

"And they live for ever! The Emperor Constantine adores Apollo. You will find the Trinity in the mysteries of Samothrace, baptism in the case of Isis, the redemption in that of Mithra, the martyrdom of a god in the feasts of Bacchus. Proserpine is the Virgin; Aristæus, Jesus!"

Antony keeps his eyes cast down; then all at once he repeats the creed of Jerusalem — as he recollects it — emitting, after each phrase, a long sigh:

"I believe in one only God, the Father; — and in one only Lord, Jesus Christ, first-born son of God, who became incarnate and was made man; who was crucified and buried; who ascended into Heaven; who will come to judge the living and the dead; whose kingdom will have no end; — and in one only Holy Ghost; — and in one only baptism of repentance; — and in one holy Catholic Church; — and in the resurrection of the flesh; — and in the life everlasting!”“

Immediately the cross becomes larger, and, piercing the clouds, it casts a shadow over the heaven of the gods.

They all grow dim. Olympus vanishes.

Antony distinguishes near its base, half lost in the caverns, or supporting the stones on their shoulders, huge bodies chained. These are the Titans, the Giants, the Hecatonchires, and the Cyclops.

A voice rises, indistinct and formidable, — like the murmur of the waves, like the sound heard in woods during a storm, like the roaring of the wind down a precipice:

“We knew it, we of all others! The gods were doomed to die. Uranus was mutilated by Saturn, and Saturn by Jupiter. He will be himself annihilated. Each in its turn. It is destiny!”

And, by degrees, they plunge into the mountain, and disappear.

Meanwhile, the roof of the palace of gold flies away.

Jupiter descends from his throne. The thunder at his feet smokes like a brand that is almost extinguished; and the eagle, stretching its neck, gathers with its beak its falling plumes.

“So, then, I am no longer the master of things, all-good, all-powerful, god of the phratriæ and of the Greek peoples, ancestor of all the kings, the Agamemnon of Heaven!

“Eagle of the apotheoses, what breath of Erebus has driven thee to me? or, flying from the Campus Martius, dost thou bring to me the soul of the last of the Emperors?

“I no longer desire those of men! Let the earth guard them, and let them be moved on a level with its baseness. They now have hearts of slaves; they forget injuries, ancestors, oaths; and everywhere the folly of mobs, the mediocrity of the individual, and the hideousness of races reign supreme!”

His respiration makes his sides swell even to bursting, and he writhes with his hands. Hebe in tears presents a cup to him. He seizes it:

“No! no! As long as there will be, no matter where, a head enclosing thought which hates disorder and realises the idea of Law, the spirit of Jupiter will live!”

But the cup is empty. He turns it around slowly on his finger-nail.

“Not a drop! When ambrosia fails, there is an end of the Immortals!”

It slips out of his hand, and he leans against a pillar, feeling that he is dying.

Juno — ”There was no need of so many loves! Eagle, bull, swan, golden shower, cloud and flame, thou hast assumed every form, scattered thy light in every element, hidden thy head on every couch! This time the divorce is irrevocable — and our sway, our very existence, is dissolved!”

She rushes away into the air!

Minerva no longer has her spear; and the ravens, which nestled in the sculptures of the frieze, whirl round her, and bite at her helmet.

“Let me see whether my vessels, cleaving the shining sea, have returned into my three ports, wherefore the fields are deserted, and what the daughters of Athens are now doing.

“In the month of Hecatombæon, all my people came to me led by their magistrates and priests. Then, in white robes, with chitons of gold, the long files of virgins advanced, holding cups, baskets, and parasols; then, the three hundred oxen for the sacrifice, old men shaking green boughs, soldiers clashing their armour against each other, youths singing hymns, players on the flute and on the lyre, rhapsodists and dancing-girls — and finally, on the mast of a trireme, supported by coils of rope, my great veil embroidered by virgins, who, for the space of a year, had been nourished in a particular fashion; and, when it had been shown in every street, in every square, and before every temple, in the midst of a procession continually chanting, it ascended to the Acropolis, brushed passed the Propylæum, and entered the Parthenon.

“But a difficulty faces me — me, the ingenious one! What! what! not a single idea! Here am I more terrified than a woman.”

She perceives behind her a ruin, utters a cry, and, struck on the forehead, falls backward to the ground.

Hercules has cast off his lion’s skin, and, resting on his feet, bending his back, and biting his lips, he makes desperate efforts to sustain Olympus, which is toppling down.

“I have vanquished the Cercopes, the Amazons, and the Centaurs. I have slain many kings, I have broken the horn of Achelous, a great river. I have cut through mountains; I have brought oceans together. I have liberated enslaved nations; I have peopled uninhabited countries. I have travelled over Gaul. I have traversed the desert where one feels thirst. I have defended the gods, and I have freed myself from Omphale. But Olympus is too heavy. My arms are growing feeble. I am dying!"

He is crushed beneath the ruins.

Pluto — "It is thine own fault, Amphitritonades! Why didst thou descend into my realms? The vulture who devours the entrails of Tityus has raised its head; Tantalus has had his lips moistened; and Ixion's wheel is stopped.

"Meanwhile, the Keres stretch forth their nails to detain the souls; the Furies in despair twist the serpents in their locks; and Cerberus, fastened by thee with a chain, has a rattling in the throat, while he slavers from his three mouths.

"Thou didst leave the gate ajar. Others have come. The light of human day has penetrated Tartarus!"

He sinks into the darkness.

Neptune — "My trident no longer raises tempests. The monsters who caused terror have rotted at the bottom of the sea.

"Amphitrite, whose white feet rushed over the foam; the green nereids, who could be seen on the horizon; the scaly sirens, who used to stop the ships to tell stories; and the old tritons, who used to blow into shells, all are dead! The gaiety of the sea has vanished!

"I will not survive it! Let the vast ocean cover me."

He disappears into the azure.

Diana, attired in black, among her dogs, who have become wolves

---

"The freedom of great woods intoxicated me with its odour of deer and exhalations of swamps. The women, over whose pregnancy I watched, bring dead children into the world. The moon trembles under the incantations of sorcerers. I am filled with violent and boundless desires. I long to drink poisons, to lose myself in vapours or in dreams! ..."

And a passing cloud bears her away.

Mars, bare-headed and blood-stained —

"At first, I fought single-handed, provoking by insults an entire army, indifferent to countries, and for the pleasure of carnage. Then, I had companions. They marched to the sound of flutes, in good order, with even step, breathing upon their bucklers, with lofty plume and slanting spear. We flung ourselves into the battle with loud cries like those of eagles. War was as joyous as a feast. Three hundred men withstood all Asia.

“But they returned, those barbarians! and in tens of thousands, nay, in millions! Since numbers, war-engines, and strategy are more powerful, it is better to make an end of it, like a brave man!”

He kills himself.

Vulcan, wiping the sweat from his limbs with a sponge —

“The world is getting cold. It is necessary to heat the springs, the volcanoes, and the rivers, which run from metals under the earth! — Strike harder! with vigorous arm! with all your strength!”

The Cabiri hurt themselves with their hammers, blind themselves with the sparks, and, groping their way along, are lost in the shadow.

Ceres, standing in her chariot which is drawn by wheels having wings in their naves — ”Stop! Stop!

“They had good reason to exclude the strangers, the atheists, the epicureans, and the Christians! The mystery of the basket is unveiled, the sanctuary profaned — all is lost!”

She descends with a rapid fall — bursting into exclamation of despair, and dragging back the horses.

“Ah! falsehood! Daira is not given up to me. The brazen bell calls me to the dead. It is another kind of Tartarus. There is no returning from it. Horror!”

The abyss swallows her up.

Bacchus, laughing frantically:

“What does it matter! The wife of Archontes is my spouse! Even the law goes down before drunkenness. For me the new song and the multiplied forms!

“The fire which consumed my mother runs in my veins. Let it burn the stronger, even though I perish!

“Male and female, good for both, I deliver myself to ye, Bacchantes! I deliver myself to ye, Bacchantes! and the vine will twist around the trunks of trees! How! dance! writhe! Unbind the tiger and the slave! bite the flesh with ferocious teeth!”

And Pan, Silenus, the Satyrs, the Bacchantes, the Mimiagones, and the Mænades, with their serpents, their torches, and their black masks, scatter flowers, then shake their dulcimers, strike their thyrsi, pelt each other with shells, crunch grapes, strangle a he-goat, and rend Bacchus.

Apollo, lashing his coursers, whose glistening hairs fly off —

“I have left behind me Delos the stony, so empty that everything there now seems dead; and I am striving to reach the Delphian oracle before its inspiring vapour should be completely lost. The mules browse on its laurel. The pythoness, gone astray, is found there no longer.

“By a stronger concentration, I will have sublime poems, eternal monuments; and all matter will be penetrated with the vibrations of my cithara.”

He fingers its chords. They break and snap against his face. He flings down the instrument, and driving his four-horse chariot furiously:

“No! enough of forms! Farther still — to the very summit — to the world of pure thought!”

But the horses, falling back, begin to prance so that the chariot is smashed; and, entangled in the fragments of the pole and the knottings of the horses, he falls head-foremost into the abyss.

The sky is darkened. Venus, blue as a violet from the cold, shivers.

“I covered with my girdle the entire horizon of Hellas. Its fields shone with the roses of my cheeks; its shores were cut according to the form of my lips; and its mountains, whiter than my doves, palpitated under the hands of the sculptors. My spirit showed itself in the order of festivities, the arrangements of head-dresses, the dialogues of philosophers, and the constitution of republics. But I have loved men too much. It is Love that has dishonoured me!”

She falls back in tears.

“The world is abominable. My bosom feels the lack of air.

“O Mercury, inventor of the lyre, and conductor of souls, bear me away!”

She places a finger upon her mouth, and, describing an immense parabola, topples over into the abyss.

And now nothing can be seen. The darkness is complete.

In the meantime two red arrows seem to escape from the pupils of Hilarion.

Antony at length notices his high stature:

“Many times already, while you were speaking, you appeared to me to be growing tall; and it was not an illusion. How is this? Explain it to me. Your appearance appals me!”

Steps draw nigh.

“What is this now?”

Hilarion stretches forth his arms:

“Look!”

Then, under a pale ray of the moon, Antony distinguishes an interminable caravan which defiles over the crest of the rocks; and each passenger, one after another, falls from the cliff into the gulf.

First, there are the three great gods of Samothrace — Axieros, Axiokeros, and Axiokersa — joined in a cluster, with purple masks, and their hands raised.

Æsculapius advances with a melancholy air, without even seeing Samos and Telesphorus, who question him with anguish. Sosipolis, the Elean, with the form of a python, rolls out his rings towards the abyss. Doesp[oe]na, through vertigo, flings herself in there of her own accord. Britomartis, shrieking with fear, clasps the folds of her fillet. The Centaurs arrive with a great galloping, and dash, pell-mell, into the black hole.

Limping behind them come the sad group of nymphs. Those of the meadows are covered with dust; those of the woods groan and bleed, wounded by the woodcutters’ axes.

The Gelludæ, the Stryges, the Empusæ, all the infernal goddesses intermingling their hooks, their torches, and their snakes, form a pyramid; and at the summit, upon a vulture’s skin, Eurynomus, bluish like flesh-flies, devours his own arms.

Then in a whirlwind disappears at the same time, Orthia the sanguinary, Hymnia of Orchomena, the Saphria of the Patræans, Aphia of Ægina, Bendis of Thrace, and Stymphalia with the leg of a bird. Triopas, in place of three eyeballs, has nothing more than three orbits. Erichthonius, with spindle-shanks, crawls like a cripple on his wrists.

Hilarion — “What happiness, is it not, to see all of them in a state of abjectness and agony? Mount with me on this stone, and you will be like Xerxes reviewing his army.

“Yonder, at a great distance, in the midst of fogs, do you perceive that giant with yellow beard who lets fall a sword red with blood? He is the Scythian Zalmoxis between two planets — Artimpasa, Venus; and Orsiloche, the Moon.

“Farther off, emerging out of the pale clouds, are the gods who are adored by the Cimmerians, beyond even Thule!

“Their great halls were warm, and by the light of the naked swords that covered the vault they drank hydromel in horns of ivory. They ate the liver of the whale in copper plates forged by the demons, or else they listened to the captive sorcerers sweeping their hands across the harps of stone. They are weary! they are cold! The snow wears down their bearskins, and their feet are exposed through the rents in their sandals.

“They mourn for the meadows where, upon hillocks of grass, they used to recover breath in the battle, the long ships whose prows cut through the mountains of ice, and the skates they used in order to follow the orbit of the poles while carrying on the extremities of their arms the firmament, which turned around with them.”

A shower of hoar-frost pours down upon them. Antony lowers his glance to the opposite side, and he perceives — outlining themselves in black upon a red background — strange personages with chin-pieces and gauntlets, who throw balls at one another, leap one on top of the other, make grimaces, and dance frantically.

Hilarion — “These are the gods of Etruria, the innumerable Æsars. Here is Tages, the inventor of auguries. He attempts with one hand to increase the divisions of the heavens, while with the other he leans upon the earth. Let him come back to it!

“Nortia is contemplating the wall into which she drove nails to mark the number of the years. Its surface is covered and its last period accomplished. Like two travellers driven about by a tempest, Kastur and Polutuk take shelter under the same mantle.”

Antony, closes his eyes — “Enough! Enough!”

But now through the air with a great noise of wings pass all the Victories of the Capitol, hiding their foreheads in their hands, and losing the trophies suspended from their arms.

Janus, master of the twilight, flies away upon a black ram, and of his two faces one is already putrefied, while the other is benumbed with fatigue.

Summanus — god of the gloomy sky, who no longer has a head — presses against his heart an old cake in the form of a wheel.

Vesta, under a ruined cupola, tries to rekindle her extinguished lamp.

Bellona gashes her cheeks without causing the blood, which used to purify her devotees, to flow out.

Antony — "Pardon! They weary me!"

Hilarion — "Formerly they used to be entertaining!"

And he points out to Antony, in a grove of beech-trees a woman perfectly naked — with four paws like a beast — bestridden by a black man holding in each hand a torch.

"This is the goddess Aricia with the demon Virbius. Her priest, the monarch of the woods, happened to be an assassin; and the fugitive slaves, the despoilers of corpses, the brigands of the Salarian road, the cripples of the Sublician bridge, all the vermin of the garrets of the Suburra, had not dearer devotion!

"The patrician ladies of Mark Antony's time preferred Libitina."

And he shows him under the cypresses and rose-trees another woman clothed in gauze. She smiles, though she is surrounded by pickaxes, litters, black hangings, and all the utensils of funerals. Her diamonds glitter from afar among cobwebs. The Larvæ, like skeletons, display their bones amid the branches, and the Lemures, who are phantoms, spread out their bats' wings.

On the side of a field the god Terma is bent down, torn asunder, and covered with filth.

In the midst of a ridge the huge corpse of Vertumnus is being devoured by red dogs. The rustic gods depart weeping, Sartor, Sarrator, Vervactor, Eollina, Vallona, and Hostilenus — all covered with little hooded cloaks, and each bearing a mattock, a fork, a hurdle, and a boar-spear.

Hilarion — "It was their spirits that made the villa prosper with its dove-cotes, its park for dormice, its poultry-yards protected by snares, and its hot stables embalmed with cedar.

"They protected all the wretched people who dragged the fetters with their legs over the pebbles of the Sabina, those who called the hogs with the sound of the trumpet, those who gathered the grapes on the tops of the elm-trees, those who drove through the by-roads the asses laden with dung. The husbandman, while he panted over the handle of his plough, prayed to them to strengthen his arms; and the cow-herds, in the shadow of the lime-trees, beside gourds of milk, chanted their eulogies by turns upon flutes of reeds."

Antony sighs.

And in the middle of a chamber, upon a platform, a bed of ivory is revealed, surrounded by persons lifting up pine-torches.

"Those are the gods of marriage. They are awaiting the bride.

"Domiduca has to lead her in, Virgo to undo her girdle, Subigo to stretch her upon the bed, and Præma to keep back her arms, whispering sweet words in her ear.

"But she will not come! and they dismiss the others — Nona and Decima, the nurses; the three Nixii, who are to deliver her; the two wet-nurses, Educa and Potina; and Carna, the cradle-rocker, whose bunch of hawthorns drives away bad dreams from the infant. Later, Ossipago will have strengthened its knees, Barbatus will have given the beard, Stimula the first desires, and Volupia the first enjoyment; Fabulinus will have taught it how to speak, Numera how to count, Cam[oe]na how to sing, and Consus how to think."

The chamber is empty, and there remains no longer at the side of the bed anyone but Nænia — a hundred years old — muttering to herself the lament which she poured forth on the death of old men.

But soon her voice is lost amid bitter cries, which come from the domestic lares, squatted at the end of the atrium, clad in dogs' skins, with flowers around their bodies, holding their closed hands up to their cheeks, and weeping as much as they can.

"Where is the portion of food which is given to us at each meal, the good attentions of maid-servant, the smile of the matron, and the gaiety of the little boys playing with huckle-bones on the mosaic of the courtyard? Then, when they have grown big, they hang over our breasts their gold or leather bullæ.

"What happiness, when, on the evening of a triumph, the master, returning home, turned towards us his humid eyes! He told the story of his contests, and the narrow house was more stately than a palace, and more sacred than a temple.

"How pleasant were the repasts of the family, especially the day after the Feralia! The feeling of tenderness towards the dead dispelled all discords; and people embraced one another, drinking to the glories of the past, and to the hopes of the future.

“But the ancestors in painted wax, shut up behind us, became gradually covered with mouldiness. The new races, to punish us for their own deceptions, have broken our jaws; and under the rats’ teeth our bodies of wood have crumbled away.”

And the innumerable gods, watching at the doors, in the kitchen, in the cellar, and in the stoves, disperse on all sides, under the appearance of enormous ants running away, or huge butterflies on the wing.

Then a thunderclap.

A voice — “I was the God of armies, the Lord, the Lord God!

“I have unfolded on the hills the tents of Jacob, and nourished in the sands my fugitive people. It was I who burned Sodom! It was I who engulfed the earth beneath the Deluge! It was I who drowned Pharaoh, with the royal princes, the war-chariots, and the charioteers. A jealous God, I execrated the other gods. I crushed the impure; I overthrew the proud; and my desolation rushed to right and left, like a dromedary let loose in a field of maize.

“To set Israel free, I chose the simple. Angels, with wings of flame, spoke to them in the bushes.

“Perfumed with spikenard, cinnamon, and myrrh, with transparent robes and high-heeled shoes, women of intrepid heart went forth to slay the captains. The passing wind bore away the prophets.

“I engraved my law on tablets of stone. It shut in my people as in a citadel. They were my people. I was their God! The earth was mine, and men were mine, with their thoughts, their works, the implements with which they tilled the soil, and their posterity.

“My ark rested in a triple sanctuary, behind purple curtains and flaming lamps. For my ministry I had an entire tribe, who swung the censers, and the high-priest in a robe of hyacinth, and wearing precious stones upon his breast arranged in regular order.

“Woe! woe! The Holy of Holies is flung open; the veil is rent; the odours of the holocaust are scattered to all the winds. The jackals whine in the sepulchres; my temple is destroyed; my people are dispersed!

“They have strangled the priests with the cords of their vestments. The women are captives; the sacred vessels are all melted down!”

The voice, dying away:

“I was the God of armies, the Lord, the Lord God!” Then comes an appalling silence, a profound darkness.

Antony — “They are all gone!”

“I remain!” says some one.

And, face to face with him stands Hilarion, but transfigured — beautiful as an archangel, luminous as a sun, and so tall that, in order to see him, Antony lifts up his head — “Who, then, are you?”

Hilarion — “My kingdom is as wide as the universe, and my desire has no limits. I am always going about enfranchising the mind and weighing the worlds, without hate, without fear, without love, and without God. I am called Science.”

Antony, recoiling backwards — “You must be, rather, the Devil!”

Hilarion, fixing his eyes upon him — “Do you wish to see him?”

Antony no longer avoids his glance. He is seized with curiosity concerning the Devil. His terror increases; his longing becomes measureless.

“If I saw him, however — if I saw him?” ... Then, in a spasm of rage:

“The horror that I have of him will rid me of him forever. Yes!”

A cloven foot reveals itself. Antony is filled with regret. But the Devil overshadows him with his horns, and carries him off.

CHAPTER VI.

The Mystery of Space.

HE flies under Antony's body, extended like a swimmer; his two great wings, outspread, entirely concealing him, resemble a cloud.

Antony — "Where am I going? Just now I caught a glimpse of the form of the Accursèd One. No! a cloud is carrying me away. Perhaps I am dead, and am mounting up to God? ...

"Ah! how well I breathe! The untainted air inflates my soul. No more heaviness! no more suffering!

"Beneath me, the thunderbolt darts forth, the horizon widens, rivers cross one another. That light spot is the desert; that pool of water the ocean. And other oceans appear — immense regions of which I had no knowledge. There are black lands that smoke like live embers, a belt of snow ever obscured by the mists. I am trying to discover the mountains where each evening the sun goes to sleep."

The Devil — "The sun never goes to sleep!"

Antony is not startled by this voice. It appears to him an echo of his thought — a response of his memory.

Meanwhile, the earth takes the form of a ball, and he perceives it in the midst of the azure turning on its poles while it winds around the sun.

The Devil — "So, then, it is not the centre of the world? Pride of man, humble thyself!"

Antony — "I can scarcely distinguish it now. It is intermingled with the other fires. The firmament is but a tissue of stars."

They continue to ascend.

"No noise! not even the crying of the eagles! Nothing! ... and I bend down to listen to the music of the spheres."

The Devil — "You cannot hear them! No longer will you see the antichthon of Plato, the focus of Philolaüs, the spheres of Aristotle, or the seven heavens of the Jews with the great waters above the vault of crystal!"

Antony — "From below it appeared as solid as a wall. But now, on the contrary, I am penetrating it; I am plunging into it!"

And he arrives in front of the moon — which is like a piece of ice, quite round, filled with a motionless light.

The Devil — "This was formerly the abode of souls. The good Pythagoras had even supplied it with birds and magnificent flowers."

Antony — "I see nothing there save desolate plains, with extinct craters, under a black sky.

"Come towards those stars with a softer radiance, so that we may gaze upon the angels who hold them with the ends of their arms, like torches!"

The Devil carries him into the midst of the stars.

"They attract one another at the same time that they repel one another. The action of each has an effect on the others, and helps to produce their movements — and all this without the medium of an auxiliary, by the force of a law, by the virtue simply of order."

Antony — "Yes ... yes! my intelligence grasps it! It is a joy greater than the sweetness of affection! I pant with stupefaction before the immensity of God!"

The Devil — "Like the firmament, which rises in proportion as you ascend, He will become greater according as your imagination mounts higher; and you will feel your joy increase in proportion to the unfolding of the universe, in this enlargement of the Infinite."

Antony — "Ah! higher! ever higher!"

The stars multiply and shed around their scintillations. The Milky Way at the zenith spreads out like an immense belt, with gaps here and there; in these clefts, amid its brightness, dark tracts reveal themselves. There are showers of stars, trains of golden dust, luminous vapours which float and then dissolve.

Sometimes a comet sweeps by suddenly; then the tranquillity of the countless lights is renewed.

Antony, with open arms, leans on the Devil's two horns, thus occupying the entire space covered by his wings. He recalls with disdain the ignorance of former days, the limitation of his ideas. Here, then, close beside him, were those luminous globes which he used to gaze at from below. He traces the crossing of their paths, the complexity of their directions. He sees them coming from afar, and, suspended like stones in a sling, describing their orbits and pushing forward their parabolas.

He perceives, with a single glance, the Southern Cross and the Great Bear, the Lynx and the Centaur, the nebulae of the Gold-fish, the six suns in the constellation of Orion, Jupiter with his four satellites, and the triple ring of the monstrous Saturn! all the planets, all the stars which men should, in future days, discover! He fills his eyes with their light; he overloads his mind with a calculation of their distances; — then he lets his head fall once more.

“What is the object of all this?”

The Devil — “There is no object!

“How could God have had an object? What experience could have enlightened Him, what reflection enabled Him to judge? Before the beginning of things, it would not have operated, and now it would be useless.”

Antony — “Nevertheless, He created the world, at one period of time, by His mere word!”

The Devil — “But the beings who inhabit the earth came there successively. In the same way, in the sky, new stars arise — different effects from various causes.”

Antony — “The variety of causes is the will of God!”

The Devil — “But to admit in God several acts of will is to admit several causes, and thus to destroy His unity!

“His will is not separable from His essence. He cannot have a second will, inasmuch as He cannot have a second essence — and, since He exists eternally, He acts eternally.

“Look at the sun! From its borders escape great flames emitting sparks which scatter themselves to become new worlds; and, further than the last, beyond those depths where only night is visible, other suns whirl round, and behind these others again, and others still, to infinity ...”

Antony — “Enough! enough! I am terrified! I am about to fall into the abyss.”

The Devil stops, and gently balancing himself —

“There is no such thing as nothingness! There is no vacuum! Everywhere there are bodies moving over the unchangeable realms of space — and, as if it had any bounds it would not be space but a body, it consequently has no limits!”

Antony, open-mouthed — "No limits!"

The Devil — "Ascend into the sky forever and ever, and you will never reach the top! Descend beneath the earth for millions upon millions of centuries, and you will never get to the bottom — inasmuch as there is no bottom, no top, no end, above or below; and space is, in fact, comprised in God, who is not a part of space, of a magnitude that can be measured, but immensity!"

Antony, slowly — "Matter, in that case, would be part of God?"

The Devil — "Why not? Can you tell where He comes to an end?"

Antony — "On the contrary, I prostrate myself, I efface myself before His power!"

The Devil — "And you pretend to move Him! You speak to Him, you even adorn Him with virtues — goodness, justice, clemency, — in place of recognising the fact that He possesses all perfections!

"To conceive anything beyond is to conceive God outside of God. Being outside of Being. But then He is the only Being, the only Substance.

"If substance could be divided, it would lose its nature — it would not be itself; God would no longer exist. He is, therefore, indivisible as well as infinite, and if He had a body, He would be made up of parts. He would no longer be one; He would no longer be infinite. Therefore, He is not a person!"

Antony — "What? My prayers, my sobs, the sufferings of my flesh, the transports of my zeal, all these things would be no better than a lie ... in space ... uselessly — like a bird's cry, like a whirlwind of dead leaves!"

He weeps.

"Oh! no! There is above everything some One, a Great Spirit, a Lord, a Father, whom my heart adores, and who must love me!"

The Devil — "You desire that God should not be God; for, if He experienced love, anger, or pity, He would pass from His perfection to a greater or less perfection. He cannot descend to a sentiment, or be contained under a form."

Antony — "One day, however, I shall see Him!"

The Devil — "With the Blessèd, is it not? When the finite shall enjoy the Infinite, enclosing the Absolute in a limited space!"

Antony — "No matter! There must be a Paradise for the good, as well as a Hell for the wicked!”

The Devil — ”Does the exigency of your reason constitute the law of things? Without doubt, evil is a matter of indifference to God, seeing that the earth is covered with it!

“Is it from impotence that He endures it, or from cruelty that He preserves it?

“Do you think that He can be continually putting the world in order like an imperfect work, and that He watches over all the movements of all beings, from the flight of the butterfly to the thought of man?

“If He created the universe His providence is superfluous. If Providence exists, creation is defective.

“But good and evil only concern you — like day and night, pleasure and pain, death and birth, which have relationship merely to a corner of space, to a special medium, to a particular interest. Inasmuch as what is infinite alone is permanent, the Infinite exists; and that is all!”

The Devil has gradually extended his huge wings, and now they cover space.

Antony can no longer see. He is on the point of fainting:

“A horrible chill freezes me to the bottom of my soul. This exceeds the utmost pitch of pain. It is, as it were, a death more profound than death. I wheel through the immensity of darkness. It enters into me. My consciousness is shivered to atoms under this expansion of nothingness.”

The Devil — ”But things happen only through the medium of your mind. Like a concave mirror, it distorts objects, and you need every resource in order to verify facts.

“Never shall you understand the universe in its full extent; consequently you cannot form an idea as to its cause, so as to have a just notion of God, or even say that the universe is infinite, for you should first comprehend the Infinite!

“Form is perhaps an error of your senses, substance an illusion of your intellect. Unless it be that the world, being a perpetual flux of things, appearances, by a sort of contradiction, would not be a test of truth, and illusion would be the only reality.

“But are you sure that you see? Are you sure that you live? Perhaps nothing at all exists!”

The Devil has seized Antony, and, holding him by the extremities of his arms, stares at him with open jaws ready to swallow him up.

“Come, adore me! and curse the phantom that you call God!”

Antony raises his eyes with a last movement of lingering hope.

The Devil quits him.

CHAPTER VII.

The Chimera and the Sphinx.

ANTONY finds himself stretched on his back at the edge of the cliff. The sky is beginning to grow white.

“Is this the brightness of dawn? or is it the reflection of the moon?”
He tries to rise, then sinks back, and with chattering teeth:

“I feel fatigued ... as if all my bones were broken!

“Why?

“Ah! it is the Devil! I remember; and he even repeated to me all I had learned from old Didymus concerning the opinions of Xenophanes, of Heraclitus, of Melissus, and of Anaxagoras, as well as concerning the Infinite, the creation, and the impossibility of knowing anything!

“And I imagined that I could unite myself to God!”

Laughing bitterly:

“Ah! madness! madness! Is it my fault? Prayer is intolerable to me! My heart is drier than a rock! Formerly it overflowed with love! ...

“The sand, in the morning, used to send forth exhalations on the horizon, like the fumes of a censer. At the setting of the sun blossoms of fire burst forth from the cross, and, in the middle of the night, it often seemed to me that all creatures and all things, gathered in the same silence, were with me adoring the Lord. Oh! charm of prayer, bliss of ecstasy, gifts of Heaven, what has become of you?

“I remember a journey I made with Ammon in search of a solitude in which we might establish monasteries. It was the last evening, and we quickened our steps, murmuring hymns, side by side, without uttering a word. In proportion as the sun went down, the shadows of our bodies lengthened, like two obelisks, always enlarging and marching on in front of us. With the pieces of our staffs we planted the cross here and there to mark the site of a cell. The night came on slowly, and black waves spread over the earth, while an immense sheet of red still occupied the sky.

“When I was a child, I used to amuse myself in constructing hermitages with pebbles. My mother, close beside me, used to watch what I was doing.

“She was going to curse me for abandoning her, tearing her white locks. And her corpse remained stretched in the middle of the cell, beneath the roof of reeds, between the tottering walls. Through a hole, a hyena, sniffing, thrusts forward his jaws! ... Horror! horror!”

He sobs.

“No: Ammonaria would not have left her!

“Where is Ammonaria now?

“Perhaps, in a hot bath she is drawing off her garments one by one, first her cloak, then her girdle, then her outer tunic, then her inner one, then the wrappings round her neck; and the vapour of cinnamon envelops her naked limbs. At last she sinks to sleep on the tepid floor. Her hair, falling around her hips, looks like a black fleece — and, almost suffocating in the overheated atmosphere, she draws breath, with her body bent forward and her breasts projecting. Hold! here is my flesh breaking into revolt. In the midst of anguish, I am tortured by voluptuousness. Two punishments at the same time — it is too much! I can no longer endure my own body!”

He stoops down and gazes over the precipice.

“The man who falls over that will be killed. Nothing easier, by simply rolling over on the left side: it is necessary to take only one step! only one!”

Then appears an old woman.

Antony rises with a start of error. He imagines that he sees his mother risen from the dead.

But this one is much older and excessively emaciated. A winding-sheet, fastened round her head, hangs with her white hair down to the very extremities of her legs, thin as sticks. The brilliancy of her teeth, which are like ivory, makes her clayey skin look darker. The sockets of her eyes are full of gloom, and in their depths flicker two flames, like lamps in a sepulchre.

“Come forward,” she says; “what keeps you back?”

Antony, stammering — “I am afraid of committing a sin!”

She resumes:

“But King Saul was slain! Razias, a just man, was slain! Saint Pelagius of Antioch was slain! Dominus of Aleppo and his two daughters, three more saints, were slain; — and recall to your mind all the confessors who, in their eagerness to die, rushed to meet their executioners. In order to taste death the more speedily, the virgins of Miletus strangled themselves with their cords. The philosopher, Hegesias, at Syracuse preached so well on the subject, that people deserted the brothels to hang themselves in the fields. The Roman patricians sought for death as if it were a debauch."

Antony — "Yes, it is a powerful passion! Many an anchorite has yielded to it."

The old woman — "To do a thing which makes you equal to God — think of that! He created you; you are about to destroy His work, you, by your courage, freely. The enjoyment of Erostrates was not greater. And then, your body is thus mocked by your soul in order that you may avenge yourself in the end. You will have no pain. It will soon be over. What are you afraid of? A large black hole! It is empty, perhaps!"

Antony listens without saying anything in reply; — and, on the other side, appears another woman, marvellously young and beautiful. At first, he takes her for Ammonaria. But she is taller, fair as honey, rather plump, with paint on her cheeks, and roses on her head. Her long robe, covered with spangles, is studded with metallic mirrors. Her fleshly lips have a look of blood, and her somewhat heavy eyelashes are so much bathed in languor that one would imagine she was blind. She murmurs:

"Come, then, and enjoy yourself. Solomon recommends pleasure. Go where your heart leads you, and according to the desire of your eyes."

Antony — "To find what pleasure? My heart is sick; my eyes are dim!"

She replies:

"Hasten to the suburb of Racotis; push open a door painted blue; and, when you are in the atrium, where a jet of water is gurgling, a woman will present herself — in a peplum of white silk edged with gold, her hair dishevelled, and her laugh like sounds made by rattlesnakes. She is clever. In her caress you will taste the pride of an initiation, and the satisfaction of a want. Have you pressed against your bosom a maiden who loved you? Recall to your mind her remorse, which vanished under a flood of sweet tears. You can imagine yourself — can you not? — walking through the woods beneath the light of the moon. At the pressure of your hands joined with hers a shudder runs through both of you; your eyes, brought close together, overflow from one to the other like immaterial waves, and your heart is full; it is bursting; it is a delicious whirlwind, an overpowering intoxication.”

The old woman — “You need not experience joys to feel their bitterness! You need only see them from afar, and disgust takes possession of you. You must needs be wearied with the monotony of the same actions, the duration of the days, the ugliness of the world, and the stupidity of the sun!”

Antony — “Oh! yes; all that it shines upon is displeasing to me.”

The young woman — “Hermit! hermit! you shall find diamonds among the pebbles, fountains beneath the sand, a delight in the dangers which you despise; and there are even places on the earth so beautiful that you are filled with a longing to embrace them.”

The old woman — “Every evening when you lie down to sleep on the earth, you hope that it may soon cover you.”

The young woman — “Nevertheless, you believe in the resurrection of the flesh, which is the transport of life into eternity.”

The old woman, while speaking, has been growing more emaciated, and, above her skull, which has no hair upon it, a bat has been making circles in the air.

The young woman has become plumper. Her robe changes colour; her nostrils swell; her eyes roll softly.

The first says, opening her arms:

“Come! I am consolation, rest, oblivion, eternal peace!”

And the second offering her breast:

“I am the soother, the joy, the life, the happiness inexhaustible!”

Antony turns on his heel to fly. Each of them places a hand upon his shoulder.

The winding-sheet flies open, and reveals the skeleton of Death. The robe bursts open, and presents to view the entire body of Lust, which has a slender figure, with an enormous development behind, and great, undulating masses of hair, disappearing towards the end.

Antony remains motionless between the pair, contemplating them.

Death says to him —

“This moment, or a little later — what does it matter? You belong to me, like the suns, the nations, the cities, the kings, the snow on the mountains, and the grass in the fields. I fly higher than the sparrowhawk, I run more quickly than the gazelle; I keep pace even with hope; I have conquered God!”

Lust — “Do not resist; I am omnipotent. The forests echo with my sighs; the waves are stirred by my agitations. Virtue, courage, piety, are dissolved in the perfume of my breath. I accompany man at every step he takes; and on the threshold of the tomb he comes back to me.”

Death — “I will reveal to you what you tried to grasp by the light of torches on the features of the dead — or when you rambled beyond the Pyramids in those vast sand-heaps composed of human remains. From time to time, a piece of skull rolled under your sandal. You took it out of the dust; you made it slip between your fingers; and your mind, becoming absorbed in it, was plunged into nothingness.”

Lust — ”Mine is a deeper gulf! Marble slabs have inspired impure loves. People rush towards meetings that terrify them, and rivet the very chains which they curse. Whence comes the witchery of courtesans, the extravagance of dreams, the immensity of my sadness?”

Death — ”My irony surpasses that of all other things. There are convulsions of joy at the funerals of kings and at the extermination of peoples; and they make war with music, plumes, flags, golden harnesses, and a display of ceremony to pay me the greater homage.”

Lust — ”My anger is as strong as yours. I howl, I bite, I have sweats of agony, and corpse-like appearances.”

Death — ”It is I who make you serious; let us embrace each other!”

Death chuckles; Lust roars. They seize each other’s figures, and sing together:

“I hasten the dissolution of matter.”

“I facilitate the scattering of germs!”

“Thou destroyest that I may renew!”

“Thou engenderest that I may destroy!”

“Active my power!”

“Fruitful my decay!”

And their voices, whose echoes, rolling forth, fill the horizon, become so powerful that Antony falls backward.

A shock, from time to time, causes him to half open his eyes; and he perceives, in the midst of the darkness, a kind of monster before him.

It is a death’s-head with a crown of roses. It rises above the torso of a woman white as mother-of-pearl. Beneath, a winding-sheet, starred with points of gold, makes a kind of train; — and the entire body undulates, like a gigantic worm holding itself erect.

The vision grows fainter, and then fades away.

Antony, rises again — ”This time, once more, it was the Devil, and under his two-fold aspect — the spirit of voluptuousness and the spirit of destruction. Neither terrifies me. I thrust happiness aside, and feel that I am eternal.

“Thus, death is only an illusion, a veil, masking at certain points the continuity of life. But substance, being one, why is there a variety of forms? There must be somewhere primordial figures, whose bodies are only images. If one could see, one would know the bond between mind and matter, wherein Being consists!

“There are those figures which were painted at Babylon on the wall of the temple of Belus, and they covered a mosaic in the port of Carthage. I, myself, have sometimes seen in the sky what seemed like forms of spirits. Those who traverse the desert meet animals passing all conception ...”

And, opposite him, on the other side of the Nile, lo! the Sphinx appears.

It stretches out its feet, shakes the fillets on its forehead, and lies down upon its belly.

Jumping, flying, spiriting fire through its nostrils, and striking its wings with its dragon’s tail, the Chimera with its green eyes, winds round, and barks. The curls of its head, thrown back on one side, intermingle with the hair on its haunches; and on the other side they hang over the sand, and move to and fro with the swaying of its entire body.

The Sphinx is motionless, and gazes at the Chimera:

“Here, Chimera; stop!”

The Chimera — “No, never!”

The Sphinx — “Do not run so quickly; do not fly so high; do not bark so loud!”

The Chimera — “Do not address me, do not address me any more, since you remain forever silent!”

The Sphinx — “Cease casting your flames in my face and flinging your yells in my ears; you shall not melt my granite!”

The Chimera — “You will not get hold of me, terrible Sphinx!”

The Sphinx — “You are too foolish to live with me!”

The Chimera — “You are too clumsy to follow me!”

The Sphinx — “And where are you going that you run so quickly?”

The Chimera — “I gallop into the corridors of the labyrinth; I hover over the mountains; I skim along the waves; I yelp at the bottoms of precipices; I hang by my jaws on the skirts of the clouds. With my trailing tail I scratch the coasts, and the hills have taken their curb according to the form of my shoulders. But as for you, I find you perpetually motionless; or, rather, with the end of your claw tracing letters on the sand."

The Sphinx — "That is because I keep my secret! I reflect and I calculate. The sea returns to its bed; the blades of corn balance themselves in the wind; the caravans pass; the dust flies off; the cities crumble; — but my glance, which nothing can turn aside, remains concentrated on the objects which cover an inaccessible horizon."

The Chimera — "As for me, I am light and joyous! I discover in men dazzling perspectives, with Paradises in the clouds and distant felicities. I pour into their souls the eternal insanities, projects of happiness, plans for the future, dreams of glory, and oaths of love, as well as virtuous resolutions. I drive them on perilous voyages and on mighty enterprises. I have carved with my claws the marvels of architecture. It is I that hung the little bells on the tomb of Porsenna, and surrounded with a wall of Corinthian brass the quays of the Atlantides.

"I seek fresh perfumes, larger flowers, pleasures hitherto unknown. If anywhere I find a man whose soul reposes in wisdom, I fall upon him and strangle him."

The Sphinx — "All those whom the desire of God torments, I have devoured.

"The strongest, in order to climb to my royal forehead, mount upon the stripes of my fillets as on the steps of a staircase. Weariness takes possession of them, and they fall back of their own accord."

Antony begins to tremble. He is not before his cell, but in the desert, having at either side of him those two monstrous animals, whose jaws graze his shoulders.

The Sphinx — "O Fantasy, bear me on thy wings to enliven thy sadness!"

The Chimera — "O Unknown One, I am in love with thine eyes! I turn round thee, soliciting allayment of that which devours me!"

The Sphinx — "My feet cannot raise themselves. The lichen, like a ringworm, has grown over my mouth. By dint of thinking, I have no longer anything to say."

The Chimera — "You lie, hypocritical Sphinx! How is it that you are always addressing me and abjuring me?"

The Sphinx — "It is you, unmanageable caprice, who pass and whirl about."

The Chimera — "Is that my fault? Come, now, just let me be!"
It barks.

The Sphinx — "You move away; you avoid me!"

The Sphinx grumbles.

The Chimera — "Let us make the attempt! You crush me!"

The Sphinx — "No; impossible!"

And sinking, little by little, it disappears in the sand, while the Chimera, crawling, with its tongue out, departs with a winding movement.

The breath issuing from its mouth has produced a fog.

In this fog Antony traces masses of clouds and imperfect curves. Finally, he distinguishes what appear to be human bodies.

And first advances the group of Astomi, like air-balls passing across the sun.

"Don't puff too strongly! The drops of rain bruise us; the false sounds excoriate us; the darkness blinds us. Composed of breezes and of perfumes, we roll, we float — a little more than dreams, not entirely beings."

The Nisnas have but one eye, one cheek, one hand, one leg, half a body, and half a heart. And they say, in a very loud tone:

"We live quite at our ease in our halves of houses with our halves of wives and our halves of children."

The Blemmyes, absolutely bereft of heads —

"Our shoulders are the largest; — and there is not an ox, a rhinoceros, or an elephant that is capable of carrying what we carry.

"Arrows, and a sort of vague outline are imprinted on our breasts — that is all! We reduce digestion to thought; we subtilise secretions. For us God floats peacefully in the internal chyle.

"We proceed straight on our way, passing through every mire, running along the verge of every abyss; and we are the most industrious, happy, and virtuous people."

The Pygmies — "Little good-fellows, we swarm over the world, like vermin on the hump of a dromedary.

“We are burnt, drowned, or run over; but we always reappear more full of life and more numerous — terrible from the multitude of us that exists!”

The Sciapodes — “Kept on the ground by our flowing locks, long as creeping plants, we vegetate under the shelter of our feet, which are as large as parasols; and the light reaches us through the spaces between our wide heels. No disorder and no toil! To keep the head as low as possible — that is the secret of happiness!”

Their lifted thighs, resembling trunks of trees, increase in number. And now a forest appears in which huge apes rush along on four paws. They are men with dogs’ heads.

The Cynocephali — “We leap from branch to branch to suck the eggs, and we pluck the little birds; then we put their nests upon our heads after the fashion of caps.

“We do not fail to snatch away the worst of the cows, and we destroy the lynxes’ eyes. Tearing the flowers, crushing the fruits, agitating the springs, we are the masters — by the strength of our arms and the fierceness of our hearts.

“Be bold, comrades, and snap your jaws!”

Blood and milk flow from their lips. The rain streams over their hairy backs.

Antony inhales the freshness of green leaves which are agitated as the branches of the trees dash against each other. All at once appears a large black stag with a bull’s head, carrying between his two ears a mass of white horns.

The Sadhuzag — “My seventy-four antlers are hollow like flutes. When I turn myself towards the south wind, sounds go forth from them that draw around me the ravished beasts. The serpents come winding to my feet; the wasps stick in my nostrils; and the parrots, the doves, and the ibises alight upon my branches. Listen!”

He bends back his horns, from which issues an unutterably sweet music.

Antony presses both his hands above his heart. It seems to him as if this melody were about to carry off his soul.

The Sadhuzag — “But, when I turn towards the north wind, my horns, more bushy than a battalion of spears, emit a howling noise. The forests thrill; the rivers swell; the husks of the fruit burst, and blades of grass stand erect like a coward's hair. Listen!"

He bows down his branches, from which now come forth discordant cries. Antony feels as if he were torn asunder, and his horror is increased on seeing the Mantichor, a gigantic red lion with a human figure and three rows of teeth:

"The silky texture of my scarlet hair mingles with the yellowness of the sands. I breathe through my nostrils the terror of solitudes. I spit forth the plague. I devour armies when they venture into the desert. My nails are twisted like gimlets; my teeth are cut like a saw; and my hair, wriggled out of shape, bristles with darts which I scatter, right and left, behind me. Hold! hold!"

The Mantichor casts thorns from his tail, which radiate, like arrows, in all directions. Drops of blood flow, spattering over the foliage.

The Catoblepas appears, a black buffalo, with a pig's head hanging to the earth, and connected with his shoulders by a slender neck, long and flabby as an empty gut. He is wallowing on the ground; and his feet disappear under the enormous mane of hard hairs that descend over his face:

"Fat, melancholy, savage, I remain continually feeling the mire under my stomach. My skull is so heavy that it is impossible for me to carry it. I roll it around slowly; and, opening my jaws, I snatch with my tongue the poisonous herbs that are moistened with my breath. I once devoured my paws without noticing it.

"No one, Antony, has ever seen my eyes, or those who have seen them are dead. If I but raised my eyelids — my eyelids red and swollen — that instant you would die."

Antony — "Oh! that thing! ... Well! well! As if I had any such longing! Its stupidity attracts me. No! no! I will not!" He looks fixedly on the ground. But the grass lights up, and, in the twistings of the flames, stands erect the Basilisk, a huge, violet serpent, with a trilobate crest and two teeth — one above, the other below:

"Take care! You are about to fall into my jaws! I drink fire. I am fire myself; and from every quarter I suck it in — from clouds, from pebbles, from dead trees, from the hair of animals, and from the surface of marshes. My temperature supports the volcanoes. I cause the lustre of precious stones and the colour of metals."

The Griffin, a lion with a vulture's beak, white wings, red paws, and blue neck — "I am the master of the profound splendours. I know the secret of the tombs where the old kings sleep. A chain, which issues from the wall, keeps their heads erect. Near them, in basins of porphyry, women whom they have loved float upon black liquids. Their treasures are ranged in halls, in lozenges, in hillocks, and in pyramids; and, lower, far below the tombs, after long journeys in the midst of suffocating darkness, are rivers of gold with forests of diamonds, meadows of carbuncles, and lakes of quicksilver. With my back against the door of the vault, and my claws in the air, I watch with my flaming eyes those who may think fit to come there. The immense plain, even to the furthest point of the horizon, is quite bare and whitened with travellers' bones. For you the bronze doors will open, and you will inhale the vapour of the mines; you will descend into the caverns ... Quick! quick!"

He digs the earth with his claws, crowing like a cock.

A thousand voices reply to him. The forest trembles.

And all sorts of horrible beasts arise: the Tragelaphus, half-stag, half-ox; the Myrmecoleo, a lion in front, an ant behind, whose genitals are turned backwards; the python, Aksar, of sixty cubits, who frightened Moses; the great weasel, Pastinaca, which kills trees by its odour; the Presteros, which renders idiotic those who touch it; the Mirag, a horned hare dwelling in the islands of the sea. The Copard Phalmant bursts his belly by dint of howling; the Senad, a bear with three heads, tears its little ones with its mouth; the dog, Cepus, scatters on the rocks the blue milk of its dugs. Mosquitoes begin to buzz, toads to jump, and serpents to hiss. Lightnings flash; down comes the hail.

Then there are squalls, which reveal anatomical marvels. There are alligators' heads with roebucks' feet, owls with serpents' tails, swine with tigers' muzzles, goats with asses' rumps, frogs covered with hair like bears, chameleons large as hippopotami, calves with two heads, one of which weeps while the other bellows, four f[oe]tuses holding each other by the navel and spinning like tops, and winged bellies which flutter like gnats.

They rain down from the sky; they spring out of the ground; they glide from the rocks. Everywhere eyes flash, mouths roar; the breasts bulge out; the claws lengthen; the teeth gnash; the flesh quivers. Some of them bring forth their young; others with a single bite, devour one another.

Suffocating from their very numbers, multiplying by their contact, they climb on top of one another; and they all keep stirring about Antony with a regular swaying motion, as if the soil were the deck of a vessel.

He feels close to his calves the trailing of slugs, and on his hands the cold touch of vipers; and spiders spinning their webs enclose him in their network.

But the circle of monsters begins to open; the sky suddenly becomes blue, and the unicorn makes its appearance:

“Off I gallop! Off I gallop!

“I have hoofs of ivory, teeth of steel, a head coloured purple, a body like snow, and the horn on my forehead has the varied hues of the rainbow.

“I travel from Chaldea to the Tartar desert, on the banks of the Ganges, and into Mesopotamia. I outstrip the ostriches. I run so rapidly that I draw the wind along with me. I rub my back against the palm-trees; I roll myself in the bamboos. With one bound I jump across the rivers. Doves fly above my head. Only a virgin can bridle me.

“Off I gallop! Off I gallop!”

Antony watches him flying away.

And, keeping his eyes still raised, he perceives all the birds that are nourished by the wind: the Gouith, the Ahuti, the Alphalim, the Jukneth from the mountains of Caff, and the Homaï of the Arabs, which are the souls of murdered men. He hears the parrots utter human speech, then the great web-footed Pelasgians, who sob like children or chuckle like old women.

A briny breath of air strikes his nostrils. A seashore is now before him.

At a distance rise waterspouts, lashed up by the whales; and at the extremity of the horizon the beasts of the sea, round, like leather bottles, flat, like strips of metal, or indented, like saws, advance, crawling over the sand:

“You are about to come with us into our unfathomable depths, never penetrated by man before. Different races dwell in the country of the ocean. Some are in the abode of the tempests; others swim openly in the transparency of the cold waves, browse like oxen over the coral plains, sniff in with their nostrils the ebbing tide, or carry on their shoulders the weight of the ocean-springs.”

Phosphorescences flash from the hairs of the seals and from the scales of the fishes. Sea-hedgehogs turn around like wheels; Ammon’s horns unroll themselves like cables; oysters make sounds with the fastenings of their shells; polypi spread out their tentacles; medusæ quiver like crystal balls; sponges float; anemones squirt out water; and mosses and seaweed shoot up.

And all kinds of plants spread out into branches, twist themselves into tendrils, lengthen into points, and grow round like fans. Pumpkins present the appearance of bosoms, and creeping plants entwine themselves like serpents.

The Dedaims of Babylon, which are trees, have as their fruits human heads; mandrakes sing; and the root Baaras runs into the grass.

And now the plants can no longer be distinguished from the animals. Polyparies, which have the appearance of sycamores, carry arms on their branches. Antony fancies he can trace a caterpillar between two leaves; it is a butterfly which flits away. He is on the point of walking over some shingle when up springs a grey grasshopper. Insects, like petals of roses, garnish a bush; the remains of ephemera make a bed of snow upon the soil.

And, next, the plants are indistinguishable from the stones.

Pebbles bear a resemblance to brains, stalactites to udders, and iron-dust to tapestries adorned with figures. In pieces of ice he can trace efflorescences, impressions of bushes and shells — so that one cannot tell whether they are the impressions of those objects or the objects themselves. Diamonds glisten like eyes, and minerals palpitate.

And he is no longer afraid! He lies down flat on his face, resting on his two elbows, and, holding in his breath, he gazes around.

Insects without stomachs keep eating; dried-up ferns begin to bloom afresh; and limbs which were wanting sprout forth again.

Finally, he perceives little globular bodies as large as pins’ heads, and garnished all round with eyelashes. A vibration agitates them.

Antony, in ecstasy —

“O bliss! bliss! I have seen the birth of life; I have seen the beginning of motion. The blood beats so strongly in my veins that it seems about to burst them. I feel a longing to fly, to swim, to bark, to bellow, to howl. I would like to have wings, a tortoise-shell, a rind, to blow out smoke, to wear a trunk, to twist my body, to spread myself everywhere, to be in everything, to emanate with odours, to grow like plants, to flow like water, to vibrate like sound, to shine like light, to be outlined on every form, to penetrate every atom, to descend to the very depths of matter — to be matter!”

The dawn appears at last; and, like the uplifted curtains of a tabernacle, golden clouds, wreathing themselves into large volutes, reveal the sky.

In the very middle of it, and in the disc of the sun itself, shines the face of Jesus Christ.

Antony makes the sign of the Cross, and resumes his prayers.

I.

C'est dans la Thébaïde, au haut d'une montagne, sur une plate-forme arrondie en demi-lune, et qu'enferment de grosses pierres.

La cabane de l'Ermite occupe le fond. Elle est faite de boue et de roseaux, à toit plat, sans porte. On distingue dans l'intérieur une cruche avec un pain noir ; au milieu, sur une stèle de bois, un gros livre ; par terre, çà et là, des filaments de sparterie, deux ou trois nattes, une corbeille, un couteau.

A dix pas de la cabane, il y a une longue croix plantée dans le sol ; et, à l'autre bout de la plate-forme, un vieux palmier tordu se penche sur l'abîme, car la montagne est taillée à pic, et le Nil semble faire un lac au bas de la falaise.

La vue est bornée à droite et à gauche par l'enceinte des roches. Mais du côté du désert, comme des plages qui se succéderaient, d'immenses ondulations parallèles d'un blond cendré s'étirent les unes derrière les autres, en montant toujours ; — puis au delà des sables, tout au loin, la chaîne libyque forme un mur couleur de craie, estompé légèrement par des vapeurs violettes. En face, le soleil s'abaisse. Le ciel, dans le nord, est d'une teinte gris-perle, tandis qu'au zénith des nuages de pourpre, disposés comme les flocons d'une crinière gigantesque, s'allongent sur la voûte bleue. Ces rais de flamme se rembrunissent, les parties d'azur prennent une pâleur nacrée ; les buissons, les cailloux, la terre, tout maintenant paraît dur comme du bronze ; et dans l'espace flotte une poudre d'or tellement menue qu'elle se confond avec la vibration de la lumière.

SAINT-ANTOINE

qui a une longue barbe, de longs cheveux, et une tunique de peau de chèvre, est assis, jambes croisées, entrain de faire des nattes. Dès que le soleil disparaît, il pousse un grand soupir, et regardant l'horizon :

Encore un jour ! un jour de passé !

Autrefois pourtant, je n'étais pas si misérable ! Avant la fin de la nuit, je commençais mes oraisons ; puis, je descendais vers le fleuve chercher de l'eau, et je remontais par le sentier rude avec l'outre sur mon épaule, en chantant des hymnes. Ensuite, je m'amusais à ranger tout dans ma cabane. Je prenais mes outils ; je tâchais que les nattes fussent bien égales et les corbeilles légères ; car mes moindres actions me semblaient alors des devoirs qui n'avaient rien de pénible.

A des heures réglées je quittais mon ouvrage ; et priant les deux bras étendus je sentais comme une fontaine de miséricorde qui s'épanchait du haut du ciel dans mon coeur. Elle est tarie, maintenant. Pourquoi ?...

Il marche dans l'enceinte des roches, lentement.

Tous me blâmaient lorsque j'ai quitté la maison. Ma mère s'affaissa mourante, ma soeur de loin me faisait des signes pour revenir ; et l'autre pleurait, Ammonaria, cette enfant que je rencontrais chaque soir au bord de la citerne, quand elle amenait ses buffles. Elle a couru après moi. Les anneaux de ses pieds brillaient dans la poussière, et sa tunique ouverte sur les hanches flottait au vent. Le vieil ascète qui m'emmenait lui a crié des injures. Nos deux chameaux galopaient toujours ; et je n'ai plus revu personne.

D'abord, j'ai choisi pour demeure le tombeau d'un Pharaon. Mais un enchantement circule dans ces palais souterrains, où les ténèbres ont l'air épaissies par l'ancienne fumée des aromates. Du fond des sarcophages j'ai entendu s'élever une voix dolente qui m'appelait ; ou bien, je voyais vivre, tout à coup, les choses abominables peintes sur les murs ; et j'ai fui jusqu'au bord de la mer Rouge dans une citadelle en ruines. Là, j'avais pour compagnie des scorpions se traînant parmi les pierres, et au-dessus de ma tête, continuellement des aigles qui tournoyaient sur le ciel bleu. La nuit, j'étais déchiré par des griffes, mordu par des becs, frôlé par des ailes molles ; et d'épouvantables démons, hurlant dans mes oreilles, me renversaient par terre. Une fois même, les gens d'une caravane qui s'en allait vers Alexandrie m'ont secouru, puis emmené avec eux.

Alors, j'ai voulu m'instruire près du bon vieillard Didyme. Bien qu'il fût aveugle, aucun ne l'égalait dans la connaissance des Écritures. Quand la leçon était finie, il réclamait mon bras pour se promener. Je le conduisais sur le Paneum, d'où l'on découvre le Phare et la haute mer. Nous revenions ensuite par le port, en coudoyant des hommes de toutes les nations, jusqu'à des Cimmériens vêtus de peaux d'ours, et des Gymnosophistes du Gange frottés de bouse de vache. Mais sans cesse, il y avait quelque bataille dans les rues, à cause des Juifs refusant de payer l'impôt, ou des séditieux qui voulaient chasser les Romains. D'ailleurs la ville est pleine d'hérétiques, des sectateurs de Manès, de Valentin, de Basilide, d'Arius, — tous vous accaparrant pour discuter et vous convaincre.

Leurs discours me reviennent quelquefois dans la mémoire. On a beau n'y pas faire attention, cela trouble.

Je me suis réfugié à Colzim ; et ma pénitence fut si haute que je n'avais plus peur de Dieu. Quelques uns s'assemblèrent autour de moi pour devenir des anachorètes. Je leur ai imposé une règle pratique, en haine des extravagances de la Gnose et des assertions des philosophes. On m'envoyait de partout des messages. On venait me voir de très-loin.

Cependant le peuple torturait les confesseurs, et la soif du martyr m'entraîna dans Alexandrie. La persécution avait cessé depuis trois jours.

Comme je m'en retournais, un flot de monde m'arrêta devant le temple de Sérapis. C'était, me dit-on, un dernier exemple que le gouverneur voulait faire. Au milieu du portique, en plein soleil, une femme nue était attachée contre une colonne, deux soldats la fouettant avec des lanières ; à chacun des coups son corps entier se tordait. Elle s'est retournée, la bouche ouverte ; — et pardessus la foule, à travers ses longs cheveux qui lui couvraient la figure, j'ai cru reconnaître Ammonaria ...

Cependant ... celle-là était plus grande ..., et belle ..., prodigieusement !

Il se passe les mains sur le front.

Non ! non ! je ne veux pas y penser !

Une autre fois, Athanase m'appela pour le soutenir contre les Ariens. Tout s'est borné à des invectives et à des risées. Mais, depuis lors, il a été calomnié, dépossédé de son siège, mis en fuite. Où est-il, maintenant ? je n'en sais rien ! On s'inquiète si peu de me donner des nouvelles. Tous mes disciples m'ont quitté, Hilarion comme les autres !

Il avait peut-être quinze ans quand il est venu ; et son intelligence était si curieuse qu'il m'adressait à chaque moment des questions. Puis, il écoutait d'un air pensif ; — et les choses dont j'avais besoin, il me les apportait sans murmure, plus lesté qu'un chevreau, gai d'ailleurs à faire rire les patriarches. C'était un fils pour moi !

Le ciel est rouge, la terre complètement noire. Sous les rafales du vent des traînées de sable se lèvent comme de grands linceuls, puis retombent. Dans une éclaircie, tout à coup, passent des oiseaux formant un bataillon triangulaire, pareil à un morceau de métal, et dont les bords seuls frémissent.

Antoine les regarde.

Ah ! que je voudrais les suivre !

Combien de fois, aussi, n'ai-je pas contemplé avec envie les longs bateaux, dont les voiles ressemblent à des ailes, et surtout quand ils emmenaient au loin ceux que j'avais reçus chez moi ! Quelles bonnes heures nous avions ! quels épanchements ! Aucun ne m'a plus intéressé qu'Ammon ; il me racontait son voyage à Rome, les Catacombes, le Colisée, la piété des femmes illustres, mille choses encore !... et je n'ai pas voulu partir avec lui ! D'où vient mon obstination à continuer une vie pareille ? J'aurais bien fait de rester chez les moines de Nitrie, puisqu'ils m'en suppliaient. Ils habitent des cellules à part, et cependant communiquent entre eux. Le dimanche, la trompette les assemble à l'église, où l'on voit accrochés trois martinets qui servent à punir les délinquants, les voleurs et les intrus, car leur discipline est sévère.

Ils ne manquent pas de certaines douceurs, néanmoins. Des fidèles leur apportent des oeufs, des fruits, et même des instruments propres à ôter les épines des pieds. Il y a des vignobles autour de Pisperi, ceux de Pabène ont un radeau pour aller chercher les provisions.

Mais j'aurais mieux servi mes frères en étant tout simplement un prêtre. On secourt les pauvres, on distribue les sacrements, on a de l'autorité dans les familles.

D'ailleurs les laïques ne sont pas tous damnés, et il ne tenait qu'à moi d'être ... par exemple ... grammairien, philosophe. J'aurais dans ma chambre une sphère de roseaux, toujours des tablettes à la main, des jeunes gens autour de moi, et à ma porte, comme enseigne, une couronne de laurier suspendue.

Mais il y a trop d'orgueil à ces triomphes ! Soldat valait mieux. J'étais robuste et hardi, — assez pour tendre le câble des machines, traverser les forêts sombres, entrer casque en tête dans les villes fumantes !... Rien ne m'empêchait, non plus, d'acheter avec mon argent une charge de publicain au péage de quelque pont ; et les voyageurs m'auraient appris des histoires, en me montrant dans leurs bagages des quantités d'objets curieux ...

Les marchands d'Alexandrie naviguent les jours de fête sur la rivière de Canope, et boivent du vin dans des calices de lotus, au bruit des tambourins qui font trembler les tavernes le long du bord ! Au delà, des arbres taillés en cône protègent contre le vent du sud les fermes tranquilles. Le toit de la haute maison s'appuie sur de minces colonnettes, rapprochées comme les bâtons d'une claire-voie ; et par ces intervalles le maître, étendu sur un long siège, aperçoit toutes ses plaines autour de lui, avec les chasseurs entre les blés, le pressoir où l'on vendange, les boeufs qui battent la paille. Ses enfants jouent par terre, sa femme se penche pour l'embrasser.

Dans l'obscurité blanchâtre de la nuit, apparaissent çà et là des museaux pointus, avec des oreilles toutes droites et des yeux brillants. Antoine marche vers eux. Des graviers déroulent, les bêtes s'enfuient. C'était un troupeau de chacals.

Un seul est resté, et qui se tient sur deux pattes, le corps en demi-cercle et la tête oblique, dans une pose pleine de défiance.

Comme il est joli ! je voudrais passer ma main sur son dos, doucement.

Antoine siffle pour le faire venir. Le chacal disparaît.

Ah ! il s'en va rejoindre les autres ! Quelle solitude ! Quel ennui !

Riant amèrement :

C'est une si belle existence que de tordre au feu des bâtons de palmier pour faire des houlettes, et de façonner des corbeilles, de coudre des nattes, puis d'échanger tout cela avec les Nomades contre du pain qui vous brise les dents ! Ah ! misère de moi ! est-ce que ça ne finira pas ! Mais la mort vaudrait mieux ! Je n'en peux plus ! Assez ! assez !

Il frappe du pied, et tourne au milieu des roches d'un pas rapide, puis s'arrête hors d'haleine, éclate en sanglots et se couche par terre, sur le flanc.

La nuit est calme ; des étoiles nombreuses palpitent ; on n'entend que le claquement des tarentules.

Les deux bras de la croix font une ombre sur le sable ; Antoine, qui pleure, l'aperçoit.

Suis-je assez faible, mon Dieu ! Du courage, relevons-nous !

Il entre dans sa cabane, découvre un charbon enfoui, allume une torche et la plante sur le stèle de bois, de façon à éclairer le gros livre.

Si je prenais ... la Vie des Apôtres ?... oui !... n'importe où !

« Il vit le ciel ouvert avec une grande nappe qui descendait par les quatre coins, dans laquelle il y avait toutes sortes d'animaux terrestres et de bêtes sauvages, de reptiles et d'oiseaux ; et une voix lui dit : Pierre, lève-toi ! tue, et mange ! »

Donc le Seigneur voulait que son apôtre mangeât de tout ?... tandis que moi ...

Antoine reste le menton sur la poitrine. Le frémissement des pages, que le vent agite, lui fait relever la tête, et il lit :

« Les Juifs tuèrent tous leurs ennemis avec des glaives et ils en firent un grand carnage, de sorte qu'ils disposèrent à volonté de ceux qu'ils haïssaient. »

Suit le dénombrement des gens tués par eux : soixante-quinze mille. Ils avaient tant souffert ! D'ailleurs, leurs ennemis étaient les ennemis du vrai Dieu. Et comme ils devaient jouir à se venger, tout en massacrant des idolâtres ! La ville sans doute regorgeait de morts ! Il y en avait au seuil des jardins, sur les escaliers, à une telle hauteur dans les chambres que les portes ne pouvaient plus tourner !... — Mais voilà que je plonge dans des idées de meurtre et de sang !

Il ouvre le livre à un autre endroit.

« Nabuchodonosor se prosterna le visage contre terre et adora Daniel. »

Ah ! c'est bien ! Le Très-Haut exalte ses prophètes au-dessus des rois ; celui-là pourtant vivait dans les festins, ivre continuellement de délices et d'orgueil. Mais Dieu, par punition, l'a changé en bête. Il marchait à quatre pattes !

Antoine se met à rire ; et en écartant les bras, du bout de sa main, dérange les feuilles du livre. Ses yeux tombent sur cette phrase :

« Ezéchias eut une grande joie de leur arrivée. Il leur montra ses parfums, son or et son argent, tous ses aromates, ses huiles de senteur, tous ses vases précieux, et ce qu'il y avait dans ses trésors. »

Je me figure ... qu'on voyait entassés jusqu'au plafond des pierres fines, des diamants, des dariques. Un homme qui en possède une accumulation si grande n'est plus pareil aux autres. Il songe, tout en les maniant, qu'il tient le résultat d'une quantité innombrable d'efforts, et comme la vie des peuples qu'il aurait pompée et qu'il peut répandre. C'est une précaution utile aux rois. Le plus sage de tous n'y a pas manqué. Ses flottes lui apportaient de l'ivoire, des singes ... Où est-ce donc ?

Il feuillette vivement.

Ah ! voici !

« La Reine de Saba, connaissant la gloire de Salomon, vint le tenter, en lui proposant des énigmes. »

Comment espérait-elle le tenter ? Le Diable a bien voulu tenter Jésus ! Mais Jésus a triomphé parce qu'il était Dieu, et Salomon grâce peut-être à sa science de magicien. Elle est sublime, cette science-là ! Car le monde, — ainsi qu'un philosophe me l'a expliqué, — forme un ensemble dont toutes les parties influent les unes sur les autres, comme les organes d'un seul corps. Il s'agit de connaître les amours et les répulsions naturelles des choses, puis de les mettre en jeu ?... On pourrait donc modifier ce qui paraît être l'ordre immuable ?

Alors les deux ombres dessinées derrière lui par les bras de la croix se projettent en avant. Elles font comme deux grandes cornes ; Antoine s'écrie :

Au secours, mon Dieu !

L'ombre est revenue à sa place.

Ah !... c'était une illusion ! pas autre chose ! — Il est inutile que je me tourmente l'esprit ! Je n'ai rien à faire !... absolument rien à faire !

Il s'assoit, et se croise les bras.

Cependant ... j'avais cru sentir l'approche ... Mais pourquoi viendrait-Il ? D'ailleurs, est-ce que je ne connais pas ses artifices ? J'ai repoussé le monstrueux anachorète qui m'offrait, en riant, des petits pains chauds, le centaure qui tâchait de me prendre sur sa croupe, — et cet enfant noir apparu au milieu des sables, qui était très-beau, et qui m'a dit s'appeler l'esprit de fornication.

Antoine marche de droite et de gauche, vivement.

C'est par mon ordre qu'on a bâti cette foule de retraites saintes, pleines de moines portant des cilices sous leurs peaux de chèvres, et nombreux à pouvoir faire une armée ! J'ai guéri de loin des malades ; j'ai chassé des démons ; j'ai passé le fleuve au milieu des crocodiles ; l'empereur Constantin m'a écrit trois lettres ; Balacius, qui avait craché sur les miennes, a été déchiré par ses chevaux ; le peuple d'Alexandrie, quand j'ai reparu, se battait pour me voir, et Athanase m'a reconduit sur la route. Mais aussi quelles oeuvres ! Voilà plus de trente ans que je suis dans le désert à gémir toujours ! J'ai porté sur mes reins quatre-vingts livres de bronze comme Eusèbe, j'ai exposé mon corps à la piqure des insectes comme Macaire, je suis resté cinquante-trois nuits sans fermer l'oeil comme Pacôme ; et ceux qu'on décapite, qu'on tenaille ou qu'on brûle ont moins de vertu, peut-être, puisque ma vie est un continuel martyre !

Antoine se ralentit.

Certainement, il n'y a personne dans une détresse aussi profonde ! Les coeurs charitables diminuent. On ne me donne plus rien. Mon manteau est usé. Je n'ai pas de sandales, pas même une écuelle ! — car, j'ai distribué aux pauvres et à ma famille tout mon bien, sans retenir une obole. Ne serait ce que pour avoir des outils indispensables à mon travail, il me faudrait un peu d'argent. Oh ! pas beaucoup ! une petite somme !... je la ménagerais.

Les Pères de Nicée, en robes de pourpre, se tenaient comme des mages, sur des trônes, le long du mur ; et on les a régalez dans un banquet, en les comblant d'honneurs, surtout Paphnuce, parce qu'il est borgne et boiteux depuis la persécution de Dioclétien ! L'Empereur lui a baisé plusieurs fois son oeil crevé ; quelle sottise ! Du reste, le Concile avait des membres si infâmes ! Un évêque de Scythie, Théophile ; un autre de Perse, Jean ; un gardeur de bestiaux, Spiridion ! Alexandre était trop vieux. Athanase aurait dû montrer plus de douceur aux Ariens, pour en obtenir des concessions !

Est-ce qu'ils en auraient fait ! Ils n'ont pas voulu m'entendre ! Celui qui parlait contre moi, — un grand jeune homme à barbe frisée, — me lançait, d'un air tranquille, des objections captieuses ; et, pendant que je cherchais mes paroles, ils étaient à me regarder avec leurs figures méchantes, en aboyant comme des hyènes. Ah ! que ne puis-je les faire exiler tous par l'Empereur, ou plutôt les battre, les écraser, les voir souffrir ! Je souffre bien, moi !

Il s'appuie en défaillant contre sa cabane.

C'est d'avoir trop jeûné ! mes forces s'en vont. Si je mangeais ... une fois seulement, un morceau de viande.

Il entreferme les yeux, avec langueur.

Ah ! de la chair rouge ... une grappe de raisin qu'on mord !... du lait caillé qui tremble sur un plat !...

Mais qu'ai-je donc !... Qu'ai-je donc !... Je sens mon coeur grossir comme la mer, quand elle se gonfle avant l'orage. Une mollesse infinie m'accable, et l'air chaud me semble rouler le parfum d'une chevelure. Aucune femme n'est venue, cependant ?...

Il se tourne vers le petit chemin entre les roches.

C'est par là qu'elles arrivent, balancées dans leurs litières aux bras noirs des eunuques. Elles descendent, et joignant leurs mains chargées d'anneaux, elles s'agenouillent. Elles me racontent leurs inquiétudes. Le besoin d'une volupté surhumaine les torture ; elles voudraient mourir, elles ont vu dans leurs songes des Dieux qui les appelaient ; — et le bas de leur robe tombe sur mes pieds. Je les repousse. « Oh ! non, disent-elles, pas encore ! Que dois-je faire ! » Toutes les pénitences leur seraient bonnes. Elles demandent les plus rudes, à partager la mienne, à vivre avec moi.

Voilà longtemps que je n'en ai vu ! Peut-être qu'il en va venir ? pourquoi pas ? Si tout à coup ... j'allais entendre tinter des clochettes de mulot dans la montagne. Il me semble ...

Antoine grimpe sur une roche, à l'entrée du sentier ; et il se penche, en dardant ses yeux dans les ténèbres.

Oui ! là-bas, tout au fond, une masse remue, comme des gens qui cherchent leur chemin. Elle est là ! Ils se trompent.

Appelant :

De ce côté ! viens ! viens !

L'écho répète : Viens ! viens !

Il laisse tomber ses bras, stupéfait.

Quelle honte ! Ah ! pauvre Antoine !

Et tout de suite, il entend chuchoter : « Pauvre Antoine ! »

Quelqu'un ? répondez !

Le vent qui passe dans les intervalles des roches fait des modulations ; et dans leurs sonorités confuses, il distingue DES VOIX comme si l'air parlait. Elles sont basses, et insinuantes, sifflantes.

LA PREMIÈRE

Veux-tu des femmes ?

LA SECONDE

De grands tas d'argent, plutôt !

LA TROISIÈME

Une épée qui reluit ?

et LES AUTRES

— Le Peuple entier t’admire !

— Endors-toi !

— Tu les égorgeras, va, tu les égorgeras !

En même temps, les objets se transforment. Au bord de la falaise, le vieux palmier, avec sa touffe de feuilles jaunes, devient le torse d’une femme penchée sur l’abîme, et dont les grands cheveux se balançant.

ANTOINE

se tourne vers sa cabane ; et l’escabeau soutenant le gros livre, avec ses pages chargées de lettres noires, lui semble un arbuste tout couvert d’hirondelles.

C’est la torche, sans doute, qui faisant un jeu de lumière ...
Éteignons-la !

Il l’éteint, l’obscurité est profonde.

Et, tout à coup, passent au milieu de l’air, d’abord une flaque d’eau, ensuite une prostituée, le coin d’un temple, une figure de soldat, un char avec deux chevaux blancs, qui se cabrent.

Ces images arrivent brusquement, par secousses, se détachant sur la nuit comme des peintures d’écarlate sur de l’ébène.

Leur mouvement s’accélère. Elles défilent d’une façon vertigineuse. D’autres fois, elles s’arrêtent et pâlisent par degrés, se fondent ; ou bien, elles s’envolent, et immédiatement d’autres arrivent.

Antoine ferme ses paupières.

Elles se multiplient, l’entourent, l’assiègent. Une épouvante indicible l’envahit ; et il ne sent plus rien qu’une contraction brûlante à l’épigastre. Malgré le vacarme de sa tête, il perçoit un silence énorme qui le sépare du monde. Il tâche de parler ; impossible ! C’est comme si le lien général de son être se dissolvait ; et, ne résistant plus, Antoine tombe sur la natte.

II.

Alors une grande ombre, plus subtile qu'une ombre naturelle, et que d'autres ombres festonnent le long de ses bords, se marque sur la terre.

C'est le Diable, accoudé contre le toit de la cabane et portant sous ses deux ailes, — comme une chauve-souris gigantesque qui allaiterait ses petits, — les Sept Péchés Capitaux, dont les têtes grimaçantes se laissent entrevoir confusément.

Antoine, les yeux toujours fermés, jouit de son inaction ; et il étale ses membres sur la natte.

Elle lui semble douce, de plus en plus, — si bien qu'elle se rembourre, elle se hausse, elle devient un lit, le lit une chaloupe ; de l'eau clapote contre ses flancs.

A droite et à gauche, s'élèvent deux langues de terre noire, que dominant des champs cultivés, avec un sycomore, de place en place. Un bruit de grelots, de tambours et de chanteurs retentit au loin. Ce sont des gens qui s'en vont à Canope dormir sur le temple de Sérapis pour avoir des songes. Antoine sait cela ; — et il glisse, poussé par le vent, entre les deux berges du canal. Les feuilles des papyrus et les fleurs rouges des nymphæas, plus grandes qu'un homme, se penchent sur lui. Il est étendu au fond de la barque ; un aviron, à l'arrière, traîne dans l'eau. De temps en temps un souffle tiède arrive, et les roseaux minces s'entre-choquent. Le murmure des petites vagues diminue. Un assoupissement le prend. Il songe qu'il est un solitaire d'Égypte.

Alors il se relève en sursaut.

Ai-je rêvé ?... c'était si net que j'en doute. La langue me brûle ! J'ai soif !

Il entre dans sa cabane, et tâte au hasard, partout.

Le sol est humide !... Est-ce qu'il a plu ? Tiens ! des morceaux ! ma cruche brisée !... mais l'outre ?

Il la trouve.

Vide ! complètement vide !

Pour descendre jusqu'au fleuve, il me faudrait trois heures au moins, et la nuit est si profonde que je n'y verrais pas à me conduire. Mes entrailles se tordent. Où est le pain ?

Après avoir cherché longtemps, il ramasse une croûte moins grosse qu'un oeuf.

Comment ? Les chacals l'auront pris ? Ah, malédiction !

Et, de fureur, il jette le pain par terre.

A peine ce geste est-il fait qu'une table est là, couverte de toutes les choses bonnes à manger.

La nappe de byssus, striée comme les bandelettes des sphinx, produit d'elle-même des ondulations lumineuses. Il y a dessus d'énormes quartiers de viandes rouges, de grands poissons, des oiseaux avec leurs plumes, des quadrupèdes avec leurs poils, des fruits d'une coloration presque humaine ; et des morceaux de glace blanche et des buires de cristal violet se renvoient des feux. Antoine distingue au milieu de la table un sanglier fumant par tous ses pores, les pattes sous le ventre, les yeux à demi clos ; — et l'idée de pouvoir manger cette bête formidable le réjouit extrêmement. Puis, ce sont des choses qu'il n'a jamais vues, des hachis noirs, des gelées couleur d'or, des ragoûts où flottent des champignons comme des nénuphars sur des étangs, des mousses si légères qu'elles ressemblent à des nuages.

Et l'arôme de tout cela lui apporte l'odeur salée de l'Océan, la fraîcheur des fontaines, le grand parfum des bois. Il dilate ses narines tant qu'il peut ; il en bave ; il se dit qu'il en a pour un an, pour dix ans, pour sa vie entière !

A mesure qu'il promène sur les mets ses yeux écarquillés, d'autres s'accumulent, formant une pyramide, dont les angles s'écroulent. Les vins se mettent à couler, les poissons à palpiter, le sang dans les plats bouillonne, la pulpe des fruits s'avance comme des lèvres amoureuses ; et la table monte jusqu'à sa poitrine, jusqu'à son menton, — ne portant qu'une seule assiette et qu'un seul pain, qui se trouvent juste en face de lui.

Il va saisir le pain. D'autres pains se présentent.

Pour moi !... tous ! mais ...

Antoine recule.

Au lieu d'un qu'il y avait, en voilà !... C'est un miracle, alors, le même que fit le Seigneur !...

Dans quel but ? Eh ! tout le reste n'est pas moins incompréhensibles ! Ah ! démon, va-t'en ! va-t'en !

Il donne un coup de pied dans la table. Elle disparaît.

Plus rien ? — non !

Il respire largement.

Ah ! la tentation était forte. Mais comme je m'en suis délivré !

Il relève la tête, et trébuche contre un objet sonore.

Qu'est-ce donc ?

Antoine se baisse.

Tiens ! une coupe ! quelqu'un, en voyageant, l'aura perdue. Rien d'extraordinaire ...

Il mouille son doigt, et frotte.

Ça reluit ! du métal ! Cependant, je ne distingue pas ...

Il allume sa torche, et examine la coupe.

Elle est en argent, ornée d'ovules sur le bord, avec une médaille au fond.

Il fait sauter la médaille d'un coup d'ongle.

C'est une pièce de monnaie qui vaut ... de sept à huit drachmes ; pas davantage ! N'importe ! je pourrais bien, avec cela, me procurer une peau de brebis.

Un reflet de la torche éclaire la coupe.

Pas possible ! en or ! oui !... tout en or !

Une autre pièce, plus grande, se trouve au fond. Sous celle-ci, il en découvre plusieurs autres.

Mais cela fait une somme ... assez forte pour avoir trois boeufs ... un petit champ !

La coupe est maintenant remplie de pièces d'or.

Allons donc ! cent esclaves, des soldats, une foule, de quoi acheter

...

Les granulations de la bordure, se détachant, forment un collier de perles.

Avec ce joyau-là, on gagnerait même la femme de l'Empereur !

D'une secousse, Antoine fait glisser le collier sur son poignet. Il tient la coupe de sa main gauche, et de son autre bras lève la torche pour mieux l'éclairer. Comme l'eau qui ruisselle d'une vasque, il s'en épanche à flots continus, — de manière à faire un monticule sur le sable, — des diamants, des escarboucles et des saphirs mêlés à de grandes pièces d'or, portant des effigies de rois.

Comment ? comment ? des staters, des cycles, des dariques, des aryandiques ! Alexandre, Démétrius, les Ptolémées, César ! mais chacun d'eux n'en avait pas autant ! Rien d'impossible ! plus de souffrance ! et ces rayons qui m'éblouissent ! Ah ! mon coeur déborde ! comme c'est bon ! oui !... oui !... encore ! jamais assez ! J'aurais beau en jeter à la mer continuellement, il m'en restera. Pourquoi en perdre ? Je garderai tout ; sans le dire à personne ; je me ferai creuser dans le roc une chambre qui sera couverte à l'intérieur de lames de bronze — et je viendrai là, pour sentir les piles d'or s'enfoncer sous mes talons ; j'y plongerai mes bras comme dans des sacs de grain. Je veux m'en frotter le visage, me coucher dessus !

Il lâche la torche pour embrasser le tas ; et tombe par terre sur la poitrine.

Il se relève. La place est entièrement vide.

Qu'ai-je fait ?

Si j'étais mort pendant ce temps-là, c'était l'enfer ! l'enfer irrévocable !

Il tremble de tous ses membres.

Je suis donc maudit ? Eh non ! c'est ma faute ! je me laisse prendre à tous les pièges ! On n'est pas plus imbécile et plus infâme. Je voudrais me battre, ou plutôt m'arracher de mon corps ! Il y a trop longtemps que je me contiens ! J'ai besoin de me venger, de frapper, de tuer ! c'est comme si j'avais dans l'âme un troupeau de bêtes féroces. Je voudrais, à coups de hache, au milieu d'une foule ... Ah ! un poignard !...

Il se jette sur son couteau, qu'il aperçoit. Le couteau glisse de sa main, et Antoine reste accoté contre le mur de sa cabane, la bouche grande ouverte, immobile, — cataleptique.

Tout l'entourage a disparu.

Il se croit à Alexandrie sur le Paneum, montagne artificielle qu'entoure un escalier en limaçon et dressée au centre de la ville.

En face de lui s'étend le lac Mareotis, à droite la mer, à gauche la campagne, — et, immédiatement sous ses yeux, une confusion de toits plats, traversée du sud au nord et de l'est à l'ouest par deux rues qui s'entre-croisent et forment, dans toute leur longueur, une file de portiques à chapiteaux corinthiens. Les maisons surplombant cette double colonnade ont des fenêtres à vitres colorées. Quelques-unes portent extérieurement d'énormes cages en bois, où l'air du dehors s'engouffre.

Des monuments d'architecture différente se tassent les uns près des autres. Des pylônes égyptiens dominent des temples grecs. Des obélisques apparaissent comme des lances entre des créneaux de briques rouges. Au milieu des places, il y a des Hermès à oreilles pointues et des Anubis à tête de chien. Antoine distingue des mosaïques dans les cours, et aux poutrelles des plafonds des tapis accrochés.

Il embrasse, d'un seul coup d'oeil, les deux ports (le Grand-Port et l'Eunoste), ronds tous les deux comme deux cirques, et que sépare un môle joignant Alexandrie à l'îlot escarpé sur lequel se lève la tour du Phare, quadrangulaire, haute de cinq cents coudées et à neuf étages, — avec un amas de charbons nons fumant à son sommet.

De petits ports intérieurs découpent les ports principaux. Le môle, à chaque bout, est terminé par un pont établi sur des colonnes de marbre plantées dans la mer. Des voiles passent dessous ; et de lourdes gabares débordantes de marchandises, des barques thalamèges à incrustations d'ivoire, des gondoles couvertes d'un tendelet, des trirèmes et des birèmes, toutes sortes de bateaux, circulent ou stationnent contre les quais.

Autour du Grand-Port, c'est une suite ininterrompue de constructions royales : le palais des Ptolémées, le Muséum, le Posidium, le Cesareum, le Timonium où se réfugia Marc-Antoine, le Soma qui contient le tombeau d'Alexandre ; — tandis qu'à l'autre extrémité de la ville, après l'Eunoste, on aperçoit dans un faubourg des fabriques de verre, de parfums et de papyrus.

Des vendeurs ambulants, des portefaix, des âniers, courent, se heurtent. Ça et là, un prêtre d'Osiris avec une peau de panthère sur l'épaule, un soldat romain à casque de bronze, beaucoup de nègres. Au seuil des boutiques des femmes s'arrêtent, des artisans travaillent ; et le grincement des chars fait envoler des oiseaux qui mangent par terre les détritüs des boucheries et des restes de poisson.

Sur l'uniformité des maisons blanches, le dessin des rues jette comme un réseau noir. Les marchés pleins d'herbes y font des bouquets verts, les sécheries des teinturiers des plaques de couleurs, les ornements d'or au fronton des temples des points lumineux, — tout cela compris dans l'enceinte ovale des murs grisâtres, sous la voûte du ciel bleu, près de la mer immobile.

Mais la foule s'arrête, et regarde du côté de l'occident, d'où s'avancent d'énormes tourbillons de poussière.

Ce sont les moines de la Thébaïde, vêtus de peaux de chèvre, armés de gourdins, et hurlant un cantique de guerre et de religion avec ce refrain : « Où sont-ils ? où sont-ils ? »

Antoine comprend qu'ils viennent pour tuer les Ariens.

Tout à coup les rues se vident, — et l'on ne voit plus que des pieds levés.

Les Solitaires maintenant sont dans la ville. Leurs formidables bâtons, garnis de clous, tournent comme des soleils d'acier. On entend le fracas des choses brisées dans les maisons. Il y a des intervalles de silence. Puis de grands cris s'élèvent.

D'un bout à l'autre des rues, c'est un remous continu de peuple effaré.

Plusieurs tiennent des piques. Quelquefois, deux groupes se rencontrent, n'en font qu'un ; et cette masse glisse sur les dalles, se disjoint, s'abat. Mais toujours les hommes à longs cheveux reparaissent.

Des filets de fumée s'échappent du coin des édifices. Les battants des portes éclatent. Des pans de murs s'écroulent. Des architraves tombent.

Antoine retrouve tous ses ennemis l'un après l'autre. Il en reconnaît qu'il avait oubliés ; avant de les tuer, il les outrage. Il éventre, égorge, assomme, traîne les vieillards par la barbe, écrase les enfants, frappe les blessés. Et on se venge du luxe ; ceux qui ne savent pas lire déchirent les livres ; d'autres cassent, abîment les statues, les peintures, les meubles, les coffrets, mille délicatesses dont ils ignorent l'usage et qui, à cause de cela, les exaspèrent. De temps à autre, ils s'arrêtent tout hors d'haleine, puis recommencent.

Les habitants, réfugiés dans les cours, gémissent. Les femmes lèvent au ciel leurs yeux en pleurs et leurs bras nus. Pour fléchir les Solitaires, elles embrassent leurs genoux ; ils les renversent ; et le sang jaillit jusqu'aux plafonds, retombe en nappes le long des murs, ruisselle du tronc des cadavres décapités, emplît les aqueducs, fait par terre de larges flaques rouges.

Antoine en a jusqu'aux jarrets. Il marche dedans ; il en hume les gouttelettes sur ses lèvres, et tressaille de joie à le sentir contre ses membres, sous sa tunique de poils, qui en est trempée.

La nuit vient. L'immense clameur s'apaise.

Les Solitaires ont disparu.

Tout à coup, sur les galeries extérieures bordant les neuf étages du Phare, Antoine aperçoit de grosses lignes noires comme seraient des corbeaux arrêtés. Il y court, et il se trouve au sommet.

Un grand miroir de cuivre, tourné vers la haute mer, reflète les navires qui sont au large.

Antoine s'amuse à les regarder ; et à mesure qu'il les regarde, leur nombre augmente.

Ils sont tassés dans un golfe ayant la forme d'un croissant. Par derrière, sur un promontoire, s'étale une ville neuve d'architecture romaine, avec des coupoles de pierre, des toits coniques, des marbres roses et bleus, et une profusion d'airain appliquée aux volutes des chapiteaux, à la crête des maisons, aux angles des corniches. Un bois de cyprès la domine. La couleur de la mer est plus verte, l'air plus froid. Sur les montagnes à l'horizon, il y a de la neige.

Antoine cherche sa route, quand un homme l'aborde et lui dit :
« Venez ! on vous attend ! »

Il traverse un forum, entre dans une cour, se baisse sous une porte ; et il arrive devant la façade du palais, décoré par un groupe en cire qui représente l'empereur Constantin terrassant un dragon. Une vasque de porphyre porte à son milieu une conque en or pleine de pistaches. Son guide lui dit qu'il peut en prendre. Il en prend.

Puis il est comme perdu dans une succession d'appartements.

On voit le long des murs en mosaïque, des généraux offrant à l'Empereur sur le plat de la main des villes conquises. Et partout, ce sont des colonnes de basalte, des grilles en filigrane d'argent, des sièges d'ivoire, des tapisseries brodées de perles. La lumière tombe des voûtes, Antoine continue à marcher. De tièdes exhalaisons circulent ; il entend, quelquefois, le claquement discret d'une sandale. Postés dans les antichambres, des gardiens, — qui ressemblent à des automates, — tiennent sur leurs épaules des bâtons de vermeil.

Enfin, il se trouve au bas d'une salle terminée au fond par des rideaux d'hyacinthe. Ils s'écartent, et découvrent l'Empereur, assis sur un trône, en tunique violette, et chaussé de brodequins rouges à bandes noires.

Un diadème de perles contourne sa chevelure disposée en rouleaux symétriques. Il a les paupières tombantes, le nez droit, la physionomie lourde et sournoise. Aux coins du dais étendu sur sa tête quatre colombes d'or sont posées, et au pied du trône deux lions d'émail accroupis. Les colombes se mettent à chanter, les lions à rugir, l'Empereur roule des yeux, Antoine s'avance ; et tout de suite, sans préambule, ils se racontent des événements. Dans les villes d'Antioche, d'Éphèse et d'Alexandrie, on a saccagé les temples et fait avec les statues des dieux, des pots et des marmites ; l'Empereur en rit beaucoup. Antoine lui reproche sa tolérance envers les Novatiens. Mais l'Empereur s'emporte ; Novatiens, Ariens, Melécien, tous l'ennuient. Cependant il admire l'épiscopat, car les chrétiens relevant des évêques, qui dépendent de cinq ou six personnages, il s'agit de gagner ceux-là pour avoir à soi tous les autres. Aussi n'a-t-il pas manqué de leur fournir des sommes considérables. Mais il déteste les pères du Concile de Nicée. — « Allons-les voir ! » Antoine le suit.

Et ils se trouvent, de plain-pied, sur une terrasse.

Elle domine un hippodrome, rempli de monde et que surmontent des portiques, où le reste de la foule se promène. Au centre du champ de course s'étend une plate-forme étroite, portant sur sa longueur un petit temple de Mercure, la statue de Constantin, trois serpents de bronze entrelacés, à un bout de gros oeufs en bois, et à l'autre sept dauphins la queue en l'air.

Derrière le pavillon impérial, les Préfets des chambres, les Comtes des domestiques et les Patrices s'échelonnent jusqu'au premier étage d'une église, dont toutes les fenêtres sont garnies de femmes. A droite est la tribune de la faction bleue, à gauche celle de la verte, en dessous un piquet de soldats, et, au niveau de l'arène un rang d'arcs corinthiens ; formant l'entrée des loges.

Les courses vont commencer, les chevaux s'alignent. De hauts panaches, plantés entre leurs oreilles, se balancent au vent comme des arbres ; et ils secoient, dans leurs bonds, des chars en forme de coquille, conduits par des cochers revêtus d'une sorte de cuirasse multicolore, avec des manches étroites du poignet et larges du bras, les jambes nues, toute la barbe, les cheveux rasés sur le front à la mode des Huns.

Antoine est d'abord assourdi par le clapotement des voix. Du haut en bas, il n'aperçoit que des visages fardés, des vêtements bigarrés, des plaques d'orfèvrerie ; et le sable de l'arène, tout blanc, brille comme un miroir.

L'Empereur l'entretient. Il lui confie des choses importantes, secrètes, lui avoue l'assassinat de son fils Crispus, lui demande même des conseils pour sa santé.

Cependant Antoine remarque des esclaves au fond des loges. Ce sont les pères du Concile de Nicée, en haillons, abjects. Le martyr Paphnuce brosse la crinière d'un cheval, Théophile lave les jambes d'un autre, Jean peint les sabots d'un troisième, Alexandre ramasse du crottin dans une corbeille.

Antoine passe au milieu d'eux. Ils font la haie, le prient d'intercéder, lui baissent les mains. La foule entière les hue ; et il jouit de leur dégradation, démesurément. Le voilà devenu un des grands de la Cour, confident de l'Empereur, premier ministre ! Constantin lui pose son diadème sur le front. Antoine le garde, trouvant cet honneur tout simple.

Et bientôt se découvre sous les ténèbres une salle immense, éclairée par des candélabres d'or.

Des colonnes, à demi perdues dans l'ombre tant elles sont hautes, vont s'alignant à la file en dehors des tables qui se prolongent jusqu'à l'horizon, — où apparaissent dans une vapeur lumineuse des superpositions d'escaliers, des suites d'arcades, des colosses, des tours, et par derrière une vague bordure de palais que dépassent des cèdres, faisant des masses plus noires sur l'obscurité.

Les convives, couronnés de violettes, s'appuient du coude contre des lits très-bas. Le long de ces deux rangs des amphores qu'on incline versent du vin ; — et tout au fond, seul, coiffé de la tiare et couvert d'escarboucles, mange et boit le roi Nabuchodonosor.

A sa droite et à sa gauche, deux théories de prêtres en bonnets pointus balancent des encensoirs. Par terre, sous lui, rampent les rois captifs, sans pieds ni mains, auxquels il jette des os à ronger ; plus bas se tiennent ses frères, avec un bandeau sur les yeux, — étant tous aveugles.

Une plainte continue monte du fond des ergastules. Les sons doux et lents d'un orgue hydraulique alternent avec les chœurs de voix ; et on sent qu'il y a tout autour de la salle une ville démesurée, un océan d'hommes dont les flots battent les murs.

Les esclaves courent portant des plats. Des femmes circulent offrant à boire, les corbeilles crient sous le poids des pains ; et un dromadaire, chargé d'outres percées, passe et revient, laissant couler de la verveine pour rafraîchir les dalles.

Des belluaires amènent des lions. Des danseuses, les cheveux pris dans des filets, tournent sur les mains en crachant du feu par les narines ; des bateleurs nègres jonglent, des enfants nus se lancent des pelotes de neige, qui s'écrasent en tombant contre les claires argenteries. La clameur est si formidable qu'on dirait une tempête, et un nuage flotte sur le festin, tant il y a de viandes et d'haleines. Quelquefois une flammèche des grands flambeaux, arrachée par le vent, traverse la nuit comme une étoile qui file.

Le Roi essuie avec son bras les parfums de son visage. Il mange dans les vases sacrés, puis les brise ; et il énumère intérieurement ses flottes, ses armées, ses peuples. Tout à l'heure, par caprice, il brûlera son palais avec ses convives. Il compte rebâtir la tour de Babel et détrôner Dieu.

Antoine lit, de loin, sur son front, toutes ses pensées. Elles le pénètrent, — et il devient Nabuchodonosor.

Aussitôt il est repu de débordements et d'exterminations ; et l'envie le prend de se rouler dans la bassesse. D'ailleurs, la dégradation de ce qui épouvante les hommes est un outrage fait à leur esprit, une manière encore de les stupéfier ; et comme rien n'est plus vil qu'une bête brute, Antoine se met à quatre pattes sur la table, et beugle comme un taureau.

Il sent une douleur à la main, — un caillou, par hasard, l'a blessé, — et il se retrouve devant sa cabane.

L'enceinte des roches est vide. Les étoiles rayonnent. Tout se tait.

Une fois de plus je me suis trompé ! Pourquoi ces choses ? Elles viennent des soulèvements de la chair. Ah ! misérable !

Il s'élance dans sa cabane, y prend un paquet de cordes, terminé par des ongles métalliques, se dénude jusqu'à la ceinture, et levant la tête vers le ciel :

Accepte ma pénitence, ô mon Dieu ! ne la dédaigne pas pour sa faiblesse.

Rends-la aiguë, prolongée, excessive ! Il est temps ! à l'oeuvre !

Il s'applique un cinglon vigoureux.

Aie ! non ! non ! pas de pitié !

Il recommence.

Oh ! oh ! oh ! chaque coup me déchire la peau, me tranche les membres. Cela me brûle horriblement !

Eh ! ce n'est pas terrible ! on s'y fait. Il me semble même ...

Antoine s'arrête.

Va donc, lâche ! va donc ! Bien ! bien ! sur les bras, dans le dos, sur la poitrine, contre le ventre, partout ! Sifflez, lanières, mordez-moi, arrachez-moi ! Je voudrais que les gouttes de mon sang jaillissent jusqu'aux étoiles, fissent craquer mes os, découvrir mes nerfs ! Des tenailles, des chevalets, du plomb fondu ! Les martyrs en ont subi bien d'autres ! n'est-ce pas, Ammonaria ?

L'ombre des cornes du Diable reparaît.

J'aurais pu être attaché à la colonne près de la tienne, face à face, sous tes yeux, répondant à tes cris par mes soupirs ; et nos douleurs se seraient confondues, nos âmes se seraient mêlées.

Il se flagelle avec furie.

Tiens, tiens ! pour toi ! encore !... Mais voilà qu'un chatouillement me parcourt. Quel supplice ! quels délices ! ce sont comme des baisers. Ma moelle se fond ! je meurs !

Et il voit en face de lui trois cavaliers montés sur des onagres, vêtus de robes vertes, tenant des lis à la main et se ressemblant tous de figure.

Antoine se retourne, et il voit trois autres cavaliers semblables, sur de pareils onagres, dans la même attitude.

Il recule. Alors les onagres, tous à la fois, font un pas et frottent leur museau contre lui, en essayant de mordre son vêtement. Des voix crient : « Par ici, par ici, c'est là ! » Et des étendards paraissent entre les fentes de la montagne avec des têtes de chameau en licol de soie rouge, des mulets chargés de bagages, et des femmes couvertes de voiles jaunes, montées à califourchon sur des chevaux-pies.

Les bêtes haletantes se couchent, Ses esclaves se précipitent sur les ballots, on déroule des tapis bariolés, on étale par terre des choses qui brillent.

Un éléphant blanc, caparaçonné d'un filet d'or, accourt, en secouant le bouquet de plumes d'autruche attaché à son frontal.

Sur son dos, parmi des coussins de laine bleue, jambes croisées, paupières à demi closes et se balançant la tête, il y a une femme si splendidement vêtue qu'elle envoie des rayons autour d'elle. La foule se prosterne, l'éléphant plie les genoux, et se laissant glisser le long de son épaule, descend sur les tapis et s'avance vers saint Antoine.

LA REINE DE SABA

Sa robe en brocart d'or, divisée régulièrement par des falbalas de perles, de jais et de saphirs, lui serre la taille dans un corsage étroit, rehaussé d'applications de couleur, qui représentent les douze signes du Zodiaque. Elle a des patins très-hauts, dont l'un est noir et semé d'étoiles d'argent, avec un croissant de lune, — et l'autre, qui est blanc, est couvert de gouttelettes d'or avec un soleil au milieu.

Ses larges manches, garnies d'émeraudes et de plumes d'oiseau, laissent voir à nu son petit bras rond, orné au poignet d'un bracelet d'ébène, et ses mains chargées de bagues se terminent par des ongles si pointus que le bout de ses doigts ressemble presque à des aiguilles.

Une chaîne d'or plate, lui passant sous le menton, monte le long de ses joues, s'enroule en spirale autour de sa coiffure, poudrée de poudre bleue ; puis, redescendant, lui effleure les épaules et vient s'attacher sur sa poitrine à un scorpion de diamant, qui allonge la langue entre ses seins. Deux grosses perles blondes tirent ses oreilles. Le bord de ses paupières est peint en noir. Elle a sur la pommette gauche une tache brune naturelle ; et elle respire en ouvrant la bouche, comme si son corset la gênait.

Elle secoue, tout en marchant, un parasol vert à manche d'ivoire, entouré de sonnettes vermeilles ; — et douze négrillons crépus portent la longue-queue de sa robe, dont un singe tient l'extrémité qu'il soulève de temps à autre.

Elle dit :

Ah ! bel ermite ! bel ermite ! mon coeur défaille !

A force de piétiner d'impatience il m'est venu des calus au talon, et j'ai cassé un de mes ongles ! J'envoyais des bergers qui restaient sur les montagnes la main étendue devant les yeux, et des chasseurs qui criaient ton nom dans les bois, et des espions qui parcouraient toutes les routes en disant à chaque passant : « L'avez-vous vu ? »

La nuit, je pleurais, le visage tourné vers le muraille. Mes larmes, à la longue, ont fait deux petits trous dans la mosaïque, comme des flaques d'eau de mer dans les rochers, car, je t'aime ! Oh ! oui ! beaucoup !

Elle lui prend la barbe.

Ris donc, bel ermite ! ris donc ! Je suis très-gaie, tu verras ! Je pince de la lyre, je danse comme une abeille, et je sais une foule d'histoires à raconter toutes plus divertissantes les unes que les autres.

Tu n'imagines pas la longue route que nous avons faite. Voilà les onagres des courriers verts qui sont morts de fatigue !

Les onagres sont étendus par terre, sans mouvement.

Depuis trois grandes lunes, ils ont couru d'un train égal, avec un caillou dans les dents pour couper le vent, la queue toujours droite, le jarret toujours plié, et galopant toujours. On n'en retrouvera pas de pareils ! Ils me venaient de mon grand-père maternel, l'empereur Saharil, fils d'Iakhschab, fils d'Iaarab, fils de Kastan. Ah ! s'ils vivaient encore nous les attellerions à une litière pour nous en retourner vite à la maison ! Mais ... comment ?... à quoi songes-tu ?

Elle l'examine.

Ah ! quand tu seras mon mari, je t'habillerai, je te parfumerai, je t'épilerai.

Antoine reste immobile, plus roide qu'un pieu, pâle comme un mort.

Tu as l'air triste ; est-ce de quitter ta cabane ? Moi, j'ai tout quitté pour toi, — jusqu'au roi Salomon, qui a cependant beaucoup de sagesse, vingt mille chariots de guerre, et une belle barbe ! Je t'ai apporté mes cadeaux de noces. Choisis.

Elle se promène entre les rangées d'esclaves et les marchandises.

Voici du baume de Genezareth, de l'encens du cap Gardefan, du ladanon, du cinnamome, et du silphium, bon à mettre dans les sauces. Il y a là-dedans des broderies d'Assur, des ivoires du Gange, de la pourpre d'Élisa ; et cette boîte de neige contient une outre de chalibon, vin réservé pour les rois d'Assyrie, — et qui se boit pur dans une corne de licorne. Voilà des colliers, des agrafes, des filets, des parasols, de la poudre d'or de Baasa, du cassiteros de Tartessus, du bois bleu de Pandio, des fourrures blanches d'Issedonie, des escarboucles de l'île Palaesimonde, et des cure-dents faits avec les poils du tachas, — animal perdu qui se trouve sous la terre. Ces coussins sont d'Émath, et ces franges à manteau de Palmyre. Sur ce tapis de Babylone, il y a ... mais viens donc ! Viens donc !

Elle tire saint Antoine par la manche. Il résiste. Elle continue :

Ce tissu mince, qui craque sous les doigts avec un bruit d'étincelles, est la fameuse toile jaune apportée par les marchands de la Bactriane. Il leur faut quarante-trois interprètes dans leur voyage. Je t'en ferai faire des robes, que tu mettras à la maison.

Poussez les crochets de l'étui en sycomore, et donnez-moi la cassette d'ivoire qui est au garrot de mon éléphant !

On retire d'une boîte quelque chose de rond couvert d'un voile, et l'on apporte un petit coffret chargé de ciselures.

Veux-tu le bouclier de Dgian-ben-Dgian, celui qui a bâti les Pyramides ? le voilà ! Il est composé de sept peaux de dragon mises l'une sur l'autre, jointes par des vis de diamant, et qui ont été tannées dans de la bile de parricide. Il représente, d'un côté, toutes les guerres qui ont eu lieu depuis l'invention des armes, et, de l'autre, toutes les guerres qui auront lieu jusqu'à la fin du monde. La foudre rebondit dessus, comme une balle de liège. Je vais le passer à ton bras, et tu le porteras à la chasse.

Mais si tu savais ce que j'ai dans ma petite boîte ! Retourne-la, tâche de l'ouvrir ! Personne n'y parviendrait ; embrasse-moi ; je te le dirai.

Elle prend saint Antoine par les deux joues ; il la repousse à bras tendus.

C'était une nuit que le roi Salomon perdait la tête. Enfin nous conclûmes un marché. Il se leva, et sortant à pas de loup ...

Elle fait une pirouette.

Ah ! ah ! bel ermite ! tu ne le sauras pas ! tu ne le sauras pas !

Elle secoue son parasol, dont toutes les clochettes tintent.

Et j'ai bien d'autres choses encore, va ! J'ai des trésors enfermés dans des galeries où l'on se perd comme dans un bois. J'ai des palais d'été en treillage de roseaux, et des palais d'hiver en marbre noir. Au milieu de lacs grands comme des mers, j'ai des îles rondes comme des pièces d'argent, toutes couvertes de nacre, et dont les rivages font de la musique, au battement des flots tièdes qui se roulent sur le sable. Les esclaves de mes cuisines prennent des oiseaux dans mes volières, et pêchent le poisson dans mes viviers. J'ai des graveurs continuellement assis pour creuser mon portrait sur des pierres dures, des fondeurs haletants qui coulent mes statues, des parfumeurs qui mêlent le suc des plantes à des vinaigres et battent des pâtes. J'ai des couturières qui me coupent des étoffes, des orfèvres qui me travaillent des bijoux, des coiffeuses qui sont à me chercher des coiffures, et des peintres attentifs, versant sur mes lambris des résines bouillantes, qu'ils refroidissent avec des éventails. J'ai des suivantes de quoi faire un harem, des eunuques de quoi faire une armée. J'ai des armées, j'ai des peuples ! J'ai dans mon vestibule une garde de nains portant sur le dos des trompes d'ivoire.

Antoine soupire.

J'ai des attelages de gazelles, des quadriges d'éléphants, des couples de chameaux par centaines, et des cavales à crinière si longue que leurs pieds y entrent quand elles galopent, et des troupeaux à cornes si larges que l'on abat les bois devant eux quand ils pâturent. J'ai des girafes qui se promènent dans mes jardins, et qui avancent leur tête sur le bord de mon toit, quand je prends l'air après dîner.

Assise dans une coquille, et traînée par les dauphins, je me promène dans les grottes écoutant tomber l'eau des stalactites. Je vais au pays des diamants, où les magiciens mes amis me laissent choisir les plus beaux ; puis je remonte sur la terre, et je rentre chez moi.

Elle pousse un sifflement aigu ; — et un grand oiseau, qui descend du ciel, vient s'abattre sur le sommet de sa chevelure, dont il fait tomber la poudre bleue.

Son plumage, de couleur orange, semble composé d'écaillés métalliques. Sa petite tête, garnie d'une huppe d'argent, représente un visage humain. Il a quatre ailes, des pattes de vautour, et une immense queue de paon, qu'il étale en rond derrière lui.

Il saisit dans son bec le parasol de la Reine, chancelle un peu avant de prendre son aplomb, puis hérisse toutes ses plumes, et demeure immobile.

Merci, beau Simorg-anka ! toi qui m'as appris où se cachait l'amoureux !

Merci ! merci ! messenger de mon coeur !

Il vole comme le désir. Il fait le tour du monde dans sa journée. Le soir, il revient ; il se pose au pied de ma couche ; il me raconte ce qu'il a vu, les mers qui ont passé sous lui avec les poissons et les navires, les grands déserts vides qu'il a contemplés du haut des cieux, et toutes les moissons qui se courbaient dans la campagne, et les plantes qui poussaient sur le mur des villes abandonnées.

Elle tord ses bras, langoureusement.

Oh ! si tu voulais, si tu voulais !... J'ai un pavillon sur un promontoire au milieu d'un isthme, entre deux océans. Il est lambrissé de plaques de verre, parqueté d'écailles de tortue, et s'ouvre aux quatre vents du ciel. D'en haut, je vois revenir mes flottes et les peuples qui montent la colline avec des fardeaux sur l'épaule. Nous dormirions sur des duvets plus mous que des nuées, nous boirions des boissons froides dans des écorces de fruits, et nous regarderions le soleil à travers des émeraudes ! Viens !...

Antoine se recule. Elle se rapproche ; et d'un ton irrité :

Comment ? ni riche, ni coquette, ni amoureuse ? ce n'est pas tout cela qu'il te faut, hein ? mais lascive, grasse, avec une voix rauque, la chevelure couleur de feu et des chairs rebondissantes. Préfères-tu un corps froid comme la peau des serpents, ou bien de grands yeux noirs, plus sombres que les cavernes mystiques ? regarde-les, mes yeux !

Antoine, malgré lui, les regarde.

Toutes celles que tu as rencontrées, depuis la fille des carrefours chantant sous sa lanterne jusqu'à la patricienne effeuillant des roses du haut de sa litière, toutes les formes entrevues, toutes les imaginations de ton désir, demande-les ! Je ne suis pas une femme, je suis un monde. Mes vêtements n'ont qu'à tomber, et tu découvriras sur ma personne une succession de mystères !

Antoine claque des dents.

Si tu posais ton doigt sur mon épaule, ce serait comme une traînée de feu dans tes veines. La possession de la moindre place de mon corps t'emplira d'une joie plus véhémence que la conquête d'un empire. Avance tes lèvres ! mes baisers ont le goût d'un fruit qui se fondrait dans ton cœur ! Ah ! comme tu vas te perdre sous mes cheveux, humer ma poitrine, t'ébahir de mes membres, et brûlé par mes prunelles, entre mes bras, dans un tourbillon ...

Antoine fait un signe de croix.

Tu me dédaignes ! adieu !

Elle s'éloigne en pleurant, puis se retourne :

Bien sûr ? une femme si belle !

Elle rit, et le singe qui tient le bas de sa robe, la soulève.

Tu te repentiras, bel ermite, tu gémiras ! tu t'ennuieras ! mais je m'en moque ! la ! la ! la ! oh ! oh ! oh !

Elle s'en va la figure dans les mains, en sautillant à cloche-pied.

Les esclaves défilent devant saint Antoine, les chevaux, les dromadaires, l'éléphant, les suivantes, les mulets qu'on a rechargés, les négrillons, le singe, les courriers verts, tenant à la main leur lis cassé ; — et la Reine de Saba s'éloigne, en poussant une sorte de hoquet convulsif, qui ressemble à des sanglots ou à un ricanement.

III.

Quand elle a disparu, Antoine aperçoit un enfant sur le seuil de sa cabane.

C'est quelqu'un des serviteurs de la Reine, pense-t-il.

Cet enfant est petit comme un nain, et pourtant trapu comme un Cabire, contourné, d'aspect misérable. Des cheveux blancs couvrent sa tête prodigieusement grosse ; et il grelotte sous une méchante tunique, tout en gardant à sa main un rouleau de papyrus.

La lumière de la lune, que traverse un nuage, tombe sur lui.

ANTOINE

l'observe de loin et en a peur.

Qui es tu ?

L'ENFANT répond :

Ton ancien disciple Hilarion !

ANTOINE

Tu mens ! Hilarion habite depuis longues années la Palestine.

HILARION

J'en suis revenu ! c'est bien moi !

ANTOINE

se rapproche, et il le considère.

Cependant sa figure était brillante comme l'aurore, candide, joyeuse.

Celle-là est toute sombre et vieille.

HILARION

De longs travaux m'ont fatigué !

ANTOINE

La voix aussi est différente. Elle a un timbre qui vous glace.

HILARION

C'est que je me nourris de choses amères !

ANTOINE

Et ces cheveux blancs ?

HILARION

J'ai eu tant de chagrins !

ANTOINE

à part :

Serait-ce possible ?...

HILARION

Je n'étais pas si loin que tu le supposes. L'ermite Paul t'a rendu visite cette année, pendant le mois de schebar. Il y a juste vingt jours que les Nomades t'ont apporté du pain. Tu as dit, avant-hier, à un matelot de te faire parvenir trois poinçons.

ANTOINE

Il sait tout !

HILARION

Apprends même que je ne t'ai jamais quitté. Mais tu passes de longues périodes sans m'apercevoir.

ANTOINE

Comment cela ? Il est vrai que j'ai la tête si troublée ! Cette nuit particulièrement ...

HILARION

Tous les Péchés Capitaux sont venus. Mais leurs piètres embûches se brisent contre un Saint tel que toi !

ANTOINE

Oh ! non !... non ! A chaque minute, je défaille ! Que ne suis-je un de ceux dont l'âme est toujours intrépide et l'esprit ferme, — comme le grand Athanase, par exemple.

HILARION

Il a été ordonné illégalement par sept évêques !

ANTOINE

Qu'importe ! si sa vertu ...

HILARION

Allons donc ! un homme orgueilleux, cruel, toujours dans les intrigues, et finalement exilé comme accapareur.

ANTOINE

Calomnie !

HILARION

Tu ne nieras pas qu'il ait voulu corrompre Eustates, le trésorier des largesses ?

ANTOINE

On l'affirme ; j'en conviens.

HILARION

Il a brûlé, par vengeance, la maison d'Arsène !

ANTOINE

Hélas !

HILARION

Au concile de Nicée, il a dit en parlant de Jésus : « L'homme du Seigneur. »

ANTOINE

Ah ! cela c'est un blasphème !

HILARION

Tellement borné du reste, qu'il avoue ne rien comprendre à la nature du Verbe.

ANTOINE

souriant de plaisir :

En effet, il n'a pas l'intelligence très ... élevée.

HILARION

Si l'on t'avait mis à sa place, c'eût été un grand bonheur pour tes frères comme pour toi. Cette vie à l'écart des autres est mauvaise.

ANTOINE

Au contraire ! L'homme, étant esprit, doit se retirer des choses mortelles. Toute action le dégrade. Je voudrais ne pas tenir à la terre, — même par la plante de mes pieds !

HILARION

Hypocrite qui s'enfonce dans la solitude pour se livrer mieux au débordement de ses convoitises ! Tu te privas de viandes, de vin, d'étuves, d'esclaves et d'honneurs ; mais comme tu laisses ton imagination t'offrir des banquets, des parfums, des femmes nues et des foules applaudissantes ! Ta chasteté n'est qu'une corruption plus subtile, et ce mépris du monde l'impuissance de ta haine contre lui ! C'est là ce qui rend tes pareils si lugubres, ou peut-être parce qu'ils doutent. La possession de la vérité donne la joie. Est-ce que Jésus était triste ? Il allait entouré d'amis, se reposait à l'ombre de l'olivier, entraînait chez le publicain, multipliait les coupes, pardonnant à la pécheresse, guérissant toutes les douleurs. Toi, tu n'as de pitié que pour ta misère. C'est comme un remords qui t'agite et une démence farouche, jusqu'à repousser la caresse d'un chien ou le sourire d'un enfant.

ANTOINE

éclate en sanglots.

Assez ! assez ! tu remues trop mon coeur !

HILARION

Secoue la vermine de tes haillons ! Relève-toi de ton ordure ! Ton Dieu n'est pas un Moloch qui demande de la chair en sacrifice !

ANTOINE

Cependant la souffrance est bénie. Les chérubins s'inclinent pour recevoir le sang des confesseurs.

HILARION

Admire donc les Montanistes ! ils dépassent tous les autres.

ANTOINE

Mais c'est la vérité de la doctrine qui fait le martyr !

HILARION

Comment peut-il en prouver l'excellence, puisqu'il témoigne également pour l'erreur ?

ANTOINE

Te tairas-tu, vipère !

HILARION

Cela n'est peut-être pas si difficile. Les exhortations des amis, le plaisir d'insulter le peuple, le serment qu'on a fait, un certain vertige, mille circonstances les aident.

Antoine s'éloigne d'Hilarion. Hilarion le suit.

D'ailleurs, cette manière de mourir amène de grands désordres. Denys, Cyprien et Grégoire s'y sont soustraits. Pierre d'Alexandrie l'a blâmée, et le concile d'Elvire ...

ANTOINE

se bouche les oreilles.

Je n'écoute plus !

HILARION

élevant la voix :

Voilà que tu retombes dans ton péché d'habitude, la paresse. L'ignorance est l'écume de l'orgueil. On dit : « Ma conviction est faite, pourquoi discuter ? » et on méprise les docteurs, les philosophes, la tradition, et jusqu'au texte de la Loi qu'on ignore. Crois-tu tenir la sagesse dans ta main ?

ANTOINE

Je l'entends toujours ! Ses paroles bruyantes emplissent ma tête.

HILARION

Les efforts pour comprendre Dieu sont supérieurs à tes mortifications pour le fléchir. Nous n'avons de mérite que par notre soif du Vrai. La Religion seule n'explique pas tout ; et la solution des problèmes que tu méconnaissais peut la rendre plus inattaquable et plus haute. Donc il faut, pour son salut, communiquer avec ses frères, — ou bien l'Église, l'assemblée des fidèles, ne serait qu'un mot, — et écouter toutes les raisons, ne dédaigner rien, ni personne. Le sorcier Balaam, le poète Eschyle et la sibylle de Cumès avaient annoncé le Sauveur. Denys l'Alexandrin reçut du Ciel l'ordre de lire tous les livres. Saint Clément nous ordonne la culture des lettres grecques. Hermas a été converti par l'illusion d'une femme qu'il avait aimée.

ANTOINE

Quel air d'autorité ! Il me semble que tu grandis ...

En effet, la taille d'Hilarion s'est progressivement élevée ; et Antoine, pour ne plus le voir, ferme les yeux.

HILARION

Rassure-toi, bon ermite !

Asseyons-nous là, sur cette grosse pierre, — comme autrefois, quand à la première lueur du jour je te saluais, en t'appelant « claire étoile du matin » ; et tu commençais tout de suite mes instructions. Elles ne sont pas finies. La lune nous éclaire suffisamment. Je t'écoute.

Il a tiré un calame de sa ceinture ; et, par terre, jambes croisées, avec son rouleau de papyrus à la main, il lève la tête vers saint Antoine, qui, assis près de lui, reste le front penché.

Après un moment de silence, Hilarion reprend :

La parole de Dieu, n'est-ce pas, nous est confirmée par les miracles ? Cependant les sorciers de Pharaon en faisaient ; d'autres imposteurs peuvent en faire ; on s'y trompe. Qu'est-ce donc qu'un miracle ? Un événement qui nous semble en dehors de la nature. Mais connaissons-nous toute sa puissance ? et de ce qu'une chose ordinairement ne nous étonne pas, s'ensuit-il que nous la comprenions ?

ANTOINE

Peu importe ! il faut croire l'Écriture !

HILARION

Saint Paul, Origène et bien d'autres ne l'entendaient pas littéralement ; mais si on l'explique par des allégories, elle devient le partage d'un petit nombre et l'évidence de la vérité disparaît. Que faire ?

ANTOINE

S'en remettre à l'Église !

HILARION

Donc l'Écriture est inutile ?

ANTOINE

Non pas ! quoique l'Ancien Testament, je l'avoue, ait ... des obscurités

... Mais le Nouveau resplendit d'une lumière pure.

HILARION

Cependant l'ange annonciateur, dans Matthieu, apparaît à Joseph, tandis que dans Luc, c'est à Marie. L'onction de Jésus par une femme se passe, d'après le premier Évangile, au commencement de sa vie publique, et, selon les trois autres, peu de jours avant sa mort. Le breuvage qu'on lui offre sur la croix, c'est, dans Matthieu, du vinaigre avec du fiel, dans Marc du vin et de la myrrhe. Suivant Luc et Matthieu, les apôtres ne doivent prendre ni argent ni sac, pas même de sandales et de bâton, dans Marc, au contraire, Jésus leur défend de rien emporter si ce n'est des sandales et un bâton. Je m'y perds !...

ANTOINE

avec ébahissement :

En effet ... en effet ...

HILARION

Au contact de l'hémorroïdesse, Jésus se retourna en disant : « Qui m'a touché ? » Il ne savait donc pas qui le touchait ? Cela contredit l'omniscience de Jésus. Si le tombeau était surveillé par des gardes, les femmes n'avaient pas à s'inquiéter d'un aide pour soulever la pierre de ce tombeau. Donc, il n'y avait pas de gardes, ou bien les saintes femmes n'étaient pas là. A Emmaüs, il mange avec ses disciples et leur fait tâter ses plaies. C'est un corps humain, un objet matériel, pondérable, et cependant qui traverse les murailles. Est-ce possible ?

ANTOINE

Il faudrait beaucoup de temps pour te répondre !

HILARION

Pourquoi reçut-il le Saint-Esprit, bien qu'étant le Fils ? Qu'avait-il besoin du baptême s'il était le Verbe ? Comment le Diable pouvait-il le tenter, lui, Dieu ?

Est-ce que ces pensées-là ne te sont jamais venues ?

ANTOINE

Oui !... souvent ! Engourdis ou furieuses, elles demeurent dans ma conscience. Je les écrase, elles renaissent, m'étouffent ; et je crois parfois que je suis maudit.

HILARION

Alors, tu n'as que faire de servir Dieu ?

ANTOINE

J'ai toujours besoin de l'adorer !

Après un long silence :

HILARION

reprend :

Mais en dehors du dogme, toute liberté de recherches nous est permise. Désires-tu connaître la hiérarchie des Anges, la vertu des Nombres, la raison des germes et des métamorphoses ?

ANTOINE

Oui ! oui ! ma pensée se débat pour sortir de sa prison. Il me semble qu'en ramassant mes forces j'y parviendrai. Quelquefois même, pendant la durée d'un éclair, je me trouve comme suspendu ; puis je retombe !

HILARION

Le secret que tu voudrais tenir est gardé par des sages. Ils vivent dans un pays lointain, assis sous des arbres gigantesques, vêtus de blanc et calmes comme des Dieux. Un air chaud les nourrit. Des léopards tout à l'entour marchent sur des gazons. Le murmure des sources avec le hennissement des licornes se mêlent à leurs voix. Tu les écouteras ; et la face de l'Inconnu se dévoilera !

ANTOINE

soupirant :

La route est longue, et je suis vieux !

HILARION

Oh ! oh ! les hommes savants ne sont pas rares ! Il y en a même tout près de toi ; ici ! — Entrons !

IV

Et Antoine voit devant lui une basilique immense.

La lumière se projette du fond, merveilleuse comme serait un soleil multicolore. Elle éclaire les têtes innombrables de la foule qui emplit la nef et reflue entre les colonnes, vers les bas côtés, — où l'on distingue dans des compartiments de bois, des autels, des lits, des chaînettes de petites pierres bleues, et des constellations peintes sur les murs.

Au milieu de la foule, des groupes, çà et là, stationnent. Des hommes, debout sur des escabeaux, harangent le doigt levé ; d'autres prient les bras en croix, sont couchés par terre, chantent des hymnes, ou boivent du vin ; autour d'une table, des fidèles font les agapes ; des martyrs démaillotent leurs membres pour montrer leurs blessures ; des vieillards, appuyés sur des bâtons, racontant leurs voyages.

Il y en a du pays des Germains, de la Thrace et des Gaules, de la Scythie et des Indes, — avec de la neige sur la barbe, des plumes dans la chevelure, des épines aux franges de leur vêtement, les sandales noires de poussière, la peau brûlée par le soleil. Tous les costumes se confondent, les manteaux de pourpre et les robes de lin, des dalmatiques brodées, des sayons de poil, des bonnets de matelots, des mitres d'évêques. Leurs yeux fulgurent extraordinairement. Ils ont l'air de bourreaux ou l'air d'eunuques.

Hilarion s'avance au milieu d'eux. Tous le saluent. Antoine, en se serrant contre son épaule, les observe. Il remarque beaucoup de femmes. Plusieurs sont habillées en hommes, avec les cheveux ras ; il en a peur.

HILARION

Ce sont des chrétiennes qui ont converti leurs maris. D'ailleurs les femmes sont toujours pour Jésus, même les idolâtres, témoin Procula l'épouse de Pilate et Poppée la concubine de Néron. Ne tremble plus ! avance !

Et il en arrive d'autres, continuellement.

Ils se multiplient, se dédoublent, légers comme des ombres, tout en faisant une grande clameur où se mêlent des hurlements de rage, des cris d'amour, des cantiques et des objurgations.

ANTOINE

à voix basse :

Que veulent-ils ?

HILARION

Le Seigneur a dit « j'aurais encore à vous parler de bien des choses. »

Ils possèdent ces choses.

Et il le pousse vers un trône d'or à cinq marches où, entouré de quatre-vingt-quinze disciples, tous frottés d'huile, maigres et très-pâles, siège le prophète Manès, — beau comme un archange, immobile comme une statue, portant une robe indienne, des escarboucles dans ses cheveux nattés, à sa main gauche un livre d'images peintes, et sous sa droite un globe. Les images représentent les créatures qui sommeillaient dans le chaos. Antoine se penche pour les voir. Puis, fait tourner son globe ; et réglant ses paroles sur une lyre d'où s'échappent des sons cristallins :

MANÈS

La terre céleste est à l'extrémité supérieure, la terre mortelle à l'extrémité inférieure. Elle est soutenue par deux anges, le Splenditenens et l'Omophore à six visages.

Au sommet du ciel le plus haut se tient la Divinité impassible ; en dessous, face à face, sont le Fils de Dieu et le Prince des ténèbres.

Les ténèbres s'étant avancées jusqu'à son royaume, Dieu tira de son essence une vertu qui produisit le premier homme ; et il l'entourna des cinq éléments. Mais les démons des ténèbres lui en dérobèrent une partie, et cette partie est l'âme.

Il n'y a qu'une seule âme — universellement épandue, comme l'eau d'un fleuve divisé en plusieurs bras. C'est elle qui soupire dans le vent, grince dans le marbre qu'on scie, hurle par la voix de la mer ; et elle pleure des larmes de lait quand on arrache les feuilles du figuier.

Les âmes sorties de ce monde émigrent vers les astres, qui sont des êtres animés.

ANTOINE

se met à rire.

Ah ! ah ! quelle absurde imagination !

UN HOMME

sans barbe, et d'apparence austère :

En quoi ?

Antoine va répondre. Mais Hilarion lui dit tout bas que cet homme est l'immense Origène ; et

MANÈS

reprend :

D'abord elles s'arrêtent dans la lune, où elles se purifient. Ensuite elles montent dans le soleil.

ANTOINE

lentement :

Je ne connais rien ... qui nous empêche ... de le croire.

MANÈS

Le but de toute créature est la délivrance du rayon céleste enfermé dans la matière. Il s'en échappe plus facilement par les parfums, les épices, l'arôme du vin cuit, les choses légères qui ressemblent à des pensées. Mais les actes de la vie l'y retiennent. Le meurtrier renaîtra dans le corps d'un celèphe, celui qui tue un animal deviendra cet animal ; si tu plantes une vigne, tu seras lié dans ses rameaux. La nourriture en absorbe. Donc, privez-vous ! jeûnez !

HILARION

Ils sont tempérants, comme tu vois !

MANÈS

Il y en a beaucoup dans les viandes, moins dans les herbes. D'ailleurs les Purs, grâce à leurs mérites, dépouillent les végétaux de cette partie lumineuse et elle remonte à son foyer. Les animaux, par la génération, l'emprisonnent dans la chair. Donc, fuyez les femmes !

HILARION

Admire leur continence !

MANÈS

Ou plutôt, faites si bien qu'elles ne soient pas fécondes. — Mieux vaut pour l'âme tomber sur la terre que de languir dans des entraves charnelles !

ANTOINE

Ah ! l'abomination !

HILARION

Qu'importe la hiérarchie des turpitudes ? l'Église a bien fait du mariage un sacrement !

SATURNIN

en costume de Syrie :

Il propage un ordre de choses funestes ! Le Père, pour punir les anges révoltés, leur ordonna de créer le monde. Le Christ est venu, afin que le Dieu des Juifs qui était un de ces anges ...

ANTOINE

Un ange ? lui ! le Créateur !

CERDON

N'a-t-il pas voulu tuer Moïse, tromper ses prophètes, séduit les peuples, répandu le mensonge et l'idolâtrie ?

MARCION

Certainement, le Créateur n'est pas le vrai Dieu !

SAINT CLÉMENT D'ALEXANDRIE

La matière est éternelle !

BARDESANES en mage de Babylone :

Elle a été formée par les Sept Esprits planétaires.

LES HERNIENS

Les anges ont fait les âmes !

LES PRISCILLIANIENS

C'est le Diable qui a fait le monde !

ANTOINE

se rejette en arrière :

Horreur !

HILARION

le soutenant :

Tu te désespères trop vite ! tu comprends mal leur doctrine ! En voici un qui a reçu la sienne de Théodas, l'ami de saint Paul. Écoute-le !

Et, sur un signe d'Hilarion,

VALENTIN

en tunique de toile d'argent, la voix sifflante et le crâne pointu :

Le monde est l'oeuvre d'un Dieu en délire.

ANTOINE

baisse la tête.

L'oeuvre d'un Dieu en délire !...

Après un long silence :

Comment cela ?

VALENTIN

Le plus parfait des êtres, des Éons, l'Abîme, reposait au sein de la Profondeur avec la Pensée. De leur union sortit l'Intelligence, qui eut pour compagne la Vérité.

L'Intelligence et la Vérité engendrèrent le Verbe et la Vie, qui à leur tour, engendrèrent l'Homme ; et l'Église ; — et cela fait huit Éons !

Il compte sur ses doigts.

Le Verbe et la Vérité produisirent dix autres Éons, c'est-à-dire cinq couples. L'Homme et l'Église en avaient produit douze autres, parmi lesquels le Paraclet et la Foi, l'Espérance et la Charité, le Parfait et la Sagesse, Sophia.

L'ensemble de ces trente Éons constitue le Plérôme, ou Universalité de Dieu. Ainsi, comme les échos d'une voix qui s'éloigne, comme les effluves d'un parfum qui s'évapore, comme les feux du soleil qui se couche, les Puissances émanées du Principe vont toujours s'affaiblissant.

Mais Sophia, désireuse de connaître le Père, s'élança hors du Plérôme ; — et le Verbe fit alors un autre couple, le Christ et le Saint-Esprit, qui avait relié entre eux tous les Éons ; et tous ensemble ils formèrent Jésus, la fleur du Plérôme.

Cependant, l'effort de Sophia pour s'enfuir avait laissé dans le vide une image d'elle, une substance mauvaise, Acharamoth. Le Sauveur en eut pitié, la délivra des passions ; — et du sourire d'Acharamoth délivrée la lumière naquit ; ses larmes firent les eaux, sa tristesse engendra la matière noire.

D'Acharamoth sortit le Démon, fabricant des mondes, des cieus et du Diable. Il habite bien plus bas que le Plérôme, sans même l'apercevoir, tellement qu'il se croit le vrai Dieu, et répète par la bouche de ses prophètes : « Il n'y a d'autre Dieu que moi ! » Puis il fit l'homme, et lui jeta dans l'âme la semence immatérielle, qui était l'Église, reflet de l'autre Église placée dans le Plérôme.

Acharamoth, un jour, parvenant à la région la plus haute, se joindra au Sauveur ; le feu caché dans le monde anéantira toute matière, se dévorera lui-même, et les hommes, devenus de purs esprits, épouseront des anges !

ORIGÈNE

Alors le Démon sera vaincu, et le règne de Dieu commencera !

Antoine retient un cri ; et aussitôt,

BASILIDE

le prenant par le coude :

L'Être suprême avec les émanations infinies s'appelle Abraxas, et le Sauveur avec toutes ses vertus Kaulakau, autrement ligne-sur-ligne, rectitude-sur-rectitude.

On obtient la force de Kaulakau par le secours de certains mots, inscrits sur cette calcédoine pour faciliter la mémoire.

Et il montre à son cou une petite pierre où sont gravées des lignes bizarres.

Alors tu seras transporté dans l'Invisible ; et supérieur à la loi, tu mépriseras tout, même la vertu !

Nous autres, les Purs, nous devons fuir la douleur, d'après l'exemple de Kaulakau.

ANTOINE

Comment ! et la croix ?

LES ELKHESAÏTES

en robe d'hyacinthe, lui répondent :

La tristesse, la bassesse, la condamnation et l'oppression de mes pères sont effacées, grâce à la mission qui est venue !

On peut renier le Christ inférieur, l'homme-Jésus ; mais il faut adorer l'autre Christ, éclos dans sa personne sous l'aile de la Colombe.

Honorez le mariage ! Le Saint-Esprit est féminin !

Hilarion a disparu ; et Antoine poussé par la foule arrive devant

LES CARPOCRATIENS

étendus avec des femmes sur des coussins d'écarlate :

Avant de rentrer dans l'Unique, tu passeras par une série de conditions et d'actions. Pour t'affranchir des ténèbres, accomplis, dès maintenant, leurs oeuvres ! L'époux va dire à l'épouse : « Fais la charité à ton frère », et elle te baisera.

LES NICOLAÏTES

assemblés autour d'un mets qui fume :

C'est de la viande offerte aux idoles ; prends-en ! L'apostasie est permise quand le coeur est pur. Gorge ta chair de ce qu'elle demande. Tâche de l'exterminer à force de débauches ! Prounikos, la mère du Ciel, s'est vautrée dans les ignominies.

LES MARCOSIENS

avec des anneaux d'or, et ruisselants de baume :

Entre chez nous pour t'unir à l'Esprit ! Entre chez nous pour boire l'immortalité !

Et l'un d'eux lui montre, derrière une tapisserie, le corps d'un homme terminé par une tête d'âne. Cela représente Sabaoth, père du Diable. En marque de haine, il crache dessus.

Un autre découvre un lit très-bas, jonché de fleurs, en disant que Les noces spirituelles vont s'accomplir.

Un troisième tient une coupe de verre, fait une invocation ; du sang y paraît :

Ah ! le voilà ! le voilà ! le sang du Christ !

Antoine s'écarte. Mais il est éclaboussé par l'eau qui saute d'une cuve.

LES HELVIDIENS

s'y jettent la tête en bas, en marmottant :

L'homme régénéré par le baptême est impeccable !

Puis il passe près d'un grand feu, où se chauffent les Adamites, complètement nus pour imiter la pureté du paradis ; et il se heurte aux

MESSALIENS

vautrés sur les dalles, à moitié endormis, stupides :

Oh ! écrase-nous si tu veux, nous ne bougerons pas ! Le travail est un péché, toute occupation mauvaise !

Derrière ceux-là, les abjects

PATERNIENS

hommes, femmes et enfants, pêle-mêle sur un tas d'ordures, relèvent leurs faces hideuses barbouillées de vin :

Les parties inférieures du corps faites par le Diable lui appartiennent.

Buvons, mangeons, forniquons !

AETIUS

Les crimes sont des besoins au-dessous du regard de Dieu !

Mais tout à coup

UN HOMME

vêtu d'un manteau carthaginois, bondit au milieu d'eux, avec un paquet de lanières à la main ; et frappant au hasard de droite et de gauche, violemment :

Ah ! imposteurs, brigands, simoniaques, hérétiques et démons ! la vermine des écoles, la lie de l'enfer ! Celui-là, Marcion, c'est un matelot de Sinope excommunié pour inceste ; on a banni Carpocras comme magicien ; Aetius a volé sa concubine, Nicolas prostitué sa femme ; et Manès, qui se fait appeler le Bouddha et qui se nomme Cubricus, fut écorché vif avec une pointe de roseau, si bien que sa peau tannée se balance aux portes de Clésiphon !

ANTOINE

a reconnu Tertullien, et s'élance pour le rejoindre :

Maître ! à moi ! à moi !

TERTULLIEN

continuant :

Brisez les images ! voilez les vierges ! Priez, jeûnez, pleurez, mortifiez-vous ! Pas de philosophie ! pas de livres ! après Jésus, la science est inutile !

Tous ont fui ; et Antoine voit, à la place de Tertullien, une femme assise sur un banc de pierre.

Elle sanglote, la tête appuyée contre une colonne, les cheveux pendants, le corps affaissé dans une longue simarre brune.

Puis, ils se trouvent l'un près de l'autre, loin de la foule ; — et un silence, un apaisement extraordinaire s'est fait, comme dans les bois, quand le vent s'arrête et que les feuilles tout à coup ne remuent plus.

Cette femme est très-belle, flétrie pourtant et d'une pâleur de sépulcre. Ils se regardent ; et leurs yeux s'envoient comme un flot de pensées, mille choses anciennes, confuses et profondes. Enfin,

PRISCILLA

se met à dire :

J'étais dans la dernière chambre des bains, et je m'endormais au bourdonnement des rues.

Tout à coup j'entendis des clameurs. On criait : « C'est un magicien ! c'est le Diable ! » Et la foule s'arrêta devant notre maison, en face du temple d'Esculape. Je me haussai avec les poignets jusqu'à la hauteur du soupirail.

Sur le péristyle du temple, il y avait un homme qui portait un carcan de fer à son cou. Il prenait des charbons dans un réchaud, et il s'en faisait sur la poitrine de larges traînées, en appelant « Jésus, Jésus ! »

Le peuple disait : « Cela n'est pas permis ! lapidons-le ! » Lui, il continuait. C'étaient des choses inouïes, transportantes. Des fleurs larges comme le soleil tournaient devant mes yeux, et j'entendais dans les espaces une harpe d'or vibrer. Le jour tomba. Mes bras lâchèrent les barreaux, mon corps défailloit, et quand il m'eut emmenée à sa maison ...

ANTOINE

De qui donc parles-tu ?

PRISCILLA

Mais, de Montanus !

ANTOINE

Il est mort, Montanus.

PRISCILLA

Ce n'est pas vrai !

UNE VOIX

Non, Montanus n'est pas mort !

Antoine se retourne ; et près de lui, de l'autre côté, sur le banc, une seconde femme est assise, — blonde celle-là, et encore plus pâle, avec des bouffissures sous les paupières comme si elle avait longtemps pleuré. Sans qu'il l'interroge, elle dit :

MAXIMILLA

Nous revenions de Tarse par les montagnes, lorsqu'à un détour du chemin, nous vîmes un homme sous un figuier.

Il cria de loin : « Arrêtez-vous ! » et il se précipita en nous injuriant. Les esclaves accoururent. Il éclata de rire. Les chevaux se cabrèrent. Les molosses hurlaient tous.

Il était debout. La sueur coulait sur son visage. Le vent faisait claquer son manteau.

En nous appelant par nos noms, il nous reprochait la vanité de nos oeuvres, l'infamie de nos corps ; — et il levait le poing du côté des dromadaires, à cause des clochettes d'argent qu'ils portent sous la mâchoire.

Sa fureur me versait l'épouvante dans les entrailles ; c'était pourtant comme une volupté qui me berçait, m'enivrait.

D'abord, les esclaves s'approchèrent. « Maître, dirent-ils, nos bêtes sont fatiguées » ; puis ce furent les femmes : « Nous avons peur », et les esclaves s'en allèrent. Puis, les enfants se mirent à pleurer : « Nous avons faim ! » Et comme on n'avait pas répondu aux femmes, elles disparurent.

Lui, il parlait. Je sentis quelqu'un près de moi. C'était l'époux ; j'écoutais l'autre. Il se traîna parmi les pierres en s'écriant « Tu m'abandonnes ? » et je répondis : « Oui ! va-t'en ! » — afin d'accompagner Montanus.

ANTOINE

Un eunuque !

PRISCILLA

Ah ! cela t'étonne, cœur grossier ! Cependant Madeleine, Jeanne, Marthe et Suzanne n'entraient pas dans la couche du Sauveur. Les âmes, mieux que les corps, peuvent s'étreindre avec délire. Pour conserver impunément Eustolie, Léonce l'évêque se mutila, — aimant mieux son amour que sa virilité. Et puis, ce n'est pas ma faute ; un esprit m'y contraint ; Sotas n'a pu me guérir. Il est cruel, pourtant ! Qu'importe ! Je suis la dernière des prophétesses ; et après moi, la fin du monde viendra.

MAXIMILLA

Il m'a comblé de ses dons. Aucune d'ailleurs ne l'aime autant, — et n'en est plus aimée !

PRISCILLA

Tu mens ! c'est moi !

MAXIMILLA

Non, c'est moi !

Elles se battent.

Entre leurs épaules paraît la tête d'un nègre.

MONTANUS

couvert d'un manteau noir, fermé par deux os de mort :

Apaisez-vous, mes colombes ! Incapables du bonheur terrestre, nous sommes par cette union dans la plénitude spirituelle. Après l'âge du Père, l'âge du Fils ; et j'inaugure le troisième, celui du Paraclet. Sa lumière m'est venue durant les quarante nuits que la Jérusalem céleste a brillé dans le firmament, au-dessus de ma maison, à Pepuza.

Ah ! comme vous criez d'angoisse quand les lanières vous flagellent ! comme vos membres endoloris se présentent à mes ardeurs ! comme vous languissez sur ma poitrine, d'un irréalisable amour ! Il est si fort qu'il vous a découvert des mondes, et vous pouvez maintenant apercevoir les âmes avec vos yeux.

Antoine fait un geste d'étonnement.

TERTULLIEN

revenu près de Montanus :

Sans doute, puisque l'âme a un corps, — ce qui n'a point de corps n'existant pas.

MONTANUS

Pour la rendre plus subtile, j'ai institué des mortifications nombreuses, trois carêmes par an, et pour chaque nuit des prières où l'on ferme la bouche, — de peur que l'haleine en s'échappant ne ternisse la pensée. Il faut s'abstenir des secondes nocces, ou plutôt de tout mariage ! Les anges ont péché avec les femmes.

LES ARCONTIQUES

en cilices de crins :

Le Sauveur a dit : « Je suis venu pour détruire l'oeuvre de la Femme. »

LES TATIANIENS

en cilices de joncs :

L'arbre du mal c'est elle ! Les habits de peau sont notre corps.

Et, avançant toujours du même côté, Antoine rencontre

LES VALÉSIENS

étendus par terre, avec des plaques rouges au bas du ventre, sous leur tunique.

Ils lui présentent un couteau :

Fais comme Origène et comme nous ! Est-ce la douleur que tu crains, lâche ? Est-ce l'amour de ta chair qui te retient, hypocrite ?

Et pendant qu'il est à les regarder se débattre, étendus sur le dos dans les mares de leur sang,

LES CAÏNITES

les cheveux, noués par une vipère, passent près de lui, en vociférant à son oreille :

Gloire à Caïn ! gloire à Sodome ! gloire à Judas !

Caïn fit la race des forts. Sodome épouvanta la terre avec son châtiment ; et c'est par Judas que Dieu sauva le monde ! — Oui, Judas ! sans lui pas de mort et pas de rédemption !

Ils disparaissent sous la horde des

CIRCONCELLIONS

vêtus de peaux de loup, couronnés d'épines, et portant des masques de fer :

Écrasez le fruit ! troublez la source ! noyez l'enfant ! Pillez le riche qui se trouve heureux, qui mange beaucoup ! Battez le pauvre qui envie la housse de l'âne, le repas du chien, le nid de l'oiseau, et qui se désole parce que les autres ne sont pas des misérables comme lui.

Nous, les Saints, pour hâter la fin du monde, nous empoisonnons, brûlons, massacrons !

Le salut n'est que dans le martyre. Nous nous donnons le martyre. Nous enlevons avec des tenailles la peau de nos têtes, nous étalons nos membres sous les charrues, nous nous jetons dans la gueule des fours !

Honni le baptême ! honnie l'eucharistie ! honni le mariage ! damnation universelle !

Alors, dans toute la basilique, c'est un redoublement de fureurs.

Les Audiens tirent des flèches contre le Diable ; les Collyridiens lancent au plafond des voiles bleus ; les Ascites se prosternent devant une outre ; les Marcionites baptisent un mort avec de l'huile. Auprès d'Appelles, une femme, pour expliquer mieux son idée, fait voir un pain rond dans une bouteille ; une autre, au milieu des Sampséens, distribue, comme une hostie, la poussière de ses sandales. Sur le lit des Marcosiens jonché de roses, deux amants s'embrassent. Les Circoncellions s'entr'égorgent, les Valésiens râlent, Bardesane chante, Carpocras danse, Maximilla et Priscilla poussent des gémissements sonores ; — et la fausse prophétesse de Cappadoce, toute nue, accoudée sur un lion et secouant trois flambeaux, hurle l'Invocation-Terrible.

Les colonnes se balancent comme des troncs d'arbres, les amulettes aux cous des Hérésiarques entre-croisent des lignes de feux, les constellations dans les chapelles s'agitent, et les murs reculent sous le va-et-vient de la foule, dont chaque tête est un flot qui saute et rugit.

Cependant, — du fond même de la clameur, une chanson s'élève avec des éclats de rire, où le nom de Jésus revient.

Ce sont des gens de la plèbe, tous frappant dans leurs mains pour marquer la cadence. Au milieu d'eux est en costume de diacre.

ARIUS

Les fous qui déclament contre moi prétendent expliquer l'absurde ; et pour les perdre tout à fait, j'ai composé des petits poèmes tellement drôles, qu'on les sait par coeur dans les moulins, les tavernes et les ports.

Mille fois non ! le Fils n'est pas coéternel au Père, ni de même substance ! Autrement il n'aurait pas dit : « Père, éloigne de moi ce calice ! — Pourquoi m'appellez-vous bon ? Dieu seul est bon ! — Je vais à mon Dieu, à votre Dieu ! » et d'autres paroles attestant sa qualité de créature. Elle nous est démontrée, de plus, par tous ses noms : agneau, pasteur, fontaine, sagesse, fils de l'homme, prophète, bonne voie, pierre angulaire !

SABELLIUS

Moi, je soutiens que tous deux sont identiques.

ARIUS

Le concile d'Antioche a décidé le contraire.

ANTOINE

Qu'est-ce donc que le Verbe ?... Qu'était Jésus ?

LES VALENTINIENS

C'était l'époux d'Acharamoth repentie !

LES SETHIANIENS

C'était Sem, fils de Noé !

LES THÉODOTIENS

C'était Melchisédech !

LES MÉRINTHIENS

Ce n'était rien qu'un homme !

LES APOLLINARISTES

Il en a pris l'apparence ! il a simulé la Passion.

MARCEL D'ANCYRE

C'est un développement du Père !

LE PAPE CALIXTE

Père et Fils sont les deux modes d'un seul Dieu !

MÉTHODIUS

Il fut d'abord dans Adam, puis dans l'homme !

CÉRINTHE

Et il ressuscitera !

VALENTIN

Impossible, — son corps étant céleste !

PAUL DE SAMOSATE

Il n'est Dieu que depuis son baptême !

HERMOGÈNE

Il habite le soleil !

Et tous les hérésiarques font un cercle autour d'Antoine, qui pleure, la tête dans ses mains.

UN JUIF

à barbe rouge, et la peau maculée de lèpre, s'avance tout près de lui ; — et ricanant horriblement :

Son âme était l'âme d'Esäü ! Il souffrait de la maladie bellérophontienne ; et sa mère, la parfumeuse, s'est livrée à Pantherus, un soldat romain, sur des gerbes de maïs, un soir de moisson.

ANTOINE

vivement, relève sa tête, les regarde sans parler ; puis marchant droit sur eux :

Docteurs, magiciens, évêques et diacres, hommes, arrière ! arrière ! Vous êtes tous des mensonges !

LES HÉRÉSIARQUES

Nous avons des martyrs plus martyrs que les tiens, des prières plus difficiles, des élans d'amour supérieurs, des extases aussi longues.

ANTOINE

Mais pas de révélation ! pas de preuves !

Alors tous brandissent dans l'air des rouleaux de papyrus, des tablettes de bois, des morceaux de cuir, des bandes d'étoffes ; — et se poussant les uns les autres :

LES CÉRINTHIENS

Voilà l'Évangile des Hébreux !

LES MARCIONITES

L'Évangile du Seigneur !

LES MARCOSIENS

L'Évangile d'Ève !

LES ENCRATITES

L'Évangile de Thomas !

LES CAÏNITES

L'Évangile de Judas !

BASILIDE

Le traité de l'âme advenue !

MANÈS

La prophétie de Barcouf !

Antoine se débat, leur échappe ; — et il aperçoit dans un coin, plein d'ombre,

LES VIEUX ÉBIONITES

desséchés comme des momies, le regard éteint, les sourcils blancs.

Ils disent, d'une voix chevrotante :

Nous l'avons connu, nous autres, nous l'avons connu le fils du charpentier ! Nous étions de son âge, nous habitions dans sa rue. Il s'amusait avec de la boue à modeler des petits oiseaux, sans avoir peur du coupant des tailleurs, aidait son père dans son travail, ou assemblait pour sa mère des pelotons de laine teinte. Puis, il fit un voyage en Égypte, d'où il rapporta de grands secrets. Nous étions à Jéricho, quand il vint trouver le mangeur de sauterelles. Ils causèrent à voix basse, sans que personne pût les entendre. Mais c'est à partir de ce moment qu'il fit du bruit en Galilée et qu'on a débité sur son compte beaucoup de fables.

Ils répètent, en tremblotant :

Nous l'avons connu, nous autres ! nous l'avons connu !

ANTOINE

Ah ! encore, parlez ! parlez ! Comment était son visage ?

TERTULLIEN

D'un aspect farouche et repoussant ; — car il s'était chargé de tous les crimes, toutes les douleurs, et toutes les difformités du monde.

ANTOINE

Oh ! non ! non ! Je me figure, au contraire, que toute sa personne avait une beauté plus qu'humaine.

EUSÈBE DE CÉSARÉE

Il y a bien à Paneades, contre une vieille masure, dans un fouillis d'herbes, une statue de pierre, élevée, à ce qu'on prétend, par l'hémorroïdesse. Mais le temps lui a rongé la face, et les pluies ont gâté l'inscription.

Une femme sort du groupe des Carpocratiens.

MARCELLINA

Autrefois, j'étais diaconesse à Rome dans une petite église, où je faisais voir aux fidèles les images en argent de saint Paul, d'Homère, de Pythagore et de Jésus-Christ.

Je n'ai gardé que la sienne.

Elle entr'ouvre son manteau.

La veux-tu ?

UNE VOIX

Il reparait, lui-même, quand nous l'appelons ! c'est l'heure ! Viens !

Et Antoine sent tomber sur son bras une main brutale, qui l'entraîne.

Il monte un escalier complètement obscur ; — et après bien des marches, il arrive devant une porte.

Alors, celui qui le mène (est-ce Hilarion ? il n'en sait rien) dit à l'oreille d'un autre : « Le Seigneur va venir », — et ils sont introduits dans une chambre, basse de plafond, sans meubles.

Ce qui le frappe d'abord, c'est en face de lui une longue chrysalide couleur de sang, avec une tête d'homme d'où s'échappent des rayons, et le mot Knouphis, écrit en grec tout autour. Elle domine un fût de colonne, posé au milieu d'un piédestal. Sur les autres parois de la chambre, des médaillons en fer poli représentent des têtes d'animaux, celle d'un boeuf, d'un lion, d'un aigle, d'un chien, et la tête d'âne — encore !

Les lampes d'argile, suspendues au bas de ces images, font une lumière vacillante. Antoine, par un trou de la muraille, aperçoit la lune qui brille au loin sur les flots, et même il distingue leur petit clapotement régulier, avec le bruit sourd d'une carène de navire tapant contre les pierres d'un môle.

Des hommes accroupis, la figure sous leurs manteaux, lancent, par intervalles, comme un aboiement étouffé. Des femmes sommeillent, le front sur leurs deux bras que soutiennent leurs genoux, tellement perdues dans leurs voiles qu'on dirait des tas de hardes le long du mur. Auprès d'elles, des enfants demi-nus, tout dévorés de vermine, regardent d'un air idiot les lampes brûler ; — et on ne fait rien ; on attend quelque chose.

Ils parlent à voix basse de leurs familles, ou se communiquent des remèdes pour leurs maladies. Plusieurs vont s'embarquer au point du jour, la persécution devenant trop forte. Les païens pourtant ne sont pas difficiles à tromper. « Ils croient, les sots, que nous adorons Knouphis ! »

Mais un des frères, inspiré tout à coup, se pose devant la colonne, où l'on a mis un pain qui surmonte une corbeille, pleine de fenouil et d'aristoloches.

Les autres ont pris leurs places, formant debout trois lignes parallèles.

L'INSPIRÉ

déroulé une pancarte couverte de cylindres entremêlés, puis commence :

Sur les ténèbres, le rayon du Verbe descendit et un cri violent s'échappa, qui semblait la voix de la lumière.

TOUS

répondent, en balançant leurs corps :

Kyrie eleïson !

L'INSPIRÉ

L'homme, ensuite, fut créé par l'infâme Dieu d'Israël, avec l'auxiliaire de ceux-là :

En désignant les médaillons,

Astophaios, Oraïos, Sabaoth, Adonaï, Eloï, Iaô !

Et il gisait sur la boue, hideux, débile, informe, sans pensée.

TOUS

d'un ton plaintif :

Kyrie eleïson !

L'INSPIRÉ

Mais Sophia, compatissante, le vivifia d'une parcelle de son âme.

Alors, voyant l'homme si beau, Dieu fut pris de colère. Il l'emprisonna dans son royaume, en lui interdisant l'arbre de la science.

L'autre, encore une fois, le secourut ! Elle envoya le serpent, qui, par de longs détours, le fit désobéir à cette loi de haine.

Et l'homme, quand il eut goûté de la science, comprit les choses célestes.

TOUS

avec force :

Kyrie eleïson !

L'INSPIRÉ

Mais Iabdalaoth, pour se venger, précipita l'homme dans la matière, et le serpent avec lui !

TOUS très-bas :

Kyrie eleïson !

Ils ferment la bouche, puis se taisent.

Les senteurs du port se mêlent dans l'air chaud à la fumée des lampes. Leurs mèches, en crépitant, vont s'éteindre ; de longs moustiques tournoient. Et Antoine râle d'angoisse ; c'est comme le sentiment d'une monstruosité flottant autour de lui, l'effroi d'un crime près de s'accomplir.

Mais

L'INSPIRÉ

frappant du talon, claquant des doigts, hochant la tête, psalmodie sur un rythme furieux, au son des cymbales et d'une flûte aiguë :

Viens ! viens ! viens ! sors de ta caverne !

Vélocé qui cours sans pieds, capteur qui prends sans mains !

Sinueux comme les fleuves, orbiculaire comme le soleil, noir avec des taches d'or, comme le firmament semé d'étoiles ! Pareil aux enroulements de la vigne et aux circonvolutions des entrailles !

Inengendré ! mangeur de terre ! toujours jeune ! perspicace ! honoré à Épidaure ! Bon pour les hommes ! qui as guéri le roi Ptolémée, les soldats de Moïse, et Glaucus fils de Minos !

Viens ! viens ! viens ! sors de ta caverne !

TOUS

répètent :

Viens ! viens ! viens ! sors de ta caverne !

Cependant, rien ne se montre.

Pourquoi ? qu'a-t-il ?

Et on se concerte, on propose des moyens.

Un vieillard offre une motte de gazon. Alors un soulèvement se fait dans la corbeille. La verdure s'agite, des fleurs tombent, — et la tête d'un python paraît.

Il passe lentement sur le bord du pain, comme un cercle qui tournerait autour d'un disque immobile, puis se développe, s'allonge ; il est énorme et d'un poids considérable. Pour empêcher qu'il ne frôle la terre, les hommes le tiennent contre leur poitrine, les femmes sur leur tête, les enfants au bout de leurs bras ; — et sa queue, sortant par le trou de la muraille, s'en va indéfiniment jusqu'au fond de la mer. Ses anneaux se dédoublent, emplissent la chambre ; ils enferment Antoine.

LES FIDÈLES

collant leur bouche contre sa peau, s'arrachent le pain qu'il a mordu.

C'est toi ! c'est toi !

Élevé d'abord par Moïse, brisé par Ézéchias, rétabli par le Messie. Il t'avait bu dans les ondes du baptême ; mais tu l'as quitté au jardin des Olives, et il sentit alors toute sa faiblesse.

Tordu à la barre de la croix, et plus haut que sa tête, en bavant sur la couronne d'épines, tu le regardais mourir. — Car tu n'es pas Jésus, toi, tu es le Verbe ! tu es le Christ !

Antoine s'évanouit d'horreur, et il tombe devant sa cabane sur les éclats de bois, où brûle doucement la torche qui a glissé de sa main.

Cette commotion lui fait entr'ouvrir les yeux ; et il aperçoit le Nil, onduleux et clair sous la blancheur de la lune, comme un grand serpent au milieu des sables ; — si bien que l'hallucination le reprenant, il n'a pas quitté les Ophites ; ils l'entourent, l'appellent, charrient des bagages, descendent vers le port. Il s'embarque avec eux.

Un temps inappréciable s'écoule.

Puis, la voûte d'une prison l'environne. Des barreaux, devant lui, font des lignes noires sur un fond bleu ; — et à ses côtés, dans l'ombre, des gens pleurent et prient entourés d'autres qui les exhortent et les consolent.

Au dehors, on dirait le bourdonnement d'une foule, et la splendeur d'un jour d'été.

Des voix aiguës crient des pastèques, de l'eau, des boissons à la glace, des coussins d'herbes pour s'asseoir. De temps à autre, des applaudissements éclatent. Il entend marcher sur sa tête.

Tout à coup, part un long mugissement, fort et caverneux comme le bruit de l'eau dans un aqueduc.

Et il aperçoit en face, derrière les barreaux d'une autre loge, un lion qui se promène, — puis une ligne de sandales, de jambes nues et de franges de pourpre. Au delà, des couronnes de monde étagées symétriquement vont en s'élargissant depuis la plus basse qui enferme l'arène jusqu'à la plus haute, où se dressent des mâts pour soutenir un voile d'hyacinthe, tendu dans l'air, sur des cordages. Des escaliers qui rayonnent vers le centre, coupent, à intervalles égaux, ces grands cercles de pierre. Leurs gradins disparaissent sous un peuple assis, chevaliers, sénateurs, soldats, plébéiens, vestales et courtisanes, — en capuchons de laine, en manipules de soie, en tuniques fauves, avec des aigrettes de pierreries, des panaches de plumes, des faisceaux de licteurs ; et tout cela grouillant, criant, tumultueux et furieux l'étourdit, comme une immense cuve bouillonnante. Au milieu de l'arène, sur un autel, fume un vase d'encens.

Ainsi, les gens qui l'entourent sont des chrétiens condamnés aux bêtes. Les hommes portent le manteau rouge des pontifes de Saturne, les femmes les bandelettes de Cérès. Leurs amis se partagent des bribes de leurs vêtements, des anneaux. Pour s'introduire dans la prison, il a fallu, disent-ils, donner beaucoup d'argent. Qu'importe ! ils resteront jusqu'à la fin.

Parmi ces consolateurs, Antoine remarque un homme chauve, en tunique noire, dont la figure s'est déjà montrée quelque part ; il les entretient du néant du monde et de la félicité des élus. Antoine est transporté d'amour. Il souhaite l'occasion de répandre sa vie pour le Sauveur, ne sachant pas s'il n'est point lui-même un de ces martyrs.

Mais, sauf un Phrygien à longs cheveux, qui reste les bras levés, tous ont l'air triste. Un vieillard sanglote sur un banc, et un jeune homme rêve, debout, la tête basse.

LE VIEILLARD

n'a pas voulu payer, à l'angle d'un carrefour, devant une statue de Minerve ; et il considère ses compagnons avec un regard qui signifie :

Vous auriez du me secourir ! Des communautés s'arrangent quelquefois pour qu'on les laisse tranquilles. Plusieurs d'entre vous ont même obtenu de ces lettres déclarant faussement qu'on a sacrifié aux idoles.

Il demande :

N'est-ce pas Pétrus d'Alexandrie qui a réglé ce qu'on doit faire quand on a fléchi dans les tourments ?

Puis, en lui-même :

Ah ! cela est bien dur à mon âge ! mes infirmités me rendent si faible !

Cependant, j'aurais pu vivre jusqu'à l'autre hiver, encore !

Le souvenir de son petit jardin l'attendrit ; — et il regarde du côté de l'autel.

LE JEUNE HOMME

qui a troublé, par des coups, une fête d'Apollon, murmure :

Il ne tenait qu'à moi, pourtant, de m'enfuir dans les montagnes !

— Les soldats t’auraient pris, dit un des frères.

— Oh ! j’aurais fait comme Cyprien ; je serais revenu ; et, la seconde fois, j’aurais eu plus de force, bien sûr !

Ensuite, il pense aux jours innombrables qu’il devait vivre, à toutes les joies qu’il n’aura pas connues ; — et il regarde du côté de l’autel.

Mais

L’HOMME EN TUNIQUE NOIRE

accourt sur lui :

Quel scandale ! Comment, toi, une victime d’élection ? Toutes ces femmes qui te regardent, songe donc ! Et puis Dieu, quelquefois, fait un miracle. Pionius engourdit la main de ses bourreaux, le sang de Polycarpe éteignait les flammes de son bûcher.

Il se tourne vers le vieillard :

Père, père ! tu dois nous édifier par ta mort. En la retardant, tu commettrais sans doute quelque action mauvaise qui perdrait le fruit des bonnes. D’ailleurs la puissance de Dieu est infinie. Peut-être que ton exemple va convertir le peuple entier.

Et dans la loge en face, les lions passent et reviennent sans s’arrêter, d’un mouvement continu, rapide. Le plus grand tout à coup regarde Antoine, se met à rugir — et une vapeur sort de sa gueule.

Les femmes sont tassées contre les hommes.

LE CONSOLATEUR

va de l’un à l’autre.

Que diriez-vous, que dirais-tu, si on te brûlait avec des plaques de fer, si des chevaux t’écarteraient, si ton corps enduit de miel était dévoré par les mouches ! Tu n’auras que la mort d’un chasseur qui est surpris dans un bois.

Antoine aimerait mieux tout cela que les horribles bêtes féroces ; il croit sentir leurs dents, leurs griffes, entendre ses os craquer dans leurs mâchoires.

Un belluaire entre dans le cachot ; les martyrs tremblent.

Un seul est impassible, le Phrygien, qui priaît à l’écart. Il a brûlé trois temples ; et il s’avance les bras levés, la bouche ouverte, la tête au ciel, sans rien voir, comme un somnambule.

LE CONSOLATEUR

s’écrie :

Arrière ! arrière ! L’esprit de Montanus vous prendrait.

TOUS

reculent, en vociférant :

Damnation au Montaniste !

Ils l'injurient, crachent dessus, voudraient le battre.

Les lions cabrés se mordent à la crinière. Le peuple hurle : « Aux bêtes ! aux bêtes ! »

Les martyrs éclatant en sanglots, s'étreignent. Une coupe de vin narcotique leur est offerte. Ils se la passent de main en main, vivement.

Contre la porte de la loge, un autre belluaire attend le signal. Elle s'ouvre ; un lion sort.

Il traverse l'arène, à grands pas obliques. Derrière lui, à la file, paraissent les autres lions, puis un ours, trois panthères, des léopards. Ils se dispersent comme un troupeau dans une prairie.

Le claquement d'un fouet retentit. Les chrétiens chancellent, — et, pour en finir, leurs frères les poussent. Antoine ferme les yeux.

Ils les ouvre. Mais des ténèbres l'enveloppent.

Bientôt elles s'éclairassent ; et il distingue une plaine aride et mamelonneuse, comme on en voit autour des carrières abandonnées.

Çà et là, un bouquet d'arbustes se lève parmi des dalles à ras du sol ; et des formes blanches, plus indécises que des nuages, sont penchées sur elles.

Il en arrive d'autres, légèrement. Des yeux brillent dans la fente des longs voiles. A la nonchalance de leurs pas et aux parfums qui s'exhalent, Antoine reconnaît des patriciennes. Il y a aussi des hommes, mais de condition inférieure, car ils ont des visages à la fois naïfs et grossiers.

UNE D'ELLES

en respirant largement :

Ah ! comme c'est bon l'air de la nuit froide, au milieu des sépulcres ! Je suis si fatiguée de la mollesse des lits, du fracas des jours, de la pesanteur du soleil !

Sa servante retire d'un sac en toile une torche qu'elle enflamme. Les fidèles y allument d'autres torches, et vont les planter sur les tombeaux.

UNE FEMME

haletante :

Ah ! enfin, me voilà ! Mais quel ennui que d'avoir épousé un idolâtre !

UNE AUTRE

Les visites dans les prisons, les entretiens avec nos frères, tout est suspect à nos maris ! — et même il faut nous cacher quand nous faisons le signe de la croix ; ils prendraient cela pour une conjuration magique.

UNE AUTRE

Avec le mien, c'était tous les jours des querelles ; je ne voulais pas me soumettre aux abus qu'il exigeait de mon corps ; — et afin de se venger, il m'a fait poursuivre comme chrétienne.

UNE AUTRE

Vous rappelez-vous, Lucius, ce jeune homme si beau, qu'on a traîné par les talons derrière un char, comme Hector, depuis la porte Esquiléenne jusqu'aux montagnes de Tibur ; — et des deux côtés du chemin le sang tachetait les buissons ! J'en ai recueilli les gouttes. Le voilà !

Elle tire de sa poitrine une éponge toute noire, la couvre de baisers, puis se jette sur les dalles, en criant :

Ah ! mon ami ! mon ami !

UN HOMME

Il y a juste aujourd'hui trois ans qu'est morte Domitilla. Elle fut lapidée au fond du bois de Proserpine. J'ai recueilli ses os qui brillaient comme des lucioles dans les herbes. La terre maintenant les recouvre !

Il se jette sur un tombeau.

O ma fiancée ! ma fiancée !

ET TOUS LES AUTRES

par la plaine :

O ma soeur ! ô mon frère ! ô ma fille ! ô ma mère !

Ils sont à genoux, le front dans les mains, ou le corps tout à plat, les deux bras étendus ; — et les sanglots qu'ils retiennent soulèvent leur poitrine à la briser. Ils regardent le ciel en disant :

Aie pitié de son âme, ô mon Dieu ! Elle languit au séjour des ombres ; daigne l'admettre dans la Résurrection, pour qu'elle jouisse de ta lumière !

Ou, l'oeil fixé sur les dalles, ils murmurent :

Apaise-toi, ne souffre plus ! Je t'ai apporté du vin, des viandes !

UNE VEUVE

Voici du pultis, fait par moi, selon son goût, avec beaucoup d'oeufs et double mesure de farine ! Nous allons le manger ensemble, comme autrefois, n'est-ce pas ?

Elle en porte un peu à ses lèvres ; et, tout à coup, se met à rire d'une façon extravagante, frénétique.

Les autres, comme elle, grignotent quelque morceau, boivent une gorgée.

Ils se racontent les histoires de leurs martyres ; la douleur s'exalte, les libations redoublent. Leurs yeux noyés de larmes se fixent les uns sur les autres. Ils balbutient d'ivresse et de désolation ; peu à peu, leurs mains se touchent, leurs lèvres s'unissent, les voiles s'entr'ouvrent, et ils se mêlent sur les tombes entre les coupes et les flambeaux.

Le ciel commence à blanchir. Le brouillard mouille leurs vêtements ; — et, sans avoir l'air de se connaître, ils s'éloignent les uns des autres par des chemins différents, dans la campagne.

Le soleil brille ; les herbes ont grandi, la plaine s'est transformée.

Et Antoine voit nettement à travers des bambous une forêt de colonnes, d'un gris bleuâtre. Ce sont des troncs d'arbres provenant d'un seul tronc. De chacune de ses branches descendent d'autres branches qui s'enfoncent dans le sol ; et l'ensemble de toutes ces lignes horizontales et perpendiculaires, indéfiniment multipliées, ressemblerait à une charpente monstrueuse, si elles n'avaient une petite figue de place en place, avec un feuillage noirâtre, comme celui du sycomore.

Il distingue dans leurs enfourchures des grappes de fleurs jaunes, des fleurs violettes et des fougères, pareilles à des plumes d'oiseaux.

Sous les rameaux les plus bas, se montrent çà et là les cornes d'un bubal, ou les yeux brillants d'une antilope ; des perroquets sont juchés, des papillons voltigent, des lézards se traînent, des mouches bourdonnent ; et on entend, au milieu du silence, comme la palpitation d'une vie profonde.

A l'entrée du bois, sur une manière de bûcher, est une chose étrange — un homme — enduit de bouse de vache, complètement nu, plus sec qu'une momie ; ses articulations forment des noeuds à l'extrémité de ses os qui semblent des bâtons. Il a des paquets de coquilles aux oreilles, la figure très-longue, le nez en bec de vautour. Son bras gauche reste droit en l'air, ankylosé, raide comme un pieu ; — et il se tient là depuis si longtemps que des oiseaux ont fait un nid dans sa chevelure.

Aux quatre coins de son bûcher flambent quatre feux. Le soleil est juste en face. Il le contemple les yeux grands ouverts ; — et sans regarder Antoine :

Brachmane des bords du Nil, qu'en dis-tu ?

Des flammes sortent de tous les côtés par les intervalles des poutres ; et

LE GYMNOSOPHISTE

reprend :

Pareil au rhinocéros, je me suis enfoncé dans la solitude. J'habitais l'arbre derrière moi.

En effet, le gros figuier présente, dans ses cannelures, une excavation naturelle de la taille d'un homme.

Et je me nourrissais de fleurs et de fruits, avec une telle observance des préceptes, que pas même un chien ne m'a vu manger.

Comme l'existence provient de la corruption, la corruption du désir, le désir de la sensation, la sensation du contact, j'ai fui toute action, tout contact ; et — sans plus bouger que la stèle d'un tombeau, exhalant mon haleine par mes deux narines, fixant mon regard sur mon nez, et considérant l'éther dans mon esprit, le monde dans mes membres, la lune dans mon coeur, — je songeais à l'essence de la grande Ame d'où s'échappent continuellement, comme des étincelles de feu, les principes de la vie.

J'ai saisi enfin l'Ame suprême dans tous les êtres, tous les êtres dans l'Ame suprême ; — et je suis parvenu à y faire entrer mon âme, dans laquelle j'avais fait rentrer mes sens.

Je reçois la science, directement du ciel, comme l'oiseau Tchataka qui ne se désaltère que dans les rayons de la pluie.

Par cela même que je connais les choses, les choses n'existent plus.

Pour moi, maintenant, il n'y a pas d'espoir et pas d'angoisse, pas de bonheur, pas de vertu, ni jour ni nuit, ni toi ni moi, absolument rien.

Mes austérités effroyables m'ont fait supérieur aux Puissances. Une contraction de ma pensée peut tuer cent fils de rois, détrôner les dieux, bouleverser le monde.

Il a dit tout cela d'une voix monotone.

Les feuilles à l'entour se recroquerillent. Des rats, par terre, s'enfuient.

Il abaisse lentement ses yeux vers les flammes qui montent, puis ajoute :

J'ai pris en dégoût la forme, en dégoût la perception, en dégoût jusqu'à la connaissance elle-même, — car la pensée ne survit pas au fait transitoire qui la cause, et l'esprit n'est qu'une illusion comme le reste.

Tout ce qui est engendré périra, tout ce qui est mort doit revivre ; les êtres actuellement disparus séjourneront dans des matrices non encore formées, et reviendront sur la terre pour servir avec douleur d'autres créatures.

Mais, comme j'ai roulé dans une multitude infinie d'existences, sous des enveloppes de dieux, d'hommes et d'animaux, je renonce au voyage, je ne veux plus de cette fatigue ! J'abandonne la sale auberge de mon corps, maçonnée de chair, rougie de sang, couverte d'une peau hideuse, pleine d'immondices ; — et, pour ma récompense, je vais enfin dormir au plus profond de l'absolu, dans l'Anéantissement.

Les flammes s'élèvent jusqu'à sa poitrine, — puis l'enveloppent. Sa tête passe à travers comme par le trou d'un mur. Ses yeux béants regardent toujours.

ANTOINE

se relève.

La torche, par terre, a incendié les éclats de bois ; et les flammes ont roussi sa barbe.

Tout en criant, Antoine trépigne sur le feu ; — et quand il ne reste plus qu'un amas de cendres :

Où est donc Hilarion ? Il était là tout à l'heure.

Je l'ai vu !

Eh ! non, c'est impossible ! je me trompe !

Pourquoi ?... Ma cabane, ces pierres, le sable, n'ont peut-être pas plus de réalité. Je deviens fou. Du calme ! où étais-je ? qu'y avait-il ?

Ah ! le gymnosophe !... Cette mort est commune parmi les sages indiens. Kalanos se brûla devant Alexandre ; un autre a fait de même du temps d'Auguste. Quelle haine de la vie il faut avoir ! A moins que l'orgueil ne les pousse ?... N'importe, c'est une intrépidité de martyrs !... Quant à ceux-là, je crois maintenant tout ce qu'on m'avait dit sur les débauches qu'ils occasionnent.

Et auparavant ? Oui, je me souviens ! la foule des hérésiarques ... Quels cris ! quels yeux ! Mais pourquoi tant de débordements de la chair et d'égarements de l'esprit ?

C'est vers Dieu qu'ils prétendent se diriger par toutes ces voies ! De quel droit les maudire, moi qui trébuche dans la mienne ? Quand ils ont disparu, j'allais peut-être en apprendre davantage. Cela tourbillonnait trop vite ; je n'avais pas le temps de répondre. A présent, c'est comme s'il y avait dans mon intelligence plus d'espace et plus de lumière. Je suis tranquille. Je me sens capable ... Qu'est-ce donc ? je croyais avoir éteint le feu !

Une flamme voltige entre les roches ; et bientôt une voix saccadée se fait entendre, au loin, dans la montagne.

Est-ce l'abolement d'une hyène, ou les sanglots de quelque voyageur perdu ?

Antoine écoute. La flamme se rapproche.

Et il voit venir une femme qui pleure, appuyée sur l'épaule d'un homme à barbe blanche.

Elle est couverte d'une robe de pourpre en lambeaux. Il est nu-tête comme elle, avec une tunique de même couleur, et porte un vase de bronze, d'où s'élève une petite flamme bleue.

Antoine a peur — et voudrait savoir qui est cette femme.

L'ÉTRANGER (SIMON)

C'est une jeune fille, une pauvre enfant, que je mène partout avec moi.

Il hausse le vase d'airain.

Antoine la considère, à la lueur de cette flamme qui vacille.

Elle a sur le visage des marques de morsures, le long des bras des traces de coups ; ses cheveux épars s'accrochent dans les déchirures de ses haillons ; ses yeux paraissent insensibles à la lumière.

SIMON

Quelquefois, elle reste ainsi, pendant fort long-temps, sans parler, sans manger ; puis elle se réveille, — et débite des choses merveilleuses.

ANTOINE

Vraiment ?

SIMON

Ennoia ! Ennoia ! Ennoia ! raconte ce que tu as à dire !

Elle tourne ses prunelles comme sortant d'un songe, passe lentement ses doigts sur ses deux sourcils, et d'une voix dolente :

HÉLÈNE (ENNOIA)

J'ai souvenir d'une région lointaine, couleur d'émeraude. Un seul arbre l'occupe.

Antoine tressaille.

A chaque degré de ses larges rameaux se tient dans l'air un couple d'Esprits. Les branches autour d'eux s'entre-croisent, comme les veines d'un corps, et ils regardent la vie éternelle circuler depuis les racines plongeant dans l'ombre jusqu'au faite qui dépasse le soleil. Moi, sur la deuxième branche, j'éclairais avec ma figure les nuits d'été.

ANTOINE

se touchant le front.

Ah ! ah ! je comprends ! la tête !

SIMON

le doigt sur la bouche :

Chut !...

HÉLÈNE

La voile restait bombée, la carène fendait l'écume. Il me disait :
« Que m'importe si je trouble ma patrie, si je perds mon royaume ! Tu m'appartiendras, dans ma maison ! »

Qu'elle était douce la haute chambre de son palais ! Il se couchait sur le lit d'ivoire, et, caressant ma chevelure, chantait amoureusement.

A la fin du jour, j'apercevais les deux camps, les fanaux qu'on allumait, Ulysse au bord de sa tente, Achille tout armé conduisant un char le long du rivage de la mer.

ANTOINE

Mais elle est folle entièrement ! Pourquoi ?...

SIMON

Chut !... chut !

HÉLÈNE

Ils m'ont graissée avec des onguents, et ils m'ont vendue au peuple pour que je l'amuse.

Un soir, debout, et le cistre en main, je faisais danser des matelots grecs. La pluie, comme une cataracte, tombait sur la taverne, et tes coupes de vin chaud fumaient. Un homme entra, sans que la porte fût ouverte.

SIMON

C'était moi ! je t'ai retrouvée !

La voici, Antoine, celle qu'on nomme Sigeh, Ennoia, Barbelo, Prounikos ! Les Esprits gouverneurs du monde furent jaloux d'elle, et ils l'attachèrent dans un corps de femme.

Elle a été l'Hélène des Troyens, dont le poète Stesichore a maudit la mémoire. Elle a été Lucrèce, la patricienne violée par les rois. Elle a été Dalila, qui coupait les cheveux de Samson. Elle a été cette fille d'Israël qui s'abandonnait aux boucs. Elle a aimé l'adultère, l'idolâtrie, le mensonge et la sottise. Elle s'est prostituée à tous les peuples. Elle a chanté dans tous les carrefours. Elle a baisé tous les visages.

A Tyr, la Syrienne, elle était la maîtresse des voleurs. Elle buvait avec eux pendant les nuits, et elle cachait les assassins dans la vermine de son lit tiède.

ANTOINE

Eh ! que me fait !...

SIMON

d'un air furieux :

Je l'ai rachetée, te dis-je, — et rétablie en sa splendeur ; tellement que Caius César Caligula en est devenu amoureux, puisqu'il voulait coucher avec la Lune !

ANTOINE

Eh bien ?...

SIMON

Mais c'est elle qui est la Lune ! Le pape Clément n'a-t-il pas écrit qu'elle fut emprisonnée dans une tour ? Trois cents personnes vinrent cerner la tour ; et à chacune des meurtrières en même temps, on vit paraître la lune, — bien qu'il n'y ait pas dans le monde plusieurs lunes, ni plusieurs Ennoia !

ANTOINE

Oui ... je crois me rappeler ...

Et il tombe dans une rêverie.

SIMON

Innocente comme le Christ, qui est mort pour les hommes, elle s'est dévouée pour les femmes. Car l'impuissance de Jéhovah se démontre par la transgression d'Adam, et il faut secouer la vieille loi, antipathique à l'ordre des choses.

J'ai prêché le renouvellement dans Éphraïm et dans Issachar, le long du torrent de Bazor, derrière le lac d'Houleh, dans la vallée de Mageddo, plus loin que les montagnes, à Bostra et à Damas ! Viennent à moi ceux qui sont couverts de vin, ceux qui sont couverts de boue, ceux qui sont couverts de sang ; et j'effacerai leurs souillures avec le Saint-Esprit, appelé Minerve par les Grecs ! Elle est Minerve ! elle est le Saint-Esprit ! Je suis Jupiter, Apollon, le Christ, le Paraclet, la grande puissance de Dieu, incarnée en la personne de Simon !

ANTOINE

Ah ! c'est toi !... c'est donc toi ? Mais je sais tes crimes !

Tu es né à Gittoï, près de Samarie. Dosithéus, ton premier maître, t'a renvoyé ! Tu exècres saint Paul pour avoir converti une de tes femmes ; et, vaincu par saint Pierre, — de rage et de terreur tu as jeté dans les flots le sac qui contenait tes artifices !

SIMON

Les veux-tu ?

Antoine le regarde ; — et une voix intérieure murmure dans sa poitrine.

« Pourquoi pas ? »

Simon reprend :

Celui qui connaît les forces de la Nature et la substance des Esprits doit opérer des miracles. C'est le rêve de tous les sages — et le désir qui te ronge ; avoue-le !

Au milieu des Romains, j'ai volé dans le cirque tellement haut qu'on ne m'a plus revu. Néron ordonna de me décapiter ; mais ce fut la tête d'une brebis qui tomba par terre, au lieu de la mienne. Enfin on m'a enseveli tout vivant ; mais j'ai ressuscité le troisième jour. La preuve, c'est que me voilà !

Il lui donne ses mains à flairer. Elles sentent le cadavre. Antoine se recule.

Je peux faire se mouvoir des serpents de bronze, rire des statues de marbre, parler des chiens. Je te montrerai une immense quantité d'or ; j'établirai des rois ; tu verras des peuples m'adorant ! Je peux marcher sur les nuages et sur les flots, passer à travers les montagnes, apparaître en jeune homme, en vieillard, en tigre et en fourmi, prendre ton visage, te donner le mien, conduire la foudre. L'entends-tu ?

Le tonnerre gronde, des éclairs se succèdent.

C'est la voix du Très-Haut ! « car l'Éternel ton Dieu est un feu, » et toutes les créations s'opèrent par des jaillissements de ce foyer.

Tu vas en recevoir le baptême, — ce second baptême annoncé par Jésus, et qui tomba sur les apôtres, un jour d'orage que la fenêtre était ouverte !

Et tout en remuant la flamme avec sa main, lentement, comme pour en asperger Antoine :

Mère des miséricordes, toi qui découvres les secrets, afin que le repos nous arrive dans la huitième maison ...

ANTOINE

s'écrie :

Ah ! si j'avais de l'eau bénite !

La flamme s'éteint, en produisant beaucoup de fumée.

Ennoia et Simon ont disparu.

Un brouillard extrêmement froid, opaque et fétide emplit l'atmosphère.

ANTOINE

étendant ses bras, comme un aveugle :

Où suis-je ?... J'ai peur de tomber dans l'abîme. Et la croix, bien sûr, est trop loin de moi ... Ah ! quelle nuit ! quelle nuit !

Sous un coup de vent, le brouillard s'entr'ouvre ; — et il aperçoit deux hommes, couverts de longues tuniques blanches.

Le premier est de haute taille, de figure douce, de maintien grave. Ses cheveux blonds, séparés comme ceux du Christ, descendent régulièrement sur ses épaules. Il a jeté une baguette qu'il portait à la main, et que son compagnon a reçue en faisant une révérence à la manière des Orientaux.

Ce dernier est petit, gros, camard, d'encolure ramassée, les cheveux crépus, une mine naïve.

Ils sont tous les deux nu-pieds, nu-tête, et poudreux comme des gens qui arrivent de voyage.

ANTOINE

en sursaut :

Que voulez-vous ? Parlez ! Allez-vous-en !

DAMIS

— C'est le petit homme. —

Là, là !...bon ermite ! ce que je veux ? je n'en sais rien ! Voici le maître.

Il s'assoit, l'autre reste debout. Silence.

ANTOINE

reprend :

Vous venez ainsi ?...

DAMIS

Oh ! de loin, — de très-loin !

ANTOINE

Et vous allez ?...

DAMIS

désignant l'autre :

Où il voudra !

ANTOINE

Qui est-il donc ?

DAMIS

Regarde-le !

ANTOINE

à part :

Il a l'air d'un saint ! Si j'osais ...

La fumée est partie. Le temps est très-clair. La lune brille.

DAMIS

A quoi songez-vous donc, que vous ne parlez plus ?

ANTOINE

Je songe ... Oh ! rien.

DAMIS

s'avance vers Apollonius, et fait plusieurs tours autour de lui, la taille courbée, sans lever la tête.

Maître ! c'est un ermite galiléen qui demande à savoir les origines de la sagesse.

APOLLONIUS

Qu'il approche !

Antoine hésite.

DAMIS

Approchez !

APOLLONIUS

d'une voix tonnante :

Approche ! Tu voudrais connaître qui je suis, ce que j'ai fait, ce que je pense ? n'est-ce pas cela, enfant ?

ANTOINE

...Si ces choses, toutefois, peuvent contribuer à mon salut.

APOLLONIUS

Réjouis-toi, je vais te les dire !

DAMIS

bas à Antoine :

Est-ce possible ! Il faut qu'il vous ait, du premier coup d'oeil, reconnu des inclinations extraordinaires pour la philosophie ! Je vais en profiter aussi, moi !

APOLLONIUS

Je te raconterai d'abord la longue route que j'ai parcourue pour obtenir la doctrine ; et si tu trouves dans toute ma vie une action mauvaise, tu m'arrêteras, — car celui-là doit scandaliser par ses paroles qui a méfait par ses oeuvres.

DAMIS

à Antoine :

Quel homme juste ! hein ?

ANTOINE

Décidément, je crois qu'il est sincère.

APOLLONIUS

La nuit de ma naissance, ma mère crut se voir cueillant des fleurs sur le bord d'un lac. Un éclair parut, et elle me mit au monde à la voix des cygnes qui chantaient dans son rêve.

Jusqu'à quinze ans, on m'a plongé, trois fois par jour, dans la fontaine Asbadée, dont l'eau rend les parjures hydropiques ; et l'on me frottait le corps avec les feuilles du cnyza pour me faire chaste.

Une princesse palmyrienne vint un soir me trouver, m'offrant des trésors qu'elle savait être dans des tombeaux. Une hiérodoule du temple de Diane s'égorgea, désespérée, avec le couteau des sacrifices ; et le gouverneur de Cilicie, à la fin de ses promesses, s'écria devant ma famille qu'il me ferait mourir ; mais c'est lui qui mourut trois jours après, assassiné par les Romains.

DAMIS

à Antoine, en le frappant du coude :

Hein ? quand je vous disais ! quel homme !

APOLLONIUS

J'ai, pendant quatre ans de suite, gardé le silence complet des pythagoriciens. La douleur la plus imprévue ne m'arrachait pas un soupir ; et au théâtre, quand j'entrais, on s'écartait de moi comme d'un fantôme.

DAMIS

Auriez-vous fait cela, vous ?

APOLLONIUS

Le temps de mon épreuve terminé, j'entrepris d'instruire les prêtres qui avaient perdu la tradition.

ANTOINE

Quelle tradition ?

DAMIS

Laissez-le poursuivre ! Taisez-vous !

APOLLONIUS

J'ai devisé avec les Samanéens du Gange, avec les astrologues de Chaldée, avec les mages de Babylone, avec les Druides gaulois, avec les sacerdoces des nègres ! J'ai gravi les quatorze Olympes, j'ai sondé les lacs de Scythie, j'ai mesuré la grandeur du Désert !

DAMIS

C'est pourtant vrai, tout cela ! J'y étais, moi !

APOLLONIUS

J'ai d'abord été jusqu'à la mer d'Hyrkanie. J'en ai fait le tour ; et par le pays des Baraomates, où est enterré Bucéphale, je suis descendu vers Ninive. Aux portes de la ville, un homme s'approcha.

DAMIS

Moi ! moi ! mon bon maître ! Je vous aimai, tout de suite ! Vous étiez plus doux qu'une fille et plus beau qu'un Dieu !

APOLLONIUS

sans l'entendre :

Il voulait m'accompagner, pour me servir d'interprète.

DAMIS

Mais vous répondîtes que vous compreniez tous les langages et que vous deviniez toutes les pensées. Alors j'ai baisé le bas de votre manteau, et je me suis mis à marcher derrière vous.

APOLLONIUS

Après Ctésiphon, nous entrâmes sur les terres de Babylone.

DAMIS

Et le satrape poussa un cri, en voyant un homme si pâle.

ANTOINE

à part :

Que signifie ...

APOLLONIUS

Le Roi m'a reçu debout, près d'un trône d'argent, dans une salle ronde, constellée d'étoiles ; — et de la coupole pendaient, à des fils que l'on n'apercevait pas, quatre grands oiseaux d'or, les deux ailes étendues.

ANTOINE

rêvant :

Est-ce qu'il y a sur la terre des choses pareilles ?

DAMIS

C'est là une ville, cette Babylone ! tout le monde y est riche ! Les maisons, peintes en bleu, ont des portes de bronze, avec un escalier qui descend vers le fleuve ;

Dessinait par terre, avec son bâton,

Comme cela, voyez-vous ? Et puis, ce sont des temples, des places, des bains, des aqueducs ! Les palais sont couverts de cuivre rouge ! et l'intérieur donc, si vous saviez !

APOLLONIUS

Sur la muraille du septentrion, s'élève une tour qui en supporte une seconde, une troisième, une quatrième, une cinquième — et il y en a trois autres encore ! La huitième est une chapelle avec un lit. Personne n'y entre que la femme choisie par les prêtres pour le Dieu Bélus. Le roi de Babylone m'y fit loger.

DAMIS

A peine si l'on me regardait, moi ! Aussi, je restais seul à me promener par les rues. Je m'informais des usages ; je visitais les ateliers ; j'examinais les grandes machines qui portent l'eau dans les jardins. Mais il m'ennuyait d'être séparé du Maître.

APOLLONIUS

Enfin, nous sortîmes de Babylone ; et au clair de la lune, nous vîmes tout à coup une empuse.

DAMIS

Oui-da ! Elle sautait sur son sabot de fer ; elle hennissait comme un âne ; elle galopait dans les rochers. Il lui cria des injures ; elle disparut.

ANTOINE

à part :

Où veulent-ils en venir ?

APOLLONIUS

A Taxilla, capitale de cinq mille forteresses, Phraortes, roi du Gange, nous a montré sa garde d'hommes noirs hauts de cinq coudées, et dans les jardins de son palais, sous un pavillon de brocart vert, un éléphant énorme, que les reines s'amusaient à parfumer. C'était l'éléphant de Porus, qui s'était enfui après la mort d'Alexandre.

DAMIS

Et qu'on avait retrouvé dans une forêt.

ANTOINE

Ils parlent abondamment comme des gens ivres.

APOLLONIUS

Phraortes nous fit asseoir à sa table.

DAMIS

Quel drôle de pays ! Les seigneurs, tout en buvant, se divertissent à lancer des flèches sous les pieds d'un enfant qui danse. Mais je n'approuve pas ...

APOLLONIUS

Quand je fus prêt à partir, le Roi me donna un parasol, et il me dit : « J'ai sur l'Indus un haras de chameaux blancs. Quand tu n'en voudras plus, souffle dans leurs oreilles. Ils reviendront. »

Nous descendîmes le long du fleuve, marchant la nuit à la lueur des lucioles qui brillaient dans les bambous. L'esclave sifflait un air pour écarter les serpents ; et nos chameaux se courbaient les reins en passant sous les arbres, comme sous des portes trop basses.

Un jour, un enfant noir qui tenait un caducée d'or à la main, nous conduisit au collège des sages. Iarchas, leur chef, me parla de mes ancêtres, de toutes mes pensées, de toutes mes actions, de toutes mes existences. Il avait été le fleuve Indus, et il me rappela que j'avais conduit des barques sur le Nil, au temps du roi Sésostris.

DAMIS

Moi, on ne me dit rien, de sorte que je ne sais pas qui j'ai été.

ANTOINE

Ils ont l'air vague comme des ombres.

APOLLONIUS

Nous avons rencontré, sur le bord de la mer, les Cynocéphales gorgés de lait, qui s'en revenaient de leur expédition dans l'île Taprobane. Les flots tièdes poussaient devant nous des perles blondes. L'ambre craquait sous nos pas. Des squelettes de baleine blanchissaient dans la crevasse des falaises. La terre, à la fin, se fit plus étroite qu'une sandale ; — et après avoir jeté vers le soleil des gouttes de l'Océan, nous tournâmes à droite, pour revenir.

Nous sommes revenus par la Région des Aromates, par le pays des Gangarides, le promontoire de Comaria, la contrée des Sachalites, des Adramites et des Homérites ; — puis, à travers les monts Cassaniens, la mer Rouge et l'île Topazos, nous avons pénétré en Éthiopie par le royaume des Pygmées.

ANTOINE

à part :

Comme la terre est grande !

DAMIS

Et quand nous sommes rentrés chez nous, tous ceux que nous avions connus jadis étaient morts.

Antoine baisse la tête. Silence.

APOLLONIUS

reprend :

Alors on commença dans le monde à parler de moi.

La peste ravageait Ephèse ; j'ai fait lapider un vieux mendiant ;

DAMIS

Et la peste s'en est allée !

ANTOINE

Comment ! il chasse les maladies ?

APOLLONIUS

A Cnide, j'ai guéri l'amoureux de la Vénus.

DAMIS

Oui, un fou, qui même avait promis de l'épouser. — Aimer une femme passe encore ; mais une statue, quelle sottise ! — Le Maître lui posa la main sur le coeur ; et l'amour aussitôt s'éteignit.

ANTOINE

Quoi ! il délivre des démons ?

APOLLONIUS

A Tarente, on portait au bûcher une jeune fille morte.

DAMIS

Le Maître lui toucha les lèvres, et elle s'est relevée en appelant sa mère.

ANTOINE

Comment ! il ressuscite les morts ?

APOLLONIUS

J'ai prédit le pouvoir à Vespasien.

ANTOINE

Quoi ! il devine l'avenir ?

DAMIS

Il y avait à Corinthe,

APOLLONIUS

Étant à table avec lui, aux eaux de Baïa ...

ANTOINE

Excusez-moi, étrangers, il est tard !

DAMIS

Un jeune homme qu'on appelait Ménippe.

ANTOINE

Non ! non ! allez-vous-en !

APOLLONIUS

Un chien entra, portant à la gueule une main coupée.

DAMIS

Un soir, dans un faubourg, il rencontra une femme.

ANTOINE

Vous ne m'entendez pas ? retirez-vous !

APOLLONIUS

Il rôdait vaguement autour des lits.

ANTOINE

Assez !

APOLLONIUS

On voulait le chasser.

DAMIS

Ménippe donc se rendit chez elle ; ils s'aimèrent.

APOLLONIUS

Et battant la mosaïque avec sa queue, il déposa cette main sur les genoux de Flavius.

DAMIS

Mais le matin, aux leçons de l'école, Ménippe était pâle.

ANTOINE

bondissant :

Encore ! Ah ! qu'ils continuent, puisqu'il n'y a pas ...

DAMIS

Le Maître lui dit : « O beau jeune homme, tu caresses un serpent ; un serpent te caresse ! à quand les noces ? » Nous allâmes tous à la noce.

ANTOINE

J'ai tort, bien sûr, d'écouter cela !

DAMIS

Dès le vestibule, des serviteurs se remuaient, les portes s'ouvraient ; on n'entendait cependant ni le bruit des pas, ni le bruit des portes. Le Maître se plaça près de Ménippe. Aussitôt la fiancée fut prise de colère contre les philosophes. Mais la vaisselle d'or, les échansons, les cuisiniers, les pannetiers disparurent ; le toit s'envola, les murs s'écroulèrent ; et Apollonius resta seul, debout, ayant à ses pieds cette femme tout en pleurs. C'était une vampire qui satisfaisait les beaux jeunes hommes, afin de manger leur chair, — parce que rien n'est meilleur pour ces sortes de fantômes que le sang des amoureux.

APOLLONIUS

Si tu veux savoir l'art ...

ANTOINE

Je ne veux rien savoir !

APOLLONIUS

Le soir de notre arrivée aux portes de Rome,

ANTOINE

Oh ! oui, parlez-moi de la ville des papes !

APOLLONIUS

Un homme ivre nous accosta, qui chantait d'une voix douce. C'était un épithalame de Néron ; et il avait le pouvoir de faire mourir quiconque l'écoutait négligemment. Il portait à son dos, dans une boîte, une corde prise à la cythare de l'Empereur. J'ai haussé les épaules. Il nous a jeté de la boue au visage. Alors, j'ai défait ma ceinture, et je la lui ai placée dans la main.

DAMIS

Vous avez eu bien tort, par exemple !

APOLLONIUS

L'Empereur, pendant la nuit, me fit appeler à sa maison. Il jouait aux osselets avec Sporus, accoudé du bras gauche, sur une table d'agate. Il se détourna, et fronçant ses sourcils blonds : « Pourquoi ne me crains-tu pas ? me demanda-t-il ? — Parce que le Dieu qui t'a fait terrible m'a fait intrépide », répondis-je.

ANTOINE

à part :

Quelque chose d'inexplicable m'épouvante.

Silence.

DAMIS

reprend d'une voix aiguë :

Toute l'Asie, d'ailleurs, pourra vous dire ...

ANTOINE

en sursaut :

Je suis malade ! Laissez-moi !

DAMIS

Écoutez donc. Il a vu, d'Ephèse, tuer Domitien, qui était à Rome.

ANTOINE

s'efforçant de rire :

Est-ce possible !

DAMIS

Oui, au théâtre, en plein jour, le quatorzième des calendes d'octobre, tout à coup il s'écria : « On égorge César ! » et il ajoutait de temps à autre : « Il roule par terre ; oh ! comme il se débat ! Il se relève ; il essaye de fuir ; les portes sont fermées ; ah ! c'est fini ! le voilà mort ! » Et ce jour-là, en effet, Titus Flavius Domitianus fut assassiné, comme vous savez.

ANTOINE

Sans le secours du Diable ... certainement ...

APOLLONIUS

Il avait voulu me faire mourir, ce Domitien ! Damis s'était enfui par mon ordre, et je restais seul dans ma prison.

DAMIS

C'était une terrible hardiesse, il faut avouer !

APOLLONIUS

Vers la cinquième heure, les soldats m'amènèrent au tribunal.
J'avais ma harangue toute prête que je tenais sous mon manteau.

DAMIS

Nous étions sur le rivage de Pouzzoles, nous autres ! Nous vous croyions mort ; nous pleurions. Quand, vers la sixième heure, tout à coup vous apparûtes, et vous nous dites : « C'est moi ! »

ANTOINE

à part :

Comme Lui !

DAMIS

très-haut :

Absolument !

ANTOINE

Oh ! non ! vous mentez, n'est-ce pas ? vous mentez !

APOLLONIUS

Il est descendu du Ciel. Moi, j'y monte, — grâce à ma vertu qui m'a élevé jusqu'à la hauteur du Principe !

DAMIS

Thyane, sa ville natale, a institué en son honneur un temple avec des prêtres !

APOLLONIUS

se rapproche d'Antoine et lui crie aux oreilles :

C'est que je connais tous les dieux, tous les rites, toutes les prières, tous les oracles ! J'ai pénétré dans l'autre de Trophonius, fils d'Apollon ! J'ai pétri pour les Syracusaines les gâteaux qu'elles portent sur les montagnes ! j'ai subi les quatre-vingts épreuves de Mithra ! j'ai serré contre mon cœur le serpent de Sabasius ! j'ai reçu l'écharpe des Cabires ! j'ai lavé Cybèle aux flots des golfes campaniens, et j'ai passé trois lunes dans les cavernes de Samothrace !

DAMIS

riant bêtement :

Ah ! ah ! ah ! aux mystères de la Bonne Déesse !

APOLLONIUS

Et maintenant nous recommençons le pèlerinage !

Nous allons au Nord, du côté des cygnes et des neiges. Sur la plaine blanche, les hippopodes aveugles cassent du bout de leurs pieds la plante d'outre-mer.

DAMIS

Viens ! c'est l'aurore. Le coq a chanté, le cheval a henni, la voile est prête.

ANTOINE

Le coq n'a pas chanté ! J'entends le grillon dans les sables, et je vois la lune qui reste en place.

APOLLONIUS

Nous allons au Sud, derrière les montagnes et les grands flots, chercher dans les parfums la raison de l'amour. Tu humeras l'odeur du myrrhodion qui fait mourir les faibles. Tu baigneras ton corps dans le lac d'huile rose de l'île Junonia. Tu verras, dormant sur les primevères, le lézard qui se réveille tous les siècles quand tombe à sa maturité l'escarboucle de son front. Les étoiles palpitent comme des yeux, les cascades chantent comme des lyres, des enivrements s'exhalent des fleurs écloses ; ton esprit s'élargira parmi les airs, et dans ton cœur comme sur ta face.

DAMIS

Maître ! il est temps ! Le vent va se lever, les hirondelles s'éveillent, la feuille du myrte est envolée !

APOLLONIUS

Oui ! partons !

ANTOINE

Non ! moi, je reste !

APOLLONIUS

Veux-tu que je t'enseigne où pousse la plante Balis, qui ressuscite les morts ?

DAMIS

Demande-lui plutôt l'androdamas qui attire l'argent, le fer et l'airain !

ANTOINE

Oh ! que je souffre ! que je souffre !

DAMIS

Tu comprendras la voix de tous les êtres, les rugissements, les roucoulements !

APOLLONIUS

Je te ferai monter sur les licornes, sur les dragons, sur les hippocentaures et les dauphins !

ANTOINE

pleure.

Oh ! oh ! oh !

APOLLONIUS

Tu connaîtras les démons qui habitent les cavernes, ceux qui parlent dans les bois, ceux qui remuent les flots, ceux qui poussent les nuages.

DAMIS

Serre ta ceinture ! noue tes sandales !

APOLLONIUS

Je t'expliquerai la raison des formes divines, pourquoi Apollon est debout, Jupiter assis, Vénus noire à Corinthe, carrée dans Athènes, conique à Paphos.

ANTOINE

joignant les mains :

Qu'ils s'en aillent ! qu'ils s'en aillent !

APOLLONIUS

J'arracherai devant toi les armures des Dieux, nous forcerons les sanctuaires, je te ferai violer la Pythie !

ANTOINE

Au secours, Seigneur !

Il se précipite vers la croix.

APOLLONIUS

Quel est ton désir ? ton rêve ? Le temps seulement d'y songer ...

ANTOINE

Jésus, Jésus, à mon aide !

APOLLONIUS

Veux-tu que je le fasse apparaître, Jésus ?

ANTOINE

Quoi ? Comment ?

APOLLONIUS

Ce sera lui ! pas un autre ! Il jettera sa couronne, et nous causerons face à face !

DAMIS

bas :

Dis que tu veux bien ! Dis que tu veux bien !

Antoine au pied de la croix, murmure des oraisons. Damis tourne autour de lui, avec des gestes patelins.

Voyons, bon ermite, cher saint Antoine ! homme pur, homme illustre ! homme qu'on ne saurait assez louer ! Ne vous effrayez pas ; c'est une façon de dire exagérée, prise aux Orientaux. Cela n'empêche nullement ...

APOLLONIUS

Laisse-le, Damis !

Il croit, comme une brute, à la réalité des choses. La terreur qu'il a des Dieux l'empêche de les comprendre ; et il ravale le sien au niveau d'un roi jaloux !

Toi, mon fils, ne me quitte pas !

Il s'approche à reculons du bord de la falaise, la dépasse, et reste suspendu.

Par-dessus toutes les formes, plus loin que la terre, au delà des cieux, réside le monde des Idées, tout plein du Verbe ! D'un bond, nous franchirons l'autre espace ; et tu saisisiras dans son infinité l'Éternel, l'Absolu, l'Être ! — Allons ! donne-moi la main ! En marche !

Tous les deux, côte à côte, s'élèvent dans l'air, doucement.

Antoine embrassant la croix, les regarde monter.

Ils disparaissent.

V.

ANTOINE

marchant lentement :

Celui-là vaut tout l'enfer !

Nabuchodonosor ne m'avait pas tant ébloui. La reine de Saba ne m'a pas si profondément charmé.

Sa manière de parler des Dieux inspire l'envie de les connaître.

Je me rappelle en avoir vu des centaines à la fois, dans l'île d'Éléphantine, du temps de Dioclétien. L'Empereur avait cédé aux Nomades un grand pays, à condition qu'ils garderaient les frontières ; et le traité fut conclu au nom des « Puissances invisibles. » Car les Dieux de chaque peuple étaient ignorés de l'autre peuple.

Les Barbares avaient amené les leurs. Ils occupaient les collines de sable qui bordent le fleuve. On les apercevait tenant leurs idoles entre leurs bras comme de grands enfants paralytiques ; ou bien naviguant au milieu des cataractes sur un tronc de palmier, ils montraient de loin les amulettes de leurs cous, les tatouages de leurs poitrines ; — et cela n'est pas plus criminel que la religion des Grecs, des Asiatiques et des Romains !

Quand j'habitais le temple d'Héliopolis, j'ai souvent considéré tout ce qu'il y a sur les murailles : vautours portant des sceptres, crocodiles pinçant des lyres, figures d'hommes avec des corps de serpent, femmes à tête de vache prosternées devant des dieux ithyphalliques ; et leurs formes surnaturelles m'entraînaient vers d'autres mondes. J'aurais voulu savoir ce que regardent ces yeux tranquilles.

Pour que de la matière ait tant de pouvoir, il faut qu'elle contienne un esprit. L'âme des Dieux est attachée à ses images ...

Ceux qui ont la beauté des apparences peuvent séduire. Mais les autres ... qui sont abjects ou terribles, comment y croire ?...

Et il voit passer à ras du sol des feuilles, des pierres, des coquilles, des branches d'arbres, de vagues représentations d'animaux, puis des espèces de nains hydropiques ; ce sont des Dieux. Il éclate de rire.

Un autre rire part derrière lui ; et Hilarion se présente — habillé en ermite, beaucoup plus grand que tout à l'heure, colossal.

ANTOINE

n'est pas surpris de le revoir.

Qu'il faut être bête pour adorer cela !

HILARION

Oh ! oui, extrêmement bête !

Alors défilent devant eux, des idoles de toutes les nations et de tous les âges, en bois, en métal, en granit, en plumes, en peaux cousues.

Les plus vieilles, antérieures au Déluge, disparaissent sous des goëmons qui pendent comme des crinières. Quelques-unes, trop longues pour leur base, craquent dans leurs jointures et se cassent les reins en marchant.

D'autres laissent couler du sable par les trous de leurs ventres.

Antoine et Hilarion s'amuse énormément. Ils se tiennent les côtes à force de rire.

Ensuite, passent des idoles à profil de mouton. Elles titubent sur leurs jambes cagneuses, entr'ouvrent leurs paupières et bégayent comme des muets : « Bâ ! bâ ! bâ ! »

A mesure qu'elles se rapprochent du type humain, elles irritent Antoine davantage. Il les frappe à coups de poing, à coups de pied, s'acharne dessus.

Elles deviennent effroyables — avec de hauts panaches, des yeux en boules, les bras terminés par des griffes, des mâchoires de requin.

Et devant ces Dieux, on égorge des hommes sur des autels de pierre ; d'autres sont broyés dans des cuves, écrasés sous des chariots, cloués dans des arbres. Il y en a un, tout en fer rougi et à cornes de taureau, qui dévore des enfants.

ANTOINE

Horreur !

HILARION

Mais les Dieux réclament toujours des supplices. Le tien même a voulu ...

ANTOINE

pleurant :

Oh ! n'achève pas, tais-toi !

L'enceinte des roches se change en une vallée. Un troupeau de boeufs y pâture l'herbe rase.

Le pasteur qui les conduit observe un nuage ; — et jette dans l'air, d'une voix aiguë, des paroles impératives.

HILARION

Comme il a besoin de pluie, il tâche, par des chants, de contraindre le roi du ciel à ouvrir la nuée féconde.

ANTOINE

en riant :

Voilà un orgueil trop niais !

HILARION

Pourquoi fais-tu des exorcismes ?

La vallée devient une mer de lait, immobile et sans bornes.

Au milieu flotte un long berceau, composé par les enroulements d'un serpent dont toutes les têtes, s'inclinant à la fois, ombragent un dieu endormi sur son corps.

Il est jeune, imberbe, plus beau qu'une fille et couvert de voiles diaphanes. Les perles de sa tiare brillent doucement comme des lunes, un chapelet d'étoiles fait plusieurs tours sur sa poitrine ; — et une main sous la tête, l'autre bras étendu, il repose, d'un air songeur et enivré.

Une femme accroupie devant ses pieds attend qu'il se réveille.

HILARION

C'est la dualité primordiale des Brakhmanes, — l'Absolu ne s'exprimant par aucune forme.

Sur le nombril du Dieu une tige de lotus a poussé ; et, dans son calice, paraît un autre Dieu à trois visages.

ANTOINE

Tiens, quelle invention !

HILARION

Père, Fils et Saint-Esprit ne font de même qu'une seule personne !

Les trois têtes s'écartent, et trois grands Dieux paraissent.

Le premier, qui est rose, mord le bout de son orteil.

Le second, qui est bleu, agite quatre bras.

Le troisième, qui est vert, porte un collier de crânes humains.

En face d'eux, immédiatement surgissent trois Déesses, l'une enveloppée d'un réseau, l'autre offrant une coupe, la dernière brandissant un arc.

Et ces Dieux, ces Déesses se décuplent, se multiplient. Sur leurs épaules poussent des bras, au bout de leurs bras des mains tenant des étendards, des haches, des boucliers, des épées, des parasols et des tambours. Des fontaines jaillissent de leurs têtes, des herbes descendent de leurs narines.

A cheval sur des oiseaux, bercés dans des palanquins, trônant sur des sièges d'or, debout dans des niches d'ivoire, ils songent, voyagent, commandent, boivent du vin, respirent des fleurs. Des danseuses tournoient, des géants poursuivent des monstres ; à l'entrée des grottes des solitaires méditent. On ne distingue pas les prunelles des étoiles, les nuages des banderoles ; des paons s'abreuvent à des ruisseaux de poudre d'or, la broderie des pavillons se mêle aux taches des léopards, des rayons colorés s'entre-croisent sur l'air bleu, avec des flèches qui volent et des encensoirs qu'on balance.

Et tout cela se développe comme une haute frise — appuyant sa base sur les rochers, et montant jusque dans le ciel.

ANTOINE

ébloui :

Quelle quantité ! que veulent-ils ?

HILARION

Celui qui gratte son abdomen avec sa trompe d'éléphant, c'est le Dieu solaire, l'inspirateur de la sagesse.

Cet autre, dont les six têtes portent des tours et les quatorze bras des javelots, c'est le prince des armées, le Feu-dévorateur.

Le vieillard chevauchant un crocodile va laver sur le rivage les âmes des morts. Elles seront tourmentées par cette femme noire aux dents pourries, dominatrice des enfers.

Le chariot tiré par des cavales rouges, que conduit un cocher qui n'a pas de jambes, promène en plein azur le maître du soleil. Le Dieu-lune l'accompagne, dans une litière attelée de trois gazelles.

A genoux sur le dos d'un perroquet, la déesse de la Beauté présente à l'Amour, son fils, sa mamelle ronde. La voici plus loin, qui saute de joie dans les prairies. Regarde ! regarde ! Coiffée d'une mitre éblouissante, elle court sur les blés, sur les flots, monte dans l'air, s'étale partout !

Entre ces Dieux siègent les Génies des vents, des planètes, des mois, des jours, cent mille autres ! et leurs aspects sont multiples, leurs transformations rapides. En voilà un qui de poisson devient tortue ; il prend la hure d'un sanglier, la taille d'un nain.

ANTOINE

Pour quoi faire ?

HILARION

Pour rétablir l'équilibre, pour combattre le mal. Mais la vie s'épuise, les formes s'usent ; et il leur faut progresser dans les métamorphoses.

Tout à coup paraît

UN HOMME NU

assis au milieu du sable, les jambes croisées.

Un large halo vibre, suspendu derrière lui. Les petites boucles de ses cheveux noirs, et à reflets d'azur, contournent symétriquement une protubérance au haut de son crâne. Ses bras, très-longs, descendent droits contre ses flancs. Ses deux mains, les paumes ouvertes, reposent à plat sur ses cuisses. Le dessous de ses pieds offre l'image de deux soleils ; et il reste complètement immobile — en face d'Antoine et d'Hilarion, — avec tous les Dieux à l'entour, échelonnés sur les roches comme sur les gradins d'un cirque.

Ses lèvres s'entrouvrent ; et d'une voix profonde :

Je suis le maître de la grande aumône, le secours des créatures, et aux croyants comme aux profanes j'expose la loi.

Pour délivrer le monde, j'ai voulu naître parmi les hommes. Les Dieux pleuraient quand je suis parti.

J'ai d'abord cherché une femme comme il convient : de race militaire, épouse d'un roi, très-bonne, extrêmement belle, le nombril profond, le corps ferme comme du diamant ; et au temps de la pleine lune, sans l'auxiliaire d'aucun mâle, je suis entré dans son ventre.

J'en suis sorti par le flanc droit. Des étoiles s'arrêtèrent.

HILARION

murmure entre ses dents :

« Et quand ils virent l'étoile s'arrêter, ils conçurent un grande joie ! »

Antoine regarde plus attentivement

LE BUDDHA

qui reprend :

Du fond de l'Himalaya, un religieux centenaire accourut pour me voir.

HILARION

« Un homme appelé Siméon, qui ne devait pas mourir avant d'avoir vu le Christ ! »

LE BUDDHA

On m'a mené dans les écoles. J'en savais plus que les docteurs.

HILARION

«...Au milieu des docteurs ; et tous ceux qui l'entendaient étaient ravis de sa sagesse. »

Antoine fait signe à Hilarion de se taire.

LE BUDDHA

Continuellement, j'étais à méditer dans les jardins. Les ombres des arbres tournaient ; mais l'ombre de celui qui m'abritait ne tournait pas.

Aucun ne pouvait m'égaler dans la connaissance des écritures, l'énumération des atomes, la conduite des éléphants, les ouvrages de cire, l'astronomie, la poésie, le pugilat, tous les exercices et tous les arts !

Pour me conformer à l'usage, j'ai pris une épouse ; — et je passais les jours dans mon palais de roi, vêtu de perles, sous la pluie des parfums, éventé par les chasse-mouches de trente-trois mille femmes, regardant mes peuples du haut de mes terrasses, ornées de clochettes retentissantes.

Mais la vue des misères du monde me détournait des plaisirs. J'ai fui.

J'ai mendié sur les routes, couvert de haillons ramassés dans les sépulcres ; et comme il y avait un ermite très-savant, j'ai voulu devenir son esclave ; je gardais sa porte, je lavais ses pieds.

Toute sensation fut anéantie, toute joie, toute langueur.

Puis, concentrant ma pensée dans une méditation plus large, je connus l'essence des choses, l'illusion des formes.

J'ai vidé promptement la science des Brahmanes. Ils sont rongés de convoitises sous leurs apparences austères, se frottent d'ordures, couchent sur des épines, croyant arriver au bonheur par la voie de la mort !

HILARION

« Pharisiens, hypocrites, sépulcres blanchis, race de vipères ! »

LE BUDDHA

Moi aussi, j'ai fait des choses étonnantes — ne mangeant par jour qu'un seul grain de riz, et les grains de riz dans ce temps-là n'étaient pas plus gros qu'à présent ; — mes poils tombèrent, mon corps devint noir ; mes yeux rentrés dans les orbites semblaient des étoiles aperçues au fond d'un puits.

Pendant six ans, je me suis tenu immobile, exposé aux mouches, aux lions et aux serpents ; et les grands soleils, les grandes ondées, la neige, la foudre, la grêle et la tempête, je recevais tout cela, sans m'abriter même avec la main.

Les voyageurs qui passaient, me croyant mort, me jetaient de loin des mottes de terre !

La tentation du Diable me manquait.

Je l'ai appelé.

Ses fils sont venus, — hideux, couverts d'écaillés, nauséabonds comme des charniers, hurlant, sifflant, beuglant, entre-choquant des armures et des os de mort. Quelques-uns crachent des flammes par les naseaux, quelques-uns font des ténèbres avec leurs ailes, quelques-uns portent des chapelets de doigts coupés, quelques-uns boivent du venin de serpent dans le creux de leurs mains ; ils ont des têtes de porc, de rhinocéros ou de crapaud, toutes sortes de figures inspirant le dégoût ou la terreur.

ANTOINE

à part :

J'ai enduré cela, autrefois !

LE BUDDHA

Puis il m'envoya ses filles — belles, bien fardées, avec des ceintures d'or, les dents blanches comme le jasmin, les cuisses rondes comme la trompe de l'éléphant. Quelques-unes étendent les bras en bâillant, pour montrer les fossettes de leurs coudes ; quelques-unes clignent les yeux, quelques-unes se mettent à rire, quelques-unes entr'ouvrent leurs vêtements. Il y a des vierges rougissantes, des matrones pleines d'orgueil, des reines avec une grande suite de bagages et d'esclaves.

ANTOINE

à part :

Ah ! lui aussi ?

LE BUDDHA

Ayant vaincu le démon, j'ai passé douze ans à me nourrir exclusivement de parfums ; — et comme j'avais acquis les cinq vertus, les cinq facultés, les dix forces, les dix-huit substances, et pénétré dans les quatre sphères du monde invisible, l'Intelligence fut à moi ! Je devins le Buddha !

Tous les Dieux s'inclinent ; ceux qui ont plusieurs têtes les baissent à la fois.

Il lève dans l'air sa haute main et reprend :

En vue de la délivrance des êtres, j'ai fait des centaines de mille de sacrifices ! J'ai donné aux pauvres des robes de soie, des lits, des chars, des maisons, des tas d'or et des diamants. J'ai donné mes mains aux manchots, mes jambes aux boiteux, mes prunelles aux aveugles ; j'ai coupé ma tête pour les décapités. Au temps que j'étais roi, j'ai distribué des provinces ; au temps que j'étais brahmane, je n'ai méprisé personne. Quand j'étais un solitaire, j'ai dit des paroles tendres au voleur qui m'égorgea. Quand j'étais un tigre, je me suis laissé mourir de faim.

Et dans cette dernière existence, ayant prêché la loi, je n'ai plus rien à faire. La grande période est accomplie ! Les hommes, les animaux, les Dieux, les bambous, les océans, les montagnes, les grains de sable des Ganges avec les myriades de myriades d'étoiles, tout va mourir ; — et, jusqu'à des naissances nouvelles, une flamme dansera sur les ruines des mondes détruits !

Alors un vertige prend les Dieux. Ils chancellent, tombent en convulsions, et vomissent leurs existences. Leurs couronnes éclatent, leurs étendards s'envolent. Ils arrachent leurs attributs, leurs sexes, lancent par dessus l'épaule les coupes où ils buvaient l'immortalité, s'étranglent avec leurs serpents, s'évanouissent en fumée ; — et quand tout a disparu ...

HILARION

lentement :

Tu viens de voir la croyance de plusieurs centaines de millions d'hommes !

Antoine est par terre, la figure dans ses mains. Debout près de lui, et tournant le dos à la croix, Hilarion le regarde.

Un assez long temps s'écoule.

Ensuite, paraît un être singulier, ayant une tête d'homme sur un corps de poisson. Il s'avance droit dans l'air, en battant le sable de sa queue ; — et cette figure de patriarche avec de petits bras fait rire

Antoine.

OANNÈS

d'une voix plaintive :

Respecte-moi ! Je suis le contemporain des origines.

J'ai habité le monde informe où sommeillaient des bêtes hermaphrodites, sous le poids d'une atmosphère opaque, dans la profondeur des ondes ténébreuses, — quand les doigts, les nageoires et les ailes étaient confondus, et que des yeux sans tête flottaient comme des mollusques, parmi des taureaux à face humaine et des serpents à pattes de chien.

Sur l'ensemble de ces êtres, Omorôca, pliée comme un cerceau, étendait son corps de femme. Mais Bélus la coupa net en deux moitiés, fit la terre avec l'une, le ciel avec l'autre ; et les deux mondes pareils se contemplent mutuellement.

Moi, la première conscience du Chaos, j'ai surgi de l'abîme pour durcir la matière, pour régler les formes ; et j'ai appris aux humains la pêche, les semailles, l'écriture et l'histoire des Dieux.

Depuis lors, je vis dans les étangs qui restent du Déluge. Mais le désert s'agrandit autour d'eux, le vent y jette du sable, le soleil les dévore ; — et je meurs sur ma couche de limon, en regardant les étoiles à travers l'eau. J'y retourne.

Il saute, et disparaît dans le Nil.

HILARION

C'est un ancien Dieu des Chaldéens !

ANTOINE

ironiquement :

Qu'étaient donc ceux de Babylone ?

HILARION

Tu peux les voir !

Et ils se trouvent sur la plate-forme d'une tour quadrangulaire dominant six autres tours qui, plus étroites à mesure qu'elles s'élèvent, forment une monstrueuse pyramide. On distingue en bas une grande masse noire, — la ville sans doute, — étalée dans les plaines. L'air est froid, le ciel d'un bleu sombre ; des étoiles en quantité palpitent.

Au milieu de la plate-forme, se dresse une colonne de pierre blanche. Des prêtres en robes de lin passent et reviennent tout autour, de manière à décrire par leurs évolutions un cercle en mouvement ; et, la tête levée, ils contemplent les astres.

HILARION

en désigne plusieurs à saint Antoine.

Il y en a trente principaux. Quinze regardent le dessus de la terre, quinze le dessous. A des intervalles réguliers, un d'eux s'élance des régions supérieures vers celles d'en bas, tandis qu'un autre abandonne les inférieures pour monter vers les sublimes.

Des sept planètes, deux sont bienfaisantes, deux mauvaises, trois ambigües ; tout dépend, dans le monde, de ces feux éternels. D'après leur position et leur mouvement on peut tirer des présages ; — et tu foules l'endroit le plus respectable de la terre. Pythagore et Zoroastre s'y sont rencontrés. Voilà douze mille ans que ces hommes observent le ciel, pour mieux connaître les Dieux.

ANTOINE

Les astres ne sont pas Dieux.

HILARION

Oui ! disent-ils ; car les choses passent autour de nous ; le ciel, comme l'éternité, reste immuable !

ANTOINE

Il a un maître, pourtant.

HILARION

montrant la colonne :

Celui-là, Bélus, le premier rayon, le Soleil, le Mâle ! — L'Autre, qu'il féconde, est sous lui !

Antoine aperçoit un jardin, éclairé par des lampes.

Il est au milieu de la foule, dans une avenue de cyprès. A droite et à gauche, des petits chemins conduisent vers des cabanes établies dans un bois de grenadiers, que défendent des treillages de roseaux.

Les hommes, pour la plupart, ont des bonnets pointus avec des robes chamarrées comme le plumage des paons. Il y a des gens du nord vêtus de peaux d'ours, des nomades en manteau de laine brune, de pâles Gangarides à longues boucles d'oreilles ; et les rangs comme les nations paraissent confondus, car des matelots et des tailleurs de pierres coudoient des princes portant des tiaras d'escarboucles avec de hautes cannes à pomme ciselée. Tous marchent en dilutant les narines, recueillis dans le même désir.

De temps à autre, ils se dérangent pour donner passage à un long chariot couvert, traîné par des boeufs ; ou bien c'est un âne, secouant sur son dos une femme empaquetée de voiles, et qui disparaît aussi vers les cabanes.

Antoine a peur ; il voudrait revenir en arrière. Cependant une curiosité inexprimable l'entraîne.

Au pied des cyprès, des femmes sont accroupies en ligne sur des peaux de cerf, toutes ayant pour diadème une tresse de cordes. Quelques-unes, magnifiquement habillées, appellent à haute voix les passants. De plus timides cachent leur figure sous leur bras, tandis que par derrière, une matrone, leur mère sans doute, les exhorte. D'autres, la tête enveloppée d'un châle noir et le corps entièrement nu, semblent de loin des statues de chair. Dès qu'un homme leur a jeté de l'argent sur les genoux, elles se lèvent.

Et on entend des baisers sous les feuillages, — quelquefois un grand cri aigu.

HILARION

Ce sont les vierges de Babylone qui se prostituent à la Déesse.

ANTOINE

Quelle déesse ?

HILARION

La voilà !

Et il lui fait voir, tout au fond de l'avenue, sur le seuil d'une grotte illuminée, un bloc de pierre représentant l'organe sexuel d'une femme.

ANTOINE

Ignominie ! quelle abomination de donner un sexe à Dieu !

HILARION

Tu l'imagines bien comme une personne vivante !

Antoine se retrouve dans les ténèbres.

Il aperçoit, en l'air, un cercle lumineux, posé sur des ailes horizontales.

Cette espèce d'anneau entoure, comme une ceinture trop lâche, la taille d'un petit homme coiffé d'une mitre, portant une couronne à sa main, et tout la partie inférieure du corps disparaît sous de grandes plumes étalées en jupon.

C'est

ORMUZ

le dieu des Perses.

Il voltige en criant :

J'ai peur ! J'entrevois sa gueule.

Je t'avais vaincu, Ahriman ! Mais tu recommences !

D'abord, te révoltant contre moi, tu as fait périr l'aîné des créatures Kaiomortz, l'homme-Taureau. Puis tu as séduit le premier couple humain,

Meschia et Meschiané ; et tu as répandu les ténèbres dans les coeurs, tu as poussé vers le ciel tes bataillons.

J'avais les miens, le peuple des étoiles ; et je contemplais au-dessous de mon trône tous les astres échelonnés.

Mithra, mon fils, habitait un lieu inaccessible. Il y recevait les âmes, les en faisait sortir, et se levait chaque matin pour épandre sa richesse.

La splendeur du firmament était reflétée par la terre. Le feu brillait sur les montagnes, — image de l'autre feu dont j'avais créé tous les êtres. Pour le garantir des souillures, on ne brûlait pas les morts. Le bec des oiseaux les emportait vers le ciel.

J'avais réglé les pâturages, les labours, le bois du sacrifice, la forme des coupes, les paroles qu'il faut dire dans l'insomnie ; — et mes prêtres étaient continuellement en prières, afin que l'hommage eût l'éternité du Dieu. On se purifiait avec de l'eau, on offrait des pains sur les autels, on confessait à haute voix ses crimes.

Homa se donnait à boire aux hommes, pour leur communiquer sa force.

Pendant que les génies du ciel combattaient les démons, les enfants d'Iran poursuivaient les serpents. Le Roi, qu'une cour innombrable servait à genoux, figurait ma personne, portait ma coiffure. Ses jardins avaient la magnificence d'une terre céleste ; et son tombeau le représentait égorgeant un monstre, — emblème du Bien qui extermine le Mal.

Car je devais un jour, grâce au temps sans bornes, vaincre définitivement Ahriman.

Mais l'intervalle entre nous deux disparaît ; la nuit monte ! A moi, les Amschaspands, les Izeds, les Ferouers ! Au secours Mithra ! prends ton épée ! Caosyac, qui doit revenir, pour la délivrance universelle, défends-moi ! Comment ?... Personne !

Ah ! je meurs ! Ahriman, tu es le maître !

Hilarion, derrière Antoine, retient un cri de joie — et Ormuz plonge dans les ténèbres.

Alors paraît

LA GRANDE DIANE D'ÉPHÈSE

noire avec des yeux d'émail, les coudes aux flancs, les avant-bras écartés, les mains ouvertes.

Des lions rampent sur ses épaules ; des fruits, des fleurs et des étoiles s'entre-croisent sur sa poitrine ; plus bas se développent trois rangées de mamelles ; et depuis le ventre jusqu'aux pieds, elle est prise dans une gaine étroite d'où s'élancent à mi-corps des taureaux, des cerfs, des griffons et des abeilles. — On l'aperçoit à la blanche lueur que fait un disque d'argent, rond comme la pleine lune, posé derrière sa tête.

Où est mon temple ?

Où sont mes amazones ?

Qu'ai-je donc ... moi l'incorrupible, voilà qu'une défaillance me prend !

Ses fleurs se fanent. Ses fruits trop mûrs se détachent. Les lions, les taureaux penchent leur cou ; les cerfs bavent épuisés ; les abeilles, en bourdonnant, meurent par terre.

Elle presse, l'une après l'autre, ses mamelles. Toutes sont vides ! Mais sous un effort désespéré sa gaine éclate. Elle la saisit par le bas, comme le pan d'une robe, y jette ses animaux, ses floraisons, — puis rentre dans l'obscurité.

Et au loin, des voix murmurent, grondent, rugissent, brament et beuglent. L'épaisseur de la nuit est augmentée par des haleines. Les gouttes d'une pluie chaude tombent.

ANTOINE

Comme c'est bon, le parfum des palmiers, le fréuissement des feuilles vertes, la transparence des sources ! Je voudrais me coucher tout à plat sur la terre pour la sentir contre mon coeur ; et ma vie se retremperait dans sa jeunesse éternelle !

Il entend un bruit de castagnettes et de cymbales ; — et, au milieu d'une foule rustique, des hommes, vêtus de tuniques blanches à bandes rouges, amènent un âne, enharnaché richement, la queue ornée de rubans, les sabots peints.

Une boîte, couverte d'une housse en toile jaune, ballotte sur son dos entre deux corbeilles ; l'une reçoit les offrandes qu'on y place : oeufs, raisins, poires et fromages, volailles, petites monnaies ; et la seconde est pleine de roses, que les conducteurs de l'âne effeuillent devant lui, tout en marchant.

Ils ont des pendants d'oreilles, de grands manteaux, les cheveux nattés, les joues fardées ; une couronne d'olivier se ferme sur leur front par un médaillon à figurine ; des poignards sont passés dans leur ceinture ; et ils secouent des fouets à manche d'ébène, ayant trois lanières garnies d'osselets.

Les derniers du cortège posent sur le sol, droit comme un candélabre, un grand pin qui brûle par le sommet, et dont les rameaux les plus bas ombragent un petit mouton.

L'âne s'est arrêté. On retire la housse. Il y a, en dessous, une seconde enveloppe de feutre noir. Alors, un des hommes à tunique blanche se met à danser, en jouant des crotales ; un autre à genoux devant la boîte bat du tambourin, et commence :

LE PLUS VIEUX DE LA TROUPE

Voici la Bonne-Déesse, l'idéenne des montagnes, la grande-mère de Syrie !

Approchez, braves gens !

Elle procure la joie, guérit les malades, envoie des héritages, et satisfait les amoureux.

C'est nous qui la promenons dans les campagnes par beau et mauvais temps.

Souvent nous couchons en plein air, et nous n'avons pas tous les jours de table bien servie. Les voleurs habitent les bois. Les bêtes s'élancent de leurs cavernes. Des chemins glissants bordent les précipices. La voilà ! la voilà !

Ils enlèvent la couverture ; et on voit une boîte, incrustée de petits cailloux.

Plus haute que les cèdres, elle plane dans l'éther bleu. Plus vaste que le vent elle entoure le monde. Sa respiration s'exhale par les naseaux des tigres ; sa voix gronde sous les volcans, sa colère est la tempête ; la pâleur de sa figure a blanchi la lune.

Elle mûrit les moissons, elle gonfle les écorces, elle fait pousser la barbe. Donnez-lui quelque chose, car elle déteste les avares !

La boîte s'entr'ouvre ; et on distingue, sous un pavillon de soie bleue, une petite image de Cybèle — étincelante de paillettes, couronnée de tours et assise dans un char de pierre rouge, traîné par deux lions la patte levée.

La foule se pousse pour voir.

L'ARCHI-GALLE

continue :

Elle aime le retentissement des tympanons, le trépignement des pieds, le hurlement des loups, les montagnes sonores et les gorges profondes, la fleur de l'amandier, la grenade et les figues vertes, la danse qui tourne, les flûtes qui ronflent, la sève sucrée, la larme salée, — du sang ! A toi ! à toi, Mère des montagnes !

Ils se flagellent avec leurs fouets, et les coups résonnent sur leur poitrine ; la peau des tambourins vibre à éclater. Ils prennent leurs couteaux, se tailladent les bras.

Elle est triste ; soyons tristes ! C'est pour lui plaire qu'il faut souffrir ! Par là, vos péchés vous seront remis. Le sang lave tout ; jetez-en les gouttes, comme des fleurs ! Elle demande celui d'un autre — d'un pur !

L'archi-galle lève son couteau sur le mouton.

ANTOINE

pris d'horreur :

N'égorgez pas l'agneau !

Un flot de pourpre jaillit.

Le prêtre en asperge la foule ; et tous, — y compris Antoine et Hilarion, — rangés autour de l'arbre qui brûle, observent en silence les dernières palpitations de la victime.

Du milieu des prêtres sort Une Femme, — exactement pareille à l'image enfermée dans la petite boîte.

Elle s'arrête, en apercevant Un Jeune Homme coiffé d'un bonnet phrygien.

Ses cuisses sont revêtues d'un pantalon étroit, ouvert çà et là par des losanges réguliers que ferment des noeuds de couleur. Il s'appuie du coude contre une des branches de l'arbre, en tenant une flûte à la main, dans une pose langoureuse.

CYBÈLE

lui entourant la taille de ses deux bras :

Pour te rejoindre, j'ai parcouru toutes les régions — et la famine ravageait les campagnes. Tu m'as trompée ! N'importe, je t'aime ! Réchauffe mon corps ! unissons-nous !

ATYS

Le printemps ne reviendra plus, ô Mère éternelle ! Malgré mon amour, il ne m'est pas possible de pénétrer ton essence. Je voudrais me couvrir d'une robe peinte, comme la tienne. J'envie tes seins gonflés de lait, la longueur de tes cheveux, tes vastes flancs d'où sortent les êtres. Que ne suis-je toi ! que ne suis-je femme ! — Non, jamais ! va-t'en ! Ma virilité me fait horreur !

Avec une pierre tranchante il s'émascule, puis se met à courir furieux, en levant dans l'air son membre coupé.

Les prêtres font comme le dieu, les fidèles comme les prêtres. Hommes et femmes échangent leurs vêtements, s'embrassent ; — et ce tourbillon de chairs ensanglantées s'éloigne, tandis que les voix, durant toujours, deviennent plus criardes et stridentes comme celles qu'on entend aux funérailles.

Un grand catafalque tendu de pourpre, porte à son sommet un lit d'ébène, qu'entourent des flambeaux et des corbeilles en filigranes d'argent, où verdoient des laitues, des mauves et du fenouil. Sur les gradins, du haut en bas, des femmes sont assises, toutes habillées de noir, la ceinture défaite, les pieds nus, en tenant d'un air mélancolique de gros bouquets de fleurs.

Par terre, aux coins de l'estrade, des urnes en albâtre pleines de myrrhe fument, lentement.

On distingue sur le lit le cadavre d'un homme. Du sang coule de sa cuisse. Il laisse pendre son bras ; — et un chien, qui hurle, lèche ses ongles.

La ligne des flambeaux trop pressés empêche de voir sa figure ; et Antoine est saisi par une angoisse. Il a peur de reconnaître quelqu'un.

Les sanglots des femmes s'arrêtent ; et après un intervalle de silence,

TOUTES

à la fois psalmodient :

Beau ! beau ! il est beau ! Assez dormi, lève la tête ! Debout !

Respire nos bouquets ! ce sont des narcisses et des anémones, cueillis dans tes jardins pour te plaire. Ranime-toi, tu nous fais peur !

Parle ! Que te faut-il ? Veux-tu boire du vin ? veux-tu coucher dans nos lits ? veux-tu manger des pains de miel qui ont la forme de petits oiseaux ?

Pressons ses hanches, baisons sa poitrine ! Tiens ! tiens ! les sens-tu nos doigts chargés de bagues qui courent sur ton corps, et nos lèvres qui cherchent ta bouche, et nos cheveux qui balayent tes cuisses, Dieu pâmé, sourd à nos prières !

Elles lancent des cris, en se déchirant le visage avec les ongles, puis se taisent ; — et on entend toujours les hurlements du chien.

Hélas ! hélas ! Le sang noir coule sur sa chair neigeuse ! Voilà ses genoux qui se tordent ; ses côtes s'enfoncent. Les fleurs de son visage ont mouillé la pourpre. Il est mort ! Pleurons ! Désolons-nous !

Elles viennent, toutes à la file, déposer entre les flambeaux leurs longues chevelures, pareilles de loin à des serpents noirs ou blonds ; — et le catafalque s'abaisse doucement jusqu'au niveau d'une grotte, un sépulcre ténébreux qui bâille par derrière.

Alors

UNE FEMME

s'incline sur le cadavre.

Ses cheveux, qu'elle n'a pas coupés, l'enveloppent de la tête aux talons. Elle verse tant de larmes que sa douleur ne doit pas être comme celle des autres, mais plus qu'humaine, infinie.

Antoine songe à la mère de Jésus.

Elle dit :

Tu t'échappais de l'Orient ; et tu me prenais dans tes bras toute frémissante de rosée, ô Soleil ! Des colombes voletaient sur l'azur de ton manteau, nos baisers faisaient des brises dans les feuillages ; et je m'abandonnais à ton amour, en jouissant du plaisir de ma faiblesse.

Hélas ! hélas ! Pourquoi allais-tu courir sur les montagnes ?

A l'équinoxe d'automne un sanglier t'a blessé !

Tu es mort ; et les fontaines pleurent, les arbres se penchent. Le vent d'hiver siffle dans les broussailles nues.

Mes yeux vont se clore, puisque les ténèbres te couvrent. Maintenant, tu habites l'autre côté du monde, près de ma rivale plus puissante.

O Perséphone, tout ce qui est beau descend vers toi, et n'en revient plus !

Pendant qu'elle parlait, ses compagnes ont pris le mort pour le descendre au sépulcre. Il leur reste dans les mains. Ce n'était qu'un cadavre de cire.

Antoine en éprouve comme un soulagement.

Tout s'évanouit ; — et la cabane, les rochers, la croix sont reparus.

Cependant il distingue de l'autre côté du Nil, Une Femme — debout au milieu du désert.

Elle garde dans sa main le bas d'un long voile noir qui lui cache la figure, tout en portant sur le bras gauche un petit enfant qu'elle allaite. A son côté, un grand singe est accroupi sur le sable.

Elle lève la tête vers le ciel, — et malgré la distance on entend sa voix.

ISIS

O Neith, commencement des choses ! Ammon, seigneur de l'éternité, Ptha, démiurge, Thoth son intelligence, dieux de l'Amenthi, triades particulières des Nomes, éperviers dans l'azur, sphinx au bord des temples, ibis debout entre les cornes des boeufs, planètes, constellations, rivages, murmures du vent, reflets de la lumière, apprenez-moi où se trouve Osiris !

Je l'ai cherché par tous les canaux et tous les lacs, — plus loin encore, jusqu'à Byblos la phénicienne. Anubis, les oreilles droites, bondissait autour de moi, jappant, et fouillant de son museau les touffes des tamarins. Merci, bon Cynocéphale, merci !

Elle donne au singe, amicalement, deux ou trois petites claques sur la tête.

Le hideux Typhon au poil roux l'avait tué, mis en pièces ! Nous avons retrouvé tous ses membres. Mais je n'ai pas celui qui me rendait féconde !

Elle pousse des lamentations aiguës.

ANTOINE

est pris de foreur. Il lui jette des cailloux, en l'injuriant.

Impudique ! va-t'en, va-t'en !

HILARION

Respecte-la ! C'était la religion de tes aïeux ! tu as porté ses amulettes dans ton berceau.

ISIS

Autrefois, quand revenait l'été, l'inondation chassait vers le désert les bêtes impures. Les digues s'ouvraient, les barques s'entre-choquaient, la terre haletante buvait le fleuve avec ivresse. Dieu à cornes de taureau tu t'étais sur ma poitrine — et on entendait le mugissement de la vache éternelle !

Les semailles, les récoltes, le battage des grains et les vendanges se succédaient régulièrement, d'après l'alternance des saisons. Dans les nuits toujours pures, de larges étoiles rayonnaient. Les jours étaient baignés d'une invariable splendeur. On voyait, comme un couple royal, le Soleil et la Lune à chaque côté de l'horizon.

Nous trônions tous les deux dans un monde plus sublime, monarques-jumeaux, époux dès le sein de l'éternité, — lui, tenant un sceptre à tête de concoupha, moi un sceptre à fleur de lotus, debout l'un et l'autre, les mains jointes ; — et les écroulements d'empire ne changeaient pas notre attitude.

L'Égypte s'étalait sous nous, monumentale et sérieuse, longue comme le corridor d'un temple, avec des obélisques à droite, des pyramides à gauche, son labyrinthe au milieu, — et partout des avenues de monstres, des forêts de colonnes, de lourds pylônes flanquant des portes qui ont à leur sommet le globe de la terre entre deux ailes.

Les animaux de son zodiaque se retrouvaient dans ses pâturages, emplissaient de leurs formes et de leurs couleurs son écriture mystérieuse. Divisée en douze régions comme l'année l'est en douze mois, — chaque mois, chaque jour ayant son dieu, — elle reproduisait l'ordre immuable du ciel ; et l'homme en expirant ne perdait pas sa figure ; mais, saturé de parfums, devenu indestructible, il allait dormir pendant trois mille ans dans une Égypte silencieuse.

Celle-là, plus grande que l'autre, s'étendait sous la terre.

On y descendait par des escaliers conduisant à des salles où étaient reproduites les joies des bons, les tortures des méchants, tout ce qui a lieu dans le troisième monde invisible. Rangés le long des murs, les morts dans des cercueils peints attendaient leur tour ; et l'âme exempte des migrations continuait son assoupissement jusqu'au réveil d'une autre vie.

Osiris, cependant, revenait me voir quelquefois. Son ombre m'a rendu mère d'Harpocrate.

Elle contemple l'enfant.

C'est lui ! Ce sont ses yeux ; ce sont ses cheveux, tressés en cornes de bélier ! Tu recommenceras ses oeuvres. Nous refleurirons comme des lotus. Je suis toujours la grande Isis ! nul encore n'a soulevé mon voile ! Mon fruit est le soleil !

Soleil du printemps, des nuages obscurcissent ta face ! L'haleine de Typhon dévore les pyramides. J'ai vu, tout à l'heure, le sphinx s'enfuir. Il galopait comme un chacal.

Je cherche mes prêtres, — mes prêtres en manteau de lin, avec de grandes harpes, et qui portaient une nacelle mystique, ornée de patères d'argent. Plus de fêtes sur les lacs ! plus d'illuminations dans mon delta ! plus de coupes de lait à Philae ! Apis, depuis longtemps, n'a pas reparu.

Égypte ! Égypte ! tes grands Dieux immobiles ont les épaules blanchies par la fiente des oiseaux, et le vent qui passe sur le désert roule la cendre de tes morts ! — Anubis, gardien des ombres, ne me quitte pas !

Le cynocéphale s'est évanoui.

Elle secoue son enfant.

Mais ... qu'as-tu ?... tes mains sont froides, ta tête retombe !

Harpocrate vient de mourir.

Alors elle pousse dans l'air un cri tellement aigu, funèbre et déchirant, qu'Antoine y répond par un autre cri, en ouvrant ses bras pour la soutenir.

Elle n'est plus là. Il baisse la figure, écrasé de honte.

Tout ce qu'il vient de voir se confond dans son esprit. C'est comme l'étourdissement d'un voyage, le malaise d'une ivresse. Il voudrait haïr, et cependant une pitié vague amollit son coeur. Il se met à pleurer abondamment.

HILARION

Qui donc le rend triste ?

ANTOINE

après avoir cherché en lui-même, longtemps :

Je pense à toutes les âmes perdues par ces faux Dieux !

HILARION

Ne trouves-tu pas qu'ils ont ... quelquefois ... comme des ressemblances avec le vrai ?

ANTOINE

C'est une ruse du Diable pour séduire mieux les fidèles. Il attaque les forts par le moyen de l'esprit, les autres avec la chair.

HILARION

Mais la luxure, dans ses fureurs, a le désintéressement de la pénitence. L'amour frénétique du corps en accélère la destruction, — et proclame par sa faiblesse l'étendue de l'impossible.

ANTOINE

Qu'est-ce que cela me fait à moi ! Mon coeur se soulève de dégoût devant ces Dieux bestiaux, occupés toujours de carnages et d'incestes !

HILARION

Rappelle-toi dans l'Écriture toutes les choses qui te scandalisent, parce que tu ne sais pas les comprendre. De même, ces Dieux, sous leurs formes criminelles, peuvent contenir la vérité.

Il en reste à voir. Détourne-toi !

ANTOINE

Non ! non ! c'est un péril !

HILARION

Tu voulais tout à l'heure les connaître. Est-ce que ta foi vacillerait sous des mensonges ? Que crains-tu ?

Les rochers en face d'Antoine sont devenus une montagne.

Une ligne de nuages la coupe à mi-hauteur ; et au-dessus apparaît une autre montagne, énorme, toute verte, que creusent inégalement des vallons et portant au sommet, dans un bois de lauriers, un palais de bronze à tuiles d'or avec des chapiteaux d'ivoire.

Au milieu du péristyle, sur un trône, JUPITER, colossal et le torse nu, tient la victoire d'une main, la foudre dans l'autre ; et son aigle, entre ses jambes, dresse la tête.

JUNON, auprès de lui, roule ses gros yeux, surmontés d'un diadème d'où s'échappe comme une vapeur un voile flottant au vent.

Par derrière, MINERVE, debout sur un piédestal, s'appuie contre sa lance. La peau de la gorgone lui couvre la poitrine ; et un péplos de lin descend à plis réguliers jusqu'aux ongles de ses orteils. Ses yeux glauques, qui brillent sous sa visière, regardent au loin, attentivement.

A la droite du palais, le vieillard NEPTUNE chevauche un dauphin battant de ses nageoires un grand azur qui est le ciel ou la mer, car la perspective de l'Océan continue l'éther bleu ; les deux éléments se confondent.

De l'autre côté, PLUTON farouche, en manteau couleur de la nuit, avec une tiare de diamants et un sceptre d'ébène, est au milieu d'une île entourée par les circonvolutions du Styx ; — et ce fleuve d'ombre va se jeter dans les ténèbres, qui font sous la falaise un grand trou noir, un abîme sans formes.

MARS, vêtu d'airain, brandit d'un air furieux son bouclier lame et son épée.

HERCULE, plus bas, le contemple, appuyé sur sa massue.

APOLLON, la face rayonnante, conduit, le bras droit allongé, quatre chevaux blancs qui galopent ; et CÉRÈS, dans un chariot que traînent des boeufs, s'avance vers lui une faucille à la main.

BACCHUS vient derrière elle, sur un char très-bas, mollement tiré par des lynx. Gras, imberbe et des pampres au front, il passe en tenant un cratère d'où déborde du vin. Silène, à ses côtés, chancelle sur un âne. Pan aux oreilles pointues souffle dans la syrinx ; les Mimallonéides frappent des tambours, les Ménades jettent des fleurs, les Bacchantes tournoient la tête en arrière, les cheveux répandus.

DIANE, la tunique retroussée, sort du bois avec ses nymphes.

Au fond d'une caverne, VULCAIN bat le fer entre les Cabires ; ça et là les vieux Fleuves, accoudés sur des pierres vertes, épanchent leurs urnes ; les Muses debout chantent dans les vallons.

Les Heures, de taille égale, se tiennent par la main ; et MERCURE est posé obliquement sur un arc-en-ciel, avec son caducée, ses talonnières et son pétase.

Mais en haut de l'escalier des Dieux, parmi des nuages doux comme des plumes et dont les volutes en tournant laissent tomber des roses, VÉNUS-ANADYOMÈNE se regarde dans un miroir ; ses prunelles glissent langoureusement sous ses paupières un peu lourdes.

Elle a de grands cheveux blonds qui se déroulent sur ses épaules, les seins petits, la taille mince, les hanches évasées comme le galbe des lyres, les deux cuisses toutes rondes, des fossettes autour des genoux et les pieds délicats ; non loin de sa bouche un papillon voltige. La splendeur de son corps fait autour d'elle un halo de nacre brillante ; et tout le reste de l'Olympe est baigné dans une aube vermeille, qui gagne insensiblement les hauteurs du ciel bleu.

ANTOINE

Ah ! ma poitrine se dilate. Une joie que je ne connaissais pas me descend jusqu'au fond de l'âme ! Comme c'est beau ! comme c'est beau !

HILARION

Ils se penchaient du haut des nuages pour conduire les épées ; on les rencontrait au bord des chemins, on les possédait dans sa maison ; — et cette familiarité divinisait la vie.

Elle n'avait pour but que d'être libre et belle. Les vêtements larges facilitaient la noblesse des attitudes. La voix de l'orateur, exercée par la mer, battait à flots sonores les portiques de marbre. L'éphèbe, frotté d'huile, luttait tout nu en plein soleil. L'action la plus religieuse était d'exposer des formes pures.

Et ces hommes respectaient les épouses, les vieillards, les suppliants.

Derrière le temple d'Hercule, il y avait un autel à la Pitié.

On immolait des victimes avec des fleurs autour des doigts. Le souvenir même se trouvait exempt de la pourriture des morts. Il n'en restait qu'un peu de cendres. L'âme, mêlée à l'éther sans bornes, était partie vers les Dieux !

Se penchant à l'oreille d'Antoine :

Et ils vivent toujours ! L'empereur Constantin adore Apollon. Tu retrouveras la Trinité dans les mystères de Samothrace, le baptême chez Isis, la rédemption chez Mithra, le martyr d'un Dieu aux fêtes de Bacchus. Proserpine est la Vierge !... Aristée, Jésus !

ANTOINE

reste les yeux baissés ; puis tout à coup il répète le symbole de Jérusalem, — comme il s'en souvient, — en poussant à chaque phrase un long soupir :

Je crois en un seul Dieu, le Père, — et en un seul Seigneur, Jésus-Christ, — fils premier-né de Dieu, — qui s'est incarné et fait homme, — qui a été crucifié — et enseveli, — qui est monté au ciel, — qui viendra pour juger les vivants et les morts — dont le royaume n'aura pas de fin ; — et à un seul Saint-Esprit, — et à un seul baptême de repentance, — et à une seule sainte Église catholique, — et à la résurrection de la chair, — et à la vie éternelle !

Aussitôt la crois grandit, et perçant les nuages elle projette une ombre sur le ciel des Dieux.

Tous pâlisent. L'Olympe a remué.

Antoine distingue contre sa base, à demi perdus dans les cavernes, ou soutenant les pierres de leurs épaules, de vastes corps enchaînés. Ce sont les Titans, les Géants, les Hécatonchires, les Cyclopes.

UNE VOIX

s'élève, indistincte et formidable, — comme la rameur des flots, comme le bruit des bois sous la tempête, comme le mugissement du vent dans les précipices :

Nous savions cela, nous autres ! Les Dieux doivent finir. Uranus fut mutilé par Saturne, Saturne par Jupiter. Il sera lui-même anéanti.

Chacun son tour ; c'est le destin !

et, peu à peu, ils s'enfoncent dans la montagne, disparaissent.

Cependant les tuiles du palais d'or s'envolent.

JUPITER

est descendu de son trône. Le tonnerre, à ses pieds, fume comme un tison près de s'éteindre ; — et l'aigle, allongeant le cou, ramasse avec son bec ses plumes qui tombent.

Je ne suis donc plus le maître des choses, très-bon, très-grand, dieu des phratries et des peuples grecs, aïeul de tous les rois, Agamemnon du ciel !

Aigle des apothéoses, quel souffle de l'Erèbe t'a repoussé jusqu'à moi ? ou, t'envolant du champ de Mars, m'apportes-tu l'âme du dernier des empereurs ?

Je ne veux plus de celles des hommes ! Que la Terre les garde, et qu'ils s'agitent au niveau de sa bassesse. Ils ont maintenant des cœurs d'esclaves, oublient les injures, les ancêtres, le serment ; et partout triomphent la sottise des foules, la médiocrité de l'individu, la hideur des races !

Sa respiration lui soulève les côtes à les briser, et il tord ses poings. Hébé en pleurs lui présente une coupe. Il la saisit.

Non ! non ! Tant qu'il y aura, n'importe où, une tête enfermant la pensée, qui haïsse le désordre et conçoive la Loi, l'esprit de Jupiter vivra !

Mais la coupe est vide.

Il la penche lentement sur l'ongle de son doigt.

Plus une goutte ! Quand l'ambrosie défaille, les Immortels s'en vont !

Elle glisse de ses mains ; et il s'appuie contre une colonne, se sentant mourir.

JUNON

Il ne fallait pas avoir tant d'amours ! Aigle, taureau, cygne, pluie d'or, nuage et flamme, tu as pris toutes les formes, égaré ta lumière dans tous les éléments, perdu tes cheveux sur tous les lits ! Le divorce est irrévocable cette fois, — et notre domination, notre existence dissoute !

Elle s'éloigne dans l'air.

MINERVE

n'a plus sa lance ; et des corbeaux, qui nichaient dans les sculptures de la frise, tournent autour d'elle, mordent son casque.

Laissez-moi voir si mes vaisseaux, fendant la mer brillante, sont revenus dans mes trois ports, pourquoi les campagnes se trouvent désertes, et ce que font maintenant les filles d'Athènes.

Au mois d'Hécatombéon, mon peuple entier se portait vers moi, conduit par ses magistrats et par ses prêtres. Puis s'avançaient en robes blanches avec des chitons d'or, les longues files des vierges tenant des coupes, des corbeilles, des parasols ; puis, les trois cents boeufs du sacrifice, des vieillards agitant des rameaux verts, des soldats entrechoquant leurs armures, des éphèbes chantant des hymnes, des joueurs de flûte, des joueurs de lyre, des rhapsodes, des danseuses ; — enfin, au mât d'une trirème marchant sur des roues, mon grand voile brodé par des vierges, qu'on avait nourries pendant un an d'une façon particulière ; et quand il s'était montré dans toutes les rues, toutes les places et devant tous les temples, au milieu du cortège psalmodiant toujours, il montait pas à pas la colline de l'Acropole, frôlait les Propylées, et entraît au Parthénon.

Mais un trouble me saisit, moi, l'industrielle ! Comment, comment, pas une idée ! Voilà que je tremble plus qu'une femme.

Elle aperçoit une ruine derrière elle, pousse un cri, et frappée au front, tombe par terre à la renverse.

HERCULE

a rejeté sa peau de lion ; et s'appuyant des pieds, bombant son dos, mordant ses lèvres, il fait des efforts démesurés pour soutenir l'Olympe qui s'écroule.

j'ai vaincu les Cercopes, les Amazones et les Centaures. J'ai tué beaucoup de rois. J'ai cassé la corne d'Achéloüs, un grand fleuve. J'ai coupé des montagnes, j'ai réuni des océans. Les pays esclaves, je les délivrais ; les pays vides, je les peuplais. J'ai parcouru les Gaules. J'ai traversé le désert où l'on a soif. J'ai défendu les Dieux, et je me suis dégagé d'Omphale. Mais l'Olympe est trop lourd. Mes bras faiblissent. Je meurs !

Il est écrasé sous les décombres.

PLUTON

C'est ta faute, Amphytrionade ! Pourquoi es-tu descendu dans mon empire ?

Le vautour qui mange les entrailles de Tityos releva la tête, Tantale eut la lèvre mouillée, la roue d'Ixion s'arrêta.

Cependant, les Kères étendaient leurs ongles pour retenir les âmes ; les Furies en désespoir tordaient les serpents de leurs chevelures ; et Cerbère, attaché par toi avec une chaîne, râlait, en bavant de ses trois gueules.

Tu avais laissé la porte entr'ouverte. D'autres sont venus. Le jour des hommes a pénétré le Tartare !

Il sombre dans les ténèbres.

NEPTUNE

Mon trident ne soulève plus de tempêtes. Les monstres qui faisaient peur sont pourris au fond des eaux.

Amphitrite, dont les pieds blancs couraient sur l'écume, les vertes Néréides qu'on distinguait à l'horizon, les Sirènes écailleuses arrêtaient les navires pour conter des histoires, et les vieux Tritons qui soufflaient dans les coquillages, tout est mort ! La gaieté de la mer a disparu !

Je n'y survivrai pas ! Que le vaste Océan me recouvre !

Il s'évanouit dans l'azur.

DIANE

habillée de noir, et au milieu de ses chiens devenus des loups :

L'indépendance des grands bois m'a grisée, avec la senteur des fauves et l'exhalaison des marécages. Les femmes, dont je protégeais les grossesses, mettent au monde des enfants morts. La lune tremble sous l'incantation des sorcières. J'ai des désirs de violence et d'immensité. Je veux boire des poisons, me perdre dans les vapeurs, dans les rêves !...

Et un nuage qui passe l'emporte.

MARS

tête nue, ensanglanté :

D'abord j'ai combattu seul, provoquant par des injures toute une armée, indifférent aux patries et pour le plaisir du carnage.

Puis, j'ai eu des compagnons. Ils marchaient au son des flûtes, en bon ordre, d'un pas égal, respirant par-dessus leurs boucliers, l'aigrette haute, la lance oblique. On se jetait dans la bataille avec de grands cris d'aigle. La guerre était joyeuse comme un festin. Trois cents hommes s'opposèrent à toute l'Asie.

Mais ils reviennent, les Barbares ! et par myriades, par millions ! Puisque le nombre, les machines et la ruse sont plus forts, mieux vaut finir comme un brave !

Il se tue.

VULCAIN

essuyant avec une éponge ses membres en sueur :

Le monde se refroidit. Il faut chauffer les sources, les volcans et les fleuves qui roulent des métaux sous la terre ! — Battez plus dur ! à pleins bras ! de toutes vos forces !

Les Cabires se blessent avec leurs marteaux, s'aveuglent avec les étincelles, et, marchant à tâtons, s'égarent dans l'ombre.

CÉRÈS

debout dans son char, qui est emporté par des roues ayant des ailes à leur moyen :

Arrête ! arrête !

On avait bien raison d'exclure les étrangers, les athées, les épicuriens et les chrétiens ! Le mystère de la corbeille est dévoilé, le sanctuaire profané, tout est perdu !

Elle descend sur une pente rapide, — désespérée, criant, s'arrachant les cheveux.

Ah ! mensonge ! Daïra ne m'est pas rendue ! L'airain m'appelle vers les morts. C'est un autre Tartare ! On n'en revient pas. Horreur !

L'abîme l'engouffre.

BACCHUS

riant, frénétiquement :

Qu'importe ! la femme de l'Archonte est mon épouse ! La loi même tombe en ivresse. A moi le chaut nouveau et les formes multiples !

Le feu qui dévora ma mère coule dans mes veines. Qu'il brûle plus fort, dussé-je périr !

Mâle et femelle, bon pour tous, je me livre à vous, Bacchantes ! je me livre à vous, Bacchants ! et la vigne s'enroulera au tronc des arbres ! Hurlez, dansez, tordez-vous ! Déliez-le tigre et l'esclave ! à dents féroces, mordez la chair !

Et Pan, Silène, les Satyres, les Bacchantes, les Mimallonéides et les Ménades, avec leurs serpents, leurs flambeaux, leurs masques noirs, se jettent des fleurs, découvrent un phallus, la baisent, — secouent les tympanons, frappent leurs tyrses, se lapident avec des coquillages, croquent des raisins, étranglent un bouc, et déchirent Bacchus.

APOLLON

fouettant ses coursiers, et dont les cheveux blanchis s'envolent :

J'ai laissé derrière moi Délos la pierreuse, tellement pure que tout maintenant y semble mort ; et je tâche de joindre Delphes avant que sa vapeur inspiratrice ne soit complètement perdue. Les mulets broutent son laurier. La Pythie égarée ne se retrouve pas.

Par une concentration plus forte, j'aurai des poèmes sublimes, des monuments éternels ; et toute la matière sera pénétrée des vibrations de ma cithare !

Il en pince les cordes. Elles éclatent, lui cinglent la figure. Il la rejette ; et battant son quadriga avec fureur :

Non ! assez des formes ! Plus loin encore ! Tout au sommet ! Dans l'idée pure !

Mais les chevaux, reculant, se cabrent, brisent le char ; et empêtré par les morceaux du timon, l'emmêlement des harnais, il tombe vers l'abîme, la tête en bas.

Le ciel s'est obscurci.

VÉNUS

violacée par le froid, grelotte.

Je faisais avec ma ceinture tout l'horizon de l'Hellénie.

Ses champs brillaient des roses de mes joues, ses rivages étaient découpés d'après la forme de mes lèvres ; et ses montagnes, plus blanches que mes colombes, palpaient sous la main des statuaires. On retrouvait mon âme dans l'ordonnance des fêtes, l'arrangement des coiffures, le dialogue des philosophes, la constitution des républiques.

Mais j'ai trop chéri les hommes ! C'est l'Amour qui m'a déshonorée !

Elle se renverse en pleurant.

Le monde est abominable. L'air manque à ma poitrine !

O Mercure, inventeur de la lyre et conducteur des âmes, emporte-moi !

Elle met un doigt sur sa bouche, et décrivant une immense parabole, tombe dans l'abîme.

On n'y voit plus. Les ténèbres sont complètes.

Cependant il s'échappe des prunelles d'Hilarion comme deux flèches rouges.

ANTOINE

remarque enfin sa haute taille.

Plusieurs fois déjà, pendant que tu parlais, tu m'as semblé grandir ; — et ce n'était pas une illusion. Comment ? explique-moi ... Ta personne m'épouvante !

Des pas se rapprochent.

Qu'est-ce donc ?

HILARION

étend son bras.

Regarde !

Alors, sous un pâle rayon de lune, Antoine distingue une interminable caravane qui défile sur la crête des roches ; — et chaque voyageur, l'un après l'autre, tombe de la falaise dans le gouffre.

Ce sont d'abord les trois grands Dieux de Samothrace, Axieros, Axiokeros, Axiokersa, réunis en faisceau, masqués de pourpre et levant leurs mains.

Esculape s'avance d'un air mélancolique, sans même voir Samos et Télésphore, qui le questionnent avec angoisse. Sosipolis éléen, à forme de python, roule ses anneaux vers l'abîme. Doespoené, par vertige, s'y lance elle-même. Britomartis, hurlant de peur, se cramponne aux mailles de son filet. Les Centaures arrivent au grand galop, et déboulent pêle-mêle dans le trou noir.

Derrière eux, marche en boitant la troupe lamentable des Nymphes. Celles des prairies sont couvertes de poussière, celles des bois gémissent et saignent, blessées par la hache des bûcherons.

Les Gelludes, les Stryges, les Empuses, toutes les déesses infernales, en confondant leurs crocs, leurs torches, leurs vipères, forment une pyramide ; — et au sommet, sur une peau de vautour, Eurynome, bleuâtre comme les mouches à viande, se dévore les bras.

Puis, dans un tourbillon disparaissent à la fois : Orthia la sanguinaire, Hymnie d'Orchomène, la Laphria des Patréens, Aphia d'Égine, Bendis de Thrace, Stymphalia à cuisse d'oiseau, Triopas, au lieu de trois prunelles, n'a plus que trois orbites, Erichtonius, les jambes molles, rampe comme un cul-de-jatte sur ses poignets.

HILARION

Quel bonheur, n'est-ce pas, de les voir tous dans l'abjection et l'agonie ! Monte avec moi sur cette pierre ; et tu seras comme Xerxès, passant en revue son armée.

Là-bas, très-loin, au milieu des brouillards, aperçois-tu ce géant à barbe blonde qui laisse tomber un glaive rouge de sang ? c'est le Scythe Zalmoxis, entre deux planètes : Artimpasa — Vénus, et Orsiloché — la Lune.

Plus loin, émergeant des nuages pâles, sont les Dieux qu'on adorait chez les Cimmériens, au delà même de Thulé !

Leurs grandes salles étaient chaudes ; et à la lueur des épées nues tapissant la voûte, ils buvaient de l'hydromel dans des cornes d'ivoire. Ils mangeaient le foie de la baleine dans des plats de cuivre battus par des démons ; ou bien, ils écoutaient les sorciers captifs faisant aller leurs mains sur les harpes de pierre.

Ils sont las ! ils ont froid ! La neige alourdit leurs peaux d'ours, et leurs pieds se montrent par les déchirures de leurs sandales.

Ils pleurent les prairies, où sur des tertres de gazon ils reprenaient haleine dans la bataille, les longs navires dont la proue coupait les monts de glace, et les patins qu'ils avaient pour suivre l'orbe des pôles, en portant au bout de leurs bras tout le firmament qui tournait avec eux.

Une rafale de givre les enveloppe.

Antoine abaisse son regard d'un autre côté.

Et il aperçoit, — se détachant en noir sur un fond rouge, — d'étranges personnages, avec des mentonnières et des gantelets, qui se renvoient des balles, sautent les uns par-dessus les autres, font des grimaces, dansent frénétiquement.

HILARION

Ce sont les Dieux de l'Étrurie, les innombrables Aesars.

Voici Tagès, l'inventeur des augures. Il essaye avec une main d'augmenter les divisions du ciel, et de l'autre, il s'appuie sur la terre. Qu'il y rentre !

Nortia considère la muraille où elle enfonçait des clous pour marquer le nombre des années. La surface en est couverte, et la dernière période accomplie.

Comme deux voyageurs battus par un orage, Kastur et Pulutuk s'abritent en tremblant sous le même manteau.

ANTOINE

ferme les yeux.

Assez ! assez !

Mais passent dans l'air avec un grand bruit d'ailes, toutes les Victoires du Capitole, — cachant leur front de leurs mains, et perdant les trophées suspendus à leurs bras.

Janus, — maître des crépuscules, s'enfuit sur un bélier noir ; et, de ses deux visages, l'un est déjà putréfié, l'autre s'endort de fatigue.

Summanus, — dieu du ciel obscur et qui n'a plus de tête, presse contre son coeur un vieux gâteau en forme de roue.

Vesta, — sous une coupole en ruine, tâche de ranimer sa lampe éteinte.

Bellone — se taillade les joues, sans faire jaillir le sang qui purifiait ses dévots.

ANTOINE

Grâce ! ils me fatiguent !

HILARION

Autrefois, ils amusaient !

Et il lui montre dans un bosquet d'aliziers, Une Femme toute nue, — à quatre pattes comme une bête, et saillie par un homme noir, tenant dans chaque main un flambeau.

C'est la déesse d'Arícia, avec le démon Virbius. Son sacerdote, le roi du bois, devait être un assassin ; — et les esclaves en fuite, les dépouilleurs de cadavres, les brigands de la voie Salaria, les éclopés du pont Sublicius, toute la vermine des galetas de Suburre n'avait pas de dévotion plus chère !

Les patriciennes du temps de Marc-Antoine préféraient Libitina.

Et il lui montre, sous des cyprès et des rosiers, Une autre Femme — vêtue de gaze. Elle sourit, ayant autour d'elle des pioches, des brancards ; des tentures noires, tous les ustensiles des funérailles. Ses diamants brillent de loin sous des toiles d'araignées. Les Larves comme des squelettes montrent leurs os entre les branches, et les Lémures, qui sont des fantômes, étendent leurs ailes de chauve-souris.

Sur le bord d'un champ, le dieu Terme, déraciné, penche, tout couvert d'ordures.

Au milieu d'un sillon, le grand cadavre de Vertumne est dévoré par des chiens rouges.

Les Dieux rustiques s'en éloignent en pleurant, Sartor, Sarrator, Vervactor, Collina, Vallona, Hostilinus, — tous couverts de petite manteaux à capuchon, et chacun portant, soit un hoyau, une fourche, une claie, un épieu.

HILARION

C'était leur âme qui faisait prospérer la villa, avec ses colombiers, ses parcs de loirs et d'escargots, ses basses-cours défendues par des filets, ses chaudes écuries embaumées de cèdre.

Ils protégeaient tout le peuple misérable qui traînait les fers de ses jambes sur les cailloux de la Sabine, ceux qui appelaient les porcs au son de la trompe, ceux qui cueillaient les grappes au haut des ormes, ceux qui poussaient par les petits chemins les ânes chargés de fumier. Le laboureur, en haletant sur le manche de sa charrue, les priait de fortifier ses bras ; et les vachers à l'ombre des tilleuls, près des calebasses de lait, alternaient leurs éloges sur des flûtes de roseau.

Antoine soupire.

Et au milieu d'une chambre, sur une estrade, se découvre un lit d'ivoire, environné par des gens qui tiennent des torches de sapin.

Ce sont les Dieux du mariage. Ils attendent l'épousée !

Domiduca devait l'amener, Virgo défaire sa ceinture, Subigo l'étendre sur le lit, — et Praema écarter ses bras, en lui disant à l'oreille des paroles douces.

Mais elle ne viendra pas ! et ils congédient les autres : Nona et Decima gardes-malades, les trois Nixii accoucheurs, les deux nourrices Educa et Potina, — et Carna berceuse, dont le bouquet d'aubépines éloigne de l'enfant les mauvais rêves.

Plus tard, Ossipago lui aurait affermi les genoux, Barbatus donné la barbe, Stimula les premiers désirs, Volupia la première jouissance, Fabulinus appris à parler, Numera à compter, Camoena à chanter, Consus à réfléchir.

La chambre est vide ; et il ne reste plus au bord du lit que Naenia — centenaire, — marmottant pour elle-même la complainte qu'elle hurlait à la mort des vieillards.

Mais bientôt sa voix est dominée par des cris aigus. Ce sont :

LES LARES DOMESTIQUES

accroupis au fond de l'atrium, vêtus de peaux de chien, avec des fleurs autour du corps, tenant leurs mains fermées contre leurs joues, et pleurant tant qu'ils peuvent.

Où est la portion de nourriture qu'on nous donnait à chaque repas, les bons soins de la servante, le sourire de la matrone, et la gaieté des petits garçons jouant aux osselets sur les mosaïques de la cour ? Puis, devenus grands ils suspendaient à notre poitrine leur bulle d'or ou de cuir.

Quel bonheur, quand, le soir d'un triomphe, le maître en rentrant tournait vers nous ses yeux humides ! Il racontait ses combats ; et l'étroite maison était plus fière qu'un palais et sacrée comme un temple.

Qu'ils étaient doux les repas de famille, surtout le lendemain des Feralia ! Dans la tendresse pour les morts, toutes les discordes s'apaisaient ; et on s'embrassait, en buvant aux gloires du passé et aux espérances de l'avenir.

Mais les aïeux de cire peinte, enfermés derrière nous, se couvrent lentement de moisissure. Les races nouvelles, pour nous punir de leurs déceptions, nous ont brisé la mâchoire ; sous la dent des rats nos corps de bois s'émiettent.

Et les innombrables Dieux veillant aux portes, à la cuisine, au cellier, aux étuves, se dispersent de tous les côtés, — sous l'apparence d'énormes fourmis qui trottent ou de grands papillons qui s'envolent.

CRÉPITUS

se fait entendre.

Moi aussi l'on m'honora jadis. On me faisait des libations. Je fus un Dieu !

L'Athénien me saluait comme un présage de fortune, tandis que le Romain dévot me maudissait les poings levés et que le pontife d'Égypte, s'abstenant de fèves, tremblait à ma voix et pâlisait à mon odeur.

Quand le vinaigre militaire coulait sur les barbes non rasées, qu'on se régalaient de glands, de pois et d'oignons crus et que le bouc en morceaux cuisait dans le beurre rance des pasteurs, sans souci du voisin, personne alors ne se gênait. Les nourritures solides faisaient les digestions retentissantes. Au soleil de la campagne, les hommes se soulageaient avec lenteur.

Ainsi, je passais sans scandale, comme les autres besoins de la vie, comme Mena tourment des vierges, et la douce Rumina qui protège le sein de la nourrice, gonflé de veines bleuâtres. J'étais joyeux. Je faisais rire ! Et se dilatant d'aise à cause de moi, le convive exhalait toute sa gaieté par les ouvertures de son corps.

J'ai eu mes jours d'orgueil. Le bon Aristophane me promena sur la scène, et l'empereur Claudius Drusus me fit asseoir à sa table. Dans les laticlaves des patriciens j'ai circulé majestueusement ! Les vases d'or, comme des tympanons, résonnaient sous moi ; — et quand plein de murènes, de truffes et de pâtés, l'intestin du maître se dégageait avec fracas, l'univers attentif apprenait que César avait dîné !

Mais à présent, je suis confiné dans la populace, — et l'on se récrie, même à mon nom !

Et Crépitus s'éloigne, en poussant un gémissement.

Puis un coup de tonnerre ;

UNE VOIX

J'étais le Dieu des armées, le Seigneur, le Seigneur Dieu !

J'ai déplié sur les collines les tentes de Jacob, et nourri dans les sables mon peuple qui s'enfuyait.

C'est moi qui ai brûlé Sodome ! C'est moi qui ai englouti la terre sous le Déluge ! C'est moi qui ai noyé Pharaon, avec les princes fils de rois, les chariots de guerre et les cochers.

Dieux jaloux, j'exécrais les autres Dieux. J'ai broyé les impurs ; j'ai abattu les superbes ; — et ma désolation courait de droite et de gauche, comme un dromadaire qui est lâché dans un champ de maïs.

Pour délivrer Israël, je choisissais les simples. Des anges aux ailes de flamme leur parlaient dans les buissons.

Parfumées de nard, de cinnamome et de myrrhe, avec des robes transparentes et des chaussures à talon haut, des femmes d'un cœur intrépide allaient égorger les capitaines. Le vent qui passait emportait les prophètes.

J'avais gravé ma loi sur des tables de pierre. Elle enfermait mon peuple comme dans une citadelle. C'était mon peuple. J'étais son Dieu ! La terre était à moi, les hommes à moi, avec leurs pensées, leurs oeuvres, leurs outils de labourage et leur postérité.

Mon arche reposait dans un triple sanctuaire, derrière des courtines de pourpre et des candélabres allumés. J'avais, pour me servir, toute une tribu qui balançait des encensoirs, et le grand prêtre en robe d'hyacinthe, portant sur sa poitrine des pierres précieuses, disposées dans un ordre symétrique.

Malheur ! malheur ! Le Saint-des-Saints s'est ouvert, le voile s'est déchiré, les parfums de l'holocauste se sont perdus à tous les vents. Le chacal piaule dans les sépulcres ; mon temple est détruit, mon peuple est dispersé !

On a étranglé les prêtres avec les cordons de leurs habits. Les femmes sont captives, les vases sont tous fondus !

La voix s'éloignant :

J'étais le Dieu des armées, le Seigneur, le Seigneur Dieu !

Alors il se fait un silence énorme, une nuit profonde.

ANTOINE

Tous sont passés.

Il reste moi !

dit QUELQU'UN.

Et Hilarion est devant lui, — mais transfiguré, beau comme un archange, lumineux comme un soleil, — et tellement grand, que pour le voir se renverse la tête.

ANTOINE

Qui donc es-tu ?

HILARION

Mon royaume est de la dimension de l'univers ; et mon désir n'a pas de bornes. Je vais toujours, affranchissant l'esprit et pesant les mondes, sans haine, sans peur, sans pitié, sans amour, et sans Dieu. On m'appelle la Science.

ANTOINE

se rejette en arrière :

Tu dois être plutôt ... le Diable !

HILARION

en fixant sur lui ses prunelles :

Veux-tu le voir ?

ANTOINE

ne se détache plus de ce regard ; il est saisi par la curiosité du Diable. Sa terreur augmente, son envie devient démesurée.

Si je le voyais pourtant ... si je le voyais ?...

Puis dans un spasme de colère :

L'horreur que j'en ai m'en débarrassera pour toujours. — Oui !

Un pied fourchu se montre.

Antoine a regret.

Mais le Diable l'a jeté sur ses cornes, et l'enlève.

VI.

Il vole sous lui, étendu comme un nageur ; — ses deux ailes grandes ouvertes, en le cachant tout entier, semblent un nuage.

ANTOINE

Où vais-je ?

Tout à l'heure j'ai entrevu la forme du Maudit. Non ! une nuée m'emporte.

Peut-être que je suis mort, et que je monte vers Dieu ?...

Ah ! comme je respire bien ! L'air immaculé me gonfle l'âme. Plus de pesanteur ! plus de souffrance !

En bas, sous moi, la foudre éclate, l'horizon s'élargit, des fleuves s'entre-croisent. Cette tache blonde c'est le désert, cette flaque d'eau l'Océan.

Et d'autres océans paraissent, d'immenses régions que je ne connaissais pas. Voici les pays noirs qui fument comme des brasiers, la zone des neiges obscurcie toujours par des brouillards. Je tâche de découvrir les montagnes où le soleil, chaque soir, va se coucher.

LE DIABLE

Jamais le soleil ne se couche !

Antoine n'est pas surpris de cette voix. Elle lui semble un écho de sa pensée, — une réponse de sa mémoire.

Cependant la terre prend la forme d'une boule ; et il l'aperçoit au milieu de l'azur qui tourne sur ses pôles, en tournant autour du soleil.

LE DIABLE

Elle ne fait donc pas le centre du monde ? Orgueil de l'homme, humilie-toi !

ANTOINE

A peine maintenant si je la distingue. Elle se confond avec les autres feux.

Le firmament n'est qu'un tissu d'étoiles.

Ils montent toujours.

Aucun bruit ! pas même le croassement des aigles ! Rien !... et je me penche pour écouter l'harmonie des planètes.

LE DIABLE

Tu ne les entendras pas ! Tu ne verras pas, non plus, l'antichtone de Platon, le foyer de Philolaüs, les sphères d'Aristote, ni les sept cieus des Juifs avec les grandes eaux par-dessus la voûte de cristal !

ANTOINE

D'en bas elle paraissait solide comme un mur. Je la pénètre, au contraire, je m'y enfonce !

Et il arrive devant la lune, — qui ressemble à un morceau de glace tout rond, plein d'une lumière immobile.

LE DIABLE

C'était autrefois le séjour des âmes. Le bon Pythagore l'avait même garnie d'oiseaux et de fleurs magnifiques.

ANTOINE

Je n'y vois que des plaines désolées, avec des cratères éteints, sous un ciel tout noir.

Allons vers ces astres d'un rayonnement plus doux, afin de contempler les anges qui les tiennent au bout de leurs bras, comme des flambeaux !

LE DIABLE

l'emporte au milieu des étoiles.

Elles s'attirent en même temps qu'elles se repoussent. L'action de chacune résulte des autres et y contribue, — sans le moyen d'un auxiliaire, par la force d'une loi, la seule vertu de l'ordre.

ANTOINE

Oui ... oui ! mon intelligence l'embrasse ! C'est une joie supérieure aux plaisirs de la tendresse ! Je halète stupéfait devant l'énormité de Dieu !

LE DIABLE

Comme le firmament qui s'élève à mesure que tu montes et grandira sous l'ascension de ta pensée ; — et tu sentiras augmenter ta joie, d'après cette découverte du monde, dans cet élargissement de l'infini.

ANTOINE

Ah ! plus haut ! plus haut ! toujours !

Les astres se multiplient, scintillent. La Voie lactée au zénith se développe comme une immense ceinture, ayant des trous par intervalles ; dans ces fentes de sa clarté, s'allongent des espaces de ténèbres. Il y a des pluies d'étoiles, des traînées de poussière d'or, des vapeurs lumineuses qui flottent et se dissolvent.

Quelquefois une comète passe tout à coup ; — puis la tranquillité des lumières innombrables recommence.

Antoine, les bras ouverts, s'appuie sur les deux cornes du Diable, en occupant ainsi toute l'envergure.

Il se rappelle avec dédain l'ignorance des anciens jours, la médiocrité de ses rêves. Les voilà donc près de lui ces globes lumineux qu'il contemplait d'en bas ! Il distingue l'entre-croisement de leurs lignes, la complexité de leurs directions. Il les voit venir de loin, — et suspendus comme des pierres dans une fronde, décrire leurs orbites, pousser leurs hyperboles.

Il aperçoit d'un seul regard la Croix du sud et la Grande Ourse, le Lynx et le Centaure, la nébuleuse de la Dorade, les six soleils dans la constellation d'Orion, Jupiter avec ses quatre satellites, et le triple anneau du monstrueux Saturne ! toutes les planètes, tous les astres que les hommes plus tard découvriront ! Il emplit ses yeux de leurs lumières, il surcharge sa pensée du calcul de leurs distances ; — puis sa tête retombe.

Quel est le but de tout cela ?

LE DIABLE

Il n'y a pas de but !

Comment Dieu aurait-il un but ? Quelle expérience a pu l'instruire, quelle réflexion le déterminer ?

Avant le commencement il n'aurait pas agi, et maintenant il serait inutile.

ANTOINE

Il a créé le monde pourtant, d'une seule fois, par sa parole !

LE DIABLE

Mais les êtres qui peuplent la terre y viennent successivement. De même, au ciel, des astres nouveaux surgissent, — effets différents de causes variées.

ANTOINE

La variété des causes est la volonté de Dieu !

LE DIABLE

Mais admettre en Dieu plusieurs actes de volonté, c'est admettre plusieurs causes et détruire son unité !

Sa volonté n'est pas séparable de son essence. Il n'a pu avoir une autre volonté, ne pouvant avoir une autre essence ; — et puisqu'il existe éternellement, il agit éternellement.

Contemple le soleil ! De ses bords s'échappent de hautes flammes lançant des étincelles, qui se disposent pour devenir des mondes ; — et plus loin que la dernière, au delà de ces profondeurs où tu n'aperçois que la nuit, d'autres soleils tourbillonnent, derrière ceux-là d'autres, et encore d'autres, indéfiniment ...

ANTOINE

Assez ! assez ! J'ai peur ! je vais tomber dans l'abîme.

LE DIABLE

s'arrête ; et en le balançant mollement :

Le néant n'est pas ! le vide n'est pas ! Partout il y a des corps qui se meuvent sur le fond immuable de l'Étendue ; — et comme si elle était bornée par quelque chose, ce ne serait plus l'étendue, mais un corps, elle n'a pas de limites !

ANTOINE

béant :

Pas de limites !

LE DIABLE

Monte dans le ciel toujours et toujours ; jamais tu n'atteindras le sommet ! Descends au-dessous de la terre pendant des milliards de milliards de siècles, jamais tu n'arriveras au fond, — puisqu'il n'y a pas de fond, pas de sommet, ni haut, ni bas, aucun terme ; et l'Étendue se trouve comprise dans Dieu qui n'est point une portion de l'espace, telle ou telle grandeur, mais l'immensité !

ANTOINE

lentement :

La matière ... alors ... ferait partie de Dieu ?

LE DIABLE

Pourquoi non ? Peux-tu savoir où il finit ?

ANTOINE

Je me prosterne au contraire, je m'écrase, devant sa puissance !

LE DIABLE

Et tu prétends le fléchir ! Tu lui parles, tu le décores même de vertus, bonté, justice, clémence, au lieu de reconnaître qu'il possède toutes les perfections !

Concevoir quelque chose au delà, c'est concevoir Dieu au delà de Dieu, l'être par-dessus l'être. Il est donc le seul Être, la seule substance.

Si la Substance pouvait se diviser, elle perdrait sa nature, elle ne serait pas elle, Dieu n'existerait plus. Il est donc indivisible comme infini ; — et s'il avait un corps, il serait composé de parties, il ne serait plus un, il ne serait plus infini. Ce n'est donc pas une personne !

ANTOINE

Comment ? mes oraisons, mes sanglots, les souffrances de ma chair, les transports de mon ardeur, tout cela se serait en allé vers un mensonge ... dans l'espace ... inutilement, — comme un cri d'oiseau, comme un tourbillon de feuilles mortes !

Il pleure.

Oh ! non ! Il y a par-dessus tout quelqu'un, une grande âme, un Seigneur, un père, que mon coeur adore et qui doit m'aimer !

LE DIABLE

Tu désires que Dieu ne soit pas Dieu ; — car s'il éprouvait de l'amour, de la colère ou de la pitié, il passerait de sa perfection à une perfection plus grande, ou plus petite. Il ne peut descendre à un sentiment, ni se contenir dans une forme.

ANTOINE

Un jour, pourtant, je le verrai !

LE DIABLE

Avec les bienheureux, n'est-ce pas ? — quand le fini jouira de l'infini, dans un endroit restreint enfermant l'absolu !

ANTOINE

N'importe, il faut qu'il y ait un paradis pour le bien, comme un enfer pour le mal !

LE DIABLE

L'exigence de ta raison fait-elle la loi des choses ? Sans doute le mal est indifférent à Dieu puisque la terre en est couverte !

Est-ce par impuissance qu'il le supporte, ou par cruauté qu'il le conserve ?

Penses-tu qu'il soit continuellement à rajuster le monde comme une oeuvre imparfaite, et qu'il surveille tous les mouvements de tous les êtres depuis le vol du papillon jusqu'à la pensée de l'homme ?

S'il a créé l'univers, sa providence est superflue. Si la Providence existe, la création est défectueuse.

Mais le mal et le bien ne concernent que toi, — comme le jour et la nuît, le plaisir et la peine, la mort et la naissance, qui sont relatifs à un coin de l'étendue, à un milieu spécial, à un intérêt particulier. Puisque l'infini seul est permanent, il y a l'Infini ; — et c'est tout !

Le Diable a progressivement étiré ses longues ailes ; maintenant elles couvrent l'espace.

ANTOINE

n'y voit plus. Il défaille.

Un froid horrible me glace jusqu'au fond de l'âme. Cela excède la portée de la douleur ! C'est comme une mort plus profonde que la mort. Je roule dans l'immensité des ténèbres. Elles entrent en moi. Ma conscience éclate sous cette dilatation du néant !

LE DIABLE

Mais les choses ne t'arrivent que par l'intermédiaire de ton esprit. Tel qu'un miroir concave il déforme les objets ; — et tout moyen te manque pour en vérifier l'exactitude.

Jamais tu ne connaîtras l'univers dans sa pleine étendue ; par conséquent tu ne peux te faire une idée de sa cause, avoir une notion juste de Dieu, ni même dire que l'univers est infini, — car il faudrait d'abord connaître l'Infini !

La Forme est peut-être une erreur de tes sens, la Substance une imagination de ta pensée.

A moins que le monde étant un flux perpétuel des choses, l'apparence au contraire ne soit tout ce qu'il y a de plus vrai, l'illusion la seule réalité.

Mais es-tu sûr de voir ? es-tu même sûr de vivre ? Peut-être qu'il n'y a rien !

Le Diable a pris Antoine ; et le tenant au bout de ses bras, il le regarde la gueule ouverte, prêt à le dévorer.

Adore-moi donc ! et maudis le fantôme que tu nommes Dieu !

Antoine lève les yeux, par un dernier mouvement d'espoir.

Le Diable l'abandonne.

* * * * *

ANTOINE

se retrouve étendu sur le dos, au bord de la falaise.

Le ciel commence à blanchir.

Est-ce la clarté de l'aube, ou bien un reflet de la lune ?

Il tâche de se soulever, puis retombe ; et en claquant des dents :

J'éprouve une fatigue ... comme si tous mes os étaient brisés !

Pourquoi ?

Ah ! c'est le Diable ! je me souviens, — et même il me redisait tout ce que j'ai appris chez le vieux Didyme des opinions de Xénophane, d'Héraclite, de Mélisse, d'Anaxagore, sur l'infini, la création, l'impossibilité de rien connaître !

Et j'avais cru pouvoir m'unir à Dieu !

Riant amèrement :

Ah ! démente ! démente ! Est-ce ma faute ? La prière m'est intolérable ! J'ai le coeur plus sec qu'un rocher ! Autrefois il débordait d'amour !...

Le sable, le matin, fumait à l'horizon comme la poussière d'un encensoir ; au coucher du soleil, des fleurs de feu s'épanouissaient sur la croix ; — et au milieu de la nuit, souvent il m'a semblé que tous les êtres et toutes les choses, recueillis dans le même silence, adoraient avec moi le Seigneur. O charme des oraisons, félicités de l'extase, présents du ciel, qu'êtes-vous devenus !

Je me rappelle un voyage que j'ai fait avec Ammon, à la recherche d'une solitude pour établir des monastères. C'était le dernier soir ; et nous pressions nos pas, en murmurant des hymnes, côte à côte, sans parler. A mesure que le soleil s'abaissait, les deux ombres de nos corps s'allongeaient comme deux obélisques grandissant toujours et qui auraient marché devant nous. Avec les morceaux de nos bâtons, çà et là nous plantions des croix pour marquer la place d'une cellule. La nuit fut lente à venir ; et des ondes noires se répandaient sur la terre qu'une immense couleur rose occupait encore le ciel.

Quand j'étais un enfant, je m'amusais avec des cailloux à construire des ermitages. Ma mère, près de moi, me regardait.

Elle m'aura maudit pour mon abandon, en arrachant à pleines mains ses cheveux blancs. Et son cadavre est resté étendu au milieu de la cabane, sous le toit de roseaux, entre les murs qui tombent. Par un trou, une hyène en reniflant, avance la gueule !... Horreur ! horreur !

Il sanglote.

Non, Ammonaria ne l'aura pas quittée !

Où est-elle maintenant, Ammonaria ?

Peut-être qu'au fond d'une étuve elle retire ses vêtements l'un après l'autre, d'abord le manteau, puis la ceinture, la première tunique, la seconde plus légère, tous ses colliers ; et la vapeur du cinnamome enveloppe ses membres nus. Elle se couche enfin sur la tiède mosaïque. Sa chevelure à l'entour de ses hanches fait comme une toison noire, — et suffoquant un peu dans l'atmosphère trop chaude, elle respire, la taille cambrée, les deux seins en avant. Tiens !... voilà ma chair qui se révolte ! Au milieu du chagrin la concupiscence me torture. Deux supplices à la fois, c'est trop ! Je ne peux plus endurer ma personne !

Il se penche, et regarde le précipice.

L'homme qui tomberait serait tué. Rien de plus facile, en se roulant sur le côté gauche ; c'est un mouvement à faire ! un seul.

Alors apparaît

UNE VIEILLE FEMME

Antoine se relève dans un sursaut d'épouvanté. — Il croit voir sa mère ressuscitée.

Mais celle-ci est beaucoup plus vieille, et d'une prodigieuse maigreur.

Un linceul noué autour de sa tête, pend avec ses cheveux blancs jusqu'au bas de ses doux jambes, minces comme des béquilles. L'éclat de ses dents, couleur d'ivoire, rend plus sombre sa peau terreuse. Les orbites de ses yeux sont pleines de ténèbres, et au fond deux flammes vacillent, comme des lampes de sépulcre.

Avance, dit-elle. Qui te retient ?

ANTOINE

balbutiant :

J'ai peur de commettre un péché !

ELLE

reprend :

Mais le roi Saül s'est tué ! Razias, un juste, s'est tué ! Sainte Pélagie d'Antioche s'est tuée ! Dommine d'Alep et ses deux filles, trois autres saintes, se sont tuées ; — et rappelle-toi tous les confesseurs qui couraient au-devant des bourreaux, par impatience de la mort. Afin d'en jouir plus vite, les vierges de Milet s'étranglaient avec leurs cordons. Le philosophe Hégésias, à Syracuse, la prêchait si bien qu'on désertait les lupanars pour s'aller pendre dans les champs. Les patriciens de Rome se la procurent comme débauche.

ANTOINE

Oui, c'est un amour qui est fort ! Beaucoup d'anachorètes y succombent.

LA VIEILLE

Faire une chose qui vous égale à Dieu, pense donc ! Il t'a créé, tu vas détruire son oeuvre, toi, par ton courage, librement ! La jouissance d'Érostrate n'était pas supérieure. Et puis, ton corps s'est assez moqué de ton âme pour que tu t'en venges à la fin. Tu ne souffriras pas. Ce sera vite terminé. Que crains-tu ? un large trou noir ! Il est vide, peut-être ?

Antoine écoute sans répondre ; — et de l'autre côté paraît :

UNE AUTRE FEMME

jeune et belle, merveilleusement. — Il la prend d'abord pour Ammonaria.

Mais elle est plus grande, blonde comme le miel, très-grasse, avec du fard sur les joues et des roses sur la tête. Sa longue robe chargée de paillettes a des miroitements métalliques ; ses lèvres charnues paraissent sanguinolentes, et ses paupières un peu lourdes sont tellement noyées de langueur qu'on la dirait aveugle.

Elle murmure :

Vis donc, jouis donc ! Salomon recommande la joie ! Va comme ton coeur te mène et selon le désir de tes yeux !

ANTOINE

Quelle joie trouver ? mon coeur est las, mes yeux sont troubles !

ELLE

reprend :

Gagne le faubourg de Racotis, pousse une porte peinte en bleu ; et quand tu seras dans l'atrium où murmure un jet d'eau, une femme se présentera — en péplos de soie blanche lamé d'or, les cheveux dénoués, le rire pareil au claquement des crotales. Elle est habile. Tu goûteras dans sa caresse l'orgueil d'une initiation et l'apaisement d'un besoin.

Tu ne connais pas, non plus, le trouble des adultères, les escalades, les enlèvements, la joie de voir toute nue celle qu'on respectait habillée.

As-tu serré contre ta poitrine une vierge qui t'aimait ? Te rappelles-tu les abandons de sa pudeur, et ses remords qui s'en allaient sous un flux de larmes douces !

Tu peux, n'est-ce pas, vous apercevoir marchant dans les bois sous la lumière de la lune ? A la pression de vos mains jointes un frémissement vous parcourt ; vos yeux rapprochés épanchent de l'un à l'autre comme des ondes immatérielles, et votre coeur s'emplit ; il éclate ; c'est un suave tourbillon, une ivresse débordante ...

LA VIEILLE

On n'a pas besoin de posséder les joies pour en sentir l'amertume ! Rien qu'à les voir de loin, le dégoût vous en prend. Tu dois être fatigué par la monotonie des mêmes actions, la durée des jours, la laideur du monde, la bêtise du soleil !

ANTOINE

Oh ! oui, tout ce qu'il éclaire me déplaît !

LA JEUNE

Ermite ! ermite ! tu trouveras des diamants entre les cailloux, des fontaines sous le sable, une délectation dans les hasards que tu méprises ; et même il y a des endroits de la terre si beaux qu'on a envie de la serrer contre son coeur.

LA VIEILLE

Chaque soir, en t'endormant sur elle, tu espères que bientôt elle te recouvrira !

LA JEUNE

Cependant, tu crois à la résurrection de la chair, qui est le transport de la vie dans l'éternité !

La Vieille, pendant qu'elle parlait, s'est encore décharnée ; et au-dessus de son crâne, qui n'a plus de cheveux, une chauve-souris fait des cercles dans l'air.

La Jeune est devenue plus grasse. Sa robe chatoie, ses narines battent, ses yeux roulent moelleusement.

LA PREMIÈRE

dit, en ouvrant les bras :

Viens, je suis la consolation, le repos, l'oubli, l'éternelle sérénité !
et

LA SECONDE

en offrant ses seins :

Je suis l'endormeuse, la joie, la vie, le bonheur inépuisable !

Antoine tourne les talons pour s'enfuir. Chacune lui met la main sur l'épaule.

Le linceul s'écarte, et découvre le squelette de La Mort.

La robe se fend, et laisse voir le corps entier de La Luxure, qui a la taille mince avec la croupe énorme et de grands cheveux ondes s'envolant par le bout.

Antoine reste immobile entre les deux, les considérant.

LA MORT

lui dit :

Tout de suite ou tout à l'heure, qu'importe ! Tu m'appartiens, comme les soleils, les peuples, les villes, les rois, la neige des monts, l'herbe des champs. Je vole plus haut que l'épervier, je cours plus vite que la gazelle, j'atteins même l'espérance, j'ai vaincu le fils de Dieu !

LA LUXURE

Ne résiste pas ; je suis l'omnipotente ! Les forêts retentissent de mes soupirs, les flots sont remués par mes agitations. La vertu, le courage, la piété se dissolvent au parfum de ma bouche. J'accompagne l'homme pendant tous les pas qu'il fait ; — et au seuil du tombeau il se retourne vers moi !

LA MORT

Je te découvrirai ce que tu tâchais de saisir, à la lueur des flambeaux, sur la face des morts, — ou quand tu vagabondais au delà des Pyramides, dans ces grands sables composés de débris humains. De temps à autre, un fragment de crâne roulait sous ta sandale. Tu prenais de la poussière, tu la faisais couler entre tes doigts ; et ta pensée, confondue avec elle, s'abîmait dans le néant.

LA LUXURE

Mon gouffre est plus profond ! Des marbres ont inspiré d'obscènes amours. On se précipite à des rencontres qui effrayent. On rive des chaînes que l'on maudit. D'où vient l'ensorcellement des courtisanes, l'extravagance des rêves, l'immensité de ma tristesse ?

LA MORT

Mon ironie dépasse toutes les autres ! Il y a des convulsions de plaisir aux funérailles des rois, à l'extermination d'un peuple ; — et on fait la guerre avec de la musique, des panaches, des drapeaux, des harnais d'or, un déploiement de cérémonie pour me rendre plus d'hommages.

LA LUXURE

Ma colère vaut la tienne. Je hurle, je mords. J'ai des sueurs d'agonisant et des aspects de cadavre.

LA MORT

C'est moi qui te rends sérieuse ; enlaçons-nous !

La Mort ricane, la Luxure rugit. Elles se prennent par la taille, et chantent ensemble :

- Je hâte la dissolution de la matière !
- Je facilite l'éparpillement des germes !
- Tu détruis, pour mes renouvellements !
- Tu engendres, pour mes destructions !
- Active ma puissance !
- Féconde ma pourriture !

Et leur voix, dont les échos se déroulant emplissent l'horizon, devient tellement forte qu'Antoine en tombe à la renverse.

Une secousse, de temps à autre, lui fait entr'ouvrir les yeux ; et il aperçoit au milieu des ténèbres une manière de monstre devant lui.

C'est une tête de mort, avec une couronne de roses. Elle domine un torse de femme d'une blancheur nacrée. En dessous, un linceul étoilé de points d'or fait comme une queue ; — et tout le corps ondule, à la manière d'un ver gigantesque qui se tiendrait debout.

La vision s'atténue, disparaît.

ANTOINE

se relève.

Encore une fois c'était le Diable, et sous son double aspect : l'esprit de fornication et l'esprit de destruction.

Aucun des deux ne m'épouvante. Je repousse le bonheur, et je me sens éternel.

Ainsi la mort n'est qu'une illusion, un voile, masquant par endroits la continuité de la vie.

Mais la Substance étant unique, pourquoi les Formes sont-elles variées ?

Il doit y avoir, quelque part, des figures primordiales, dont les corps ne sont que les images. Si on pouvait les voir on connaîtrait le lien de la matière et de la pensée, en quoi l'Être consiste !

Ce sont ces figures-là qui étaient peintes à Babylone sur la muraille du temple de Bélus, et elles couvraient une mosaïque dans le port de Carthage. Moi-même, j'ai quelquefois aperçu dans le ciel comme des formes d'esprits. Ceux qui traversent le désert rencontrent des animaux dépassant toute conception ...

Et en face, de l'autre côté du Nil, voilà que le Sphinx apparaît.

Il allonge ses pattes, secoue les bandelettes de son front, et se couche sur le ventre.

Sautant, volant, crachant du feu par ses narines, et de sa queue de dragon se frappant les ailes, la Chimère aux yeux verts, tournoie, aboie.

Les anneaux de sa chevelure, rejetés d'un côté, s'entremêlent aux poils de ses reins, et de l'autre ils pendent jusque sur le sable et remuent au balancement de tout son corps.

LE SPHINX

est immobile, et regarde la Chimère :

Ici, Chimère ; arrête-toi !

LA CHIMÈRE

Non, jamais !

LE SPHINX

Ne cours pas si vite, ne vole pas si haut, n'aboie pas si fort !

LA CHIMÈRE

Ne m'appelle plus, ne m'appelle plus, puisque tu restes toujours muet !

LE SPHINX

Cesse de me jeter tes flammes au visage et de pousser tes hurlements dans mon oreille ; tu ne fondras pas mon granit !

LA CHIMÈRE

Tu ne me saisisiras pas, sphinx terrible !

LE SPHINX

Pour demeurer avec moi, tu es trop folle !

LA CHIMÈRE

Pour me suivre, tu es trop lourd !

LE SPHINX

Ou vas-tu donc, que tu cours si vite ?

LA CHIMÈRE

Je galope dans les corridors du labyrinthe, je plane sur les monts, je rase les flots, je jappe au fond des précipices, je m'accroche par la gueule au pan des nuées ; avec ma queue traînante, je raye les plages, et les collines ont pris leur courbe selon la forme de mes épaules. Mais toi, je te retrouve perpétuellement immobile, ou bien du bout de ta griffe dessinant des alphabets sur le sable.

LE SPHINX

C'est que je garde mon secret ! Je songe et je calcule.

La mer se retourne dans son lit, les blés se balancent sous le vent, les caravanes passent, la poussière s'envole, les cités s'écroulent ; — et mon regard, que rien ne peut dévier, demeure tendu à travers les choses sur un horizon inaccessible.

LA CHIMÈRE

Moi, je suis légère et joyeuse ! Je découvre aux hommes des perspectives éblouissantes avec des paradis dans les nuages et des félicités lointaines. Je leur verse à l'âme les éternelles démençes, projets de bonheur, plans d'avenir, rêves de gloire, et les serments d'amour et les résolutions vertueuses.

Je pousse aux périlleux voyages et aux grandes entreprises. J'ai ciselé avec mes pattes les merveilles des architectures. C'est moi qui ai suspendu les clochettes au tombeau de Porsenna, et entouré d'un mur d'orichalque les quais de l'Atlantide.

Je cherche des parfums nouveaux, des fleurs plus larges, des plaisirs inédits. Si j'aperçois quelque part un homme dont l'esprit repose dans la sagesse, je tombe dessus, et je l'étrangle.

LE SPHINX

Tous ceux que le désir de Dieu tourmente, je les ai dévorés.

Les plus forts, pour gravir jusqu'à mon front royal, montent aux stries de mes bandelettes comme sur les marches d'un escalier. La lassitude les prend ; et ils tombent d'eux-mêmes à la renverse.

Antoine commence à trembler.

Il n'est plus devant sa cabane, mais dans le désert, — ayant à ces côtés deux bêtes monstrueuses, dont la gueule lui effleura l'épaule.

LE SPHINX

O Fantaisie, emporte-moi sur tes ailes pour désennuyer ma tristesse !

LA CHIMÈRE

O Inconnu, je suis amoureuse de tes yeux ! Comme une hyène en chaleur je tourne autour de toi, sollicitant les fécondations dont le besoin me dévore.

Ouvre la gueule, lève tes pieds, monte sur mon dos !

LE SPHINX

Mes pieds, depuis qu'ils sont à plat, ne peuvent plus se relever. Le lichen, comme une dartre, a poussé sur ma gueule. A force de songer, je n'ai plus rien à dire.

LÀ CHIMÈRE

Tu mens, sphinx hypocrite ! D'où vient toujours que tu m'appelles et me renies ?

LE SPHINX

C'est toi, caprice indomptable, qui passe et tourbillonne !

LA CHIMÈRE

Est-ce ma faute ? Comment ? laisse-moi !

Elle aboie.

LE SPHINX

Tu remues, tu m'échappes !

Il grogne.

LA CHIMÈRE

Essayons ! — tu m'écrases !

LE SPHINX

Non ! impossible !

Et en s'enfonçant peu à peu, il disparaît dans le sable, — tandis que la

Chimère, qui rampe la langue tirée, s'éloigne en décrivant des cercles.

L'haleine de sa bouche a produit un brouillard.

Dans cette brume, Antoine aperçoit des enroulements de nuages, des courbes indécises.

Enfin, il distingue comme des apparences de corps humains ;

Et d'abord s'avance

LE GROUPE DES ASTOMI

pareils à des bulles d'air que traverse le soleil.

Ne souffle pas trop fort ! Les gouttes de pluie nous meurtrissent, les sons faux nous écorchent, les ténèbres nous aveuglent. Composés de brises et de parfums, nous roulons, nous flottons — un peu plus que des rêves, pas des êtres tout à fait ...

LES NISNAS

n'ont qu'un oeil, qu'une joue, qu'une main, qu'une jambe, qu'une moitié du corps, qu'une moitié du coeur. Et ils disent, très-haut :

Nous vivons fort à notre aise dans nos moitiés de maisons, avec nos moitiés de femmes et nos moitiés d'enfants.

LES BLEMMYES

absolument privés de tête :

Nos épaules en sont plus larges ; — et il n'y a pas de boeuf, de rhinocéros ni d'éléphant qui soit capable de porter ce que nous portons.

Des espèces de traits, et comme une vague figure empreinte sur nos poitrines, voilà tout ! Nous pensons des digestions, nous subtilisons des sécrétions. Dieu, pour nous, flotte en paix dans des chyles intérieurs.

Nous marchons droit notre chemin, traversant toutes les fanges, côtoyant tous les abîmes ; — et nous sommes les gens les plus laborieux, les plus heureux, les plus vertueux.

LES PYGMÉES

Petits bonshommes, nous grouillons sur le monde comme de la vermine sur la bosse d'un dromadaire.

On nous brûle, on nous noie, ou nous écrase ; et toujours, nous réparaissons, plus vivaces et plus nombreux, — terribles par la quantité !

LES SCIAPODES

Retenus à la terre par nos chevelures, longues comme des lianes, nous végétons à l'abri de nos pieds, larges comme des parasols ; et la lumière nous arrive à travers l'épaisseur de nos talons. Point de dérangement et point de travail ! — La tête le puis bas possible, c'est le secret du bonheur !

Leurs cuisses levées ressemblant à des troncs d'arbres, se multiplient.

Et une forêt paraît. De grands singes y courent à quatre pattes ; ce sont des hommes à tête de chien.

LES CYNOCÉPHALES

Nous sautons de branche en branche pour sucer les oeufs, et nous plumons les oisillons ; puis nous mettons leurs nids sur nos têtes, en guise de bonnets.

Nous ne manquons pas d'arracher les pis des vaches ; et nous crevons les yeux des lynx, nous fientons du haut des arbres, nous étalons notre turpitude en plein soleil.

Lacérant les fleurs, broyant les fruits, troublant les sources, violant les femmes, nous sommes les maîtres, — par la force de nos bras et la férocité de notre coeur.

Hardi, compagnons ! Faites claquer vos mâchoires !

Du sang et du lait coulent de leurs babines. La pluie ruisselle sur leurs dos velus.

Antoine hume la fraîcheur des feuilles vertes.

Elles s'agitent, les branches s'entre-choquent ; et tout à coup paraît un grand cerf noir, à tête de taureau, qui porte entre les oreilles un buisson de cornes blanches.

LE SADHUZAG

Mes soixante-quatorze andouillers sont creux comme des flûtes.

Quand je me tourne vers le vent du sud, il en part des sons qui attirent à moi les bêtes ravies. Les serpents s'enroulent à mes jambes, les guêpes se collent dans mes narines, et les perroquets, les colombes et les ibis s'abattent dans mes rameaux. — Écoute !

Il renverse son bois, d'où s'échappe une musique ineffablement douce.

Antoine presse son coeur à deux mains. Il lui semble que cette mélodie va emporter son âme.

LE SADHUZAG

Mais quand je me tourne vers le vent du nord, mon bois plus touffu qu'un bataillon de lances, exhale un hurlement ; les forêts tressaillent, les fleuves remontent, la gousse des fruits éclate, et les herbes se dressent comme la chevelure d'un lâche.

— Écoute !

Il penche ses rameaux, d'où sortent des cris discordants ; Antoine est comme déchiré.

Et son horreur augmente en voyant :

LE MARTICHORAS

gigantesque lion rouge, à figure humaine, avec trois rangées de dents.

Les moires de mon pelage écarlate se mêlent au miroitement des grands sables. Je souffle par mes narines l'épouvante des solitudes. Je crache la peste. Je mange les armées, quand elles s'aventurent dans le désert.

Mes ongles sont tordus en vrilles, mes dents sont taillées en scie ; et ma queue, qui se contourne, est hérissée de dards que je lance à droite, à gauche, en avant, en arrière. — Tiens ! tiens !

Le Martichoras jette les épines de sa queue ; qui s'irradient comme des flèches dans toutes les directions. Des gouttes de sang pleuvent, en claquant sur le feuillage.

LE CATOBLEPAS

buffle noir, avec une tête de porc tombant jusqu'à terre, et rattachée à ses épaules par un cou mince, long et flasque comme un boyau vidé.

Il est vautré tout à plat ; et ses pieds disparaissent sous l'énorme crinière à poils durs qui lui couvre le visage.

Gras, mélancolique, farouche, je reste continuellement à sentir sous mon ventre la chaleur de la boue. Mon crâne est tellement lourd qu'il m'est impossible de le porter. Je le roule autour de moi, lentement ; — et la mâchoire entr'ouverte, j'arrache avec ma langue les herbes vénéneuses arrosées de mon haleine. Une fois, je me suis dévoré les pattes sans m'en apercevoir.

Personne, Antoine, n'a jamais vu mes yeux, ou ceux qui les ont vus sont morts. Si je relevais mes paupières, — mes paupières roses et gonflées, — tout de suite, tu mourrais.

ANTOINE

Oh ! celui-là !... a ... a ... Si j'allais avoir envie ?... Sa stupidité m'attire. Non ! non ! je ne veux pas !

Il regarde par terre fixement.

Mais les herbes s'allument, et dans les torsions des flammes se dresse

LE BASILIC

grand serpent violet à crête trilobée, avec deux dents, une en haut, une en bas.

Prends garde, tu vas tomber dans ma gueule ! Je bois du feu. Le feu, c'est moi ; — et de partout j'en aspire : des nuées, des cailloux, des arbres morts, du poil des animaux, de la surface des marécages. Ma température entretient les volcans ; je fais l'éclat des pierreries et la couleur des métaux.

LE GRIFFON

lion à bec de vautour avec des ailes blanches, les pattes rouges et le cou bleu.

Je suis le maître des splendeurs profondes. Je connais le secret des tombeaux où dorment les vieux rois.

Une chaîne, qui sort du mur, leur tient la tête droite. Près d'eux, dans des bassins de porphyre, des femmes qu'ils ont aimées flottent sur des liquides noirs. Leurs trésors sont rangés dans des salles, par losanges, par monticules, par pyramides ; — et plus bas, bien au-dessous des tombeaux, après de longs voyages au milieu des ténèbres étouffantes, il y a des fleuves d'or avec des forêts de diamant, des prairies d'escarboucles, des lacs de mercure.

Adossé contre la porte du souterrain et la griffe en l'air, j'épie de mes prunelles flamboyantes ceux qui voudraient venir. La plaine immense, jusqu'au fond de l'horizon est toute nue et blanchie par les ossements des voyageurs. Pour toi les battants de bronze s'ouvriront, et tu humeras la vapeur des mines, tu descendras dans les cavernes ... Vite ! vite !

Il creuse la terre avec ses pattes, en criant comme un coq.

Mille voix lui répondent. La forêt tremble.

Et toutes sortes de bêtes effroyables surgissent : le Tragelaphus, moitié cerf et moitié boeuf ; le Myrmecoleo, lion par devant, fourmi par derrière, et dont les génitoires sont à rebours ; le python Aksar, de soixante coudées, qui épouvanta Moïse ; la grande belette Pastinaca, qui tue les arbres par son odeur ; le Presteros, qui rend imbécile par son contact ; le Mirag, lièvre cornu, habitant des îles de la mer. Le léopard Phalmant crève son ventre à force de hurler ; le Senad, ours à trois têtes, déchire ses petits avec sa langue ; le chien Cépús répand sur les rochers le lait bleu de ses mamelles. Des moustiques se mettent à bourdonner, des crapauds à sauter, des serpents à siffler. Des éclairs brillent. La grêle tombe.

Il arrive des rafales, pleines d'anatomies merveilleuses. Ce sont des têtes d'alligators sur des pieds de chevreuil, des hiboux à queue de serpent, des pourceaux à mufle de tigre, des chèvres à croupe d'âne, des grenouilles velues comme des ours, des caméléons grands comme des hippopotames, des veaux à deux têtes dont l'une pleure et l'autre beugle, des foetus quadruples se tenant par le nombril et valsant comme des toupies, des ventres ailés qui voltigent comme des moucheron.

Il en pleut du ciel, il en sort de terre, il en coule des roches. Partout des prunelles flamboient, des gueules rugissent ; les poitrines se bombent, les griffes s'allongent, les dents grincent, les chairs clapotent. Il y en a qui accouchent, d'autres copulent, ou d'une seule bouchée s'entre-dévorent.

S'étouffant sous leur nombre, se multipliant par leur contact, ils grimpent les uns sur les autres ; — et tous remuent autour d'Antoine avec un balancement régulier, comme si le sol était le pont d'un navire. Il sent contre ses mollets la traînée des limaces, sur ses mains le froid des vipères ; et des araignées filant leur toile l'enferment dans leur réseau.

Mais le cercle des monstres s'entr'ouvre, le ciel tout à coup devient bleu, et se présente.

LA LICORNE

Au galop ! au galop !

J'ai des sabots d'ivoire, des dents d'acier, la tête couleur de pourpre, le corps couleur de neige, et la corne de mon front porte les bariolures de l'arc-en-ciel.

Je voyage de la Chaldée au désert tartare, sur les bords du Gange et dans la Mésopotamie. Je dépasse les autruches. Je cours si vite que je traîne le vent. Je frotte mon dos contre les palmiers. Je me roule dans les bambous. D'un bond je saute les fleuves. Des colombes volent au-dessus de moi. Une vierge seule peut me brider.

Au galop ! au galop !

Antoine la regarde s'enfuir.

Et ses yeux restant levés, il aperçoit tous les oiseaux qui se nourrissent de vent : le Gouith, l'Ahuti, l'Alphalim, le Iukneth des montagnes de Caff, les Homaï des Arabes qui sont les âmes d'hommes assassinés. Il entend les perroquets proférer des paroles humaines, puis les grands palmipèdes pélasgiens qui sanglotent comme des enfants ou ricanent comme de vieilles femmes.

Un air salin le frappe aux narines. Une plage maintenant est devant lui.

Au loin des jets d'eau s'élèvent, lancés par des baleines ; et du fond de l'horizon

LES BÊTES DE LA MER

rondes comme des outres, plates comme des lames, dentelées comme des scies, s'avancent en se traînant sur le sable.

Tu vas venir avec nous, dans nos immensités où personne encore n'est descendu !

Des peuples divers habitent les pays de l'Océan. Les uns sont au séjour des tempêtes ; d'autres nagent en plein dans la transparence des ondes froides, broutent comme des boeufs les plaines de corail, aspirent par leur trompe le reflux des marées, ou portent sur leurs épaules le poids des sources de la mer.

Des phosphorescences brillent à la moustache des phoques, aux écailles des poissons. Des oursins tournent comme des roues, des cornes d'Ammon se déroulent comme des câbles, des huîtres font crier leurs charnières, des polypes déploient leurs tentacules, des méduses frémissent pareilles à des boules de cristal, des éponges flottent, des anémones crachent de l'eau ; des mousses, des varechs ont poussé.

Et toutes sortes de plantes s'étendent en rameaux, se tordent en vrilles, s'allongent en pointes, s'arrondissent en éventail. Des courges ont l'air de seins, des lianes s'enlacent comme des serpents.

Les Dedaims de Babylone, qui sont des arbres, ont pour fruits des têtes humaines ; des Mandragores chantent, la racine Baaras court dans l'herbe.

Les végétaux maintenant ne se distinguent plus des animaux. Des polypiers, qui ont l'air de sycomores, portent des bras sur leurs branches. Antoine croit voir une chenille entre deux feuilles ; c'est un papillon qui s'envole. Il va pour marcher sur un galet ; une sauterelle grise bondit. Des insectes pareils à des pétales de roses, garnissent un arbuste ; des débris d'éphémères font sur le sol une couche neigeuse.

Et puis les plantes se confondent avec les pierres.

Des cailloux ressemblent à des cerveaux, des stalactites à des mamelles, des fleurs de fer à des tapisseries ornées de figures.

Dans des fragments de glace, il distingue des efflorescences, des empreintes de buissons et de coquilles — à ne savoir si ce sont les empreintes de ces choses-là, ou ces choses elles-mêmes. Des diamants brillent comme des yeux, des minéraux palpitent.

Et il n'a plus peur !

Il se couche à plat ventre, s'appuie sur les deux coudes ; et retenant son haleine, il regarde.

Des insectes n'ayant plus d'estomac continuent à manger ; des fougères desséchées se remettent à fleurir ; des membres qui manquaient repoussent.

Enfin, il aperçoit de petites masses globuleuses, grosses comme des têtes d'épingles et garnies de cils tout autour. Une vibration les agite.

ANTOINE

délirant :

O bonheur ! bonheur ! j'ai vu naître la vie, j'ai vu le mouvement commencer. Le sang de mes veines bat si fort qu'il vas les rompre, j'ai envie de voler, de nager, d'aboyer, de beugler, de hurler. Je voudrais avoir des ailes, une carapace, une écorce, souffler de la fumée, porter une trompe, tordre mon corps, me diviser partout, être en tout, m'émaner avec les odeurs, me développer comme les plantes, couler comme l'eau, vibrer comme le son, briller comme la lumière, me blottir sur toutes les formes, pénétrer chaque atome, descendre jusqu'au fond de la matière, — être la matière !

Le jour enfin paraît ; et comme les rideaux d'un tabernacle qu'on relève, des nuages d'or en s'enroulant à larges volutes découvrent le ciel.

Tout au milieu, et dans le disque même du soleil, rayonne la face de Jésus-Christ.

Antoine fait le signe de la croix et se remet en prières.

ACT I.

Scene: A garden before the house of M. Rousselin. A pavilion, R. An iron gate, L.

SCENE I.

(Murel, Pierre, and a servant Pierre stands, C., unfolding a newspaper. Enter M. Murel, L., carrying a large bouquet, which he hands to Pierre.)

MUREL: Pierre, where is Monsieur Rousselin?

PIERRE: In his study, Monsieur Murel. The ladies are in the park, I believe, with Monsieur Onésime de Bouvigny and the English governess.

MUREL: Monsieur Onésime de Bouvigny — that half-cracked idiot! I will wait here until he has gone, because I detest the very sight of him.

PIERRE: And I also, Monsieur.

MUREL: YOU? And why?

PIERRE: Because he is a snake, besides being a braggart and a boaster. And then, too, I have an idea that he comes here on account of [mysteriously] Mademoiselle!

MUREL [in a half whisper]: What! Mademoiselle Louise?

PIERRE: Yes, Monsieur. Unless I am greatly mistaken, these Bouvignys, father and son, being noblemen, would not come bowing and scraping before a mere bourgeois like Monsieur Rousselin, except for the reason I have just mentioned.

MUREL [aside]: The deuce! I must look into this. [Aloud] Listen, Pierre. Some gentlemen will arrive at the house soon to have an interview with your master, Monsieur Rousselin. Do not fail to let me know the moment they come. I will wait here.

PIERRE: Several gentlemen, did you say, Monsieur Murel? And — do they bring news regarding the election? They say that —

MUREL: Enough! Listen to me! You will do me the favour to go immediately to Heurtelot, the bootmaker, and beg him for my sake —

PIERRE: Beg him — for your sake, Monsieur Murel!

MUREL: Pay attention, I tell you! Say to him that he must forget nothing.

PIERRE: Oh, I begin to understand!

MUREL: And that he must be exact in every particular of the instructions he has received, as he is a leader of his class.

PIERRE: I understand perfectly, Monsieur. I will go at once. [Exit.

SCENE II.

MUREL [to M. Gruchet, who enters, L.]: Ah! it is Monsieur Gruchet, if I am not mistaken.

GRUCHET: Yes, in person — Pierre-Antoine Gruchet, at your service, Monsieur.

MUREL: Your visits at this house have become very infrequent of late, it appears to me.

GRUCHET: That is not to be wondered at, considering the change we find in our old friends, the Rousselins. Since they have become so very intimate with these De Bouvignys — and a pretty pair they are! — they put on too many airs to please me.

MUREL: TOO many airs? What do you mean?

GRUCHET [after a slight pause]: Haven't you noticed that their servants now wear buckskins, and that Madame never drives out without two horses? And at dinner — at least, so my maid Félicité informs me — they have all the knives, forks, and spoons changed at each course.

MUREL: But all this does not alter the fact that Monsieur is just the same kindly, generous fellow he always was.

GRUCHET: Certainly not — he is more foolish than blamable. But it is surely a crowning piece of folly for him to show so wild a desire to obtain a deputyship. They say he is forever declaiming and gesticulating before a mirror, and that he even murmurs parliamentary expressions in his sleep!

MUREL [laughs]: Really?

GRUCHET: The title of deputy sounds extremely well, you know. When your name is announced: "Monsieur the Deputy So-and-So" — what a fine effect is produced! Every one salutes you. On one's visiting card, the word "Deputy" comes after the name — how agreeable to the eye! And in travelling, or at the theatre — anywhere, in fact — if any trouble arises, if some person should be insolent to you, or even if a policeman should lay his hand upon your shoulder, you draw yourself up and say, with an air, "Monsieur, you evidently do not know that I am a deputy!"

MUREL: Ha! ha! ha! [Aside] You wouldn't mind being one yourself, my good friend!

GRUCHET: After all, we must not laugh too much at our friend Rousselin's aspirations. If a man has a comfortable house, a few good friends, and a fair amount of tact, he is sure to get on well.

MUREL: Ah, if Monsieur Rousselin succeeds in getting the nomination —

GRUCHET: Well, if he should, what then? He will be the candidate only of the middle class.

MUREL [aside]: Who knows?

GRUCHET: We ought not to be expected to support him, you and I. You see, we are Liberals, and your position, naturally, gives you an influence over the working classes. To be sure, I think you show them rather more consideration than is necessary. I, too, am a friend of the people, but not quite so enthusiastic a friend as you.

MUREL: Well, let us suppose that Rousselin should present his own name —

GRUCHET: I should vote against him.

MUREL [aside]: I was right to be discreet! [Aloud] But, holding such views regarding Monsieur Rousselin, how is it that you care to come to his house?

GRUCHET: I have come here to-day simply to do a slight service for young Julien — you know him.

MUREL: The editor of The Impartial? And how does it happen that you have become the friend of a poet?

GRUCHET: We are not exactly friends. I meet him occasionally at the club, and he has asked me to introduce him to Monsieur Rousselin and his family.

MUREL: He asked you to do this, instead of addressing himself to me, one of the stockholders of The Impartial? What could have been his reason?

GRUCHET: I'm sure I don't know.

MUREL [aside]: That is very strange! [Aloud] Well, my friend, I fear that this idea of presenting Monsieur Julien is not a very happy one for you.

GRUCHET: Why do you say that?

MUREL [looks off, L., paces to and fro, then aside]: Confound that rascal Pierre! he has not yet returned. [Aloud] I said it simply because I know that Monsieur detests Bohemians.

GRUCHET: But this particular one —

MUREL: That particular one above all others, I assure you. Only a week ago — [Draws out his watch and looks at it anxiously]

GRUCHET: What is troubling you? You appear very restless.

MUREL: I am, indeed.

GRUCHET: Business affairs, perhaps.

MUREL: Yes, — my own affairs.

GRUCHET: Ah, I thought so! I am not at all surprised.

MUREL: NOW I shall have the pleasure of listening to a moral lecture, I suppose!

GRUCHET: Oh, I know all about the saddle-horses, the cabs, the hunting-parties, picnics, and all the rest of it. Good heavens, man! when a young fellow is simply a representative of a company, he cannot live as if he kept the cash-box in his pocket.

MUREL: Nonsense! I intend to pay all that I owe.

GRUCHET: Meanwhile, if you find yourself embarrassed, why not borrow of our friend Rousselin?

MUREL: Impossible!

GRUCHET: YOU have borrowed of me, you know, and I am not so rich as he.

MUREL: Yes, I know, but Monsieur Rousselin — that is quite a different matter.

GRUCHET: How is it different? — with a man so generous as he, so ready to serve his friends! [Short pause] There is something under all this. You have a reason, my fine fellow, for not wishing to injure your credit in this house.

MUREL: What do you mean?

GRUCHET: YOU are trying to make yourself agreeable to Mademoiselle Rousselin, hoping that a good marriage will —

MUREL: Oh, the devil! Hold your tongue! Yes, I adore her! Hush! here comes Madame Rousselin. For heaven's sake, not a hint of this!

GRUCHET [aside]: Oh, ho! you adore her, eh? My opinion is that your adoration is directed chiefly towards her dot I

SCENE III.

(The same. Enter Madame Rousselin, through the gate, leaning on the arm of Onésime de Bouvigny; followed by Louise Rousselin and Miss Arabella; the latter carries a book )

MUREL [presents his bouquet to Mme. Rousselin]: Permit me, Madame, to offer you —

MME. ROUSSELIN [takes bouquet and tosses it upon a round table standing L.]: Thank you, Monsieur.

ARABELLA: Oh, what splendid gardenias! Where do you find such beautiful flowers, Monsieur Murel?

MUREL: At my home, Miss Arabella, in my conservatory.

ONÉSIME [with an impertinent air]: Have you a conservatory, Monsieur?

MUREL: Yes, Monsieur, — a hot-house.

LOUISE: And it costs him nothing to make himself agreeable to his friends.

MME. R.: If one could only forget his political preferences!

MUREL [aside to Louise]: Your mamma is rather cold to me to-day.

LOUISE [aside to Murel]: Oh, never mind!

MME. R. [sits, R., beside a small table]: Come and sit beside me, my dear Vicomte. Won't you join us, Monsieur Gruchet? [The gentlemen indicated sit near her] Well, have they found a satisfactory candidate at last? Tell me all the news.

GRUCHET: A great many things have happened, Madame. The most important —

ONÉSIME [interrupts]: My father declares that Monsieur has only to allow his own name to be presented —

MME. R.: Indeed! Is that really his opinion?

ONÉSIME: Without a doubt. And all our peasants, who know well that their interests are in accord with his ideas —

GRUCHET: Which differ a little, however, from the principles of 'eighty-nine.

ONÉSIME [laughs loudly]: Hal ha! ha! the immortal principles of 'eighty-nine!

GRUCHET: May I ask what you are laughing at, Monsieur?

ONÉSIME: Why — why — my father always laughs when he hears that expression.

GRUCHET: Well, I assure you, without 'eighty-nine and its immortal principles, we should have had no deputies at all.

ARABELLA: YOU are quite right, Monsieur Gruchet, to defend the parliament. When a gentleman becomes a member of that body, it is in his power to do a great deal of good.

GRUCHET [to Mme. R.]: One of the greatest advantages is that one may live in Paris during the winter.

MME. R.: And that is certainly an important consideration. Louise, my dear, come and sit near us. A long sojourn in the country becomes very tiresome, does it not, Monsieur Murel?

MUREL [with animation]: Yes, indeed, Madame. [Aside to Louise] It is quite possible, however, to be very happy in the country sometimes!

GRUCHET: One would think that this simple rural spot was agreeable to no one but persons of little sense!

ARABELLA: Oh, no, no, Monsieur! A person of true sentiment must feel his heart throb with pleasure when he finds himself in the deep shadow of these ancient forests; sweet thoughts must possess him when he gazes across these wide fields; and perhaps — who knows? — in some obscure corner of this village a bright intellect is hidden, — some one whose genius will one day dazzle the world! [Sits, and assumes a pose of sentimental reverie]

MME. R. [satirically]: What a romantic tirade, my dear! Really, you are in a more poetic mood than usual to-day.

ONÉSIME: I think Mademoiselle has just favoured us with a quotation — in admirable fashion, except for a very slight accent — from The Lake, by Monsieur de Lamartine.

MME. R.: Indeed. Do you know the work well?

ONÉSIME: No, Madame. I was never allowed to read the works of that author.

MME. R.: Ah, yes, of course. Your education was of a more serious nature. [Takes a skein of wool from the table and indicates to Onésime that he is to hold up his hands in order that she may pass the skein over them. He obeys, and she begins to wind the wool into a ball] Will you have the kindness to assist me, my dear Vicomte? Please keep your arms well extended — there, that will do perfectly.

ONÉSIME: Oh, I know how to perform this delightful office, Madame. [Slight pause, as Mme. Rousselin winds the wool] We were speaking of rural scenery just now, — do you know, I admire exceedingly that little landscape framed in pearls that my sister Elizabeth sent to you.

MME. R.: It is, indeed, a charming work of art. It is now hanging in my boudoir. [Sharply, looking at Louise] Louise, when you have quite finished looking at that magazine, I wish to speak to you.

MUREL [aside]: She certainly suspects me!

MME. R.: I greatly admired the delightful talents of your other sisters also, Vicomte, the last time that we had the pleasure of visiting the Château de Bouvigny.

ONÉSIME: You are very kind, Madame. My mother expects to receive very soon a visit from my great-uncle, the Bishop of Saint-Giraud.

MME. R.: IS the Bishop of Saint-Giraud your uncle, Monsieur?

ONÉSIME: Yes, Madame, and he is also my father's godfather.

MME. R.: Ah, I fear the dear Count, your father, has quite forgotten us by this time — naughty man!

ONÉSIME: Not at all, I assure you, Madame. In fact, I know that he intends very soon to ask Monsieur Rousselin to grant him an interview.

MME. R. [pleased]: Ah!

ONÉSIME: He wishes to consult Monsieur Rousselin about a certain undertaking. [Looks off] Is not that Monsieur Dodart approaching the house?

MUREL [aside, looking off]: The notary! Can it be possible that —

ARABELLA: Yes, it is he. And look! there come Marchais, the grocer, Monsieur Boudois, Monsieur Liégeard, and several other persons.

MUREL [aside]: The devil! What can this mean?

SCENE IV.

(The same. Enter M. Rousselin.)

LOUISE [jumps up and runs to M. Rousseiin]: Ah! it is papa!

ROUSSELIN [with a complacent smile]: Look well at him, my child. You may now indeed be proud of him! [Embraces Mme. R.] Good-morning, my dearest!

MME. R.: What has happened? You look absolutely radiant.

ROUSSELIN [sees Murel]: You here, my good Murel? You have heard the news, I suppose, — and you wished to be the first to greet me.

MUREL: I confess I do not understand you, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN [sees Gruchet]: And Gruchet, too. Ah, my friends, I am delighted as well as touched. [Strikes attitude] Indeed, my fellow-citizens —

GRUCHET: But we don't know what you are talking about.

MUREL: We have heard nothing, I assure you.

ROUSSELIN: Why, they have asked me — in fact, urged me —

ALL: They? Who?

ROUSSELIN [with dignity]: The ministerial committee, which has proposed me as a candidate for this district.

MUREL [aside]: Hang it! Some one has got ahead of me, after all!

MME. R.: Oh, how delightful!

GRUCHET: And shall you accept the nomination?

ROUSSELIN: Why not? I am a conservative, as everyone knows.

MME. R.: Have you given your answer?

ROUSSELIN: Not yet, my dear. I wished to consult you.

MME. R.: I say, accept!

LOUISE: Oh, of course!

MME. R.: You see no reason why I should not do so?

LOUISE: Certainly not! Quite the contrary! Accept, by all means.

ROUSSELIN: Frankly, now, — you think it would be a wise action on my part?

MME. R.: Yes, yes!

ROUSSELIN: Very well, then. At least, I can always say that you urged me to take this step. [About to go]

MUREL [detains him]: Just a word of warning. Be a little prudent about this matter. Don't act too hastily.

ROUSSELIN [astonished]: Why, what do you mean?

MUREL: Well, you know, such a candidacy is not, after all, a very serious matter.

ROUSSELIN: And why not, pray?

SCENE V.

(The same, including M. Marchais, followed by M. Dodart)

MARCHAIS: I salute the company! Ladies, pray pardon my intrusion. I was instructed to come here to learn Monsieur Rousselin's intentions. It is necessary that he should give us a speedy reply, and we hope for a favourable one.

ROUSSELIN: Certainly.

MARCHAIS: Because we believe that you are a practical man, and would make a good deputy.

ROUSSELIN: A deputy! [Delighted.]
(Enter M. Dodart )

DODART: Well, Monsieur Rousselin, everyone outside is very impatient to know your decision.

GRUCHET [aside, grumbling]: That Dodart! A regular hypocrite!

DODART [to Onésime]: Monsieur, your noble father, who is at present in the court outside, requested me to tell you that he desires to speak to you.

MUREL [to Gruchet]: Ah! his papa has arrived, it appears.

GRUCHET [to Murel]: He arrived immediately after these men entered the grounds. He means to keep his eye on our friend Rousselin,, you may be sure.

MUREL: Pardon my interruption, Monsieur Dodart. [To Rousselin] Invent some pretext to gain time before replying — only a little delay. [To Marchais ] Say to Monsieur Rousselin's friends that he begs for a, little delay, as he is not feeling quite well, but that as soon as he recovers he will give them his answer. Go and tell them that immediately. [Exit Marchais ]

ROUSSELIN: I say, Murel, what the deuce did you do that for? Rather cool proceeding on your part,! should say!

MUREL: My dear friend, I assure you it is not the proper thing to accept a candidacy in that fashion — on the spur of the moment.

ROUSSELIN: But for the last three years I have thought of nothing else than the possibility of obtaining it!

MUREL: To speak frankly, I think that you are making a blunder in this affair. Ask Monsieur Dodart, a man of common-sense who has had plenty of experience and knows this district well, whether he thinks your chance of election is good — a sure thing, in short.

DODART: I will not say it is sure, of course. But I believe he stands a very good chance of being elected. No one can be sure of the result of an election, especially as we do not know whether our adversaries —

GRUCHET [interrupts]: And they are very numerous!

ROUSSELIN [astonished]: Numerous, did you say?

MUREL: Certainly they are. [To Dodart] You will have the kindness, then, to excuse our friend here, who wishes to have a little time for reflection. [To Rousselin ] Ah, if you will risk everything, prepare for the consequences!

ROUSSELIN: Perhaps you are right. [To Dodart] Yes, Monsieur Dodart, pray ask them to allow me a brief delay in order that I may consider the matter.

DODART [bows]: Very well. Monsieur Onésime, shall we go?

MUREL: By all means. It will not do to keep his papa waiting!

ROUSSELIN [to Murel, who has taken Onésime by the arm, about to go]: What, are you going too? Why do you leave me?

MUREL: That is my secret! Now, don't worry! Wait and see!
[Exit with Onésime and Dodart.]

SCENE VI.

(Robsselin, Mme. Rousselin, Louise, Miss Arabella, and Gruchet )

ROUSSELIN: What can he be going to do?

GRUCHET: I know nothing at all about it.

MME. R.: What an absurd fellow he is!

GRUCHET: YOU may be sure it is some boyish joke of his. [Laughs]
Oh, Monsieur Rousselin, I came here to-day to ask permission to present to you a young man — a friend of mine — who desires the honour of your acquaintance.

ROUSSELIN: Very well, bring him along.

GRUCHET: But I do not wish to do anything that might be disagreeable to you. Sometimes, you know, you have your little — prejudices. In short, the young man I wish to introduce is Monsieur Julien Duprat.

ROUSSELIN: NO, no! Not that man!

GRUCHET: Will you tell me why you forbid it?

ROUSSELIN: Don't speak to me of him, I say! [Sees newspaper lying on the round table; picks it up] I have said several times that this sheet should not be brought into my house. [Examines the journal] But it appears that I am not master here. Look! here are some of Duprat's verses!

GRUCHET: Very likely, I should think, since he is a poet.

ROUSSELIN: I don't like poets — they are all blackguards and rascals!

ARABELLA [somewhat breathlessly]: I assure you, Monsieur, that I once had a short conversation with Monsieur Duprat in the public park, and he is — very charming indeed!

GRUCHET [to Rousselin]: If you would only receive him!

ROUSSELIN: I am less inclined than ever to do so — [to Louise] less than ever, I tell you, Louise.

LOUISE: Oh, I am not defending him, papa.

ROUSSELIN: I should hope not — a fellow like that!

ARABELLA [with strong emotion]: AH!

GRUCHET: But, my dear Rousselin, why are you so bitter against Monsieur Duprat?

ROUSSELIN: Because — pardon me, Miss Arabella! [To Mme. R.] Will you ladies oblige me by going into the house, my dear? I wish to explain something to Monsieur Gruchet.

[Exit Mme. R., Louise, and Miss Arabella ]

SCENE VII.

GRUCHET: Well, I am ready to hear you. [Sits on bench, L.]

ROUSSELIN [takes up journal]: The poem I noticed in this sheet is entitled "Again to Her!" [Reads]

"Under the bright Egyptian sky, The stony, crouching sphinxes sigh
When torments harsh their breasts assail, Because of" —

I have a pretty shrewd idea in my head as to this sphinx business, my friend!

GRUCHET: And I, too, although I don't quite understand all the allusions.

ROUSSELIN [taps the journal in his hand]: This is the continuation of a clandestine correspondence, that's what it is!

GRUCHET: Explain yourself more clearly, I beg.

ROUSSELIN: Well, I will tell you, in confidence, that a week ago last Tuesday, while I was walking in my garden very early in the morning — I am so much upset nowadays that I don't sleep well — I perceived, between the trellis and the fruit-wall —

GRUCHET: A man?

ROUSSELIN: NO, a letter. The envelope was rather large, and looked as if it might enclose some sort of petition, but it was addressed simply "To Her!" Of course I opened it, as you may imagine, and found inside a declaration of love in verse. And such stanzas, my friend K I assure you, they were passionate and inflammatory to a degree!

GRUCHET: I suppose the lines were not signed, of course. Was there any clue to the identity of the sender?

ROUSSELIN: Listen! I said to myself that the first thing to do was to discover who was the lady that had inspired these glowing lines; and as they speak of dark hair, my suspicion fell at first upon Miss Arabella, our governess.

GRUCHET: But she is a blonde!

ROUSSELIN: What does that matter? Poets often use one word instead of another, for the sake of the rhyme. However, purely as a matter of delicacy — you know what English women are — I have not ventured to ask her any questions.

GRUCHET: But what did your wife say?

ROUSSELIN: She only gave a shrug, and advised me not to bother my head about it.

GRUCHET: But why do you suspect Julien of being, the author of the stanzas?

ROUSSELIN: I will explain. First, I must tell you that the poem I found in the garden began with these words.

“I behold thy robe among the orange-trees.”

Now, I possess two orangeries, one on each side of the house, and there are no others in this neighbourhood. What does this show? That the declaration was addressed to some member of my household. To whom? Evidently to my daughter, Louise. And by whom? By the only person in this part of the country that writes verses — Julien Duprat I (Gruchet makes a movement of dissent) Moreover, when I compared the handwriting of the verses found by the wall with that which I see every day on the wrappers of the journal, I saw at once that they were exactly similar.

GRUCHET [aside]: Clumsy Julien!

ROUSSELIN: So that is your protégé, Gruchet. What does he propose to do in this house — seduce Mademoiselle Rousselin?

GRUCHET: Oh, what an idea!

ROUSSELIN: To marry her, perhaps.

GRUCHET: Well, he might wish to do that.

ROUSSELIN [drily]: I think it very likely! Upon my soul! these fellows have no respect for anyone. What insolence! Do I ask anything of him? Do I mix myself up in his affairs? Let him write his newspaper articles! Let him try to stir up the people against me! Let him then make apologies to mud-slingers like himself! If I should see him this moment, I would say: Get away from here, you miserable little hanger-on of newspaper offices, and hunt elsewhere for an heiress!

GRUCHET: Humph! as to that, my friend, there are others besides journalists who seek your daughter for the sake of her money.

ROUSSELIN: What are you saying?

GRUCHET: Why, the thing is plain enough to be seen! A certain person, we will say, lives in the country, where he cultivates, with his own hands, the soil owned by his ancestors. He does it very badly, to be sure, but is forced to it by reasons of economy. The land is now poor, besides being heavily mortgaged. This person has eight children, five of whom are girls, one of them a humpback. One never sees the other daughters on week-days, because of deficiencies in their toilets. The eldest of the sons speculated in stocks for a time, but is now making a beast of himself with absinthe, and his need of money is frequent. The second son, fortunately, is to be a priest. The youngest son — you know him, he is very much in evidence just now. Existence cannot be very gay in the ancestral castle, where the rain falls on the head through the holes in the roof. But our gentleman lays his plans, and one fine day he packs them all into the rickety old family carriage, which he drives himself, and they come to refresh themselves at the excellent table of that good Monsieur Rousselin, who is only too happy to be thus honoured!

ROUSSELIN: See here, my friend, you carry your obstinate resentment against that family rather too far.

GRUCHET: Well, I don't understand why you should have so much respect for the Bouvignys, unless it is a survival of the deference your class was once compelled to pay to the aristocrats who were in former days your masters.

ROUSSELIN [pained]: Gruchet, not a word of that, my friend, not a word! That thought is — GRUCHET: Oh, don't be afraid! They will never say anything about it, and for good reasons.

ROUSSELIN: What reasons?

GRUCHET: Don't you see that these aristocrats despise us because we are plebeians — parvenus? That they are jealous of you because you are rich? The proffer of the candidacy to you — due, I have no doubt, to the management of Bouvigny, and of which he will probably boast — is merely a bait to catch your daughter's fortune. But, although it is quite possible that you will not be elected —

ROUSSELIN: Not be elected?

GRUCHET: Certainly — I said it was quite possible. Nevertheless, your daughter will probably become the wife of a young idiot who will blush to acknowledge his father-in-law.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, but I believe they have some sentiment in the matter.

GRUCHET: YOU think so, do you? But suppose I tell you that already they speak as if they owned you!

ROUSSELIN: Who told you that?

GRUCHET: Félicité, my maid. You know how servants talk over, among themselves, all the affairs of their masters.

ROUSSELIN: But what have they said? Tell me that.

GRUCHET: Their cook heard them talking mysteriously of this possible marriage of their son to Mademoiselle Louise, and when the Countess expressed some doubt about being able to bring it to pass, the Count, alluding to you, said, "Bah! he will feel himself only too much honoured!"

ROUSSELIN: Ah, they think they honour me, eh? 1

GRUCHET: They believe the affair is as good as settled.

ROUSSELIN: It is not, however, — thank heaven!

GRUCHET: They are so confident that just now, before the ladies, Onésime took on a little air of proprietorship.

ROUSSELIN: Did he, indeed?

GRUCHET: A little more, and I think he would have said "thee" and "thou" to them!

PIERRE [announcing]: Monsieur the Count de Bouvigny! [Exit].

GRUCHET: The Count! I will go. Good-bye, Rousselin. Don't forget what I have said to you. [Enter Bouvigny. Gruchet passes in front of him, keeping his hat on his head; the two exchange disdainful glances. At the door Gruchet turns and shakes his fist at Bouvigny's back] I think I've settled your business, my fine gentleman! [Exit].

SCENE VIII.

(Rousselin, the Count de Bouvigny )

BOUVIGNY [In a tone of easy familiarity]: I asked for a private interview, my dear fellow, with the intention of —

ROUSSELIN [interrupts with ceremonious dignity, inviting the Count, with a gesture, to be seated]: Monsieur de Bouvigny!

BOUVIGNY [sighs]: Oh, ceremony is not necessary between us, is it? I wish to say, in a few words — flattering myself in advance that you will grant the request I am about to make — that I have the honour to ask the hand in marriage of your daughter, Mademoiselle Louise, for my son, the Vicomte Onésime-Gaspard-Oliver de Bouvigny. [of pause] Well, your answer, Monsieur?

ROUSSELIN: I can say nothing just at present.

BOUVIGNY: Ah, I forgot! Mademoiselle has great expectations, of course, and — as a dot — a settlement — well, in short, Monsieur Dodart, who holds the titles to certain mortgages [lowers his voice], will not fail to do the right thing, [all pause] I await your answer, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN: Monsieur de Bouvigny, your proposition does me very great honour, but —

BOUVIGNY [annoyed]: Eh, Monsieur? But what?

ROUSSELIN: I fear that some one must have greatly exaggerated to you the amount of my fortune.

BOUVIGNY: And do you think we consider a thing like that? Do you imagine that the house of Bouvigny —

ROUSSELIN [drily]: Far be it from me to impute to you any mercenary motives! .Nevertheless, it is only right to tell you that I am not so rich as many persons believe.

BOUVIGNY [graciously]: The disproportion in other respects would only be less marked!

ROUSSELIN: However, in spite of the modest amount of my revenues, we manage to live with a certain degree of comfort. My wife has rather expensive tastes, and I am fond of entertaining, and of making happy everyone around me. I repaved, at my own expense, the road from Bugueux to Faverville. I have established a school, and have endowed at the hospital four beds which bear my name.

BOUVIGNY: These facts are very well known, my dear sir.

ROUSSELIN: I have rehearsed them only to convince you that, although the son of a banker, and once in that business myself, I am comfortably well off, but not what is generally considered a man of great wealth. As to Monsieur 'Onésime, his rank would not in itself be an obstacle, but there is a serious drawback, nevertheless. Your son has rio occupation.

BOUVIGNY [proudly]: Sir, a gentleman of my son's rank can take up no profession but that of arms!

ROUSSELIN: But he is not a soldier.

BOUVIGNY: He is waiting, in order to serve his country, until the government is changed.

ROUSSELIN: And while waiting?

BOUVIGNY: He will live in his own domains, as I live, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN: TO wear out his shoes in hunting — very good! But,

Monsieur, I prefer to give my daughter to some one whose fortune — pardon me for using the word! — is even less than your son's.

BOUVIGNY: But your daughter's fortune is assured, is it not?

ROUSSELIN: Yes! But I prefer to give her to a man who has nothing at all.

BOUVIGNY: Nothing at all!

ROUSSELIN [rises]: Yes, Monsieur, a simple workman, a person without breeding or culture!

BOUVIGNY [rises]: Is it your intention to express scorn of rank and aristocratic breeding?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, Monsieur. I am a son of the Revolution!

BOUVIGNY: Your manners show it, believe me!

ROUSSELIN: And I do not allow myself to be dazzled by the glitter of brilliant titles.

BOUVIGNY: Nor I by that of gold!

ROUSSELIN: We no longer cringe low before the nobility, thank heaven!

BOUVIGNY: True! I remember that your grandfather was a servant in our household!

ROUSSELIN: Ah, you wish to insult me! Go, Monsieur! The consideration of one's reputation is to-day a privilege belonging to everyone. Mine is above your sneers and calumnies. Has not a group of worthy citizens just waited upon me in order to offer me the candidacy?

BOUVIGNY: Let me tell you that they wished to offer it first to me, and I declined it in your favour! But in the face of such indelicacy on your part, after the declaration of your principles, and since you have practically announced yourself a democrat, a supporter of anarchy —

ROUSSELIN: Of anarchy! Not at all!

BOUVIGNY: An organ of disorder, I say — I have resolved to take back my refusal. I shall declare myself a candidate — a conservative candidate, you understand — and we shall see which will win! I am the friend of the prefect who has just been nominated. I shall tell him everything, and he will support me. Good evening, Monsieur!
[Exit.]

SCENE IX.

ROUSSELIN: Now he is so furious now that he is quite capable of doing all he can to ruin me in public opinion — even of representing me as a Jacobite! Perhaps I did wrong to hurt his feelings. But to be expected to hand over a large part of my fortune to set up the Bouvignys — that was a little too much! Well, it can't be helped now, but it is a pity to break with him. Murel and Gruchet already appear to me to be less certain of my election than they were, and we must find some means to persuade the Conservatives that I am in reality the most conservative of men! Ha! what does this mean?

SCENE X.

(Enter Murel, followed by a crowd of Electors, then by Heurtelot, Beaumesnil, Voinchet, Hombourg, Ledru, then Gruchet )

MUREL: My dear fellow-citizen, the electors here present have come to offer you, through me, the candidacy of the Liberal party of this district.

ROUSSELIN: But, gentlemen —

MUREL: YOU will have the majority of votes in the communes of Faverville, Harolle, Lahoussaye, Sannevas, Bonneval, Hautot, Saint-Mathieu —

ROUSSELIN [delighted]: Ah, indeed!

MUREL: Randau, Manerville, and La Coudrette. In short, we count on a majority of more than fifteen hundred votes, and your election is practically assured.

ROUSSELIN: Ah, my fellow-citizens — [Aside to Murel] I don't know what to say!

MUREL: Allow me to present to you some of your political friends. Here is the most enthusiastic of all, a true patriot — Monsieur Heurtelot, a manufacturer —

HEURTELOT: Oh, say shoemaker — it is all the same to me!

MUREL: Monsieur Hombourg, proprietor of the Golden Lion, and also of a livery stable. Monsieur Voinchet, nurseryman; Monsieur Beaumesnil, without a profession; and the brave Captain Ledru, retired.

ROUSSELIN [with enthusiasm]: Ah, the military!

MUREL: And we are all convinced that you will fill this high office in the most satisfactory manner. [Aside to Rousselin] Say something.

ROUSSELIN: Gentlemen — no, citizens! My principles are yours — and — certainly — I am a son of this soil — like yourselves. No one has ever heard me say anything against the cause of liberty. Quite the contrary! You will find in me a servant devoted to your interests — a defender — a barrier against the encroachments of Power!

MUREL [presses Rousselin's hand]: Good! my friend, very good! Have no doubt as to the result of your nomination! First of all, you will be sustained and upheld by that well-known journal, The Impartial.

ROUSSELIN: The Impartial will support me, you say?

GRUCHET [coming forward from the midst of the group]: Absolutely, I assure you. I have just come from the editor's office. Julien Duprat is most enthusiastic. [Surprised at seeing Murel; then aside to him] He has given me his reasons — I will explain to you later. [To the Electors] You will permit me, gentlemen. [Makes his way to Rousselin; then aside to him] Now, then, my friend, don't you think you would do well to follow my advice?

ROUSSELIN: TO follow your advice? Pardon me! I have a head of my own, you know.

GRUCHET: I mean — to let me present Julien to you? He is very desirous to meet you.

ROUSSELIN: IS it — absolutely necessary?

GRUCHET: Oh, indispensable!

ROUSSELIN: Well, then — yes, — as you please.
[Exit Gruchet.]

HEURTELOT [takes Rousselin by the elbow and turns him squarely around]: That is not all, by any means, Monsieur. One of the first things you must do after you are elected is to abolish the tax on liquors.

ROUSSELIN: Abolish the tax on liquors — oh, yes, certainly!

HEURTELOT: The other candidates have made fine promises, but after election they tell you to go and take a walk! But I believe you are an honest man — give me your hand on it! [Extends his own hand]

ROUSSELIN [with a slight hesitation]: Willingly, sir, willingly!

HEURTELOT: That's all right, then. It is high time that some of these public abuses should stop. We have suffered from them quite long enough.

HOMBOURG: I believe you! A man can make nothing now in the livery business. The price of hay is beyond all reason.

ROUSSELIN: That is quite true. The occupation of agriculture —

HOMBOURG: I am not talking about agriculture, but about the livery business.

MUREL: And a most important business it is! But now, thanks to our friend here, the government will —

LEDRU: Bah! the government! It decorates a lot of good-for-nothing puppies!

VOINCHET: I wish to say that the laying out of the railway so that it shall run through Saint-Mathieu, is a piece of imbecile folly.

BEAUMESNIL: A man cannot educate his children properly in these days.

ROUSSELIN: I promise you all —

HOMBOURG: First of all, the rights of liverymen.

ROUSSELIN: Yes, yes!

LEDRU: That is, when they are in the interest of discipline.

ROUSSELIN: Of course!

VOINCHET: You must persuade the railway company to lay the road by way of Bonneval.

ROUSSELIN: Certainly, certainly!

BEAUMESNIL: AS for me, I have only the best intentions —

ROUSSELIN: I believe you, Monsieur.

HOMBOURG: Thus, in order to rent a carriage —

LEDRU: I ask nothing for myself, but —

VOINCHET: My property will be greatly injured if —

BEAUMESNIL: Really, you know, since there are colleges —

MUREL [loudly]. My fellow-citizens, pardon me! One word! Gentlemen, on this occasion, when our beloved fellow-citizen here has so well expressed himself, — in language which I might almost call classic in its simplicity — and has so well confirmed our hopes, I am very happy to have been your spokesman. In order to celebrate this event — the influence of which will spread over all the district, and perhaps over France — permit me to invite you to partake, next Monday, of a punch of my own brewing!

ELECTORS [together]: Bravo! Agreed! Next Monday be it!

MUREL: And now, I believe, nothing remains for us to do but to retire.

ELECTORS [together]: Good morning, Monsieur Rousselin I Good luck! All will go well! You will see!

ROUSSELIN [shakes hands with several of the Electors]: My friends, I am indeed touched! Good morning! I am your servant, gentlemen! [Electors retire slowly up stage, talking together]

MUREL [aside to Rousselin]: You must cultivate Heurtelot a little; he is a leader among them. [Follows Electors up stage and delays their exit]

ROUSSELIN [calls]: Oh, Monsieur Heurtelot, one moment!

HEURTELOT [returns]: Yes, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN [speaks confidentially]: Could you not make me fifteen pairs of boots?

HEURTELOT: Fifteen pairs, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN: Yes, and as many pairs of shoes. I am not going on a long journey, but I think it wise to provide myself with a good supply of foot-wear.

HEURTELOT: They shall be begun at once, Monsieur. At your service! [Bows low, and rejoins the Electors]

HOMBOURG [approaches Rousselin, speaking confidentially]: Monsieur Rousselin, I have recently bought a pair of beautiful chestnut horses, and they would look superb harnessed to your carriage. Would you like to see them?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, yes! One of these days. [Hombourg rejoins Electors]

VOINCHET [approaches Rousselin]: I will send you a little memorandum about the laying out of that new railroad, showing that by running it through my property —

ROUSSELIN: Very well, very well! [Voinchet rejoins Electors]

BEAUMESNIL: I mean to bring my son to call on you, and you will be convinced that it would be deplorable to allow so promising a boy to grow up without a proper education.

ROUSSELIN: He shall be permitted to re-enter his classes, I promise it.

HEURTELOT: That's something like a candidate! Hurrah for Rousselin!

ALL: Hurrah for Rousselin! [Exit Electors.]

SCENE XI.

(Rousselin, Murel )

ROUSSELIN [rushes to Murel and embraces him]: Ah, my friend, my dear, good friend!

MUREL: Well, do you think I managed that part of the business satisfactorily?

ROUSSELIN: I never can find words to express my gratitude and appreciation.

MUREL: YOU are very desirous to obtain this nomination, aren't you?

ROUSSELIN: Well, I don't mind telling you that I am very anxious to get it. You see, after I retired from active business life, and had spent about a year or two out here in the country, I began to feel a certain lassitude creeping over me. I became dull and heavy. I used to go to sleep every evening after dinner; and finally the doctor told my wife it was absolutely necessary for me to find something to occupy myself with. So I cast about in my mind to decide upon some agreeable occupation.

MUREL: And you thought you would like to become a deputy, eh?

ROUSSELIN: Naturally. Besides, I have arrived at an age when a man owes something to himself. I have bought a library and I have subscribed to The (Monitor).

MUREL: You have laid out some pretty stiff work for yourself, I should say!

ROUSSELIN: Then I joined the Archaeological Society, and I have already received, through the mails, several pamphlets on archaeology.

After awhile I was chosen as a member of the municipal council; next, of the district council; and finally, of the general council; and when any important questions came up in the affairs of these councils, I never compromised myself by making any statements or remarks — I only smiled discreetly! Ah, the non-committal smile is a great resource sometimes, my boy!

MUREL: But in doing that, you see, you never allow the public to become acquainted with your real ideas and sympathies; and now it is time to declare yourself. Perhaps you do not know —

ROUSSELIN: Oh, yes! I know that I owe everything to you alone.

MUREL: NO, no! You don't understand at all.

ROUSSELIN: Perhaps not! That's your modesty. What a diplomat you are, my dear fellow!

MUREL [aside]: He's trying to pique me! [Aloud] Frankly, the workmen in my factory were against you when your name was first proposed, and they are redoubtable men, I assure you. But now they are all in your favour.

ROUSSELIN: YOU are worth your weight in gold!

MUREL [aside]: I don't ask quite so much as that!

ROUSSELIN [looks at Murel admiringly]: You are dearer to me than a brother! You are like my own son!

MUREL [significantly]: Well, I might be — that!

ROUSSELIN: No doubt [sudden movement from Murel], if I were only a trifle older.

MUREL [with a forced laugh]: Or if — I — should become your — son-in-law! How would you like that?

ROUSSELIN [also with a forced laugh]: You're a great joker! You know you wouldn't like it yourself.

MUREL [earnestly]: But indeed I should!

ROUSSELIN: Nonsense! Marry, with your Parisian habits?

MUREL: I should live in the country.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, pshaw! Men of your age don't marry.

MUREL: Thirty-four years — it is just the right age.

ROUSSELIN: Especially when they have before them such a future as yours.

MUREL: My future prospects would be greatly improved if — ROUSSELIN: Now let us reason a little. Here you are, simply the manager of the Bugneaux spinning-mills, representing the Flemish company, and you have a salary of twenty thousand francs.

MUREL: And a considerable sum coming to me besides, in perquisites and privileges.

ROUSSELIN: But how about the years when business is bad? And then, of course, you might lose your place at any time.

MUREL: Then I should go somewhere else, where I could find —

ROUSSELIN: But you have debts and dishonoured bills — you are harassed by your creditors.

MUREL: I have some means of my own, nevertheless, to say nothing of my expectations.

ROUSSELIN: Ah, you mean you expect to inherit something from your aunt. You do not really count upon that, do you? Your aunt lives two hundred leagues away from this place, and besides you are not on good terms with her.

MUREL [aside]: The old brute! He finds out everything!

ROUSSELIN: In short, my dear Murel, although I doubt neither your intelligence nor your industry, I prefer to give my daughter to a man who —

MUREL: Who has nothing at all, and is a fool into the bargain, I suppose!

ROUSSELIN: NO, but whose fortune, though small, would be certain.

MUREL [scornfully]: Ah, indeed!

ROUSSELIN: Yes, Monsieur, to a gentleman possessing a modest income, or to a small landed proprietor living in this part of the country.

MUREL: Apparently, you have not a very high opinion of a man that works.

ROUSSELIN: Listen to me, my good fellow! Industry is very commendable, but it is not to be depended upon — its results are not sure — and a good father must look carefully after the interests of his child.

MUREL: Then you refuse to give me your daughter?

ROUSSELIN [very good-naturedly, taking Murel's hand]: I am forced to do so, but really it is not my fault, and I speak entirely without rancour. [Calls] Pierre! Bring my writing-case and an inkstand. [To Murel] Sit down here. You must now prepare my declaration of policy for the electors.

(Enter Pierre, with writing materials; puts them on small table, R. Exit
)

MUREL: I must prepare it, you say?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, and afterward we will look it over together. But you begin it, there's a good fellow! With your spirit and imagination, you will be sure to do it well, — better than I could, although you did praise me for my speech to the electors. It was good, wasn't it? Now I will leave you for a short time, as I have to look after some rather pressing matters. Give them something lively — something fiery — wake them up! [Exit

SCENE XII.

MUREL: Fool! I've advanced my interests beautifully, I must say!
[Looks after Rousselin] You old idiot! You'll never find anyone that will be so useful to you as I. How shall I pay him back, or rather, how can I frighten him? He would sacrifice anything for the sake of being elected. I shall have to threaten him with a dangerous political rival. But whom? [Enter Gruchet] Ah, Gruchet!

GRUCHET: YOU look disturbed. What is the matter with you?

MUREL: Remorse! I have just done a stupid thing — and you, too.

GRUCHET: In what way?

MUREL: YOU were here just now, with the men that promised to support Rousselin's candidacy. You saw and heard him.

GRUCHET: Yes, and then I went to find Julien — he is coming here directly.

MUREL: It is not a question of Julien, but of Rousselin. That man is an ass! He doesn't know how to say four words properly. We shall have a fine deputy!

GRUCHET: Well, I did not take the initiative step!

MUREL: He has shown himself to be possessed of scarcely mediocre intelligence.

GRUCHET: Quite true!

MUREL: But that doesn't prevent him from, being regarded with great consideration in this neighbourhood, — even more than you yourself receive.

GRUCHET [vexed]: More than I!

MUREL: I don't wish to offend you, but of course I know you do not enjoy, in this town, the distinction that belongs to the Rousselins.

GRUCHET: Oh, if I wished it — [Short pause]

MUREL [looks Gruchet full in the eyes]: Gruchet, would you be willing to raise yourself in the world, even if it should put you to a rather heavy expense?

GRUCHET: Heavy expense? That sort of thing is not very much to my taste, but what do you mean?

MUREL: Suppose some one said to you: For a consideration of several thousand francs, you may take Rousselin's place — you shall become deputy?

GRUCHET: I? Deputy?

MUREL: Just think what a glorious time you would have in Paris, where you would be in the very midst of great affairs! You would meet hundreds of delightful people — even the ministers. You would know all about everything — society gossip, news about important public works, the latest thing on the Bourse — everything! What influence you might have, my friend, and what an experience!

GRUCHET: But how can all this possibly come about? Rousselin is almost elected.

MUREL: Not yet! He failed to mention his ideas on the rights of franchise when he made the declaration of his policy; and then — a little — manipulation — is easy! Several electors were not in favour of his nomination in the first place. Heurtelot, in particular grumbled at it.

GRUCHET: The shoemaker? I have a seizure against him for the day after to-morrow.

MUREL: Put it off! He is looked up to by his fellows. With regard to the others, we shall see. I shall arrange matters so that the dissatisfaction with Rousselin shall begin among the workmen in our mills; then, if it becomes necessary for me to declare myself outright for you, I shall do so.

As Monsieur Rousselin has not shown a sufficiently patriotic spirit, I feel compelled to withdraw from his support! More than that, I know him now for what he is — a blockhead!

GRUCHET: Gently! gently! [Falls into a reverie]

MUREL: Who can stop you? You are on the "left" side, aren't you? Your name can be brought up by that faction, as a member of the Chamber; but even if you fail of election, the votes cast for you will take away from Rousselin any chance he might have of being elected.

GRUCHET: That would make him furious!

MUREL: It will not cost much to try it — perhaps a few hundred francs in the wine-shops.

GRUCHET [with interest]: No more than that, you think?

MUREL: NOW I am going to stir up the district! Soon you will be nominated, and Rousselin will be buried — out of sight! You will have the satisfaction of seeing that some persons that appear not to know you now, will then bow very low and say, "Monsieur the deputy, I have the honour to offer you my respects!"

SCENE XIII.

MUREL: My young friend Duprat, you cannot see Monsieur Rousselin. JULIEN: I cannot see him, you say?

MUREL: Precisely. He and I have had some disagreement over politics.

JULIEN: But I do not understand. Just now you came to my house to tell me that I must support Monsieur Rousselin, and gave me a mass of reasons — which I repeated to Monsieur Gruchet. He accepted them immediately, all the sooner since he desires —

GRUCHET [hastily]: That matter is entirely between you and me, Julien. This is another affair altogether — something that does not concern Rousselin.

JULIEN: Then what is the trouble regarding him?

MUREL: I will tell you in a few words — he is not the right man for our party.

GRUCHET [complacently]: Another candidate must be found!

MUREL: YOU shall know soon the name of the next candidate. But let us get out of here. We mustn't conspire on the very grounds of the enemy.

JULIEN: The enemy! Rousselin?

MUREL: Certainly! And you will please oblige us by attacking him vigorously in The Impartial.

JULIEN: But why? I don't know of anything bad to say about him.

GRUCHET: With a little exercise of the imagination, it should be easy to find something.

JULIEN: I am not in the habit of doing that sort of thing, Monsieur!

GRUCHET: NOW listen! You came to me first to offer me your services, and, knowing that I was a friend of Rousselin, you begged me — yes, that's the word — to introduce you here.

JULIEN: And no sooner do I arrive than you take back your promise to present me.

GRUCHET: It is not my fault if political affairs have taken a turn in the other direction.

JULIEN: And is it mine?

GRUCHET: YOU will remember, it was distinctly understood between us that you should publish some slashing articles against the Society of the Turf of Grumesnil-les-Arbois — the president of which is the Count de Bouvigny — demonstrating the financial incapacity of its leader. A fine affair, that Society! from which that scoundrelly Dodart has excluded me!

MUREL [aside]: Oh! So this is the secret of the alliance between Gruchet and our young friend!

GRUCHET: Up to the present, however, you have done nothing whatever, which is a very good reason why you should now do something effective. Besides, what we wish you to do is not at all difficult.

JULIEN: I don't care what it is! I refuse!

MUREL: Julien, you appear to forget the terms of your engagement with our journal.

JULIEN: Oh, I remember them well enough! You engaged me to make extracts from other publications; to write bright little stories about lost dogs, floods, fires, and accidents, and to write up, with plenty of clever hits, the daily happenings of life in Paris! I must seek interviews, listen to explanations, receive all visitors, work like a galley-slave, lead a regular dog's life, and never, under any conditions, be my own master in anything! Well, for once I ask to be excused.

MUREL: All the worse for you!

GRUCHET: I conclude that it was not necessary for you to accept this engagement with The Impartial!

JULIEN: Not necessary! Ah! if only I could have found another!

GRUCHET: Oh, indeed! Well, when a man has no means to fall back upon, I should think it would be rather pleasant to have a good comfortable berth like this.

JULIEN [walks slowly up stage]: Ah, the misery of poverty!

MUREL: Let him pout! We might as well sit down here a few moments, long enough for me to write out your declaration of policy.

GRUCHET: Willingly! [They sit; Murel draws out paper and pencil and begins to write; Gruchet looks over his shoulder]

JULIEN [stands up stage; looks up at Rousselin's house]: How gladly would I rid myself of my wretched existence, were it not for thee, my love! Oh, I cannot allow the slightest grief or anxiety on my account to come to thee — herein thine own home! May the walls that shelter thee be blessed! [Looks off] It appears to me that I can distinguish a white robe out there — among the acacias. Now it has disappeared! Farewell! [About to go]

GRUCHET [looks around at Julien]: Wait a moment, we have something to show you.

JULIEN: Ah! I have had enough of your dirty work!
[Exit.]

MUREL [holds up sheet of paper]: There! What do you think of it?

GRUCHET: It is very well done! Thank you! But —

MUREL: Well, what is it?.

GRUCHET: The thought of Rousselin disturbs me a little.

MUREL: Pooh! He is a person of very little consequence.

GRUCHET: You don't know what he is capable of doing. Young Duprat appeared extremely angry just now, didn't he?

MUREL: My opinion is, he must have some strong reason for wishing to become acquainted with the Rousselins.

GRUCHET: To be sure he has! He is in love with Louise.

MUREL: Who told you so?

GRUCHET: Rousselin himself.

MUREL [aside]: Another rival! Bah! I have knocked over more formidable ones than he! [Aloud] I am going to find Julien again, and catechise him. In the meantime, you must get this declaration of policy set up at the printer's; then go around and see as many of your friends as you can, and meet me here again in two hours.

GRUCHET: Agreed! [Exit.]

MUREL: And now, Monsieur Rousselin, I think the time will come when you will be glad to offer me your daughter!

ACT II.

Scene: A promenade in a public square. A café, L. 2 E.; the walls and the iron gates leading to the grounds belonging to Rousselin's house, R. 2 E. As the curtain rises, a bill-poster is discovered affixing a placard to Rousselin's wall.

SCENE I.

(Heurtelot, Marchais, a Village Policeman, and a crowd of citizens )

POLICEMAN: Move on, there! Get away from the wall, so that everyone can read the proclamation. CITIZENS: That's right! Stand back! [Crowd moves back]

HEURTELOT: Ah, it is De Bouvigny's declaration of policy!

MARCHAIS: What! Is he nominated?

HEURTELOT: NO, no! It is Gruchet who will get the . nomination now. Read what is on the placard.

MARCHAIS: I — read it?

HEURTELOT: Yes.

MARCHAIS: YOU read the first part of it. [Aside] He does not know his alphabet! [Aloud] Well?

HEURTELOT: But why don't you read it?

MARCHAIS: I?

HEURTELOT [aside]: He doesn't know how to spell! [Aloud] Well — ahem!

POLICEMAN: And these ignoramuses vote! Wait — I'll read it for you. First, I'll read Bouvigny's: "My friends! Yielding to your urgent request, I believe it my duty to present myself as a candidate for your votes — "

HEURTELOT [interrupts]: Oh, we know all about him I Read another — read Gruchet's.

POLICEMAN: "Fellow-citizens! In obedience to the wishes of my friends, I present myself — "

MARCHAIS [interrupts]: What a farce! That's enough about him!

POLICEMAN: Now I will read Monsieur Rousselin's announcement: "My dear fellow-patriots! So many of you have solicited me to accept the nomination that I dare not — "

HEURTELOT: The old rascal! He thinks he is going to fool us! Let's tear down his placard!

MARCHAIS: Yes, because he is a traitor!

POLICEMAN [stops their approach to the wall]: You have no right to do that.

MARCHAIS: Not when it is in the interest of law and order?

HEURTELOT: And liberty!

POLICEMAN: YOU let those placards alone, or I will throw you both into jail! '

HEURTELOT: A fine government this is! It is carried on only to torment us and cheat us!

MARCHAIS: We can do nothing to defend ourselves!

SCENE II.

(The same, including Murel and Gruchet )

MUREL [to Heurteiot]: Faithful at your post! That's good! Now take all this crowd over there [points to café], and give them a drink.

HEURTEIOT: Oh, but —

MUREL: Take them along, I say, and go in without ceremony. I have given them their orders over there, but it is Gruchet who stands treat!

GRUCHET: Up to a certain amount — don't forget that!

MUREL: Well, go along with them, then.

CITIZENS: Hurrah for Gruchet! A good fellow! A solid citizen! A patriot!

[Exit all except Murel.]

SCENE III.

MUREL [approaches Rousselin's gates]: I must try to see Louise for a moment.

ARABELLA [enters through the gates]: I wish to speak to you, Monsieur.

MUREL: Delighted, Miss Arabella! But — tell me — Louise, is she not —

ARABELLA: Was not some one here with you a moment ago?

MUREL: Yes.

ARABELLA: Monsieur Duprat, I believe.

MUREL: NO, it was Gruchet.

ARABELLA: Gruchet! He is a very bad man! It is a shame to make him a candidate!

MUREL: And why, may I ask?

ARABELLA: Some time ago Monsieur Rousselin lent him quite a large sum of money, which he has never repaid. I have seen the memorandum of it.

MUREL [aside]: This explains the reason why Gruchet was so afraid of him!

ARABELLA: But Monsieur Rousselin had too much delicacy and kindly feeling to press him for payment. He is so good, although a little odd at times! For instance, his prejudice against Monsieur Julien

MUREL: And Louise, Miss Arabella — how is she?

ARABELLA: Oh, when they told her it was impossible that she should be allowed to marry you, she wept sadly.

MUREL: My sweet Louise!

ARABELLA: Poor little thing! Madame Rousselin is very hard upon her.

MUREL: And her father — what does he say about me?

ARABELLA: He is very much worried and vexed.

MUREL: Does he regret his words to me?

ARABELLA: NO. But he is afraid of you.

MUREL: I am glad to hear it!

ARABELLA: He fears your workmen will oppose him, and he dreads the editorials in The Impartial, of which he says you are the real master.

MUREL: Ha! ha! ha!

ARABELLA: But that is not true, is it? Has not Monsieur Julien more influence there than you?

MUREL [still laughing]: Go on, I beg, Miss Arabella!

ARABELLA: Oh! I am very sad about this whole affair. I wish that matters could be settled amicably.

MUREL: It would be rather difficult to do that now, it seems to me.

ARABELLA: Not at all! I know that Monsieur Rousselin strongly desires a friendly understanding. But hush! Do not mention what I have just said, I entreat you.

MUREL [aside]*. What a queer creature!

ARABELLA: A reconciliation would be to your interest with regard to Louise, believe me! Everyone should be reconciled and made happy — she, you, myself, and Monsieur Julien.

MUREL [aside]: Always Julien! How stupid I have been! I believe I have discovered a romance — the poet and his muse! How very funny! [Aloud ] I will do whatever I can to bring about a reconciliation. Au revoir, Mademoiselle.

ARABELLA [curtseys]: Good afternoon, sir! [Sees an old woman, who stands up stage, C., beckoning J Ah, Félicité! [Joins the woman; they go out]

SCENE IV.

(Enter Rousselin, hastily, through the gates )

ROUSSELIN: Upon my word, this is a most unheard-of thing! MUREL [aside]: Now for it!

ROUSSELIN: Gruchet! — it is that man Gruchet who is trying to cut the ground from under my feet! A miserable fellow, whom I have protected and helped! And he boasts that he is upheld by you!

MUREL: But —

ROUSSELIN: HOW the devil did this idea of putting himself forward as a candidate ever get into his head?

MUREL: I really do not know. He came tearing into my rooms like a madman, saying that I must abjure all my former political opinions at once.

ROUSSELIN: I have been too moderate. Nevertheless, I protested with equal vigour against the preposterous demagoguery, of which this rascally Gruchet is the representative, and the yoke of absolutism that the aristocrats would like to hang upon our necks, of which the Count de Bouvigny is the abominable supporter, the Gothic symbol, I may say! In a word, faithful to the traditions of the old French spirit, I demand, before all, the reign of law, the government of the people by the people, with a due regard for the rights of property. On that point-

MUREL: Precisely! It is on that very point that the people judge you as not being sufficiently republican in your ideas.

ROUSSELIN: I am more so than Gruchet, however, and I have recommended — but perhaps I ought to announce it in the public prints — the lowering of customs duties and of town taxes.

MUREL: Bravo!

ROUSSELIN: I ask frankly of the municipal powers for a better organising of juries; for the liberty of the press; and for the abolishing of all sinecure offices, and also of all titles of nobility.

MUREL: Very fine!

ROUSSELIN: I have also been urgent in the cause of universal suffrage. Does that surprise you? Nevertheless, that is my policy. To our new prefect, who supports the other side, I have written three letters, as a warning. I have, indeed! And I am ready to meet him face to face — even to insult him, if necessary. Tell that to your workmen!

MUREL [aside]: Can he be speaking seriously?

ROUSSELIN: YOU see, then, that in preferring Gruchet to me — because, I repeat, he boasts that he has your support — he has told it all over town!

MUREL: How do you know that I shall vote for him?

ROUSSELIN: Eh?

MUREL: In politics I hold fast to my own opinions. Now, his views seem to my mind not quite so progressive as yours. We must wait a bit. All is not over yet.

ROUSSELIN: Indeed, it is not all over, but I don't know what more I can do to please the electors. And I am greatly surprised to find that I have been so misunderstood by a man of your intelligence.

MUREL: YOU overwhelm me!

ROUSSELIN: I have no doubt as to the success of your career in the future.

MUREL: Indeed! Well, in that case —

ROUSSELIN: Proceed!

MUREL: Well, then, to meet confidence with confidence, I have a little confession to make to you. I did agree to help Gruchet after you had refused my request for your daughter's hand, and I own that I acted under the influence of anger.

ROUSSELIN [pats Murel on the shoulder]: ALL the better! That proves you have spirit.

MUREL: I cursed you as much as I adored your daughter.

ROUSSELIN: YOU dear boy! [Takes Murel's hand] Ah, your leaving me hurt me deeply!

MUREL: Seriously, Monsieur, if I cannot have Louise I shall die of grief!

ROUSSELIN: NO, no! you must not die.

MUREL: YOU will give me some hope?

ROUSSELIN: After examination and mature reflection, your personal standing appears rather more advantageous than I thought when you first mentioned the matter to me.

MUREL: More advantageous?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, for besides your thirty thousand francs of salary —

MUREL [timidly]: Twenty thousand.

ROUSSELIN: Thirty thousand! — and a share in the stock of the company — there is your aunt to be considered, since you are her heir.

MUREL: Yes — with another nephew, a soldier.

ROUSSELIN: A soldier, eh? Well, there are always chances of — [Makes gesture as if firing a gun] The Bedouins! [Laughs]

MUREL [laughs]: Yes, yes, you are right! All women, even when they are old, change their minds very quickly, and my aunt is certainly capricious. But seriously, I have recently heard that she speaks very kindly of me sometimes.

ROUSSELIN [aside]: If that were only true! [Aloud] Well, dear boy, come around here this evening after dinner, and stand near my house, but don't appear as if you were looking for me. [Exit]

SCENE V.

MUREL: Come here this evening! That is rather encouraging — it is almost a consent. Arabella was right. [Enter Gruchet]

GRUCHET: Here I am! I have not lost time. What news? Tell me quickly.

MUREL: Gruchet, have you reflected seriously upon the matter you are considering?

GRUCHET: Why do you ask that?

MUREL: It is no light responsibility to be a deputy.

GRUCHET: I believe you!

MUREL: YOU will bring down upon yourself all sorts of scheming rascals and beggars.

GRUCHET: Oh, my good fellow, I am well accustomed to refusing people.

MUREL: It will seriously upset all your private affairs.

GRUCHET: Never! Don't you believe it!

MUREL: Besides, it would be necessary to live in Paris, and that would entail great expense.

GRUCHET: Very well, I will live in Paris, and hang the expense!

MUREL: Frankly, I don't see any particular advantage for you even if you should obtain the deputyship.

GRUCHET: YOU may think what you please. I see the advantage, myself.

MUREL: And you may fail of election, you know.

GRUCHET: Have you any reason to think that?

MUREL: Nothing very serious. But there is no denying that Rousselin has a firm hold on the public favour.

GRUCHET: Only a short time ago, you said he was an imbecile!

MUREL: That may not prevent him from succeeding.

GRUCHET: Then you advise me to give up the whole thing?

MUREL: Not absolutely. But it is always bad to have for an adversary a man of Rousselin's importance.

GRUCHET: His importance! Ha! ha!

MUREL: Remember, he has many friends; his manners are cordial and pleasing; and, while he manages the Conservatives very cleverly, he poses as a Republican.

GRUCHET: Everyone knows that.

MUREL: Oh, if you count on the good sense of the public —

GRUCHET: But why do you discourage me now, when everything is running as smoothly as if on wheels? Listen to me! No one suspects it, but through Félicité, my maid, I know all that goes on in Rousselin's household.

MUREL: Your method of gaining information is not particularly delicate!

GRUCHET: Why not?

MUREL: Nor even prudent; because they say that once you borrowed a considerable sum of money from Rousselin.

GRUCHET: They say that? Well?

MUREL: YOU ought first to repay him.

GRUCHET: For that matter, you ought to repay me the money I lent you a long time ago. Be just!

MUREL: In spite of my proofs of devoted friendship, and the good advice I have just given you, you speak to me like that! Please remember that without my influence you never can be elected! Here I have been wearing myself out for you, although I have no personal interest in the matter.

GRUCHET: Who knows? I don't understand this business at all. First you push me ahead, then you pull me back. The money I owe to Rousselin! Let some one else pay it! I am not inexhaustible! And the bill at the café is going to be something terrible, because those lively fellows drink and drink, without knowing when to stop. Perhaps you think I am not worrying about that! This electioneering is a whirlpool that sucks down all one's money. [Enter Hombourg] Hombourg, here again?

HOMBOURG: IS Monsieur Rousselin at home?

GRUCHET: I know nothing about him.

HOMBOURG: One word! I own a little Normandy horse — not an expensive animal — which would be very useful to you in driving about the country on your electioneering business.

GRUCHET: I make all my trips on foot, thank you!

HOMBOURG: A rare chance, Monsieur Gruchet!

GRUCHET: Chances like that will be sure to turn up again.

HOMBOURG: I do not believe it.

GRUCHET: It is quite impossible for me to buy it at present.

HOMBOURG [bows]: At your service, Monsieur! [Enters Rousselin's house]

MUREL: Do you think Rousselin would have done that? That man keeps an inn, and he will try to turn all his customers against you. You may lose fifty votes through him. I am tired of trying to support your cause!

GRUCHET: Keep cool! I own I did wrong. It was because you had just been worrying me with your remarks about Rousselin. And perhaps what you told me is not true, after all. From whom did you get the information? Only from Rousselin, I'LL wager! Or possibly you are playing one of your own little jokes, just to test me. [Noise without]

MUREL: Listen!

GRUCHET: I hear.

MUREL: The noise is coming nearer.

VOICES [without]: Gruchet! Gruchet I (Enter Félicité, L.)

FELICITE: Monsieur Gruchet, some one wishes to see you.

GRUCHET: ME?

FELICITE: Yes; come quickly!

GRUCHET: TO see me? [Exit hastily, with Félicité. Noise increases]

MUREL [about to go, L.]S What a racket! What can be the matter?
[Exit.]

SCENE VI.

ROUSSELIN [enters from the house]: The people are becoming quite excited, apparently. Good! — that is, provided they are not getting excited against me!

VOICES [from the café]: Down with the bourgeoisie ROUSSELIN:
Ha! I don't like that much!

(Gruchet passes across the back of stage, trying to evade a crowd of men, who demand a speech from him)

GRUCHET: Leave me, my friends! Let me alone! No, no! I tell you, I cannot make a speech!

ALL: Gruchet! Long live Gruchet, our deputy!

ROUSSELIN: What do they say — deputy?

HOMBOURG [who has entered from Rousselin's house]: And why not, since Bouvigny has withdrawn?

[Gruchet and the crowd exit C.]

ROUSSELIN: It is not possible!

HOMBOURG: Certainly it is — the ministry has changed, Monsieur! The prefect has handed in his resignation, and he has just written to Bouvigny to advise him to do the same with regard to his own candidacy. [Exit C.]

ROUSSELIN: Then — no one remains in the field as a candidate except — [points to his breast] myself! No, no — there is Gruchet! Gruchet! [Reflects. Slight pause. Enter Dodart] What do you wish from me?

SCENE VII.

DODART: I am here to render you a service, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN: Coming from a faithful follower of the Count de Bouvigny, that astonishes me!

DODART: YOU will appreciate my action later. As the Count de Bouvigny has retired from the candidacy —

ROUSSELIN [brusquely]: It is true, then? He has retired?

DODART: Yes, for certain reasons.

ROUSSELIN: Personal reasons.

DODART: Monsieur —

ROUSSELIN: I say he had strong personal reasons, that's all!

DODART: Very likely. Now, permit me to warn you of something very important. Those persons who are interested in your success — and I am one of them, I assure you! — are beginning to fear the violence of your adversaries.

ROUSSELIN: Well? What of that?

DODART: Perhaps you have not heard the insurrectionary cries that Gruchet's followers have been uttering. This village Catiline — ROUSSELIN [aside]: Village Catiline! What a good phrase! I must remember that.

DODART: He is capable of anything, Monsieur. And perhaps, thanks to the present crazy mood of the people, he will become one of our tribunes!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: By Jove! I am beginning to be afraid he will!

DODART: But the Conservatives have not given up the fight, by any means. First of all, they wish to vote for an honest man, who will guarantee — [Rousselin makes a movement] — Oh! they will not ask him to go back on any of his principles; they will require only a few simple concessions.

ROUSSELIN: And that devil of a Murel has spoiled my chances!

DODART: Unfortunately, that seems to be the case!

ROUSSELIN [thoughtfully]: Alas! yes!

DODART: AS notary and as citizen, I deplore it! Ah! it was a fine dream — the idea of an alliance between the bourgeoisie and the nobility, cemented by the marriage of your daughter to a son of the house of Bouvigny! The Count himself said to me an hour ago — will you believe what I am about to say?

ROUSSELIN: I have the utmost confidence in your word, Monsieur!

DODART: The Count said, with the chivalric air so characteristic of him: "I am not at all angry with Monsieur Rousselin — "

ROUSSELIN: Neither have I any resentment against him, upon my honour!

DODART: And he added: "I should like nothing better, if Monsieur Rousselin does not find it unsuitable — "

ROUSSELIN: Find what unsuitable?

DODART: "Than to join forces with him, in the interest of our canton and of the public morals."

ROUSSELIN: Indeed! I will join him in that with pleasure.

DODART: Here comes the Count now! [Makes signal; Bouvigny comes forward]

BOUVIGNY [bows']: Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN [glances around]: I am just observing whether any one

BOUVIGNY: NO one saw me enter here — do not be disturbed!
Monsieur Rousselin, I beg you to accept the assurance of my regrets regarding the matter of —

ROUSSELIN: Oh, there is no harm in —

DODART: In acknowledging one's errors, eh?

BOUVIGNY: I admit it; but pray consider that my affection may have exaggerated the importance of certain principles.

ROUSSELIN: Ah, Monsieur, I honour high principles!

BOUVIGNY: Consider also the malady from which my poor son suffers.

ROUSSELIN: He did not appear ill when he was here a few hours ago.

DODART: Oh, yes! Monsieur Onésime is very much indisposed. But he has the courage to hide his suffering. Poor fellow! his nerves are so sensitive!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: Aha! I see your game! Well, you shall help me in mine! [Aloud] I understand. You mean that Monsieur Onésime, having conceived certain hopes —

BOUVIGNY: Exactly!

ROUSSELIN: It must pain him very much —

BOUVIGNY: It breaks his heart, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN: To see you abandon your candidacy so suddenly!

DODART [aside]: He is laughing at us!

ROUSSELIN: When you had already a number of votes!

BOUVIGNY [with dignity]: I had a great many, I assure you!

ROUSSELIN [smiles]: Not all, however!

DODART: Perhaps not so many among the working classes in the town, an immense number but in the country!

ROUSSEUN: Ah, if you count on —

BOUVIGNY: Allow me! First, the commune of Bouvigny, where I live, is in my favor, naturally. Then there are the villages of Saint-Leonard, Valencourt, and La Coudrette.

ROUSSELIN [quickly]: No, not that!

BOUVIGNY: And why not that?

ROUSSELIN [embarrassed]: Why, I believe — [Aside] Murel must have deceived me about that.

BOUVIGNY: I am equally certain to carry Grumesnil, Ypremesnil, and Les Arbois.

DODART [reads from list which he takes from his pocket-book]:
Châtillon, Colange, Heurtaux, Lenneval, Bahurs, Saint-Filleul, Grand-Chêne, Roche-Aubert, Fortinet!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: This is alarming!

DODART [reads]: Monicamp, Dehaut, Lampérière, Saint-Nicaise, Vieville, Sirvin, Château-Regnier, La Chapelle, Lebarrois, Mont-Suleau.

ROUSSELIN [aside]: I begin to think I don't know the geography of this district!

BOUVIGNY: All these, to say nothing of the fact that I have many friends in the various communes who —

ROUSSELIN [overcome]: Oh, I believe you, Monsieur!

BOUVIGNY: These good people hardly know what to do now. They are, of course, very desirous to please me, and will do whatever I wish, obeying me as one man; and if I should instruct them to vote for — no matter whom — you, for instance —

ROUSSELIN: Good heavens! I am not so strongly opposed as —

BOUVIGNY: Opposition is sometimes very useful.

ROUSSELIN: AS an instrument of war, let us say. But it need not be a matter of counteraction; why should we not consolidate?

DODART: By all means, let us consolidate.

ROUSSELIN: I have a horror of new-fangled Utopian ideas, and of subversive doctrines. There is talk of re-establishing the divorce courts — that must be looked after. And the press demands recognition in anything it may choose to do, no matter how great the license.

DODART: Abominable!

BOUVIGNY: The country is infested with quantities of worthless books.

ROUSSELIN: Unfortunately, it has not the proper persons in authority to conduct its affairs. Ah! there is so much high-mindedness to be found among the nobility! On that point I fully agree with some of the most prominent public men in England.

BOUVIGNY: Your words are as welcome as a refreshing breeze, and if we might hope —

ROUSSELIN [mysteriously]: To tell the truth, Monsieur, the democracy really terrifies me. I do not know what madmen my seize upon me, what malicious impulse — BOUVIGNY [suppresses a smile]: Oh, come! I think you go rather too far.

ROUSSELIN: NO, no, I was guilty of — you see, I am really a staunch Conservative, but perhaps I have not fully understood certain shades of meaning —

DODART: All honest men understand one another!

ROUSSELIN [shakes hands with Bouvigny]: Certainly, my dear Count, certainly! Monsieur Dodart is quite right!

SCENE VIII.

(Enter Murel, Ledru, Onésime, and several Workmen )

MUREL: Thank heaven! I find you without your electors, my dear Rousselin!

BOUVIGNY [aside]: I thought they were at swords' points!

MUREL: Here are a few more voters. I have shown them that the ideas of Gruchet do not meet the requirements of our time; and now that I have explained to them what you said to me this morning, they understand you better. These worthy citizens are not only republicans, but socialists!

BOUVIGNY [jumps]: What! Socialists!

ROUSSELIN: He brings me socialists!

DODART: Socialists! I think my presence is no longer required here!
[Slips away noiselessly]

LEDRU: Yes, citizen! We are socialists!

ROUSSELIN: Well — ahem! — I see no harm in that.

BOUVIGNY: And just now you were declaiming against this sort of rabble!

ROUSSELIN: Pardon me! There are several ways of looking at these matters.

ONESIME [springing from a chair]: No doubt — several ways!

BOUVIGNY [scandalised]: What! even my son?

MUREL [to Onésime]: What are you doing here?

ONESIME: I heard that something of a political nature was going on at Monsieur Rousselin's house, and I wished to show him that my sentiments were in sympathy with his own.

MUREL [aside]: Intriguing little puppy!

BOUVIGNY: I never expected, my son, to see you, in the presence of the author of your being, renounce the faith of your ancestors!

ROUSSELIN: Very fine!

LEDRU: And why "very fine"? This gentleman is the Count de Bouvigny [to Murel, indicating Rousselin], and you would have us believe that Monsieur Rousselin demands the abolition of all titles.

ROUSSELIN: Certainly!

BOUVIGNY: What! He demands that?

LEDRU: Yes, indeed! So he says!

BOUVIGNY: Ah, this is too much! [About to go]

ROUSSELIN [tries to hold Bouvigny]: I do not wish to destroy our mutual understanding so abruptly. Listen to me! Many of these men are simply mistaken in judgment. Let us manage them together.

BOUVIGNY [loudly]: No more of your management for me, Monsieur! A man of honour does not ally himself with, the advocates of disorder, and I tell you, fairly and squarely, that I will have no more to do with you or your election. Come, Onésime! [Exit the Bouvignys].

LEDRU: SO he was in favor of your election, was he? We all know what that would mean for us! I wish you good-day, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN: In order to stand by my convictions, I have sacrificed a friend of thirty years' acquaintance!

LEDRU: We demand no sacrifices! But you blow first hot and then cold, and I think you are a regular old humbug! Come along, friends! Let us go back to Gruchet. Are you coming, Murel?

MUREL: I will be with you in a moment.

[Exit Ledru and Workmen.]

SCENE IX.

MUREL: You must see, my dear friend, that you have put me in a very embarrassing situation.

ROUSSELIN: Perhaps you do not think that I am in one also.

MUREL: See here! you must settle on some decided line of action at once. Be on one side or the other. But decide quickly — let us have an end of this dilly-dallying.

ROUSSELIN: But why be so radical, one way or the other? Is there not something worth having in all parties?

MUREL: Yes! Their votes!

ROUSSELIN: YOU are very witty, upon my word! Your humour is delicate, yet always irresistible. I am not surprised that a certain person loves you!

MUREL: Some one loves me! Who is it?

ROUSSELIN: Innocent! A little lady named Louise!

MUREL: Oh, what happiness! Thank you, thank you a thousand times! Now I shall do some lively work in your behalf. I will convince those fellows that they did not understand you — that it was all a mistake. As to The Impartial — ROUSSELIN: There, at least, you are master.

MUREL: Not altogether. We depend upon Paris, which gives the word of command. You must be very much fatigued.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, hang the fatigue!

MUREL: SO much the better! But now, tell me, how shall I make Julien understand the reason why we wish him to do exactly the contrary thing from the orders he received this morning?

ROUSSELIN: I don't know. What shall we do?

MUREL: Wait a moment! In your house there is a person that has a certain influence over him.

ROUSSELIN: Who is it?

MUREL: Miss Arabella. From something she said to me, I have reason to believe that she is interested in the young poet!

ROUSSELIN: Ha! ha! The romantic verses were addressed to the English girl, after all, eh?

MUREL: I cannot answer for the verses, but I believe they are in love with each other.

ROUSSELIN: I was sure of it! Never in my life have I been deceived in matters of that sort! Well, so long as my daughter is not concerned, there is no danger, and I should have a good laugh if — but I must speak to my wife about it. I must tell her everything.

MUREL: Meanwhile, I will try to warm up those voters who were rather chilled by your lukewarm philosophy.

ROUSSELIN: Don't go too far, for fear Bouvigny —

MUREL: Have no fear! I will re-paint your patriotism in glowing colors! [Exit.

ROUSSELIN [alone]: We must be shrewd, quick, and subtle!

SCENE X.

(Enter Mme. Rousselin and Miss Arabella )

ROUSSELIN [to Arabella]: My dear child, — my almost fatherly affection for you allows me to address you thus — I am about to ask a great favour of you. Will you meet Monsieur Julien Duprat and take a short walk with him?

ARABELLA [joyfully]: You wish me to do that!

MME. R. [haughtily]: What an extraordinary request!

ARABELLA: Monsieur Duprat strolls along this promenade every evening, smoking his cigar. It would be very easy to meet him.

MME. R.: It would be highly unconventional! It seems to me that I am the proper person to meet this gentleman.

ROUSSELIN: Well, yes, I suppose it would be rather more suitable for a married woman to have the interview with him.

ARABELLA: But I should like very much to meet him!

MME. R.: I forbid you to do so, Mademoiselle!

ARABELLA: I obey, Madame! [Aside, as she goes up stage] Why should she wish to prevent me from seeing him? I will try to find out! [Exit.]

MME. R.: My dear, you have very singular ideas sometimes! Fancy your asking a young woman, our daughter's governess, to do a thing like that! Did you wish her to see him with regard to something concerning your election?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, of course! And it struck me that Arabella, because of the evident fancy she has for the young man, was the very person to have an interview with him.

MME. R.: Ah, you do not know her! She is both sly and violent, and under her romantic airs she hides a small, mean nature. I think we should do well to keep a close watch of her.

ROUSSELIN: Perhaps you are right. Here comes Julien. You know, of course, the general import of what I wish to have said to him, with regard to the course his journal is to take.

MME. R.: Leave him to me! I shall know how to manage him.

ROUSSELIN: Very well. I trust everything to you. [Enter Julien. Rousselin bows to him and goes out. Twilight comes on]

SCENE XI.

(Madame Rousselin, Julien )

JULIEN [sees Mme. R.]: She! [Throws away his cigar] Alone! What shall I say? [Bows] Madame!

MME. R.: Monsieur Julien Duprat, I believe.

JULIEN: Alas! yes, Madame.

MME. R.: And why "alas"?

JULIEN: I have the misfortune to be connected with a journal the sentiments of which must be displeasing to you.

MME. R.: Well — yes, so far as its political tone is concerned.

JULIEN: If you only knew how distasteful are the affairs that occupy my time!

MME. R.: But a bright intellect may apply its efforts to almost anything without being lowered in the least. Your disdain of your occupation is not surprising. When a man can write such remarkable verses as you have produced —

JULIEN: Ah, now you are unkind, Madame! Why do you laugh at me?

MME. R.: I do not, I assure you. I make no profession of being a literary critic, but it seems to me that you have a brilliant future, Monsieur.

JULIEN: No, such possibilities are closed to me, by reason of my enforced environment. Art does not flourish in the provinces. A poet who finds himself compelled to remain there, and is obliged by poverty to perform uncongenial work, is like a man trying to run in a muddy field. A weight attaches itself to his feet, - dragging him down, and the faster he tries to run, the deeper he sinks. And something within him continually protests and complains. Then, to console himself for his hard fate, he dreams of what might have been, and time slips away, until finally he forces himself to be satisfied with his own mediocrity, and feels only resignation — the calmer phase of despair!

MME. R.: I understand you, and I pity you!

JUUN: Ah, Madame! your compassion is sweet, although it only augments my sadness!

MME. R.: Have courage! Success will surely come to you some day!

JULIEN: Here, in my isolation, is it possible?

MME. R.: But, instead of flying from the world, approach it! Its language is not like your own — but learn it! Submit to its demands. Reputation and power are gained only by coming in contact with people; and, since society is naturally a state of war, range yourself on the side of the strong, the rich, the happy. Of your inmost thoughts and feelings I will not speak, for reasons of — prudence! When you go to Paris to live, as we intend to do —

JULIEN: But, Madame, I have not the means to live in Paris.

MME. R.: Who knows? To a man with your versatility of talent nothing is difficult; and you must use it in such a way as to make the right persons show their gratitude for it. But it is growing late! I hope for the pleasure of seeing you again, Monsieur! [Curtseys, and goes up stage]

JULIEN: Oh, do not leave me, in heaven's name! I have waited so long for this moment! I have vainly tried so many devices in order to approach you! Besides, I did not fully understand your last words. You appear to expect me to perform some service. Do you wish to give me a command? Give it, then — I will obey!

MME. R.: What devotion! Darkness increases ]

JULIEN: I tell you, Madame, you occupy my whole life! Many a time, as twilight comes on, do I climb one of these hills to breathe a freer air; and when I turn my gaze in the direction of the town, my eyes wander, in spite of myself, towards the dwelling that shelters you — this house, that gleams like a pearl in a green setting. The sight of a royal palace would not give me so deep a feeling of covetousness! Sometimes I see you in the street — a dazzling vision! I stop! I try to walk near you, unobserved, following your dainty, airy veil, that floats about your head like a blue cloud. Often I have stood outside your garden gate, only to catch a glimpse of you and hear the rustle of your skirt as you walked among the violet-beds. Your slightest word, your most ordinary phrase, possesses a value quite unintelligible to anyone but me; and I treasure every utterance like a prize! Do not drive me away! Pardon me! I dared to send you some verses. They were lost, like the flowers that I gather in the country without being able to offer them to you; lost, like the words I murmur to you at night — words that you never hear! You are my inspiration, my muse, the embodiment of my ideal, my delight, my torment!

MME. R.: Calm yourself, Monsieur! This exaggeration —

JULIEN: Ah, I belong to the days of 1830! I learned to read by studying Hernani and often have I wished I could have been the romantic Lara! I execrate my dull contemporaries, the commonplaces of modern life, the ignominy of matter-of-fact happiness! The grand passion that caused the lyres of the great masters to vibrate, swells my own breast! In my thoughts you are inextricably entwined with all that is beautiful in the universe! Everything in the world is influenced by your personality! These trees were made only to shade your face; the night comes only to shelter you and to soothe your spirit; the stars, that beam as softly as your eyes, were made to shed their light upon you!

MME. R.: The reading of romantic literature has made you over-enthusiastic, I fear! What confidence can a woman have in a man that cannot control his language or his passion? I believe you are sincere. But you are young, and you ignore certain necessary restraints. Some women in my place would have taken offence at the freedom of your language. You must promise me —

JULIEN: But you tremble, too, Madame! I knew it! No woman could repel such love as mine!

MME. R.: My courage in listening to you surprises even myself. The people hereabouts have malicious tongues, Monsieur. The slightest suspicion of scandal would ruin us.

JULIEN: Fear nothing! My lips shall be sealed, my eyes closed, my manner indifferent; and if I should present myself at your house —

MME. R.: But, Monsieur, my husband —

JULIEN: Do not speak to me of that man! .

MME. R.: I must defend him.

JULIEN: I have done that — for love of you!

MME. R.: He will hear of your defense of him, and you never will have reason to regret your generosity.

JULIEN: Let me kneel before you, that I may look at you more closely. I will do all that you wish, and boldly, too, for I have gained new strength. I wish to become a part of your life, to enjoy with you all the intoxications that life affords; all the enchantments of art, all the blessings of heaven!

ARABELLA [enters softly, and slips behind a tree]: Aha! I was sure of it!

MME. R.: I expect from you an immediate proof of confidence and love.

JULIEN: Only tell me what you wish!

SCENE XII.

(The same, then Murel and Gruchet, followed by Rousselin )

MME R.: Some one approaches! I must go into the house.

JULIEN: Not yet! [Enter Murel, L. 3. E., walking leisurely across back of stage]

GRUCHET [enters L. 3. E., running after Murel]: Give me back my money!

MUREL [still walks slowly]: Go away! You annoy me!

GRUCHET: Rascal!

MUREL [turns suddenly and strikes Gruchet]: Thief!

ROUSSELIN [enters just as the blow is struck]: Why, who is here? What is the matter? JULIEN: Grant me only this favour, Madame! [Kisses her hand audibly]

ARABELLA [recognises Julien]: Ah! it is he! [Runs off]

ROUSSELIN: What is going on here? [Sees Arabella running] Arabella! I will put her out of the house to-morrow!

ACT III.

Scene: A public ball-room in the Salon de Flore. At the back, facing the audience, a platform for an orchestra. A bass-viol stands in a corner, L. Several musical instruments hang on the walls; also a stand of tri-colored flags. In the middle of the platform are a table and chairs; two other tables stand R. and L. on the stage proper. Lower platform is placed directly in front of the orchestra platform. Many chairs stand R. and L. At the rear is a practicable balcony.

SCENE I.

ROUSSELIN [standing C.]: I think it would sound well if I should compare Anarchy to a serpent — and a hydra-headed one at that! And Power — I might call that a vampire. No, that word is a little too pretentious. I must find some effective phrase that will arouse enthusiasm, such as: We must close the era of revolutions! — comrades! — indefeasible rights! — and some words ending in "ism," — parliamentarism, and things like that!

I must be perfectly calm and collected. The electors will arrive soon. Everything is ready; the committee was organized last night. [Points to various places on the stage] Here the committee will sit. There is the place for the President. [Points to table in the middle of the platform] His two secretaries will sit one on each side of him. [Steps up on the lower platform] I shall stand here, facing the company. But what shall I lean upon? I must have something to lean upon — to represent a tribune. Wait! I have it! [Steps down and takes a chair from the stage, remounts lower platform and places chair before him] Good! And I must have a glass of water, because I begin to feel very thirsty already. [Takes a glass of water which he finds on the president's table, and puts it on his own chair] Let it stand there! Shall I have enough sugar! [Peeps into the sugar-bowl on the president's table] Oh, yes! Now! — everyone is seated. The president opens the meeting, and some one begins to speak. He appeals to me, to ask me, for instance — But first, who is it that calls on me? Where is the person? I will suppose him to be on my right. I turn my head quickly. He must not be too far away. [Steps down to arrange a chair R.; remounts platform] I preserve my calm and dignified air, with one hand thrust in the front of my waistcoat. I wonder whether I should not have looked better in my frock-coat. This coat is easier for the arms. But I rather think the frock-coat would be the proper thing, for they say the common people like to have a speaker pay them the compliment of wearing good clothes. Let me see, how is my cravat? [Takes small mirror from pocket and examines his appearance; then puts it back in pocket] I think my collar should be a little lower. [Settles collar] Not too low, however. I don't want to look like a romantic tenor! I feel sure all will go well, with a word from Murel now and then, to encourage me. Oh, it will be all right! Only — I do feel a bit. nervous, and a slight indigestion — [Drinks from glass of water] There! It is nothing serious. All great orators have had to begin some time. Come, come, Rousselin! no more weakness! One man is as good as another, and I am better than a great many! This excitement is going to my head like a hot drink. I must put on a bold face! [Strikes attitude]

And do you address yourself to me, Monsieur? — This speaker must be in front of me. [Steps down and places chair C. of stage; remounts platform] — Do you address yourself to me? — I must put both hands on my breast and bow slightly. [Does so] — To me, who, during forty years — to me, whose patriotism — to me, who — to me, for whom — then, suddenly: Ah, you cannot really believe it, Monsieur! — Then he will sit staring at me, and not moving. [Holds his head very high, his right forefinger pointing upward] He says: "Your proofs, then! Give us your proofs! Ah, take care! You cannot juggle with the public faith!" I say nothing. "You are silent!" he cries; "Your silence condemns you! I will take action upon it!" Now I give him a little irony. I must say something cutting and assume a laugh of superiority. — Ha! ha! ha! I acknowledge myself completely vanquished, Monsieur! — But two other men, over there — [places two chairs] — I recognize them — they cry out that I have urged the people to Insurrection against our institutions — no matter what! Then I say in a furious tone, — What! You would obstruct the march of progress? —

Development of the word ' progress " — from the astronomer, with his telescope, who, to aid the hardy mariner — and so on, and so on, — To the humble village workman, gaining his living by the sweat of his brow; the proletarian of our cities; the artist, whose inspiration — and so on. I'll keep talking until I find just the right phrase to introduce the word bourgeoisie. Then follows praise of the bourgeoisie; the third estate; the instructions of the electors to the deputies; 'eighty-nine; our commerce; the wealth of the nation; the development of the public welfare by the rise and progress of the middle classes. Then a workman calls out: "And the people, — what will you do for them?" I reply: — Ah! the people — the great people! And I give him a great deal of palaver on that subject. I exalt the character of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, who was once a servant; Jacquard, the weaver; Marceau, the tailor, — and all the servants and all the tailors will feel flattered! Then I will thunder against the corruption and heartlessness of the rich. — For what reason do they reproach you, — the people? For being poor! — Bravos! — Ah! to the man who knows all your virtues, how sweet is the duty of becoming your defender! I always feel a noble pride when I press the calloused hand of an honest working-man, because his grasp, though perhaps a little rough, betokens genuineness and sincerity; because all differences of rank, title, and fortune are now — thank God! — things of the past; and nothing can compare with the sterling merit and true heart of a man of the people! — I tap myself on the breast. "Bravo! Bravo! Bravo!" [Claps his hands, turning a little, L.]

WAITER [Enters, L.]: Monsieur Rousselin, the gentlemen have arrived.

ROUSSELIN: Let us retire, so that I shall not appear to have been — Shall I have time to get my other coat? I think so — if I run!
[Exit Rousselin and Waiter.]

SCENE II.

(Enter all the Electors; the President, Voinchet, Marchais, Hombourg, Heurtelot, Onésime, the Village Policeman, Beaumesnil, Ledru, and others )

VOINCHET: Quite a crowd of us! I have an idea that this is going to be rather amusing.

LEDRU: For a political meeting, I should think a more suitable place could have been chosen than the Salon de Flore.

BEAUMESNIL: Since there is no other public hall in the neighbourhood, I don't see how we could do any better. Which man are you going to nominate, Monsieur Marchais?

MARCHAIS: Oh, Lord! Rousselin, of course. It seems we must settle on him, after all.

LEDRU: I don't see why! I'm going to stir up some kind of row at this meeting!

VOINCHET: Look! There is the son of Bouvigny!

BEAUMESNIL: The father will not come here — he is too shrewd.

THE PRESIDENT: Order!

POLICEMAN: Order!

PRESIDENT: Gentlemen, it has been decided that meetings shall be held in order to discuss the merits of the candidates for the impending election. Tonight we shall speak of the honourable Monsieur Rousselin; to-morrow night of the honourable Monsieur Gruchet. The meeting is open.

(Enter Rousselin, in a frock-coat, from a small door behind the president's chair. Salutes the company, and takes his place behind the chair on the lower platform)

VOINCHET: I demand that the candidate shall speak to us first about the railways.

ROUSSELIN [coughs, and takes a sip of water]: If any person had said, in the days of Charlemagne, or even in the time of Louis the Fourteenth, that a day would come when, in three hours, it would be possible to go —

VOINCHET: Oh, I don't mean that! Are you of the opinion that we should approve of a grant to a railway that shall run through Saint-Mathieu, or to one that will take in Bonneval? — which would be a hundred times better.

AN ELECTOR: Saint-Mathieu is more convenient for the larger part of the public. Declare yourself in favour of that, Monsieur Rousselin!

ROUSSELIN: Why should I not speak in favour of the general development of these gigantic enterprises, that change the situation of capitals, prove the genius of man, and carry prosperity into the midst of all communities?

HOMBOURO: That is not true; they often ruin them!

ROUSSELIN: What, Monsieur! Would you oppose the march of progress? Progress, which, from the astronomer —

HOMBOURG: But the railway passengers —

ROUSSEUN: With his telescope —

HOMBOURG: Ah, if you try to shut me up —

PRESIDENT: Monsieur Hombourg has the floor!

HOMBOURG: Travellers will never stop in our part of the country.

VOINCHET: He is an inn-keeper — that is the reason why he complains!

HOMBOURG: And a very good inn it is, too!

ELECTORS: Enough! enough! Sit down! [Hombourg is forced to sit down] PRESIDENT: NO violence, gentlemen!

POLICEMAN: Silence!

HOMBOURG [to Rousselin]: That's the way you defend our interests!

ROUSSELIN: I declare —

AN ELECTOR: He must uphold free trade!

ROUSSELIN: Certainly! By means of the untaxed transmission of merchandise, a day of universal brotherhood among all mankind will dawn —

AN ELECTOR: We must admit English woollens, and proclaim the freedom of the hosiery trade!

ROUSSELIN: And the exemption of everything!

SEVERAL ELECTORS: Yes! yes!

OTHER ELECTORS: NO! no!

ROUSSELIN: May heaven grant us abundance of grain and cattle!
A FARMER [wearing a peasants blouse]: You are a pretty chap to talk about agriculture.

ROUSSELIN: I will speak to you immediately on that subject.
[Drinks. A pause]

HEURTELOT [speaks from the balcony, to which he has mounted unobserved]: What is your opinion on the subject of blind beetles, Monsieur?

ALL [laugh loudly]: Ha! ha! ha!

PRESIDENT: A little less levity, gentlemen!

POLICEMAN: NO disorder! In the name of the law, sit down!
[Electors that have sprung up re-seat themselves, and quiet is gradually restored]

MARCHAIS [pushed forward by his neighbors]: Monsieur Rousselin, we should like to know your ideas about taxes.

ROUSSELIN: Taxes! [Aside] Great heavens! [Aloud] Oh, certainly! Taxes are disagreeable but — necessary! They may be compared to a pump, which sucks up from the earth a fertilizing element that expands under the sun's rays. It remains to be seen whether the means justify the end; — and if — as an illustration — one should happen to exhaust it —

PRESIDENT [leans toward Rousselin]: Charming comparison!

VOINCHET: All land-owners are over-taxed.

HEURTELOT: And we have to pay more than thirty sous' tax on a litre of cognac.

LEDRU: The navy devours our earnings!

BEAUMESNIL: Does the country really need the Botanical Gardens, I ask?

ROUSSELIN: There is no doubt that we should begin at once to practise great economy!

ALL: Good! Good!

ROUSSELIN: And the parsimonious government, whereas it ought to —

BEAUMESNIL: Bring up all our children at its own expense!

MARCHAIS: Protect commerce!

FARMER: Encourage agriculture!

ROUSSELIN: Certainly, certainly! You are all quite right!

BEAUMESNIL: Furnish water and gas free in every house!

ROUSSELIN: UM! Possibly — yes!

HOMBOURG: YOU are forgetting all about the livery business.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, not at all, not at all! But permit me to resume the thread of my discourse, and to group —

LEDRU: We know your way of getting around everybody! But if you had Gruchet before you —

ROUSSELIN: And do you compare me to Gruchet? — me, who have seen during the past forty years, — me, whose patriotism — ah! how little you know me, Monsieur!

LEDRU: Yes, I do compare him to you, I tell you!

ROUSSELIN: That village Catiline!

HEURTELOT [From the balcony]: Who the deuce was Catiline, eh?

ROUSSELIN: He was a celebrated conspirator, who, in Rome —

LEDRU: But Gruchet is not a conspirator.

HEURTELOT: And do you belong to the police, Monsieur?

ALL [speaking confusedly]: He is! He is! No, he is not! [Great disorder]

ROUSSELIN: Citizens! For heaven's sake! I beg of you, listen to me!

MARCHAIS: Well, we are listening. [All become suddenly quiet. Rousselin tries to speak, but remains silent. Roars of laughter from the crowd]

POLICEMAN: Silence!

HEURTELOT: He must explain his views as to the right to work.

ALL: Yes! yes! what about a man's right to work?

ROUSSELIN: Masses of books have been written on that subject. [Murmurs] Ah, you know that, do you? Well, have you read them?

HEURTELOT: No!

ROUSSELIN: I know them by heart! And if, like me, you had passed many nights in the solitude of your apartment, studying —

HEURTELOT: There! that's enough about you! What about the right to work?

ROUSSELIN: Oh! Ah! Without doubt, everyone ought to work.

HEURTELOT: And to demand work!

MARCHAIS: But suppose one has no need to work?

ROUSSELIN: Oh, never mind that point!

MARCHAIS: What! Would you attack property-owners?

ROUSSELIN: Absurd! When did I do that?

MARCHAIS [jumps up on the stage]: Ah, you force me to put myself forward!

ELECTORS [from the right]: Come down!

ELECTORS [from the left]: No; let him stay!

ROUSSELIN: Yes, let him remain. I admit the contradiction. I am in favour of liberty before all!

Does the word "liberty" choke you, Monsieur? It is because you do not in the least understand the meaning of economy — the value of humanitarianism. The press has elucidated the matter somewhat; and the press — mark it well, fellow-citizens — is a torch, a sentinel that —

BEAUMESNIL: Get back to the question!

MARCHAIS: Yes, the question of property.

ROUSSELIN: Well, like you, I love it! I am a property-owner myself! You see, therefore, that we are agreed upon that point.

MARCHAIS [embarrassed]: Well! — hum! — well!

LEDRU [mockingly]: Ah, the poor grocer! [Laughter]

ROUSSELIN: One word more! [To Marchais] I am about to convince you. Isn't it true that we ought, as much as possible, to democratize silver and republicanize the circulating medium? The more it circulates, the more of it falls into the pockets of the people, and consequently into yours. Now let us consider the matter of credit.

MARCHAIS: There should not be any credit!

ROUSSELIN: Oh, really —

LECRU: What! No credit?

ROUSSELIN: YOU are right to protest, Monsieur Ledru, because if credit is withdrawn there is no more money; and, on the other hand, it is money that forms the basis of credit. The two terms are correlative. [Shakes Marchais gently by the arm] Do you understand that the terms are correlative? You do not answer. Your silence condemns you, I shall take action upon it!

ALL: NO! No! Enough! Enough! [Marchais returns to his place]

ROUSSELIN: Thus, my fellow-citizens, is the great question of labour settled! To sum up, — no property, no work! A man creates labour because he is rich, and without work there will be no riches. You work, not to become property-owners, because you are that already. Your trade is your capital, and you are all capitalists!

FARMER: Queer kind of capitalists!

MARCHAIS: YOU mix everything up very strangely, Monsieur!

LEDRU: He makes fun of everyone!

ALL: Yes! Yes! He laughs at us! Let us adjourn! Open the doors! Adjourn!

PRESIDENT: This is intolerable! One cannot —

POLICEMAN: I shall clear the way. [Enter Murel]

ROUSSELIN [aside]: Murel! At last!

LEDRU: Let the candidate explain the eulogies of the opinions of the Count de Bouvigny, which he made in your presence. [To the Workmen] You were there, some of you.

ROUSSELIN: But — I — I —

LEDRU: He is lost!

HEURTELOT: Catch him with a boat-hook! [Laughter]

VOINCHET: Call a doctor! [Louder laughter]

MUREL: I, too, was present, gentlemen! The honourable Monsieur Rousselin appeared to condescend to agree with the sentiments of the Count de Bouvigny. He does not seek to hide the fact; he even boasts of it!

ROUSSELIN [proudly]: Ah!

MUREL: And it was precisely because of the electors who surrounded him that, in order to strengthen their convictions and to make them see how far certain persons would go in —

ROUSSELIN: Obscurantism!

MUREL: Exactly! It was, I say, a bit of parliamentary tactics, a ruse, quite legitimate, to — pardon the expression! — catch them in a net!

HEURTELOT: That's all too deep for us!

LEDRU: YOU are right! it was the conduct of a mountebank MUREL:
But I —

HEURTELOT: Do not defend him!

LEDRU: And this is the man that promised to box the prefect's ears!

ROUSSELIN: And why not?

POLICEMAN [taps Rousselin lightly on the shoulder] Gently, Monsieur Rousselin, gently!

ALL: Enough! Enough! Adjourn! Adjourn! [All rise. Rousselin makes a despairing gesture; then turns to the president, who is about to go]

PRESIDENT: A rather unfavourable meeting, my dear sir! Let us hope that some other time —

ROUSSELIN [observes Murel about to go]: Murel is going, too! [To Marchais, who passes near him] Marchais! Oh, it is too bad! too bad!

MARCHAIS: What can you expect, holding such opinions as yours?

[Exit all the Electors, leaving Rousselin, Onésime and a Waiter.]

SCENE III.

ROUSSELIN [descends from platform]: Farewell, my dreams!
Nothing is left for me now but to fly, or to throw myself in the water!
They will demolish me! [Looks at the chairs] They sat there, — but instead of the delighted crowd, whose applause I heard in imagination
— ah! [The Waiter begins to arrange the chairs in orderly rows] Ah, fatal ambition! as ruinous to kings as to men of lower rank! And I did not get a chance to make my speech — they cut me off every time! Ah, I suffer! [To the Waiter] Take away all those chairs — I have no more need of them. [Aside] The sight of them gets on my nerves!

WAITER [addresses Onésime, whom he discovers sitting in the corner, behind the bass-viol]: Do you intend to remain there, Monsieur?

ONESIME [comes forward timidly]: Monsieur Rousselin!

ROUSSELIN: Ah, is it you, Onésime?

ONESIME: I wish I could find something consoling to say to you, because you have my entire sympathy.

ROUSSELIN: Thank you! Everyone else has abandoned me — even Murel.

ONESIME: He has just gone out with Monsieur Dodart's clerk.

ROUSSELIN: I might run and catch him! [Looks out of the window]
There is still a crowd in the street, and they are capable of committing any outrage upon me if I should go out.

ONESIME: I hardly think that, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN: Hasn't it been proved within the walls of this room? They would insult me still worse if I should show myself to them now. Oh, the villainous populace! I can understand Nero's feelings!

ONESIME: When my father received from the prefect a letter telling him he had no chance of election, he was very much disappointed and cast down, as you are. But his philosophy soon enabled him to get over it.

ROUSSELIN: Tell me — you, whom I always thought a good fellow — you will not deceive me?

ONESIME: Oh, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN: Has your father — [Turns to the Waiter, who is carrying out chairs] He irritates me, that waiter! Go! leave us in peace! [Exit Waiter] Has your father still any adherents who would support him with their votes? He showed me a long list of names of communes — ONESIME: He is absolutely certain of the votes of sixty-four labourers.' I have seen their names.

ROUSSELIN [aside]: Not an alarming number!

ONESIME: But I have something to give you, Monsieur. An old woman stopped me as I was about to enter this house, and said, "Do me the favour to hand this note to Monsieur Rousselin." [Hands a note]

ROUSSELIN: An odd-looking letter! Let us see what it says. [Opens and reads the note] "A person who is interested in you believes it his duty to warn you that Madame Rousselin — " [stops, astounded]

ONESIME: Do you wish to send back any answer to that?

ROUSSELIN [sneering]: An answer?

ONESIME: Yes.

ROUSSELIN [furiously]: My answer would be a kick for the fool who executes such a commission! [Exit Onésime hastily] Pooh! only an anonymous letter! I am an idiot to let it disturb me!

[Crushes thé note and throws it on the floor] Apparently, the hatred of my enemies knows no bounds. This is a dirty trick, surpassing all the others. It was written to draw my attention away from political matters; and to spoil the chances of my election, the wretches do not hesitate to attack my honour! I am sure this is some of Gruchet's work. His servant is always nosing about my place. [Picks up letter and reads] "Your wife has a lover." My wife has no lover! What man is there who could be her lover? What a stupid accusation! [Pause] I remember hearing, the other evening, out in the park, a box on the ear, followed by a kiss! And then immediately after that I saw Miss Arabella going towards the house; but surely she was not alone, for I am positive I heard a loud slap. Can it be that some insolent puppy presumed to approach my wife? Impossible! She would have told me of it. And in that case, the kiss would have come before the blow, whereas I remember distinctly that the blow came first and the kiss afterwards! Bah! I shall worry no more about it; I have other things to think of. And now to work! [About to go. Enter Gruchet]

SCENE IV.

GRUCHET: Monsieur Murel is not here, it appears.

ROUSSELIN: You have come to mock me, I suppose, — to enjoy my chagrin, and to give me some of your sneers.

GRUCHET: Not at all!

ROUSSELIN: At least, you might have used fair means, Monsieur.

GRUCHET: The right is on my side.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, I understand that in politics —

GRUCHET: It is not the love of politics that has prompted me, but a more humble interest. Monsieur Murel —

ROUSSELIN: Murel! I don't care a button for him!

GRUCHET: He has avoided me for a week, in spite of all his fine promises. He has behaved in an abominable manner. He was not content with making me a party to his revengeful actions, — I tell you, I could betray him to the authorities, but I have not done so out of respect to everyone concerned, and for the sake of his working-people.

ROUSSELIN: Say quickly whatever you have to say.

GRUCHET: When Murel came here, he was interested in speculations on the Bourse, which at the beginning were very fortunate. In fact, he did so well that — for the first time — I lent him ten thousand francs. He paid them back, to be sure, and with interest. Two months later he borrowed five thousand of me. But his luck had changed. A third time

ROUSSELIN: I really don't see that this concerns me at all!

GRUCHET: In short, he actually owes me to-day thirty thousand two hundred and twenty-six francs and fifteen centimes!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: This bit of information may be useful!

GRUCHET: That young man has abused my confidence! He deluded me by saying that he had a prospect of making a rich marriage.

ROUSSEUR: The rascal!

GRUCHET: Thanks to him, I now find myself without money. For several days, following his advice, I have been spending a great deal! [S&As] And since you are his friend, will you not ask him to give me back the money that belongs to me?

ROUSSELIN: YOU, my rival, ask me that?

GRUCHET: I have not taken an oath to remain your rival. I have a heart, Monsieur Rousselin, and I know how to appreciate kindness.

ROUSSELIN: Do you, indeed? Perhaps you remember that I hold a receipt from you for six thousand francs, lent some time ago to help you set yourself up in business, which — counting the interest — now amounts to more than twenty thousand . francs.

GRUCHET: I wished to speak to you about that very matter. But I am compelled to be always giving and giving.

ROUSSELIN: I rather think that I do more of that sort of thing than anyone else!

GRUCHET: Remember how many persons I have depending upon me, and that I have — although you may not believe it — a certain amount of influence. If you would give me back that paper you just mentioned, we might come to an understanding.

ROUSSELIN: An understanding? On what point?

GRUCHET: Well, — I would — cut loose from the electors — give up my chances.

ROUSSELIN: And if I should not be elected, — then I should lose the deputyship and the money too!

GRUCHET: Oh, you are too modest!

ROUSSELIN: What do you mean by that?

GRUCHET: Have your own way, then! There would be time to change matters, even at the last moment. I tell you once more, you are making a mistake. [Turns to the left] ROUSSELIN: Where are you going by that door?

GRUCHET: TO a private room just outside, where I think Julien is writing out his report of the meeting. You are making a blunder, I assure you.

[Exit, L.]

SCENE V.

ROUSSELIN: Was that a ruse or was he speaking the truth? As to Murel — he is an idiot, to allow himself to be drawn into stock speculations. I always suspected him of it. But I shall not bother my head about him; he has lost his credit with the people, and by Jove! —

MUREL [enters joyously]: Pardon me, my dear Rousselin, for leaving you so abruptly! I have just come from Dodart's office. What an event, my dear friend! Such a fortunate —

ROUSSELIN: Ha! You're a nice fellow! I have been obliged to receive your creditors. Gruchet demands thirty thousand francs!

MUREL: He shall have them next week!

ROUSSELIN: Still boasting, are you? You never have a doubt about anything! Not even about my election. Not everyone is as clever as you; and now I suppose you intend to —

MUREL: TO support Gruchet, were you about to say?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, I was! For a whole week now The Impartial has done nothing to help my cause.

MUREL: I was away on a journey, and no sooner did I arrive home than I rushed to the office.

ROUSSELIN: That's a slim excuse!

MUREL: Gruchet's demand for payment at this time is simply an act of revenge. I have ruined myself for you. But fortunately —

ROUSSELIN: What is fortunate?

MUREL: Well — you have, in a way, promised me your daughters hand.

ROUSSELIN: Oh, listen to him!

MUREL: But you do not know that I have just fallen heir to a fortune.

ROUSSELIN: Your aunt's, perhaps!

MUREL: Precisely!

ROUSSELIN: That joke is rather stale.

MUREL: I swear to you that my aunt is dead!

ROUSSELIN: All right! Bury her, then, but don't try to fool me with your story of inheritance.

MUREL: But it is absolutely true, I tell you! Only, as the poor woman died after I left her, her executors are trying to discover whether she left any later will.

ROUSSELIN: Ah, there is a doubt! Well, for my part, I like people that are sure of what they say and do.

MUREL: Monsieur Rousselin, you forget what I am able to do for you.

ROUSSELIN: NO great things, I fancy! Your own workmen won't listen to you any more.

MUREL: Indeed! You really believe that? Just because five or six brawling fellows, who I had discharged from the factory, turned against me! But there are others!

ROUSSELIN: Why didn't they come to the meeting, then?

MUREL: HOW could I bring them here when I was absent on a journey?

ROUSSELIN [aside]: That's a fine reason!

MUREL: YOU do not know their humour, but I will wager that between now and next Sunday, I could — but no, I will not mix myself up in any more of your affairs. I will work for Gruchet.

ROUSSELIN [aside]: He threatens me! I wonder whether there is still a hope! [Aloud] So you believe that the effect of a reunion would not be altogether bad?

MUREL: Well, I don't know. You see, you have hurt the feelings of the people.

ROUSSELIN: But I myself am one of the people! My father was a humble workman. We must impress that upon them, my good Murel! Say that I have suffered much for them, because the government has laid its hand upon me, only just now. Go back to the factory quickly and speak to them again.

MUREL: But listen — wait! I must show you the certificate of my aunt's death.

ROUSSELIN: GO! GO! Make them understand —

MUREL: First, she* left a farm —

SCENE VI.

(The same, including Mme. Rousselin and Louise)

MME. R. [to Louise, speaking off stage]: Follow me, Louise! What are you looking at out there? [Enter Mme. R. and Louise] Ah! I have found you at last! [To Rousselin] I was so anxious about you. If you only had a little sense!

ROUSSELIN: I could not get away before, my dear.

LOUISE [sees Murel]: Ah! my friend!

MUREL: Louise!

MME. R. [scandalised]: What does this mean? Louise, is this proper behaviour for a young girl? And you, Monsieur, why do you presume to be so familiar?

MUREL: My dear Madame, Monsieur Rousselin will explain to you

MME. R.: I am decidedly curious to know [draws Rousselin aside] for what possible reason my daughter —

ROUSSELIN: My dear, first of all, you must understand — [They talk aside]

LOUISE [to Murel]: It was I who made mamma come. I knew you were here, and it was the only way I could manage to see you.

MUREL: We must not seem to be too much interested in each other; I will tell you later the reason why. [Approaches M. and Mme. Rousselin] Madame, although I know it is the custom to ask a friend to act as an intermediary in these matters, I am forced by circumstances to act for myself; and I beg you now to give me the hand of Mademoiselle Louise in marriage.

MME. R.: But, Monsieur, persons of our station in life do not wish —

MUREL [hastily]: The change in my fortunes warrants my making this request.

ROUSSELIN: We must first be fully satisfied on that point.

MME. R.: But this is entirely contrary to ordinary etiquette! LOUISE [smiles]: Oh, mamma! MME. R.: And such an unconventional proposal in a public place! — it is really — really —

SCENE VII.

JULIEN [enters]: I have come, Monsieur [to Rousselin], to place myself wholly at your disposal.

ROUSSELIN: YOU?

JULIEN: Yes, certainly!

MUREL [aside]: Who brought him here?

JULIEN: As the journal that I represent has the authority of seniority over any other publication in this part of the country, I can be of great service to you, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN [astonished]: But how about Murel?

JULIEN [looks at Mme R.]: Through that door I heard all that passed at the meeting; and it will be perfectly easy for me to make a favourable report of it — of course [indicates Murel], with the permission of my chief.

ROUSSELIN: I do not know how to express my gratitude to you!

MME. R. [aside to Rousselin]:. Now you see how successful I have been! [Aside to Julien] I thank you, Monsieur!

JULIEN [aside to Mme R.]: Your eyes have inspired me, believe it, Madame!

ROUSSELIN [to Mme. R.]: He is really charming! Protected by you, he is sure of a staunch supporter!

MUREL: He has wonderful talent, and a remarkably clever and picturesque style of writing!

ROUSSELIN: I can easily believe it.

MUREL: He has plenty of strength, too, when he takes the trouble to use it. [Aside to Julien] You will oblige me by saying that this idea was mine!

JULIEN: Well, I own, Monsieur Rousselin, that in spite of the former arguments of our friend Murel — who always praised you with the greatest enthusiasm — I was rather obstinate and hard to convince. [Looks at Mme. R.] But now, with the suddenness of a flash of light, I understand everything, and I will obey your wishes!

ROUSSELIN: Ah, my dear Monsieur, I am filled with gratitude!

JULIEN [aside to Mme. R.]: When shall we meet again?

MME. R. [aside to Julien]: I will send you word!

ROUSSELIN: I do not exactly know how you will succeed in winning the favour of Madame Rousselin, my dear Monsieur Duprat! [Smiles]

JULIEN [gaily]: I shall try my best to do so, I assure you, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN [to Mme. R.]: Ask Monsieur Julien to dine with us this evening, quite en famille.

MME. R. [curtseys low]: Certainly, with the greatest pleasure!

JULIEN [bows]: Madame!

ACT IV.

Scene: Rousselin's study. Large window at the back, showing view of the country. Several doors R. and L. A desk stands L, with a clock on its top shelf

SCENE I.

PIERRE [stands at half-open door, speaking loudly to some person off the stage]: François! see that carriages are sent at once to take eight gentlemen to Saint-Léonard, and do not close the driveway gates. Elizabeth must open the bulletins as they arrive. Don't forget to stop at the stationer's on your way back, and bring home the visiting-cards! [Enter a Messenger, who pants under a load of newspapers] That's heavy, isn't it, my good man? Put it down there — that's right! [The Messenger deposits his bundle, then goes outside the door, and returns with a much larger package, which he puts down beside the first] Now go down to the kitchen and get something to brace you up! They are drinking champagne out of preserve-pots down there! Everything goes just now, you see! [Exit Messenger] This is election day, and next week — Paris! How long have I dreamed of living there, and longed for it — principally on account of the oysters and the Opera Ball! [Looks at the two bundles on the floor] There are more copies of that article written by Monsieur Duprat! Where shall I distribute them? Every one in the town has, without exaggeration, at least three copies of it already! And here are all these extra copies on our hands! Never mind! I'll get to work on them. [Begins to, divide the papers into small parcels. Enter the Policeman] Ah! Father Morin! You are rather late to-day.

POLICEMAN: It is because some kind of row has been going on at Monsieur Murel's house; his workmen have all turned their backs on him now! Everything is going wrong, I fear. [Helps Pierre to sort papers. Enter Félicité]

PIERRE: HOW are you, Félicité? Good morning, Madame Gruchet!

Ha! ha!

FELICITE: YOU are very rude, Pierre!

PIERRE: I thought you were all off with us, since your master set himself up in opposition to mine.

FELICITE [drily]: That was none of my business, was it? I have a message for your master.

PIERRE: He has gone out.

FELICITE: Will he return for luncheon?

PIERRE: For luncheon? Do you suppose he has time for luncheon? Why, he is rushing about from morning till night! Madame carries his meals to his room when he is at home, and Mademoiselle Louise goes about distributing food to the poor!

FELICITE: And the governess?

PIERRE: Oh, she is more sentimental than ever! [To the Policeman] No, not that way! [Folds a paper carefully] Monsieur Rousselin himself showed me how to fold these journals, so that this article shall catch the eye at first glance.

POLICEMAN: He is making lively times in this district.

PIERRE: I believe you, my boy!

FELICITE: While I am waiting, may I say a word to the English lady?

PIERRE [points to a door, L.]: Her room is out there, down the corridor, last door at the right.

FELICITE: Oh, I know! [Crosses to door, L.]

PIERRE: Here comes our good master! [Félicité slips behind the door and remains unobserved in the corner. Enter Rousselin]

SCENE II.

ROUSSELIN [clasps Pierre's hand warmly]: My dear friend!

PIERRE [astonished]: Why, master!

ROUSSELIN [recovers himself]: Oh! Ah! — a slight absence of mind! I have become so accustomed to shaking hands with my political friends! The palm of my right hand is almost inflamed! [To the Policeman] Ah! very good! [Hands him money quietly] Thank you very much, my good friend, for your assistance. Do not be afraid to call upon me — if — if — ever you need anything!

POLICEMAN [with a deprecating gesture]: Oh, that's all right, Monsieur!

[Exit, with Pierre, helping to carry away the bundles.]

ROUSSELIN: That newspaper article of Julien's does away with all possible objections that remained against me! It shows how absurd it was for the electors to form their opinions so hastily, and demonstrates that my conduct has been most wise and loyal! He praises my administrative ability, and even says that, should I be elected, I shall gain only what is my right! And he says it all with such style — so much elegance! Ah! I owe a great deal to the cleverness of my wife in managing this affair!

FELICITE [comes from the corner, extending a note]: From Monsieur Gruchet!

ROUSSELIN [takes note, opens it and reads]: "Send me that receipt, and I will withdraw all opposition. You may entrust it to my servant." The devil! This might be called putting a knife to a man's throat! But — if he should withdraw and make no more trouble, and I should be nominated! That's worth considering. It is a large sum, and the interest increases it all the time. If he should be elected, I could get it all back. But — six thousand francs! — not so great a sum, after all — I had almost forgotten about it. What good would they do me? A man gains nothing without some sacrifice! [Opens writing-desk] Wait! [Opens drawer in desk and takes out paper; gives it to Félicité] Take that, and hasten home! Your master is waiting for it.

FELICITE: Thank you, Monsieur! [Exit].

ROUSSELIN: His resignation comes rather late in the day! Pshaw! the voting is only just about to begin, and even if I should lose a few votes

---

SCENE III.

(The same, including Murel and Dodart)

MUREL [enters with Dodart]: Now, perhaps you will believe me, Monsieur Rousselin. I have brought the notary, who will show you all the papers proving my inheritance.

DODART [shows documents]: Here are the legal papers, also the inventory, establishing the rights and qualities of my client as heir to the property of his aunt, Madame Murel, widow, late of Montélimart.

ROUSSELIN: I congratulate you!

MUREL: NOW there will be no further opposition, I hope, to — to —

ROUSSELIN: TO what, Monsieur Murel?

MUREL: Why, to my marriage!

ROUSSELIN: YOU cannot expect me to talk about that on such a day as this!

MUREL: Of course I know you are very much occupied. But, without saying anything decisive, you might give me a little encouragement.

ROUSSELIN: Have you heard the news? Hasnt anyone told you that Gruchet —

MUREL: Monsieur Rousselin, it seems to me you might listen to my request!

ROUSSELIN: NO! no! Don't worry me now! You would do better to go and look after your workmen. Even in the short time that remains, they might —

MUREL: But I brought Dodart here expressly that he might explain my affairs to you!

ROUSSELIN: GO to your workmen now, I say! We can talk of your affairs later.

MUREL: YOU consent, then — it is certain?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, but don't lose any more time!

MUREL [joyfully]: Ah! you may count on me! Why, I ought to give them an increase in wages out of my own pocket! [Exit].

SCENE IV.

ROUSSELIN: A good lad, that Murel!

DODART: Nevertheless, he deceives himself. The factory hands laugh at him now. As to his fortune —

(Enter Marchais)

MARCHAIS: Your servant, gentlemen! [To Rousselin] Monsieur de Bouvigny sent me here to receive your reply.

ROUSSELIN: Reply to what?

MARCHAIS: TO the matter that Monsieur Dodart had just laid before you.

DODART [slaps his own forehead]: What a piece of thoughtlessness! The first that I have been guilty of in my career as a notary!

MARCHAIS: And he would like your answer in writing!

ROUSSELIN: But —

DODART: Let me explain. [To Marchais] Go out in the courtyard and wait a few moments. [Exit Marchais] Three days ago, Monsieur Rousselin.

the Count de Bouvigny informed me again that he still wishes to form an alliance with your family.

ROUSSELIN: I knew that well enough!

DODART: And he said that if you wish — hang it! you know one must use what means he can! They may not always be the most desirable, but —

ROUSSELIN: YOU have a very roundabout way of getting at this matter.

DODART: Had it not been for Murel, who rushed into my study and took up my time, I should have been here much sooner.

ROUSSELIN: Well, well! what is the business, for heaven's sake?

DODART: If you will allow your daughter to marry Monsieur Onésime, the Count says he is sure — positively sure, you understand — of your election, because he will send sixty-four of his own labourers to the polls to vote for you.

ROUSSELIN: This message by Marchais is a sort of final word?

DODART: Absolutely!

ROUSSELIN: Well, — but Murel?

DODART: YOU have just given him a promise.

ROUSSELIN: Was it really a promise?

DODART: Oh, rather!

ROUSSELIN: That is to say, not altogether! But — what do you advise me to do?

DODART: The situation is rather serious. Certain ties of friendship, and many other interests, attach me to Monsieur de Bouvigny, and I should be delighted to see an alliance made between his family and yours. On the other hand, I will not hide from you the fact that Monsieur Murel is now — [aside] party to a contract! [Aloud] You ought to reflect, to look on all sides, to weigh every consideration. On one side, there is family, on the other, fortune! For Monsieur Murel is now a good match. However, young Onésime —

ROUSSELIN: What shall I do? Oh, my wife! I had forgotten her! I cannot do anything without consulting her. [Rings. A pause] Everyone is dead or asleep to-day! [Calls] Pierre! Pierre! [Enter Pierre] Say to Madame Rousselin that I wish to speak to her here.

PIERRE: Madame is not in the house, Monsieur.

ROUSSELIN: Look for her in the garden. [Exit Pierre] She will discover some way — she has so much tact.

DODART: In certain circumstances, I, too, consult my wife, and to do her justice — [Re-enter Pierre]

PIERRE: Monsieur, I cannot find Madame in the garden.

ROUSSELIN: Well, search elsewhere, then! Find her!

PIERRE: The cook thinks that Madame went out some time ago.

ROUSSELIN: Where was she going?

PIERRE: She did not say.

ROUSSELIN: Are you sure of that?

PIERRE: Quite sure, Monsieur. [Pause. Exit Pierre.]

ROUSSELIN: This is very extraordinary! Never in her life has she —

ARABELLA [enters hastily, with much excitement]: Monsieur! Monsieur! I must speak to you! Hear me! It is something very important, — oh, very serious, Monsieur!

DODART: Shall I retire, Mademoiselle? [Arabella nods] [Exit Dodart.]

SCENE V.

ROUSSELIN: What is the matter with you, Mademoiselle? Tell me quickly.

ARABELLA: Good heavens! Monsieur, pardon me if I dare — it is in your interest! Madame's absence seems very strange to you, and I believe I can —

ROUSSELIN: Is it, by chance —

ARABELLA: Ah, Monsieur! by chance! Listen! Your wife is now with Monsieur Julien!

ROUSSELIN [stunned]: What! [Suddenly, after a pause] Of course! Something to do with my election!

ARABELLA: I do not believe it, because I met them at the Blue Cross, and watched them; they went into the little pavilion — you know, the hunters' rendezvous — and I — I — overheard these words from Monsieur 'Julien — without comprehending them altogether, in spite of the explanation that Monsieur Gruchet gave me just now, seeming to understand them better than I. Monsieur Julien said: "I will go out before you, and in order to make you understand that you may come out also without fear, I will shake my handkerchief behind me!"

ROUSSALIN: Impossible! Proofs, Miss Arabella, proofs!

SCENE VI.

DODART [enters quickly]: Marchais would not wait! From your summer-house in the park, he fancied he saw the Count de Bouvigny coming down the hill surrounded by a great crowd.

ROUSSELIN: The sixty-four labourers!

DODART: The Count may make them vote for Gruchet!

ROUSSELIN: Oh, no! Gruchet has promised — but, after all — that miserable fellow — who knows what he will do?

DODART: Or the Count may make them put blank papers in the box.

ROUSSELIN: And perhaps that would be enough to spoil my chances!

DODART: But the hour is growing late!

ROUSSELIN: It will be some time before they can reach the city hall, fortunately. Tell Marchais to go to the count, and beg him to grant me at least — Where is Louise? Miss Arabella call Louise! [Exit Arabella] How shall I persuade the girl?

DODART: If you think anything I can say —

ROUSSELIN: NO, that might hurt her feelings. Wait here, and as soon as I have her consent — But Bouvigny demands a written reply! Can I ever —

DODART: Your word of honour will suffice. Then I will return at once to tell you —

ROUSSELIN: But you will not have time! The polls close at four o'clock! Run! Hasten!

DODART: I will go at once to the city hall.

ROUSSELIN: HOW I wish I could be there, so that I could know the sooner how affairs are going!

DODART: YOU will soon know.

ROUSSELIN: I hardly think so! You are not very quick!

DODART: If you win, I will wave my handkerchief as a signal to you. You will be able to see it from your window.

ROUSSELIN: A good idea! [Enter Louise]

LOUISE: Did you send for me, papa?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, my child. [To Dodart] Now go quickly, my dear friend! DODART: But I must wait outside to learn Mademoiselle's decision. ROUSSELIN: Oh, — true! [Exit Dodart.]

SCENE VII.

ROUSSELIN: Louise, you love your father, do you not?

LOUISE: Oh, papa! what a question!

ROUSSELIN: And for him you would do —

LOUISE: Anything he wishes!

ROUSSELIN: Good! Now listen to me! It often happens that catastrophes come into the quietest lives. A perfectly honest man sometimes allows himself to be led astray by blandishments, or his own folly. Suppose, for instance — it is only a supposition, nothing more! — I had committed some reprehensible action, and that, in order to help me out of my trouble —

LOUISE: Oh, papa! You frighten me!

ROUSSELIN: DO not be alarmed, darling! The matter is not so serious as that. But, — suppose I should ask a certain sacrifice of you, would you resign yourself? I do not ask a sacrifice, however, — only a concession. It would not be difficult for you — the acquaintance has been so short. Briefly, then, my poor little girl, I ask you to think no more of Monsieur Murel!

LOUISE: But I love him!

ROUSSELIN: What! Nonsense! You have only allowed yourself to be taken with his manners and his dashing way of talking.

LOUISE: I find him very charming indeed!

ROUSSELIN: But, my child, — I cannot tell you the details, but I will just hint to you that his morals are far from good!

LOUISE: That is not true!

ROUSSELIN: Then, he is overwhelmed with debts! We shall probably see him running away from them at no very distant day!

LOUISE: But why? He is rich now.

ROUSSELIN: Ah! you are thinking of his fortune, are you? I had not spoken of it. I thought your sentiments were higher, more noble than that!

LOUISE: But I did love him for himself, from the very first day I saw him

ROUSSELIN: And you cherish your own little interests, too, — own up to it! You do not disdain little frivolities and pretty things; you like titles; and you would be very happy in Paris — after I become deputy — to take your place in fashionable society; to be invited to the houses of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. Wouldn't you like to be a countess?

LOUISE: A countess — I?

ROUSSELIN: Yes, — by marrying Onésime!

LOUISE: Never — so long as I live! Marry an idiot who does nothing but gaze at the tips of his boots — who hasn't brains enough to get an engagement as valet de chambre! He is incapable of speaking two sensible words! And what charming sisters-in-law I should have! They don't know how to spell! And a pretty father-in-law — who looks like a farmer! And such pride and arrogance, and such a style of dressing themselves! Why, they wear gloves made of floss silk!

ROUSSELIN: YOU are very unjust. Onésime has been much better educated than you think. He was brought up under the tutorship of an eminent churchman; and the family dates from the twelfth century.

You can see their genealogical tree in the grand hall of the castle. The ladies — they are not models of fashion, it is true, but what of that? And as for the Count de Bouvigny — there is no more loyal friend —

LOUISE: But you have been very bitter against him since you became a candidate, and the Count has shown just as great an enmity towards you! He is not like Murel, who has stood by you faithfully. And he stands by you still! Yet you ask me to forget him! I do not understand all this. What does it mean?

ROUSSELIN: I cannot explain it to you, my child, but surely you do not think I wish to make you unhappy. You do not doubt my tenderness, my judgment, my good sense? I know the world well. I know what is best for you. You would never be compelled to leave us — we should always be together. Nothing would be changed. I entreat you, my dear Louise — try to please me!

LOUISE: Ah, you torture me!

ROUSSELIN: I do not command — I supplicate you! [Kneels] Save me!

LOUISE [her hand on her heart]: No! I cannot!

ROUSSELIN [despairingly]: You will be compelled to reproach yourself for having killed your father!

LOUISE [starts up]: Ah, my God! Do what you will, then! [Exit].

ROUSSELIN [runs to door, up stage; opens it and speaks loudly]: Dodart! Give the Count my word of honour! Quick! [Comes down G] That was a painful scene! Poor little girl! But, after all, why shouldn't she love Onésime just as well as Murel? He is as good as any one else. And he will be much easier to manage than Murel! No, I have not done badly; everyone will be pleased, particularly my wife. [Starts] My wife! Ah! That serpent of an Arabella, with her lies and insinuations! In spite of myself, I — [Enter Voinchet] What! Do you not intend to vote?

SCENE VIII.

VOINCHET: Yes, immediately. There are fifteen of us from Bonneval; the others are waiting for me in the Café Français, and we shall all go to the city hall together.

ROUSSELIN [very graciously]: And how can I be of service to you, Monsieur?

VOINCHET: One of the engineers of the new railway has just told me that the road will certainly be laid by way of Saint-Mathieu, although at first, it was thought that it would run through Bonneval. Considering that probability, I had bought a piece of ground, and, in order to be able to claim a larger indemnity, I had even started a nursery upon it! So now I find myself very much embarrassed. I wish to change my business, but how shall I dispose of about five hundred bergamot pear-trees, eight hundred peach-trees, three hundred Emperors of China, and more than a hundred and sixty pigeons?

ROUSSELIN: I do not see that I can do anything to help you in the matter.

VOINCHET: Pardon me! You have at the rear end of your park an excellent soil for raising fruit-trees — fine and rich! — and at the rate of thirty sous apiece, I will gladly turn over to you all my shrubs!

ROUSSELIN [walks towards the door with Voinchet]: Well, well! I will decide about it later.

VOINCHET: YOU will take them, of course? You shall receive the first load to-morrow. Now I will go to join my friends! [Exit].

HOMBOURG [enters, L.]: I have only come to say, Monsieur, that you must take my —

ROUSSELIN: But I have your chestnut horses already, man! They have been in my stable three days!

HOMBOURG: And that's the right place for them! But listen — for rough cartage and heavy work, Monsieur de Bouvigny (oh! you will beat that man, without fail!) has refused to buy from me a fine, strong mare, and the price was a mere trifle — only forty pistoles!

ROUSSELIN: And do you wish me to buy it?

HOMBOURG: That would give me a great deal of pleasure, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN: Very well, I will take it.

HOMBOURG: Excuse me, Monsieur Rousselin, but — is it too much to ask — a small sum on account — for the chestnuts, you know? The remainder at your leisure, of course!

ROUSSELIN: Oh, certainly! [Goes to desk and opens drawer] How are things going at the city hall?

HOMBOURG: All goes well.

ROUSSELIN: Have you been there?

HOMBOURG: Yes, indeed.

ROUSSELIN [aside, pushes back the drawer]: There is no great hurry!

HOMBOURG [sees Rousselin's movement]: That is to say, I went there, of course, to get my ballot. I have now just time to go and vote. [Rousselin opens drawer and hands money to Hombourg] Thanks for your kindness! [About to go] You ought to cut a dash, Monsieur Rousselin! Now, there is that pretty little Normandy nag I told you about —

ROUSSELIN: Oh, enough! Enough!

HOMBOURG: If it were freshened up a bit and well groomed, it would make a fine pony for Mademoiselle!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: Poor Louise!

HOMBOURG: It would be a pleasant distraction for her.

ROUSSELIN [sighs]: Well, I will take the pony!
[Exit Hombourg.]

BEAUMESNIL [standing at threshold of door, R.]: Only two words with you, Monsieur! I have brought my son to you!

ROUSSELIN: And why have you done that?

BEAUMESNIL: He is out in the courtyard now, playing with the dog. Will you see him? It is he of whom I spoke to you regarding his education. We hope for a little help from you.

ROUSSELIN: I will do what I can, certainly.

BEAUMESNIL: These children cost so much! And I have seven, Monsieur, all as strong as young Turks!

ROUSSELIN [aside]: That's encouraging!

BEAUMESNIL: His schoolmaster has sent me a bill for two quarters, and though it humiliates me to ask you, — still, if you could advance me the money —

ROUSSELIN [opens drawer of the desk]: How much is it a quarter?

BEAUMESNIL [shows a long bill]: There are some extras besides.

[Rousselin gives him money] i will run home and tell the good news!
Frankly, I came here on purpose to see you!

ROUSSELIN: What! did you not come to vote? How about my election?

BEAUMESNIL: I thought that was to come off tomorrow! I live so quietly at home, Monsieur, in my own little circle! But I will go at once and do my duty — at once, Monsieur! [Exit.LEDRU [(enters, C.): Ah, famous! You are as good as elected!

ROUSSELIN [joyfully]: Ah!

LEDRU: Gruchet has withdrawn. Everyone has known it for the last two hours. He was right — it was the prudent thing for him to do. To tell the truth, I helped to spoil his chances, and you ought to recognise my friendly services by trying to obtain for me — [Shows the buttonhole of his coat]

ROUSSELIN [speaks low]: The ribbon!

LEDRU [loudly]: If I did not deserve it I would not ask for it, but — You appear very cold, Monsieur Rousselin!

ROUSSELIN: But, my dear friend, how can I do this for you? I am not yet a minister!

LEDRU: Oh, well! never mind! Only — I have behind me twenty-five men — good, lively fellows, Heurtelot at the head of them, with some of Murel's mill-hands — and they are waiting for me at the market. I told them I was coming here to make you a proposition, and they will wait until I tell them how it was received. Now, I warn you, if you don't swear that you will try to obtain for me the cross of honour —

ROUSSELIN: Oh, very well! I will try! And I will buy a few foreign orders also for you!

LEDRU: ALL in good time! [Exit quickly.]

SCENE IX.

ROUSSELIN [looks out of wide window at the back of stage]: He will have just time — there are still five minutes! In five minutes the polls will close, and then! — I do not dream! It is true! A brilliant future opens before me! Oh, to take my place among distinguished men! To call myself a member of some committee; to be chosen sometimes to make a report; to talk of budgets, amendments, sub-amendments; and to take part in many affairs, all of the greatest importance! Every morning I shall* see my name printed in the journals, even in those of which I do not know the language!

The theatres! the hunt! the women! Isn't all that well worth having?
[Pause] But, in order to obtain it, I am compelled to give my money, my own flesh and blood — everything! Yes, I have sacrificed my daughter — my poor daughter! [Weeps] I feel the deepest remorse, and I do not even know whether Bouvigny will keep his word. One does not sign votes. [The clock strikes four] Four o'clock! It is all over! They will count the vote at once — that will not take long. How shall I pass the time until I hear the result? Some intimate friend — even if it were only Murel — ought to come here soon, to give me the first news. Oh, men! men! One may ruin himself for them without finding any gratitude! If they do not elect me — Ah, well! so much the worse for them! Where can they find another candidate like me? I should do my duty! [Stamps his foot] Oh, come! hasten, some one! They are all against me, the wretches! This is killing me! My head reels! I don't know what I am about! If this suspense keeps on, I shall smash the furniture!

SCENE X.

(Enter a Beggar, pretending to be blind)

ROUSSELIN: This is not an elector! Why didn't some one hustle him off the premises? Who allowed you to enter my doors?

BEGGAR: The house was open, and some one told me I should find in here a man who was kind to everyone — the good Monsieur Rousselin! No one talks of anything but you, Monsieur. Give me something, — it will bring you good luck!

ROUSSELIN [speaks to himself]: It will bring me good luck! [Puts two fingers in his waistcoat pocket; pauses; reflects] They say that alms given in critical circumstances possess a power for bringing good fortune that no one can explain. I ought to have gone to church this morning —

BEGGAR [whines]: Charity, if you please!

ROUSSELIN [feels in all his pockets]: I have no more money about me.

BEGGAR [whines]: Something, Monsieur!

ROUSSELIN [rummages in the drawers of his desk]: No, not a sou! I have been giving away money all day long! This creature annoys me! Ah, I shall soon find that money flies!

BEGGAR: Charity, if you please! You, who are so rich! I want bread! Ah, how weak I am! [Appears about to fall; leans against the door]

ROUSSELIN [discouraged]: I cannot beat a blind man!

BEGGAR: Only the least thing — and I will pray to the good God for you!

ROUSSELIN [tears his watch from its pocket and hands it to the Beggar]: There! take that! and heaven will, without doubt, have pity on me! [Exit Beggar quickly. Rousselin looks at the clock] No one has come yet! Something bad has happened, and no one dares to tell me! I would go myself, but my legs — ah! it is too much! Everything seems to turn around! I am about to faint! [Sinks on a couch near the window]

SCENE XI.

ARABELLA [enters softly, and touches Rousselin on the shoulder]: Look! [Points out of the window; Rousselin leans over to follow the direction of her finger] Just below the road — in front of the schoolhouse — on the top of the hedge — do you see?

ROUSSELIN: I see something white waving over the hedge.

ARABELLA: The handkerchief!

ROUSSELIN: But I do not understand — [Suddenly cries] Ah! how stupid of me! [Springs up] It is Dodart waving his handkerchief! Victory! Victory! Yes, my good Arabella, it is certain! Look! some one is running this way!

ARABELLA [leans out of the window]: A crowd is coming through the gates — men with guns! [Gun-shots heard]

ROUSSELIN: That is to celebrate my victory! Good! [A shot] Again! Keep it up! Pif! Paf! [Silence] Listen to that! [Steps heard running rapidly. Enter Gruchet. Rousselin rushes at him] Gruchet! What is it? Speak! Am I elected? Is it done?

GRUCHET [looks at Rousselin from head to foot; then bursts into rude laughter] I think there's no doubt whatever about that, Monsieur!

(Enter a great crowd from all sides, shouting): Our deputy! Long live our deputy!

Curtain

LE CANDIDAT

ACTE UN

Chez M. Rousselin. Un jardin. Pavillon à droite. Une grille occupant le côté gauche.

Scène I : Murel, Pierre, domestique

Pierre est debout, en train de lire un journal. - Murel, entre, tenant un gros bouquet qu'il donne à Pierre.

MUREL : Pierre, où est donc M. Rousselin ?

PIERRE : Dans son cabinet, monsieur Murel ; ces dames sont dans le parc avec leur Anglaise et M. Onésime... de Bouvigny !

MUREL : Ah cette espèce de cagot [séminariste] à moitié gandin ? J'attendrai qu'il soit parti, car sa vue seule me déplaît tellement !...

PIERRE : Et à moi donc !

MUREL : A toi aussi ! Pourquoi ?

PIERRE : Un gringalet ! fiérot ! pingre ! Et puis, j'ai idée qu'il vient chez nous... (Mystérieusement) C'est pour Mademoiselle.

MUREL, à demi-voix : Louise ?

PIERRE : Parbleu ! sans cela les Bouvigny, qui sont des nobles ne feraient pas tant de salamalecs à nos bourgeois !

MUREL, à part : Ah ! ah ! attention. (Haut) N'oublie pas de m'avertir lorsque des messieurs, tout à l'heure, viendront pour parler à ton maître.

PIERRE : Plusieurs ensemble ? Est-ce que ce serait... par rapport aux élections ? ... On en cause...

MUREL : Assez ! Ecoute-moi ! Tu vas me faire le plaisir d'aller chez Heurtelot le cordonnier, et prie-le de ma part...

PIERRE : Vous, le prier, monsieur Murel !

MUREL : N'importe ! Dis-lui qu'il n'oublie rien !

PIERRE : Entendu !

MUREL : Et qu'il soit exact ! qu'il amène tout le monde !

PIERRE : Suffit, Monsieur ! j'y cours (il sort)

Scène II : Murel, Gruchet

MUREL : Eh, c'est monsieur Gruchet, si je ne me trompe ?

GRUCHET : En personne ! Pierre-Antoine pour vous servir.

MUREL : Vous êtes devenu si rare dans la maison !

GRUCHET : Que voulez-vous ? avec le nouveau genre des Rousselin ! Depuis qu'ils fréquentent Bouvigny, - un joli coco encore, celui-là, - ils font des embarras !...

MUREL : Comment ?

GRUCHET : Vous n'avez donc pas remarqué que leur domestique maintenant porte des guêtres ! Madame ne sort plus qu'avec deux chevaux, et dans les dîners qu'ils donnent - du moins, c'est Félicité, ma servante, qui me l'a dit, - on change de couvert à chaque assiette.

MUREL : Tout cela n'empêche pas Rousselin d'être généreux, serviable !

GRUCHET : Oh ! d'accord ! plus bête que méchant ! Et pour surcroît de ridicule, le voilà qui ambitionne la députation ! Il déclame tout seul devant son armoire à glace, et la nuit, il prononce en rêve des mots parlementaires.

MUREL, riant : En effet !

GRUCHET : Ah ! c'est que ce titre-là sonne bien, député ! ! ! Quand on vous annonce : "Monsieur un tel, député," alors on s'incline ! Sur une carte de visite, après le nom, "député", ça flatte l'oeil. Et en voyage, dans un théâtre, n'importe où, si une contestation s'élève, qu'un individu soit insolent, ou même qu'un agent de police vous pose la main sur le collet : “Vous ne savez donc pas que je suis député, Monsieur !”

MUREL, à part : Tu ne serais pas fâché de l’être, non plus, mon bonhomme !

GRUCHET : Avec ça, comme c’est malin ! pourvu qu’on ait une maison bien montée, quelques amis, de l’entregent !

MUREL : Eh ! mon Dieu ! quand Rousselin serait nommé !

GRUCHET : Un moment ! S’il se porte, ce ne peut être que candidat juste-milieu ?

MUREL, à part : Qui sait ?

GRUCHET : Et alors, mon cher, nous ne devons pas... Car enfin nous sommes des libéraux ; votre position, naturellement, vous donne sur les ouvriers une influence !... Oh ! vous poussez même à leur égard les bons offices très loin ! Je suis pour le peuple, moi, mais pas tant que vous ! Non... non !

MUREL : Bref, en admettant que Rousselin se présente ?...

GRUCHET : Je vote contre lui, c’est réglé !

MUREL, à part : Ah ! j’ai eu raison d’être discret ! (Haut) Mais avec de pareils sentiments, que venez-vous faire chez lui ?

GRUCHET : C’est pour rendre service... à ce petit Julien.

MUREL : Le rédacteur de l’Impartial ?... Vous, l’ami d’un poète ?

GRUCHET : Nous ne sommes pas amis ! Seulement, comme je le vois de temps à autre au cercle, il m’a prié de l’introduire chez Rousselin.

MUREL : Au lieu de s’adresser à moi, un des actionnaires du journal ! Pourquoi ?

GRUCHET : Je l’ignore !

MUREL, à part : Voilà qui est drôle. (Haut) Eh bien, mon cher, vous êtes mal tombé.

GRUCHET : La raison ?

MUREL, à part : Ce Pierre qui ne revient pas ! J'ai toujours peur...
(Haut) La raison ? c'est que Rousselin déteste les bohèmes.

GRUCHET : Celui-là, cependant...

MUREL : Celui-là surtout ! et même depuis huit jours... (il tire sa montre)

GRUCHET : Ah ça ! qui vous démange ? Vous paraissez tout inquiet.

MUREL : Certainement !

GRUCHET : Les affaires, hein ?

MUREL : Oui, mes affaires !

GRUCHET : Ah ! je vous l'avais bien dit ! ça ne m'étonne pas ! ...

MUREL : De la morale maintenant !

GRUCHET : Dame, écoutez-donc, chevaux de selle et de cabriolet, pique-niques, est-ce que je sais moi ! Quand on est simplement le représentant d'une compagnie, on ne vit pas comme si on avait la caisse dans sa poche.

MUREL : Eh ! mon Dieu, je paierai tout !

GRUCHET : En attendant, puisque vous êtes gêné, pourquoi n'empruntez-vous pas à Rousselin ?

MUREL : Impossible !

GRUCHET : Vous m'avez bien emprunté à moi, et je suis moins riche.

MUREL : Oh ! lui ! c'est autre chose.

GRUCHET : Comment, autre chose ? un homme si généreux, si serviable ! Vous avez un intérêt, mon gaillard, à ne pas vous déprécier dans la maison.

MUREL : Pourquoi ?

GRUCHET : Vous faites la cour à la jeune fille, espérant qu'un bon mariage...

MUREL : Diable d'homme, va ! ... Oui, je l'adore... Mme Rousselin !

Au nom du ciel, pas d'allusion !

GRUCHET, à part : Oh ! oh ! tu l'adores. Je crois que tu adores surtout sa dot !

Scène III : Murel, Gruchet, Mme Rousselin, Onésime, Louise, Miss Arabelle, un livre à la main

MUREL, présentant son bouquet à Mme Rousselin : Permettez-moi, Madame de vous offrir...

MME ROUSSELIN, jetant le bouquet sur le guéridon à gauche : Merci, Monsieur !

MISS ARABELLE : Oh ! les splendides gardénias !... et où peut-on trouver des fleurs aussi rares ?

MUREL : Chez moi, miss Arabelle, dans ma serre !

ONESIME, avec impertinence : Monsieur possède une serre ?

MUREL : Chaude ! oui, Monsieur !

LOUISE : Et rien ne lui coûte pour être agréable à ses amis.

MME ROUSSELIN : Si ce n'est, peut-être, d'oublier ses préférences politiques.

MUREL, à Louise, à demi-voix : Votre mère aujourd'hui est d'une froideur !

LOUISE, de même, comme pour l'apaiser : Oh !

MME ROUSSELIN, à droite, assise devant une petite table : Ici, près de moi, cher Vicomte. Approchez, monsieur Gruchet ! Eh bien, a-t-on fini par découvrir un candidat ? Que dit-on ?

GRUCHET : Une foule de choses, Madame. Les uns...

ONESIME, lui coupant la parole : Mon père affirme que M. Rousselin n'aurait qu'à se présenter...

MME ROUSSELIN, vivement : Vraiment, c'est son avis ?

ONESIME : Sans doute ! et tous nos paysans, qui savent que leur intérêt bien entendu s'accorde avec ses idées...

GRUCHET : Cependant, elles diffèrent un peu des principes de 89 !

ONESIME, *riant aux éclats : Ah ! ah ! ah ! les immortels principes de 89 !

GRUCHET : De quoi riez-vous ?

ONESIME : Mon père rit toujours quand il entend ce mot-là.

GRUCHET : Eh ! sans 89, il n'y aurait pas de députés !

MISS ARABELLE : Vous avez raison, monsieur Gruchet, de défendre le parlement. Lorsqu'un gentleman est là, il peut faire beaucoup de bien !

GRUCHET : D'abord on habite Paris pendant l'hiver.

MME ROUSSELIN : Et c'est quelque chose !... Louise, rapproche-toi donc !... Car le séjour de la province, n'est-ce pas, monsieur Murel, à la longue fatigue ?

MUREL, *vivement : Oui, madame ! (Bas à Louise). On y peut cependant trouver le bonheur !

GRUCHET : Comme si cette pauvre province ne contenait que des sots !

MISS ARABELLE, *avec exaltation : Oh ! non ! non ! Des coeurs nobles palpitent à l'ombre de nos vieux bois ; la rêverie se déroule plus largement sur les plaines ; dans des coins obscurs, peut-être, il y a des talents ignorés, un génie qui rayonnera ! (Elle s'assied)

MME ROUSSELIN : Quelle tirade, ma chère ! Vous êtes plus que jamais en veine poétique !

ONESIME : Mademoiselle, en effet, sauf un léger accent, nous a détaillé tout à l'heure, le Lac de M. de Lamartine... d'une façon...

MME ROUSSELIN : Mais vous connaissez la pièce ?

ONESIME : On ne m'a pas encore permis de lire cet auteur.

MME ROUSSELIN : Je comprends ! une éducation... sérieuse ! (Lui passant sur les poignets un écheveau de laine à dévider) Auriez-vous l'obligeance ?... Les bras toujours étendus ! fort bien !

ONESIME : Oh ! je sais Et même, je suis pour quelque chose dans ce paysage en perles que vous a donné ma soeur Elisabeth !

MME ROUSSELIN : Un ouvrage charmant ; il est suspendu dans ma chambre ! Louise, quand tu auras fini de regarder l'Illustration...

MUREL, à part : On se méfie de moi, c'est clair.

MME ROUSSELIN : J'ai admiré, du reste, les talents de vos autres soeurs, la dernière fois que nous avons été au château de Bouvigny.

ONESIME : [Ma mère y recevra prochainement la visite de mon grand-oncle, l'évêque de Saint-Giraud.

MME ROUSSELIN : Monseigneur de Saint-Giraud votre oncle !

ONESIME : Oui ! le parrain de mon père.

MME ROUSSELIN : Il nous oublie, le cher Comte, c'est un ingrat ! ]

ONESIME : Oh ! non ! car il a demandé pour tantôt un rendez-vous à M. Rousselin.

MME ROUSSELIN, l'air satisfait : Ah !

ONESIME : Il veut l'entretenir d'une chose... Et je crois même que j'ai vu entrer tout à l'heure Maître Dodart.

MUREL, à part : Le notaire ! Est-ce que déjà ?

MISS ARABELLE : En effet ! Et après est venu Marchais, l'épicier, puis M. Bondois, M. Liégeard, d'autres encore.

MUREL, à part : Diable, qu'est-ce que cela veut dire ?

Scène IV : les mêmes, Rousselin

LOUISE : Ah ! papa !

ROUSSELIN, le sourire aux lèvres : Regarde-le mon enfant ! Tu peux en être fière ! (Embrassant sa femme) Bonjour, ma chérie !

MME ROUSSELIN : Que se passe-t-il ? cet air rayonnant...

ROUSSELIN, *apercevant Murel : Vous ici, mon bon Murel ! Vous savez déjà... et vous avez voulu être le premier !

MUREL : Quoi donc ?

ROUSSELIN, *apercevant Gruchet : Gruchet aussi ! ah ! mes amis ! C'est bien ! Je suis touché ! Vraiment, tous mes concitoyens...

GRUCHET : Nous ne savons rien !

MUREL : Nous ignorons complètement...

ROUSSELIN : Mais ils sont là !... ils me pressent !

TOUS : Qui donc ?

ROUSSELIN : [Tout un comité ] qui me propose la candidature de l'arrondissement.

MUREL, *à part : Sapristi ! on m'a devancé !

MME ROUSSELIN : Quel bonheur !

GRUCHET : Et vous allez accepter peut-être ?

ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi pas ? Je suis conservateur, moi !

MME ROUSSELIN : Tu leur as répondu ?

ROUSSELIN : Rien encore, Je voulais avoir ton avis.

MME ROUSSELIN : Accepte !

LOUISE : Sans doute !

ROUSSELIN : Ainsi, vous ne voyez pas d'inconvénient ?

TOUS : Aucun - Au contraire - Va donc !

ROUSSELIN : Franchement, vous pensez que je ferais bien ?

MME ROUSSELIN : Oui ! oui !

ROUSSELIN : Au moins, je pourrai dire que vous m'avez forcé.
(Fausse sortie)

MUREL, *l'arrêtant : Doucement ! un peu de prudence.

ROUSSELIN, *stupéfait : Pourquoi ?

MUREL : Une pareille candidature n'est pas sérieuse !

ROUSSELIN : Comment cela ?

Scène V : les mêmes, puis Marchais, Maître Dodart.

MARCHAIS : Serviteur à la compagnie ! Mesdames, faites excuse ! Les messieurs qui sont là m'ont dit d'aller voir ce que faisait Rousselin, et qu'il faut qu'il vienne ! et qu'il réponde oui !

ROUSSELIN : Certainement !

MARCHAIS : Parce que vous êtes une bonne pratique, et que vous ferez un bon député !

ROUSSELIN, avec enivrement : Député !

DODART, entrant : Eh ! mon cher, on s'impatiente, à la fin !

MUREL, à part : Dodart ! encore un tartuffe, celui-là !

DODART, à Onésime : Monsieur votre père, qui est dans la cour, désire vous parler.

MUREL : Ah ! son père est là ?

GRUCHET, à Murel : Il vient avec les autres. L'oeil au guet, Murel !

MUREL : Pardon, maître Dodart. (A Rousselin) Imaginez un prétexte... (A Marchais) Dites que M. Rousselin se trouve indisposé et qu'il donnera sa réponse... tantôt. Vivement ! (Marchais sort)

ROUSSELIN : Voilà qui est trop fort, par exemple !

MUREL : Eh ! on n'accepte pas une candidature, comme cela, à l'improviste !

ROUSSELIN : Depuis trois ans je ne fais qu'y penser !

MUREL : Mais vous allez commettre une bévue ! Demandez à Me Dodart, homme plein de sagesse, et qui connaît la localité, s'il peut répondre de votre élection.

DODART : En répondre, non ! J'y crois, cependant ! Dans ces affaires-là, après tout, on n'est jamais sûr de rien. D'autant plus que nous ne savons pas si nos adversaires...

GRUCHET : Et ils sont nombreux, les adversaires !

ROUSSELIN : Ils sont nombreux ?

MUREL : Immensément ! (A Dodart) Vous excuserez donc notre ami qui désire un peu de réflexion. (A Rousselin) Ah ! si vous voulez risquer tout !

ROUSSELIN : Il n'a peut-être pas tort ! (A Dodart) Oui, priez-les...

DODART : Eh bien, monsieur Onésime ? Allons !

MUREL : Il faut obéir à papa.

ROUSSELIN, à Murel : Comment, vous partez aussi ? Pourquoi ?

MUREL : Cela est mon secret ! Tenez-vous tranquille ! vous verrez !

Scène VI : Rousselin, Mme Rousselin, Louise, Miss Arabelle, Gruchet

ROUSSELIN : Que va-t-il faire ?

GRUCHET : Je n'en sais rien.

MME ROUSSELIN : Quelque extravagance !

GRUCHET : Oui ; c'est un drôle de jeune homme ! J'étais venu pour avoir la permission de vous en présenter un autre.

ROUSSELIN : Amenez-le !

GRUCHET : Oh ! il peut fort bien ne pas vous convenir. Vous avez quelquefois des préventions ! En un mot, il se nomme M. Julien Duprat.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! non ! non !

GRUCHET : Quelle idée !

ROUSSELIN : Qu'on ne m'en parle pas, entendez-vous (Apercevant, sur le guéridon, un journal) J'avais pourtant défendu chez moi l'admission de ce papier ! Mais je ne suis pas le maître, apparemment ! (Examinant la feuille) Oui, encore des vers !

GRUCHET : Parbleu, puisque c'est un poète !

ROUSSELIN : Je n'aime pas les poètes ! de pareils galopins...

MISS ARABELLE : Je vous assure, Monsieur, que je lui ai parlé, une fois, à la promenade, sous les quinconces ; et il est... très bien !

GRUCHET : Quand vous le receviez !

ROUSSELIN : Moins que jamais ! (A Louise) moins que jamais, ma fille !

LOUISE : Oh ! je ne le défends pas !

ROUSSELIN : Je l'espère bien... un misérable !

MISS ARABELLE, violemment : Ah !

GRUCHET : Mais pourquoi ?

ROUSSELIN : Parce que... Pardon, miss Arabelle ! (A sa femme, montrant Louise) Oui, emmène-là ! J'ai besoin de m'expliquer avec Gruchet.

Scène VII : Rousselin, Gruchet

GRUCHET, assis sur le banc à gauche : Je vous écoute.

ROUSSELIN, prenant le journal : Le feuilleton est intitulé : "Encore à Elle !"

"Les vieux sphinx accroupis, qui sont de pierre dure, "Gémiraient sous la peine horrible qu'on endure "Lorsque..."

Eh ! je me fiche bien de tes sphinx !

GRUCHET : Moi aussi, mais je ne comprends pas.

ROUSSELIN : C'est la suite de la correspondance... indirecte.

GRUCHET : Si vous vouliez vous expliquer plus clairement ?

ROUSSELIN : Figurez-vous donc qu'il y a eu mardi huit jours, en me promenant dans mon jardin, le matin, de très bonne heure - je suis agité maintenant, je ne dors plus, - voilà que je distingue, contre le mur de l'espalier, sur le treillage...

GRUCHET : Un homme ?

ROUSSELIN : Non, une lettre, une grande enveloppe, ça avait l'air d'une pétition, et qui portait pour adresse simplement : "A Elle !" Je l'ai ouverte, comme vous pensez ; et j'ai lu... une déclaration d'amour en vers, mon ami !... quelque chose de brûlant... tout ce que la passion...

GRUCHET : Et pas de signature, naturellement ? Aucun indice ?

ROUSSELIN : Permettez ! La première chose à faire était de connaître la personne qui inspirait ce délire, et, comme elle se trouvait décrite dans cette poésie même, car on y parlait de cheveux noirs, mon soupçon d'abord s'est porté sur Arabelle, notre institutrice, d'autant plus...

GRUCHET : Mais elle est blonde !

ROUSSELIN : Qu'est-ce que ça fait ? en vers, quelquefois, à cause de la rime, on met un mot pour un autre. Cependant, par délicatesse, vous comprenez, les Anglaises... je n'ai pas osé lui faire de questions.

GRUCHET : Mais votre femme ?

ROUSSELIN : Elle a haussé les épaules en me disant : "Ne t'occupe donc pas de tout ça !"

GRUCHET : Et Julien, là-dedans ?

ROUSSELIN : Nous y voici ! Je vous prie de noter que la susdite poésie commençait par ces mots : "Quand j'aperçois ta robe entre les orangers !" et que je possède deux orangers, un de chaque côté de ma grille ; - il n'y en a pas d'autres aux environs ; - c'est donc bien à quelqu'un de chez moi que la déclaration en vers est faite. A qui ? A ma fille, évidemment, à Louise ! et par qui ? par le seul homme du pays qui compose des vers, Julien ! De plus, si on compare l'écriture de la poésie avec l'écriture qui se trouve tous les jours sur la bande du journal, on reconnaît facilement que c'est la même.

GRUCHET, à part : Maladroit, va !

ROUSSELIN : Le voilà, votre protégé ! que voulait-il ? séduire Mlle Rousselin ?

GRUCHET : Oh !

ROUSSELIN : L'épouser, peut-être ?

GRUCHET : Ça vaudrait mieux.

ROUSSELIN : Je crois bien ! Maintenant, ma parole d'honneur, on ne respecte plus personne ! L'insolent ! Est-ce que je lui demande quelque chose, moi ? Est-ce que je me mêle de ses affaires ? Qu'il écrivaille ses articles ! qu'il ameute le peuple contre nous ! qu'il fasse l'apologie des bousingots de son espèce ! Va, va, mon petit journaliste, cours après les héritières !

GRUCHET : Il y en a d'autres qui ne sont pas journalistes et qui recherchent votre fille pour son argent !

ROUSSELIN : Hein ?

GRUCHET : Cela saute aux yeux ! - On vit à la campagne, où l'on cultive les terres de ses ancêtres soi-même, par économie et fort mal. Du reste, elles sont mauvaises et grevées d'hypothèques. Huit enfants, dont cinq filles, une bossue ; impossible de voir les autres pendant les semaines, à cause de leurs toilettes. L'aîné des garçons, qui a voulu spéculer sur le bois, s'abrutit à Mostaganem avec de l'absinthe. Ses besoins d'argent sont fréquents. Le cadet, Dieu merci [sera prêtre] ; le dernier, vous le connaissez, il tapisse. Si bien que l'existence n'est pas drôle dans le castel, où la pluie vous tombe sur la nuque par les trous du plafond. Mais on fait des projets, et de temps à autre, - les beaux jours, ceux-là, - on s'encaque de temps à autre dans la petite voiture de famille disloquée que le papa conduit lui-même, pour venir se refaire à l'excellente table de ce bon M. Rousselin, trop heureux de la fréquentation.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! vous allez loin ; cet acharnement...

GRUCHET : C'est que je ne comprends pas tant de respect pour eux, à moins que, par suite de votre ancienne dépendance...

ROUSSELIN, avec douleur : Gruchet, pas un mot de cela, mon ami ! pas un mot, ce souvenir...

GRUCHET : Soyez sans crainte ; ils ne divulgueront rien, et pour cause !

ROUSSELIN : Alors ?

GRUCHET : Mais vous ne voyez donc pas que ces gens nous méprisent parce que nous sommes des plébéiens, des parvenus ! et qu'ils vous jalourent, vous, parce que vous êtes riche ! L'offre de la candidature qu'on vient de vous faire, - due, je n'en doute pas, aux manoeuvres de Bouvigny, et dont il se targuera, est une amorce pour happer la fortune de votre fille. Mais comme vous pouvez très bien ne pas être élu...

ROUSSELIN : Pas élu ?

GRUCHET : Certainement ! Et elle n'en sera pas moins la femme d'un idiot, qui rougira de son beau-père.

ROUSSELIN : Oh ! je leur crois des sentiments...

GRUCHET : Si je vous apprenais qu'ils en font déjà des gorges chaudes ?

ROUSSELIN : Qui vous l'a dit ?

GRUCHET : Félicité, ma bonne. Les domestiques entre eux, vous savez, se racontent les propos de leurs maîtres.

ROUSSELIN : Quel propos ? lequel ?

GRUCHET : Leur cuisinière les a entendus qui causaient de ce mariage, mystérieusement ; et, comme la comtesse avait des craintes, le comte a répondu, en parlant de vous : "Bah ! il en sera trop honoré !"

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! ils m'honorent !

GRUCHET : Ils croient la chose presque arrangée !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! non, Dieu merci !

GRUCHET : Ils sont même tellement sûrs de leur fait, que tout à l'heure, devant ces dames, Onésime prenait un petit air fat !

ROUSSELIN : Voyez-vous !

GRUCHET : Un peu plus, j'ai cru qu'il allait me tutoyer !

PIERRE, *annonçant : M. le comte de Bouvigny !

GRUCHET : Ah ! - Je me retire ! Adieu, Rousselin ! N'oubliez pas ce que je vous ai dit ! (Il passe devant Bouvigny, le chapeau sur la tête, puis lui montre le point par derrière.) Je te réserve un plat de mon métier, à toi

Scène VIII : Rousselin, le comte de Bouvigny

BOUVIGNY, *d'un air dégagé : L'entretien que j'ai réclamé de vous, cher Monsieur, avait pour but...

ROUSSELIN, *d'un geste, l'invite à s'asseoir : Monsieur le conte...

BOUVIGNY, *s'asseyant : Entre nous, n'est-ce pas, la cérémonie est inutile ? Je viens donc, presque certain d'avance du succès, vous demander la main de mademoiselle votre fille Louise, pour mon fils le vicomte Onésime-Gaspard-Olivier de Bouvigny. (Silence de Rousselin) Hein ! vous dites ?

ROUSSELIN : Rien jusqu'à présent, Monsieur :

BOUVIGNY, *vivement : J'oubliais ! Il y a de grandes espérances, pas directes, à la vérité !... et comme dot... une pension ; ... du reste Me Dodart, détenteur des titres (baissant la voix) ne manquera pas... (Même silence) J'attends.

ROUSSELIN : Monsieur, ... c'est beaucoup d'honneur pour moi, mais...

BOUVIGNY : Comment ? mais !...

ROUSSELIN : On a pu, Monsieur le conte, vous exagérer ma fortune ?

BOUVIGNY : Croyez-vous qu'un pareil calcul ?... et que les Bouvigny !...

ROUSSELIN : Loin de moi cette idée ! Mais je ne suis pas aussi riche qu'on se l'imagine !

BOUVIGNY, *gracieux : La disproportion en sera moins grande !

ROUSSELIN : Cependant, malgré des revenus... raisonnables, c'est vrai, nous vivons, sans nous gêner. Ma femme a des goûts... élégants. J'aime à recevoir, à répandre le bien-être autour de moi. J'ai réparé, à mes frais, la route de Bugueux à Faverville. J'ai établi une école, et fondé, à l'hospice, une salle de quatre lits qui portera mon nom.

BOUVIGNY : On le sait, Monsieur, on le sait !

ROUSSELIN : Tout cela pour vous convaincre que je ne suis pas - bien que fils de banquier et l'ayant été moi-même - ce qu'on appelle un homme d'argent. Et la position de M. Onésime ne saurait être un obstacle, mais il y en a un autre. Votre fils n'a pas de métier ?

BOUVIGNY, fièrement : Monsieur, un gentilhomme ne connaît que celui des armes !

ROUSSELIN : Mais il n'est pas soldat ?

BOUVIGNY : Il attend, pour servir son pays, que le gouvernement ait changé...

ROUSSELIN : Et en attendant ?

BOUVIGNY : Il vivra dans son domaine, comme moi, Monsieur !

ROUSSELIN : A user des souliers de chasse, fort bien ! Mais moi, Monsieur, j'aimerais mieux donner ma fille à quelqu'un dont la fortune - pardon du mot- serait encore moindre.

BOUVIGNY : La sienne est assurée !

ROUSSELIN : A un homme qui n'aurait même rien du tout, pourvu...

BOUVIGNY : Oh ! rien du tout !...

ROUSSELIN, se levant : Oui, Monsieur, à un simple travailleur, à un prolétaire.

BOUVIGNY, se levant : C'est mépriser la naissance !

ROUSSELIN : Soit ! je sis un enfant de la Révolution, moi !

BOUVIGNY : Vos manières le prouvent, Monsieur !

ROUSSELIN : Et je ne me laisse pas éblouir par l'éclat des titres !

BOUVIGNY : Ni moi par celui de l'or... croyez-le !

ROUSSELIN : Dieu merci, on ne se courbe plus devant les seigneurs comme autrefois !

BOUVIGNY : En effet, votre grand-père a été domestique dans ma maison !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! vous voulez me déshonorer ? Sortez, Monsieur ! La considération est aujourd'hui un privilège tout personnel ! La mienne se trouve au dessus de vos calomnies ! Ne serait-ce que ces notables qui sont venus tout à l'heure m'offrir la candidature...

BOUVIGNY : On aurait pu me l'offrir aussi, à moi ! et je l'ai, je l'aurais refusée par égard pour vous. Mais devant une pareille indécatesse, après la déclaration de vos principes, et du moment que vous êtes un démocrate, un suppôt de l'anarchie...

ROUSSELIN : Pas du tout !

BOUVIGNY : Un organe du désordre, moi aussi, je me déclare candidat ! Candidat conservateur, entendez-vous ! et nous verrons bien lequel des deux... je suis même le camarade du préfet qui vient d'être nommé. Je ne m'en cache pas ! et il me soutiendra ! Bonsoir ! (il sort)

Scène IX : Rousselin, seul

ROUSSELIN : Mais ce furieux-là est capable de me démolir dans l'opinion et de me faire passer pour un jacobin ! J'ai peut-être eu tort de le blesser. Cependant, vu la fortune de Bouvigny, il m'était bien impossible... N'importe, c'est fâcheux ! Murel et Gruchet déjà n'avaient pas l'air si rassurés ; et il faudrait découvrir un moyen de persuader aux conservateurs... que je suis... le plus conservateur des hommes... Hein ? qu'est-ce donc ?

Scène X : Rousselin, Murel, avec une foule d'électeurs Heurtelot, Beaumesnil, Voinchet, Hombourg, Ledru, puis Gruchet

MUREL : Mon cher concitoyen, les électeurs ici présents viennent vous offrir, par ma voix, la candidature du parti libéral de l'arrondissement.

ROUSSELIN : Mais..., Messieurs...

MUREL : Vous aurez entièrement pour vous les communes de Faverville, Harolle, Lahoussaye, Bonneval, Hautot, Saint-Mathieu.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! Ah !

MUREL : Randou, Manerville, La Coudrette ! Enfin nous comptons sur une majorité qui dépassera quinze cents voix, et votre élection est certaine.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! citoyens ! (Bas à Murel) Je ne sais que dire.

MUREL : Permettez-moi de vous présenter quelques-uns de vos amis politiques : d'abord le plus ardent de tous, un véritable patriote, M. Heurtelet... fabricant...

HEURTELOT : Oh ! dites cordonnier, ça ne me fait rien !

MUREL : M. Hombourg, maître de l'Hôtel du Lion d'or et entrepreneur de roulage ; M. Voinchet, pépiniériste ; M. Beaumesnil, sans profession ; le brave capitaine Ledru, retraité.

ROUSSELIN, avec enthousiasme : Ah ! les militaires !

MUREL : Et tous nous sommes convaincus que vous remplirez hautement cette noble mission (Bas à Rousselin) Parlez donc !

ROUSSELIN : Messieurs... non, citoyens ! Mes principes sont les vôtres ! et... certainement que... je suis l'enfant du pays, comme vous ! On ne m'a jamais vu dire du mal de la liberté, au contraire ! Vous trouverez en moi... un interprète... dévoué à vos intérêts, le défenseur... une digue contre les envahissements du Pouvoir.

MUREL, lui prenant la main : Très bien mon ami, très bien ! Et n'ayez aucun doute sur le résultat de votre candidature ! D'abord, elle sera soutenue par l'Impartial !

ROUSSELIN : L'Impartial pour moi ?

GRUCHET, sortant de la foule : Mais tout à fait pour vous ! J'arrive de la rédaction. Julien est d'une ardeur ! (Bas à Murel, étonné de le voir) Il m'a donné des raisons. Je vous expliquerai (Aux électeurs) Vous permettez, n'est-ce pas ? (A Rousselin) Maintenant, c'est bien le moins que je vous l'amène ?

ROUSSELIN : Qui ? pardon ! car j'ai la tête...

GRUCHET : Que je vous amène Julien ; il a envie de venir.

ROUSSELIN : Est-ce... vraiment nécessaire ?

GRUCHET : Oh ! indispensable !

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien alors... oui, comme vous voudrez (Gruchet sort)

HEURTELOT : Ce n'est pas tout ça, citoyen ; mais la première chose, quand vous serez là-bas, c'est d'abolir l'impôt des boissons !

ROUSSELIN : Les boissons ? sans doute !

HEURTELOT : Les autres font toujours des promesses ; et puis, va te promener ! Moi, je vous crois un brave ; et tapez là-dedans ! (Il lui tend la main)

ROUSSELIN, avec hésitation : Volontiers, citoyen, volontiers !

HEURTELOT : A la bonne heure ! et il faut que ça finisse ! Voilà trop longtemps que nous souffrons !

HOMBOURG : Parbleu, on ne fait rien pour le roulage ! l'avoine est hors de prix !

ROUSSELIN : C'est vrai ! l'agriculture !

HOMBOURG : Je ne parle pas de l'agriculture, je dis le roulage !

MUREL : Il n'y a que cela ! mais, grâce à lui, le Gouvernement...

LEDRU : Ah ! le Gouvernement ! il décore un tas de freluquets !

VOINCHET : Et leur tracé du chemin de fer, qui passera par Saint-Mathieu, est d'une bêtise !...

BEAUMESNIL : On ne peut plus élever ses enfants !

ROUSSELIN : Je vous promets...

HOMBOURG : D'abord, les droits de la poste !

ROUSSELIN : Oh ! oui !

LEDRU : Quand ce ne serait que dans l'intérêt de la discipline !...

ROUSSELIN : Parbleu !

VOINCHET : Au lieu que si on avait pris par Bonneval...

ROUSSELIN : Assurément !

BEAUMESNIL : Moi, j'en ai un qui a des dispositions...

ROUSSELIN : Je vous crois !

HOMBOURG, LEDRU, VOINCHET, BEAUMESNIL, tous à la fois :

(HOMBOURG) : Ainsi, pour louer un cabriolet...

(LEDRU) : Je ne demande rien ; cependant...

(VOINCHET) : Ma propriété qui se trouve...

(BEAUMESNIL) : Car enfin, puisqu'il y a des collègues...

MUREL, *élevant la voix plus haut : Citoyens, pardon, un mot ! Citoyens, dans cette circonstance où notre cher compatriote, avec une simplicité de langage que j'ose dire antique, a si bien confirmé notre espoir, je suis heureux d'avoir été votre intermédiaire.. ; et afin de célébrer cet événement, d'où sortiront pour le canton, - et peut-être pour la France, - de nouvelles destinées, permettez-moi de vous offrir, lundi prochain, un punch, à ma fabrique.

LES ELECTEURS : Lundi, oui, lundi !

MUREL : Nous n'avons plus qu'à nous retirez, je crois ?

TOUS, *en s'en allant : Adieu, monsieur Rousselin ! A bientôt ! ça ira ! vous verrez !

ROUSSELIN, *donnant des poignées de main : Mes amis ! Ah ! je suis touché, je vous assure ! Adieu ! Tout à vous ! (Les électeurs s'éloignent)

MUREL, *à Rousselin : Soignez Heurtelot, c'est un meneur ! (Il va retrouver au fond les électeurs)

ROUSSELIN, *appelant : Heurtelot !

HEURTELOT : De quoi ?

ROUSSELIN : Vous ne pourriez pas me faire quinze paires de bottes ?

HEURTELOT : Quinze paires ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, et autant de souliers. Ce n'est pas que j'aie en voyage, mais je tiens à avoir une forte provision de chaussures.

HEURTELOT : On va s'y mettre tout de suite, Monsieur ! A vos ordres ! (Il va rejoindre les électeurs)

HOMBOURG : Monsieur Rousselin, il m'est arrivé dernièrement une paire d'alezans, qui seraient des bijoux à votre calèche ! Voulez-vous les voir ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, un de ces jours !

VOINCHET : Je vous donnerai une petite note, vous savez, sur le tracé du nouveau chemin de fer, de façon à ce que, prenant mon terrain par le milieu...

ROUSSELIN : Très bien !

BEAUMESNIL : Je vous amènerai mon fils ; et vous conviendrez qu'il serait déplorable de laisser un pareil enfant sans éducation.

ROUSSELIN : A la rentrée des classes, soyez sûr !...

HEURTELOT : Voilà un homme celui-là ! Vive Rousselin !

TOUS : Vive Rousselin ! (Tous les électeurs sortent)

Scène XI : Rousselin, Murel

ROUSSELIN, se précipite sur Murel, et l'embrassant : Ah ! mon ami ! mon ami ! mon ami !

MUREL : Trouvez-vous la chose bien conduite ?

ROUSSELIN : C'est-à-dire que je ne peux pas vous exprimer...

MUREL : Vous en aviez envie, avouez-le ?

ROUSSELIN : J'en serais mort ! Au bout d'un an que je m'étais retiré ici, à la campagne, j'ai senti peu à peu comme de la langueur.. Je devenais lourd. Je m'endormais le soir, après le dîner ; et le médecin a dit à ma femme : "Il faut que votre mari s'occupe !" Alors j'ai cherché en moi-même ce que je pourrais bien faire.

MUREL : Et vous avez pensé à la députation ?

ROUSSELIN : Naturellement ! Du reste, j'arrivais à l'âge où l'on se doit ça. J'ai donc acheté une bibliothèque. J'ai pris un abonnement au Moniteur

MUREL : Vous vous êtes mis à travailler, enfin !

ROUSSELIN : Je me suis fait, premièrement, admettre dans une société d'archéologie, et j'ai commencé à recevoir, par la poste, des brochures. Puis, j'ai été du conseil municipal, du conseil d'arrondissement, enfin du conseil général ; et dans toutes les questions importantes, de peur de me compromettre... je souriais. Oh ! le sourire, quelquefois, est d'une ressource !

MUREL : Mais le public n'était pas fixé sur vos opinions, et il a fallu - vous ne savez peut-être pas...

ROUSSELIN : Oui ! je sais... c'est vous, vous seul !

MUREL : Non, vous ne savez pas !

ROUSSELIN : Si fait ! ah ! quel diplomate !

MUREL, à part : Il y mord. (Haut) Les ouvriers de ma fabrique étaient hostiles au début. Des hommes redoutables, mon ami ! A présent, tous dans votre main !

ROUSSELIN : Vous valez votre pesant d'or !

MUREL, à part : Je n'en demande pas tant !

ROUSSELIN, le contemplant : Tenez ! vous êtes pour moi... plus qu'un frère ! ... comme mon enfant !

MUREL, avec lenteur : Mais... je pourrais... l'être.

ROUSSELIN : Sans doute ! en admettant que je sois plus vieux.

MUREL, avec un rire forcé : Ou moi... en devenant votre gendre.

Voudriez-vous ?

ROUSSELIN, avec le même rire : Farceur !... vous ne voudriez pas vous-même !

MUREL : Parbleu ! oui !

ROUSSELIN : Allons donc ! avec vos habitudes parisiennes !

MUREL : Je vis en province !

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! on ne se marie pas à votre âge !

MUREL : Trente-quatre ans, c'est l'époque !

ROUSSELIN : Quand on a, devant soi, un avenir comme le vôtre !

MUREL : Eh ! mon avenir s'en trouverait singulièrement...

ROUSSELIN : Raisonillons ; vous êtes tout simplement le directeur de la filature de Bugnaux, représentant de la compagnie flamande..
Appointements : vingt mille.

MUREL : Plus une part considérable dans les bénéfices !

ROUSSELIN : Mais l'année où on n'en fait pas ? Et puis, on peut très bien vous mettre à la porte.

MUREL : J'irai ailleurs, où je trouverai...

ROUSSELIN : Mais vous avez des dettes ! des billets en souffrance ! on vous harcèle !

MUREL : Et ma fortune, à moi ! sans compter que plus tard...

ROUSSELIN : Vous allez me parler de l'héritage de votre tante ? Vous n'y comptez pas vous-même. Elle habite à deux cents lieues d'ici, et vous êtes fâchés !

MUREL, à part : Il sait tout, cet animal-là !

ROUSSELIN : Bref, mon cher, et quoique je ne doute nullement de votre intelligence, ni de votre activité, j'aimerais mieux donner ma fille... à un homme...

MUREL : Qui n'aurait rien du tout, et qui serait bête !

ROUSSELIN : Non ! mais dont la fortune, quoique minime, serait certaine !

MUREL : Ah ! par exemple !

ROUSSELIN : Oui, Monsieur, à un modeste rentier, à un petit propriétaire de campagne.

MUREL : Voilà le cas que vous faites du travail !

ROUSSELIN : Ecoutez donc ! l'industrie, ça n'est pas sûr ; et un bon père de famille doit y regarder à deux fois.

MUREL : Enfin, vous me refusez votre fille ?

ROUSSELIN : Forcément ! et en bonne conscience, ce n'est pas ma faute ! sans rancune, n'est-ce pas ? (Appelant) Pierre ! mon buvard, et un encrier ! Asseyez-vous là ! Vous allez préparer ma profession de foi aux électeurs. (Pierre apporte ce que Rousselin a demandé, et le dépose sur la petite table à droite)

MUREL : Moi ! que je...

ROUSSELIN : Nous la reverrons ensemble ! Mais commencez d'abord. Avec votre verve, je ne suis pas inquiet ! Ah ! vous m'avez donné tout à l'heure un bon coup d'épaule, pour mon discours ! Je ne vous tiens pas quitte ! Est-il gentil ! - Je vous laisse ! Moi, je vais à mes petites affaires ! Quelque chose d'enlevé, n'est-ce pas ? - du feu ? (Il sort)

Scène XII : Murel, seul

MUREL : Imbécile ! Me voilà bien avancé, maintenant ! (A la cantonade) Mais, vieille bête, tu ne trouveras jamais quelqu'un pour la chérir comme moi ! De quelle façon me venger ? ou plutôt si je lui faisais peur ? C'est un homme à sacrifier tout pour être élu ! Donc, il faudrait lui découvrir un concurrent ! Mais lequel ? (Entre Gruchet) Ah !

Scène XIII : Murel, Gruchet

GRUCHET : Qu'est-ce qui vous prend ?

MUREL : Un remords ! J'ai commis une sottise, et vous aussi.

GRUCHET : En quoi ?

MUREL : Vous étiez tout à l'heure avec ceux qui portent Rousselin à la candidature ! Vous l'avez vu !

GRUCHET : Et même que j'ai été chercher Julien ; il va venir.

MUREL : Il ne s'agit pas de lui, mais de Rousselin ! Ce Rousselin, c'est un âne ! Il ne sait pas dire quatre mots ! et nous aurons le plus pitoyable député !

GRUCHET : L'initiative n'est pas de moi !

MUREL : Il s'est toujours montré on ne peut plus médiocre.

GRUCHET : Certainement !

MUREL : Ce qui ne l'empêche pas d'avoir une considération !... tandis que vous...

GRUCHET, vexé : Moi, eh bien ?

MUREL : Je ne veux pas vous offenser, mais vous ne jouissez pas, dans le pays, de l'espèce d'éclat qui entoure la maison Rousselin.

GRUCHET : Oh ! si je voulais ! (Silence)

MUREL, le regardant en face : Gruchet, seriez-vous capable de vous livrer à une assez forte dépense ?

GRUCHET : Ce n'est pas trop dans mon caractère ; cependant...

MUREL : Si on vous disait : "Moyennant quelques mille francs, tu prendras sa place, tu seras député !" ?

GRUCHET : Moi, dé...

MUREL : Mais songez donc que là-bas, à Paris, on est à la source des affaires ! on connaît un tas de monde ! on va soi-même chez les ministres ! Les adjudications de fournitures, les primes sur les sociétés nouvelles, les grands travaux, la Bourse, on a tout ! Quelle influence ! mon ami, que d'occasions !

GRUCHET : Comment voulez-vous que ça m'arrive ? Rousselin est presque élu !

MUREL : Pas encore ! Il a manqué de franchise dans la déclaration de ses principes ; et là-dessus la chicane est facile ! Quelques électeurs n'étaient pas contents. Heurtelot grommelait.

GRUCHET : Le cordonnier ? J'ai contre lui une saisie pour après-demain !

MUREL : Epargnez-le ; il est fort ! Quant aux autres, on verra. Je m'arrangerai pour que la chose commence par les ouvriers de la fabrique..., puis, s'il faut se déclarer pour vous, je me déclarerai, M. Rousselin n'ayant pas le patriotisme nécessaire ; je serai forcé de le reconnaître ; d'ailleurs, je le reconnais, c'est une ganache ?

GRUCHET, *rêvant : Tiens ! tiens !

MUREL : Qui vous arrête ? Vous êtes pour la Gauche ? Eh bien, on vous pousse à la Chambre de ce côté-là ; et quand bien même vous n'iriez pas, votre candidature seule, en ôtant des voix à Rousselin, l'empêche d'y parvenir.

GRUCHET : Comme ça le ferait bisquer !

MUREL : Un essai ne coûte rien ; peut-être quelques centaines de francs dans les cabarets.

GRUCHET, *vivement : Pas plus, vous croyez ?

MUREL : Et je vais remuer tout l'arrondissement, et vous serez nommé, et Rousselin sera enfoncé ! Et beaucoup de ceux qui font semblant de ne pas vous connaître s'inclineront très bas en vous disant : "Monsieur le député, j'ai bien l'honneur de vous offrir mes hommages."

Scène XIV : les mêmes, Julien

MUREL : Mon petit Duprat, vous ne verrez pas M. Rousselin !

JULIEN : Je ne pourrai pas voir...

MUREL : Non ! Nous sommes brouillés... sur la politique.

JULIEN : Je ne comprends pas ! Tantôt vous êtes venu chez moi me démontrer qu'il fallait soutenir M. Rousselin, en me donnant une foule de raisons... que j'ai été redire à M. Gruchet. Il les a, de suite, acceptées, d'autant plus qu'il désire...

GRUCHET : Ceci entre nous, on cher ! C'est une autre question, qui ne concerne pas Rousselin.

JULIEN : Pourquoi n'en veut-on plus ?

MUREL : Je vous le répète, ce n'est pas l'homme de notre parti.

GRUCHET, avec fatuité : Et on en trouvera un autre !

MUREL : Vous saurez lequel. Allons-nous en ! On ne conspire pas chez l'ennemi.

JULIEN : L'ennemi ? Rousselin !

MUREL : Sans doute ; et vous aurez l'obligeance de l'attaquer, dans l'Impartial, vigoureusement !

JULIEN : Pourquoi cela ? Je ne vois pas de mal à en dire.

GRUCHET : Avec de l'imagination, on en trouve.

JULIEN : Je ne suis pas fait pour ce métier.

GRUCHET : Ecoutez-donc ! Vous êtes venu à moi le premier m'offrir vos services, et sachant que j'étais l'ami de Rousselin, vous m'avez prié, - c'est le mot, - de vous introduire chez lui.

JULIEN : A peine y suis-je que vous m'en arrachez !

GRUCHET : Ce n'est pas ma faute si les choses ont pris, tout à coup, une autre direction.

JULIEN : Est-ce la mienne ?

GRUCHET : Mais comme il était bien convenu entre nous deux que vous entameriez une polémique contre la Société des Tourbières de Grumesnil-les-Arbis, président le comte de Bouvigny, en démontrant l'incapacité financière dudit sieur, - une affaire superbe dont ce gremlin de Dodart m'a exclu !...

MUREL, à part : Ah ! voilà le motif de leur alliance !

GRUCHET : Jusqu'à présent, vous n'en avez rien fait ; donc, c'est bien le moins, cette fois, que vous vous exécutiez ! Ce qu'on vous demande, d'ailleurs, n'est pas tellement difficile...

JULIEN : N'importe ! Je refuse.

MUREL : Julien, vous oubliez qu'aux termes de notre engagement...

JULIEN : Oui, je sais ! Vous m'avez pris pour faire des découpures dans les autres feuilles, écrire toutes les histoires de chiens perdus, noyades, incendies, accidents quelconques, et rapetisser à la mesure de l'esprit local les articles des confrères parisiens, en style plat ; c'est une exigence, chaque métaphore enlève un abonnement. Je dois aller aux informations, écouter les réclamations, recevoir toutes les visites, exécuter un travail de forçat, mener une vie d'idiot, et n'avoir, en quoi que ce soit, jamais d'initiative ! Eh bien, une fois par hasard, je demande grâce !

MUREL : Tant pis pour vous !

GRUCHET : Alors il ne fallait pas prendre cette place !

JULIEN : Si j'en avais une autre !

GRUCHET : Quand on n'a pas de quoi vivre, c'est pourtant bien joli !

JULIEN, s'éloignant : Ah ! la misère !

MUREL : Laissons-le boudier ! Asseyons-nous, pour que j'écrive votre profession de foi.

GRUCHET : Très volontiers (Ils s'assoient)

JULIEN, un peu remonté au fond : Comme je m'enfuirais à la grâce de Dieu, n'importe où, si tu n'étais pas là, mon pauvre amour. (Regardant la maison de Rousselin) Oh ! je ne veux pas que dans ta maison, aucune douleur, fût-ce la moindre, survienne à cause de moi ! Que les murs qui t'abritent soient bénis ! Mais... sous les acacias, il me semble.. qu'une robe ?... Disparue ! Plus rien ! Adieu ! (Il s'éloigne)

GRUCHET, le rappelant : Restez donc ; nous avons quelque chose à vous montrer !

JULIEN : Ah ! j'en ai assez de vos sales besognes ! (Il sort)

MUREL, tendant le papier à Gruchet : Qu'en pensez-vous ?

GRUCHET : C'est très bien ; merci !... Cependant...

MUREL : Qu'avez-vous ?

GRUCHET : Rousselin m'inquiète !

MUREL : Un homme sans conséquence !

GRUCHET : Eh ! vous ne savez pas de quoi il est capable - au fond !
Et puis, le jeune Duprat ne m'a pas l'air extrêmement chaud.

MUREL : Son entêtement à ménager Rousselin doit avoir une cause.

GRUCHET : Eh ! il est amoureux de Louise !

MUREL : Qui vous l'a dit ?

GRUCHET : Rousselin lui-même !

MUREL, à part : Un autre rival ! Bah ! j'en ai roulé des plus solides !
(Haut) Ecoutez-moi ; je vais le rejoindre pour le catéchiser ; vous, pendant ce temps-là, faites imprimer la profession de foi ; voyez tous nos amis, et trouvez-vous ici dans deux heures.

GRUCHET : Convenu ! (Il sort)

MUREL : Et maintenant, M. Rousselin, c'est vous qui m'offrirez votre fille. (Il sort)

ACTE DEUX

Le théâtre représente une promenade sous les quinconces A gauche, au deuxième plan, le Café Français ; A droite, la grille de la maison de Rousselin. Au lever du rideau, un colleur est en train de coller trois affiches sur les murs de la maison de Rousselin.

Scène I : Heurteiot, Marchais, le garde champêtre, la foule.

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE, à la foule : Circulez ! circulez ! laissez toute la place aux proclamations !

LA FOULE : Trop juste !

HEURTEIOT : Ah ! la profession de foi de Bouvigny !

MARCHAIS : Parbleu, puisqu'il sera nommé !

HEURTEIOT : C'est Gruchet qui sera nommé ! Lisez plutôt son affiche !

MARCHAIS : Que je la lise !

HEURTEIOT : Oui !

MARCHAIS : Commencez vous-même ! (A part) Il ne connaît pas ses lettres ! (Haut) Eh bien ?

HEURTEIOT : Mais vous ?

MARCHAIS : Moi ?

HEURTEIOT, à part : Il ne sait pas épeler ! (Haut) Allons...

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Et ça vote ! - Tenez, je vais m'y mettre pour vous ! D'abord, celle du comte de Bouvigny : "Mes amis, cédant à de vives instances, j'ai cru devoir me présenter à vos suffrages..."

HEURTEIOT : Connu ! A l'autre ! Celle de Gruchet !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : "Citoyens, c'est pour obéir à la volonté de quelques amis que je me présente..."

MARCHAIS : Quel farceur ! assez !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Alors je passe à celle de M. Rousselin ! “Mes chers compatriotes, si plusieurs d’entre vous ne m’en avaient vivement sollicité, je n’oserais...”

HEURTELOT : Il nous embête ! je vais déchirer son affiche !

MARCHAIS : Moi aussi, car c’est une trahison !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE, s’interposant : Vous n’en avez pas le droit !

MARCHAIS : Comment, pour soutenir l’ordre !

HEURTELOT : Eh bien, et la liberté ?

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Laissez les papiers tranquilles, ou je vous flanque au violon tous les deux !

HEURTELOT : Voilà bien le Gouvernement ! Il est à nous vexer, toujours !

MARCHAIS : On ne peut rien faire !

Scène II : les mêmes, Murel, Gruchet

MUREL, à HeurteLOT : Fidèle au poste ! c’est bien ! Prenez-les tous ; faites les boire !

HEURTELOT : Oh ! là-dessus !...

MUREL, aux électeurs : Entrez ! et pas de cérémonie ! J’ai donné des ordres ; c’est Gruchet qui régale !

GRUCHET : Jusqu’à un certain point, cependant !

MUREL, à Gruchet : Allez donc !

LES ELECTEURS : Ah ! Gruchet ! un bon ! un solide ! un patriote !
(Ils entrent tous dans le café)

Scène III : Murel, Miss Arabelle

MUREL, *se dirigeant vers la grille de la maison Rousselin : Il faut pourtant que je tâche de voir Louise !

MISS ARABELLE, *sortant de la grille : Je voudrais vous parler, Monsieur.

MUREL : Tant mieux, miss Arabelle ! Et Louise, dites-moi, n'est-elle pas ?...

MISS ARABELLE : Mais vous étiez avec quelqu'un ?

MUREL : Oui.

MISS ARABELLE : M. Julien, je crois ?

MUREL : Non, Gruchet.

MISS ARABELLE : Gruchet ! Ah, un bien mauvais homme ! C'est vilain, sa candidature !

MUREL : En quoi, miss Arabelle ?

MISS ARABELLE : M. Rousselin lui a prêté, autrefois, une somme qui n'est pas rendue. J'ai vu le papier.

MUREL, *à part : C'est donc pour cela que Gruchet a peur !

MISS ARABELLE : Mais M. Rousselin, par délicatesse, gentlemanry, ne voudra pas poursuivre ! Il est bien bon ! seulement bizarre quelquefois ! Ainsi sa colère contre M. Julien...

MUREL : Et Louise, miss Arabelle ?

MISS ARABELLE : Oh ! quand elle a su votre mariage impossible, elle a pleuré, beaucoup.

MUREL, *joyeux : Vraiment ?

MISS ARABELLE : Oui ; et, pauvre petite ! Mme Rousselin est bien dure pour elle !

MUREL : Et son père ?

MISS ARABELLE : Il a été très fâché !

MUREL : Est-ce qu'il regrette ?

MISS ARABELLE : Oh non ! Mais il a peur de vous.

MUREL : Je l'espère bien !

MISS ARABELLE : A cause des ouvriers et de l'Impartial, où il dit que vous êtes le maître !

MUREL, riant : Ah ! ah !

MISS ARABELLE : Mais non, n'est-ce pas, c'est M. Julien ?

MUREL : Continuez, miss Arabelle.

MISS ARABELLE : Oh ! moi, je suis bien triste, bien triste ! et je voudrais un raccommodement.

MUREL : Cela me paraît maintenant difficile !

MISS ARABELLE : Oh ! non ! M. Rousselin en a envie, j'en suis sûre ! Tâchez ! Je vous en prie !

MUREL, à part : Est-elle drôle !

MISS ARABELLE : C'est dans votre intérêt, à cause de Louise ! Il faut que tout le monde soit content : elle, vous, moi, M. Julien !

MUREL, à part : Encore Julien ! Ah ! que je suis bête ; c'était pour l'institutrice ; une muse et un poète, parfait ! (Haut) je ferai ce qui dépendra de moi. Au revoir, Mademoiselle !

MISS ARABELLE, saluant : Good Afternoon, sir ! (Apercevant une vieille femme qui lui fait signe de venir) Ah ! Félicité ! (Elle sort avec elle)

Scène IV : Murel, Rousselin

ROUSSELIN, entrant : C'est inouï, ma parole d'honneur !

MUREL, à part : Rousselin, à nous deux !

ROUSSELIN : Gruchet ! un Gruchet, qui veut me couper l'herbe sous le pied ! un misérable que j'ai défendu, nourri ; et il se vante d'être soutenu par vous ?

MUREL : Mais...

ROUSSELIN : D'où diable lui est venue cette idée de candidature ?

MUREL : Je n'en sais rien. Il est tombé chez moi comme un furieux, en disant que j'allais abjurer mes opinions.

ROUSSELIN : C'est parce que je suis modéré ! Je proteste également contre les tempêtes de la démagogie que souhaite ce polisson de Gruchet, et le joug de l'absolutisme, dont M. Bouvigny est l'abominable soutien, le gothique symbole ! en un mot, - fidèle aux traditions du vieil esprit français, - je demande, avant tout, le règne des lois, le gouvernement du pays par le pays, avec le respect de la propriété Oh ! là-dessus, par exemple !...

MUREL : Justement ! on ne vous trouve pas assez républicain !

ROUSSELIN : Je le suis plus que Gruchet, encore une fois ! car je me prononce, - voulez-vous que l'imprime ? - pour la suppression des douanes et de l'octroi.

MUREL : Bravo !

ROUSSELIN : Je demande l'affranchissement des pouvoirs municipaux, une meilleure composition du jury, la liberté de la presse, l'abolition de toutes les sinécures et titres nobiliaires !

MUREL : Très bien !

ROUSSELIN : Et l'application sérieuse du suffrage universel ! Cela vous étonne ? Je suis comme ça, moi ! Notre nouveau préfet qui soutient la réaction, je lui ai écrit trois lettres, en manière d'avertissement ! Oui, Monsieur ! E je suis capable de le braver en face, de l'insulter ! Vous pouvez dire ça aux ouvriers !

MUREL, à part : Est-ce qu'il parlerait sérieusement ?

ROUSSELIN : Vous voyez donc qu'en me préférant Gruchet... car, je vous le répète, il se vante d'être soutenu par vous. Il le crie dans toute la ville.

MUREL : Que savez-vous si je vote pour lui ?

ROUSSELIN : Comment ?

MUREL : Moi, en politique, je ne tiens qu'aux idées ; or, les siennes ne m'ont pas l'air d'être aussi progressives que les vôtres. Un moment ! Tout n'est pas fini !

ROUSSELIN : Non ! tout n'est pas fini ! et on ne sait pas jusqu'où je peux aller, pour plaire aux électeurs. Aussi, je m'étonne d'avoir été méconnu par une intelligence comme la vôtre.

MUREL : Vous me comblez !

ROUSSELIN : Je ne doute pas de votre avenir !

MUREL : Eh bien, alors, dans ce cas-là...

ROUSSELIN : Quoi ?

MUREL : Pour répondre à votre confiance, - j'ai un petit aveu à vous faire : - en écoutant Gruchet, c'était après ce refus, et j'ai cédé à un mouvement de rancune.

ROUSSELIN : Tant mieux ! ça prouve du cœur.

MUREL : Comme j'adore votre fille, je vous maudissais.

ROUSSELIN : Ce cher ami ! Ah ! votre défection m'a fait une peine !

MUREL : Sérieusement, si je ne l'ai pas, j'en mourrai.

ROUSSELIN : Il ne faut pas mourir !

MUREL : Vous me donnez de l'espoir ?

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! eh ! Après mûr examen, votre position personnelle me paraît plus avantageuse...

MUREL, étonné : Plus avantageuse ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, car sans compter trente mille francs d'appointements...

MUREL, timidement : Vingt mille !

ROUSSELIN : Trente mille ! en plus, une part dans les bénéfices de la Compagnie ; et puis vous avez votre tante...

MUREL : Madame veuve Murel, de Montélimar.

ROUSSELIN : Puisque vous êtes son héritier.

MUREL : Avec un autre neveu, militaire !

ROUSSELIN : Alors, il y a des chances... (Faisant le geste de tirer un coup de fusil) Les Bédouins ! (Il rit)

MUREL, riant : Oui, oui, vous avez raison ! Les femmes, même les vieilles, changent d'idée facilement ; celle-là est capricieuse. Bref ! cher monsieur Rousselin, j'ai tout lieu de croire que ma bonne tante songe à moi, quelquefois.

ROUSSELIN, à part : Si c'était vrai, cependant ? (Haut) Enfin, mon cher, trouvez-vous ce soir, après dîner, là, devant ma porte, sans avoir l'air de me chercher. (Il sort)

Scène V : Murel, seul

MUREL : Un rendez-vous pour ce soir ! Mais c'est une avance, une espèce de consentement ; Arabelle disait vrai.

Scène VI : Murel, Gruchet, puis Hombourg, puis Félicité

GRUCHET : Me voilà ! je n'ai pas perdu de temps ! Quoi de neuf ? - Répondez-moi.

MUREL : Gruchet, avez-vous réfléchi à l'affaire dans laquelle vous vous embarquez ?

GRUCHET : Hein ?

MUREL : Ce n'est pas une petite besogne que d'être député.

GRUCHET : Je le crois bien !

MUREL : Vous allez avoir sur le dos tous les quémandeurs.

GRUCHET : Oh ! moi, mon bon, je suis habitué à éconduire les gens.

MUREL : N'importe, ils vous dérangeront de vos affaires énormément.

GRUCHET : Jamais de la vie !

MUREL : Et puis, il va falloir habiter Paris. C'est une dépense.

GRUCHET : Eh bien, j'habiterai Paris ! ce sera une dépense, voilà !

MUREL : Franchement, je n'y vois pas de grands avantages.

GRUCHET : Libre à vous !... moi j'en vois.

MUREL : Vous pouvez d'ailleurs échouer.

GRUCHET : Comment ? vous savez quelque chose ?

MUREL : Rien de grave ! Cependant Rousselin, eh ! eh ! il gagne dans l'opinion.

GRUCHET : Tantôt vous disiez que c'est un imbécile.

MUREL : Ça n'empêche pas de réussir.

GRUCHET : Alors, vous me conseillez de me démettre ?

MUREL : Non ! Mais il est toujours fâcheux d'avoir contre soi un homme de l'importance de Rousselin.

GRUCHET : Son im-por-tan-ce !

MUREL : Il a beaucoup d'amis, ses manières sont cordiales, enfin, il plaît ; et tout en ménageant les conservateurs, il pose pour le républicain ;

GRUCHET : On le connaît !

MUREL : Ah ! si vous comptez sur le bon sens du public...

GRUCHET : Mais pourquoi tenez-vous à me décourager, quand tout marche comme sur des roulettes ? Ecoutez-moi : Primo, sans qu'on s'en doute le moins du monde, je saurai par Félicité, ma bonne, tout ce qui se passe chez lui.

MUREL : Ce n'est peut-être pas trop délicat, ce que vous faites.

GRUCHET : Pourquoi ?

MUREL : Ni même prudent ; car on dit que vous lui avez autrefois emprunté...

GRUCHET : On le dit ? eh bien...

MUREL : Il faudrait d'abord lui rendre la somme.

GRUCHET : Pour cela, il faudrait d'abord que vous me rendiez ce qui m'est dû, vous ! Soyons justes !

MUREL : Ah ! devant les preuves de mon dévouement, et à l'instant même où je vous gratifie d'un excellent conseil, voilà ce que vous imaginez ! Mais, sans moi, mon bonhomme, jamais de la vie vous ne seriez élu ; je m'érige, bien que je n'aie aucun intérêt...

GRUCHET : Qui sait ? Ou plutôt je n'y comprends goutte ; tout à tour, vous me poussez, vous m'arrêtez ! Ce que je dois à Rousselin ? Les autres aussi feront des réclamations ! On n'est pas inépuisables. Il faudrait pourtant que je rentre dans mes avances ! Et la note du café, qui va être terrible, - car ces farceurs-là boivent, boivent ! - Si vous croyez que je n'y pense pas ! C'est un gouffre qu'une candidature ! (A Hombourg, qui entre) Hombourg ! quoi encore !

HOMBOURG : Le bourgeois est il là ?

GRUCHET : Je n'en sais rien !

HOMBOURG : Un mot ! je possède un petit bidet cauchois, pas cher, et qui vous serait bien utile pour vos tournées électorales.

GRUCHET : Je les ferai à pied ; merci !

HOMBOURG : Une occasion, monsieur Gruchet !

GRUCHET : Des occasions comme celle-là, on les retrouve !

HOMBOURG : Je ne crois pas !

GRUCHET : Il m'est à présent, impossible...

HOMBOURG : A votre service ! (Il entre chez Rousselin)

MUREL : Pensez-vous que Rousselin eût fait cela ? Cet homme, qui tient une auberge, va vous déchirer près de ses pratiques. Vous venez de perdre, peut-être, cinquante voix. Je suis fatigué de vous soutenir.

GRUCHET : Du calme ! j'ai eu tort ! Admettons que je n'aie rien dit. C'est que vous veniez de m'agacer avec votre histoire de Rousselin, qui, d'abord, n'est peut-être pas vraie. De qui la tenez-vous ? A moins que lui-même... Ah ! c'est plutôt une farce de votre invention pour m'éprouver. (Rumeur dans la coulisse)

MUREL : Ecoutez donc !

GRUCHET : J'entends bien !

MUREL : Le bruit se rapproche.

DES VOIX, dans la coulisse : Gruchet ! Gruchet !

FELICITE, apparaissant à gauche : Monsieur, on vous cherche !

GRUCHET : Moi ?

FELICITE : Oui, venez tout de suite !

GRUCHET : Me voilà ! (Il sort précipitamment avec elle. - le bruit augmente)

MUREL, en s'en allant par la gauche : Tout ce tapage ! Qu'est-ce donc ? (Il sort)

Scène VII : Rousselin, puis Hombourg

ROUSSELIN, sortant de chez lui : Ah ! le peuple à la fin s'agite ! pourvu que ce ne soit pas contre moi !

TOUS, criant dans le café : Enfoncés, les bourgeois !

ROUSSELIN : Voilà qui devient inquiétant !

GRUCHET, passant au fond, et tâchant de se soustraire aux ovations : Mes amis, laissez-moi ! non ! vraiment !

TOUS : Gruchet ! Vive Gruchet ! notre député !

ROUSSELIN : Comment, député ?

HOMBOURG, sortant de chez Rousselin : Parbleu, puisque
Bouvigny se retire. (La bande s'éloigne)

ROUSSELIN : Pas possible !

HOMBOURG : Mais oui, le ministère est changé. Le préfet donne sa démission ; et il vient d'écrire à Bouvigny, pour l'engager à faire comme lui, à se démettre ! (Il sort par où est sortie la bande)

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien, alors, il ne reste plus... (La main sur la poitrine pour dire : moi) Mais non ! il y a encore Gruchet ! (Rêvant) Gruchet ! (Apercevant Dodart qui entre) Que me voulez-vous ?

Scène VIII : Rousselin, Dodart

DODART : Je viens pour vous rendre un service.

ROUSSELIN : De la part d'un féal de M. le comte, cela m'étonne !

DODART : Vous apprécierez ma conduite, plus tard... M. de Bouvigny ayant retiré sa candidature...

ROUSSELIN, *brusquement : Il l'a retirée ? c'est vrai ?

DODART : Oui... pour des raisons...

ROUSSELIN : Personnelles.

DODART : Comment ?

ROUSSELIN : Je dis : il a eu des raisons, voilà tout.

DODART : En effet ; et permettez moi de vous avertir d'une chose... capitale. Tous ceux qui s'intéressent à vous - je suis du nombre, n'en doutez pas - commencent à s'effrayer de la violence de vos adversaires !

ROUSSELIN : En quoi ?

DODART : Vous n'avez donc pas entendu les cris insurrectionnels que poussait la bande Gruchet ! Ce Catalina de village ! ...

ROUSSELIN, *à part : Catalina de village... Jolie expression ! A noter !

DODART : Il est capable, Monsieur, de... capable de tout ) et d'abord, grâce à la démente du peuple, il deviendra peut-être un de nos tribuns.

ROUSSELIN, *à part : C'est à craindre !

DODART : Mais les conservateurs n'ont pas renoncé à la lutte, croyez-le ! D'avance, leurs voix appartiennent à l'honnête homme qui offrirait des garanties. (Mouvement de Rousselin). Oh ! on ne lui demande pas de se poser en rétrograde ; seulement quelques concessions... bien simples.

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! c'est ce diable de Murel ! ...

DODART : Malheureusement, la chose est faite

ROUSSELIN, *rêvant : Oui !

DODART : Comme notaire et comme citoyen, je gémiss sur tout cela ! Ah ! c'était un beau rêve que cette alliance de la bourgeoisie et de la noblesse cimentée en vos deux familles ; et le comte me disait tout à l'heure, - vous n'allez pas me croire ? ..

ROUSSELIN : Pardon ! ... Je suis plein de confiance.

DODART : Il me disait, avec ce ton chevaleresque qui le caractérise : “Je n'en veux pas du tout à M. Rousselin...”

ROUSSELIN : Ni moi non plus, mon Dieu !

DODART : “Et je ne demande pas mieux, s'il n'y trouve point d'inconvénient...”

ROUSSELIN : Mais quel inconvénient ?

DODART : “Je ne demande pas mieux que de m'aboucher avec lui, dans l'intérêt du canton, et de la moralité publique.”

ROUSSELIN : Comment donc ? je le verrai avec plaisir !

DODART : Il est là ! (A la cantonade) Psitt ! Avancez !

Scène IX : les mêmes, le comte de Bouvigny

BOUVIGNY, *saluant : Monsieur !

ROUSSELIN, *regardant autour de lui : Je regarde si quelquefois...

BOUVIGNY : Personne ne m'a vu ! soyez sans crainte ! Et acceptez mes regrets sur...

ROUSSELIN : Il n'y a pas de mal...

DODART : A reconnaître ses fautes, n'est-ce pas ?

BOUVIGNY : Que voulez-vous, l'amour peut-être exagéré de certains principes....

ROUSSELIN : Mois aussi, Monsieur, j'honore les principes !

BOUVIGNY : Et puis la maladie de mon fils !

ROUSSELIN : Il n'est pas malade ; tantôt, ici même...

DODART : Oh ! fortement indisposé ! Mais il a l'énergie de cacher sa douleur. Pauvre enfant ! les nerfs ! tellement sensible !

ROUSSELIN, à part : Ah ! je devine ton jeu, à toi ; tu vas faire le mien ! (Haut) En effet, après avoir conçu des espérances...

BOUVIGNY : Oh ! certes !

ROUSSELIN : Il a dû être peiné...

BOUVIGNY : Désolé, Monsieur !

ROUSSELIN : De vous voir abandonner subitement cette candidature.

DODART, à part : Il se moque de nous !

ROUSSELIN : Lorsque vous aviez déjà un nombre de voix.

BOUVIGNY : J'en avais beaucoup !

ROUSSELIN, souriant : Pas toutes, cependant !

DODART : Parmi les ouvrier, peut-être, mais dans les campagnes, énormément !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! si on comptait ! ...

BOUVIGNY : Permettez ! D'abord la commune de Bouvigny, où je réside, m'appartient, n'est-ce pas ? Ainsi que les villages de Saint Léonard, Valencourt, la Coudrette.

ROUSSELIN, vivement : Celui-là, non !

BOUVIGNY : Pourquoi ?

ROUSSELIN, embarrassé : Je croyais !... (A part) Murel m'avait donc trompé ?

BOUVIGNY : Je suis également certain de Grumesnil, Ypremesnil, les Arbois.

DODART, lisant une liste qu'il tire de son portefeuille : Châtillon, Colange, Heurtaux, Lenneval, Bahurs, Saint Filleul, Le Grand-Chêne, la Roche-Aubert, Fortinet !

ROUSSELIN, à part : C'est effroyable !

DODART : Manicamp, Dehaut, Lampérière, Saint-Nicaise, Vieville, Sirvin, Château-Régner, la Chapelle, Lebarrois, Mont-Suleau.

ROUSSELIN, à part : Je ne savais donc pas la géographie de l'arrondissement !

BOUVIGNY : Sans compter que j'ai des amis nombreux dans les communes de...

ROUSSELIN, accablé : Oh ! je vous crois, Monsieur !

BOUVIGNY : Ces braves gens ne savent plus que faire ! Ils sont toujours à ma disposition, du reste, m'obéissant comme un seul homme ; - et si je leur disais... de voter pour... n'importe qui... pour vous, par exemple...

ROUSSELIN : Mon Dieu ! je ne suis pas d'une opposition tellement avancée...

BOUVIGNY : Eh ! eh ! l'Opposition est quelquefois utile !

ROUSSELIN : Comme instrument de guerre, soit ! Mais il ne s'agit pas de détruire, il faut fonder !

DODART : Incontestablement, nous devons fonder !

ROUSSELIN : Aussi ai-je en horreur toutes ces utopies, ces doctrines subversives !... N'a-t-on pas l'idée de rétablir le divorce, je vous demande un peu ! Et la presse, il faut le reconnaître, se permet des excès...

DODART : Affreux !

BOUVIGNY : Nos campagnes sont infestées par un tas de livres !

ROUSSELIN : Elles n'ont plus personne pour les conduire ! Ah ! il y avait du bon dans la noblesse ; et là-dessus je partage les idées de quelques publicistes de l'Angleterre.

BOUVIGNY : Vos paroles me font l'effet d'une brise rafraîchissante ; et si nous pouvions espérer...

ROUSSELIN : Enfin, Monsieur le comte, (Mystérieusement) la

Démocratie m’effraye ! Je ne sais par quel vertige, quel entraînement coupable...

BOUVIGNY : Vous allez trop loin ! ...

ROUSSELIN : Non ! j’étais coupable ; car je suis conservateur, croyez-le, et peut-être quelques nuances seulement...

DODART : Tous les honnêtes gens sont faits pour s’entendre.

ROUSSELIN, serrant la main de Bouvigny : Bien sûr, Monsieur le comte, bien sûr.

Scène X : les mêmes, Murel, Ledru, Onésime, des ouvriers.

MUREL : Dieu merci, je vous trouve sans vos électeurs, mon cher Rousselin !

BOUVIGNY, à part : Je les croyais fâchés !

MUREL : En voici d’autres ! Je leur ai démontré que les idées de Gruchet ne répondent plus aux besoins de notre époque ; et, d’après ce que vous m’avez dit ce matin, vous serez de ceux-ci mieux compris ; ce sont non seulement des républicains, mais des socialistes !

BOUVIGNY, faisant un bond : Comment, des socialistes !

ROUSSELIN : Il m’amène des socialistes !

DODART : Des socialistes ! Il ne faut pas que ma personnalité... (Il s’esquive)

ROUSSELIN, balbutiant : Mais...

LEDRU : Oui, citoyen ! Nous le sommes !

ROUSSELIN : Je n’y vois pas de mal !

BOUVIGNY : Et tout à l’heure vous déclamiez contre ces infamies !

ROUSSELIN : Permettez ! Il y a plusieurs manières d’envisager...

ONESIME, surgissant : Sans doute, plusieurs manières...

BOUVIGNY, scandalisé : Jusqu’à mon fils...

MUREL : Que venez-vous faire ici, vous ?

ONESIME : J'ai entendu dire que l'on se portait chez M. Rousselin, et je voudrais lui affirmer que je partage, à peu près... son système.

MUREL, à demi-voix : Petit intrigant !

BOUVIGNY : Je ne m'attendais pas, mon fils, à vous voir, devant l'auteur de vos jours, renier la foi de vos aïeux !

ROUSSELIN : Très bien !

LEDRU : Pourquoi très bien ? Parce que Monsieur est M. le comte ! (à Murel, désignant Rousselin) et à vous croire, il demandait l'abolition de tous les titres !...

ROUSSELIN : Certainement !

BOUVIGNY : Comment ? il demandait...

LEDRU : Mais oui !

BOUVIGNY : Ah ! c'est assez !

ROUSSELIN, voulant le retenir : Je ne peux pas rompre en visière brusquement. Beaucoup ne sont qu'égarés. Ménageons-les !

BOUVIGNY, très haut : Pas de ménagements, Monsieur ! On ne pactise point avec le désordre ; et je vous déclare net que je ne suis plus pour vous ! - Onésime ! (Il sort, son fils le suit)

LEDRU : Il était pour vous ? Nous savons à quoi nous en tenir ! Serviteur !

ROUSSELIN : Pour soutenir mes convictions, je vous sacrifie un ami de trente ans !

LEDRU : On n'a pas besoin de sacrifices ! Mais vous dites tantôt blanc, tantôt noir ; et vous m'avez l'air d'un véritable... blagueur ! Allons, nous autres, retournons chez Gruchet ! Venez-vous, Murel ?

MUREL : Dans une minute, je vous rejoins !

Scène XI : Rousselin, Murel

MUREL : Il faut convenir, mon cher, que vous me mettez dans une situation embarrassante !

ROUSSELIN : Si vous croyez que je n'y suis pas ?

MUREL : Saperlotte, il faudrait cependant vous résoudre ! Soyez d'un côté ou de l'autre ! Mais décidez-vous ! finissons-en !

ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi toujours ce besoin d'être emporte-pièce, exagéré ! Est-ce qu'il n'y a pas dans tous les partis quelque chose de bon à prendre ?

MUREL : Sans doute, leurs voix !

ROUSSELIN : Vous avez un esprit, ma parole d'honneur ! une délicatesse ! ... Ah ! je ne m'étonne pas qu'on vous aime !

MUREL : Moi ? et qui donc ?

ROUSSELIN : Innocent ! une demoiselle, du nom de Louise.

MUREL : Quel bonheur ! merci ! merci ! Maintenant, je vais m'occuper de vous, gaillardement ! J'affirmerai qu'on ne vous a pas compris. Une dispute de mots, une erreur. Quant à l'Impartial...

ROUSSELIN : Là, vous êtes le maître !

MUREL : Pas tout à fait ! Nous dépendons de Paris, qui donne le mot d'ordre. Vous deviez même être éreinté !

ROUSSELIN : Décommandez l'éreintement !

MUREL : Sans doute. Mais, comment, tout de suite, prêcher à Julien le contraire de ce qu'on lui a dit ?

ROUSSELIN : Que faire ?

MUREL : Attendons donc ! Il y a chez vous quelqu'un dont peut-être l'influence...

ROUSSELIN : Qui cela ?

MUREL : Miss Arabelle ! D'après certaines paroles qu'elle m'a dites, j'ai tout lieu de croire que ce jeune poète l'intéresse...

ROUSSELIN, riant : La pièce de vers serait-elle pour l'Anglaise ?

MUREL : Je ne connais pas les vers, mais je crois qu'ils s'aiment.

ROUSSELIN : J'en étais sûr ! Jamais de la vie je ne me trompe ! Du moment que ma fille n'est pas en jeu, je ne risque rien ; et je me moque pas mal, après tout, si... Il faut que j'en parle à ma femme. Elle doit être là, précisément.

MUREL : Moi, pendant ce temps-là, je vais essayer de ramener ceux que votre tiédeur philosophique a un peu refroidis.

ROUSSELIN : N'allez pas trop loin, cependant, de peur que Bouvigny, de son côté...

MUREL : Ah ! il faut bien que je rebadigeonne votre patriotisme ! (Il sort)

ROUSSELIN, seul : Tâchons d'être fin, habile, profond !

Scène XII : Rousselin, Mme Rousselin, Miss Arabelle

ROUSSELIN, à Arabelle : Ma chère enfant, - car mon affection toute paternelle me permet de vous appeler ainsi, - j'attends de vous un grand service ; il s'agirait d'une démarche auprès de M. Julien !

ARABELLE, vivement : Je peux la faire !

MME ROUSSELIN, avec hauteur : Ah ! comment cela ?

ARABELLE : Il fume son cigare tous les soirs sur cette promenade. Rien de plus facile que de l'aborder.

MME ROUSSELIN : Vu les convenances, ce serait plutôt à moi...

ROUSSELIN : En effet, c'est plutôt à une femme mariée..

ARABELLE : Mais je veux bien !

MME ROUSSELIN : Je vous le défends, Mademoiselle !

ARABELLE : J'obéis, Madame ! (A part, en remontant) Qu'a-t-elle donc à vouloir m'empêcher ? ... Attendons ! (Elle disparaît)

MME ROUSSELIN : Tu as parfois, mon ami, des idées singulières ; charger l'institutrice d'une chose pareille ! car c'est pour ta candidature, j'imagine ?

ROUSSELIN : Sans doute ! Et moi, je trouvais que miss Arabelle, précisément à cause de son petit amour, dont je ne doute plus, pouvait fort bien...

MME ROUSSELIN : Ah ! tu ne la connais pas. C'est une personne à la fois violente et dissimulée, cachant sous des airs romanesques une âme qui l'est fort peu ; et je sens qu'il faut se méfier d'elle...

ROUSSELIN : Tu as peut-être raison ? Voici Julien ! Tu comprends, n'est-ce pas, tout ce qu'il faut lui dire ?

MME ROUSSELIN : Oh ! je saurai m'y prendre !

ROUSSELIN : Je me fie à toi ! (Rousselin s'éloigne, après avoir salué Julien. La nuit est venue)

Scène XIII : Mme Rousselin, Julien

JULIEN, apercevant Mme Rousselin : Elle ! (Il jette son cigare) Seule ! Comment faire ? (Saluant) Madame !

MME ROUSSELIN : M. Duprat, je crois ?

JULIEN : Hélas oui, Madame.

MME ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi hélas ?

JULIEN : J'ai le malheur d'écrire dans un journal qui doit vous déplaire.

MME ROUSSELIN : Par sa couleur politique, seulement.

JULIEN : Si vous saviez combien je méprise les intérêts qui m'occupent !

MME ROUSSELIN : Mais les intelligences d'élite peuvent s'appliquer à tout sans déchoir. Votre dédain, il est vrai, n'a rien de surprenant. Quand on écrit des vers aussi... remarquables...

JULIEN : Ce n'est pas bien ce que vous faites là, Madame ! Pourquoi railler ?

MME ROUSSELIN : Nullement ! Malgré mon insuffisance, peut-être, je vous crois un avenir...

JULIEN : Il est fermé par le milieu où je me débats. L'art pousse mal sur le terroir de la province. Le poète qui s'y trouve et que la misère oblige à certains travaux est comme un homme qui voudrait courir dans un borborygme. Un ignoble poids, toujours collé à ses talons, le retient ; plus il s'agite, plus il enfonce. Et cependant, quelque chose d'indomptable proteste et rugit au dedans de vous ! Pour se consoler de ce que l'on fait, on rêve orgueilleusement à ce que l'on fera ; puis les mois s'écoulent, la médiocrité ambiante vous pénètre, et on arrive doucement à la résignation, cette forme tranquille du désespoir.

MME ROUSSELIN : Je comprends, et je vous plains !

JULIEN : Ah ! Madame, que votre pitié est douce, bien qu'elle augmente ma tristesse !

MME ROUSSELIN : Courage ! le succès, plus tard, viendra.

JULIEN : Dans mon isolement, est-ce possible ?

MME ROUSSELIN : Au lieu de fuir le monde, allez vers lui ! Son langage n'est pas le vôtre, apprenez-le ! Soumettez-vous à ses exigences. La réputation et le pouvoir se gagnent par le contact ; et, puisque la société est naturellement à l'état de guerre, rangez-vous dans le bataillon des forts, du côté des riches, des heureux ! Quant à vos pensées intimes, n'en dites jamais rien, par dignité et par prudence. Dans quelques temps, lorsque vous habiterez Paris, comme nous...

JULIEN : Mais je n'ai pas le moyen d'y vivre, Madame !

MME ROUSSELIN : Qui sait ? avec la souplesse de votre talent, rien n'est difficile ; et vous l'utiliserez pour des personnes qui en marqueront leur gratitude. Mais il est tard ; au plaisir de vous revoir, Monsieur. (Elle remonte)

JULIEN : Oh ! restez ! au nom du ciel, je vous en conjure ! Voilà si longtemps que je l'espère, cette occasion. Je cherchais des ruses, inutilement, pour arriver jusqu'à vous ! D'ailleurs, je n'ai pas bien compris vos dernières paroles. Vous attendez quelque chose de moi, il me semble ? Est-ce un ordre ? Dites-le ! J'obéirai.

MME ROUSSELIN : Quel dévouement !

JULIEN : Mais vous occupez ma vie ! Quand, pour respirer plus à l'aise, je monte sur la colline, malgré moi, tout de suite mes yeux découvrent parmi les autres votre chère maison, blanche dans le verdure de son jardin ; et le spectacle d'un palais ne me donnerait pas autant de convoitise ! Quelquefois vous apparaissez dans la rue, c'est un éblouissement, je m'arrête ; et puis je cours après votre voile, qui flotte derrière vous comme un petit nuage bleu ! Bien souvent je suis venu devant cette grille, pour vous apercevoir et entendre passer au bord des violettes le murmure de votre robe. Si votre voix s'élevait, le moindre mot, la phrase la plus ordinaire, me semblait d'une valeur inintelligible pour les autres ; et j'emportais cela, joyeusement, comme une acquisition ! - Ne me chassez pas ! Pardonnez-moi ! J'ai eu l'audace de vous envoyer des vers. Ils sont perdus, comme les fleurs que je cueille dans la campagne, sans pouvoir vous les offrir, comme les paroles que je vous adresse la nuit, et que vous n'entendez pas, car vous êtes mon inspiration, ma muse, le portrait de mon idéal, mes délices, mon tourment !

MME ROUSSELIN : Calmez-vous, Monsieur ! Cette exagération...

JULIEN : Ah ! c'est que je suis de 1830, moi ! J'ai appris à lire dans Hernani, et j'aurais voulu être Lara ! J'exècre toutes les lâchetés contemporaines, l'ordinaire de l'existence, et l'ignominie des bonheurs faciles ! L'amour qui a fait vibrer la grande lyre des maîtres gonfle mon coeur. Je ne vous sépare pas dans ma pensée de tout ce qu'il y a de plus beau ; et le reste du monde, au loin, me paraît une dépendance de votre personne. Ces arbres sont faits pour se balancer sur votre tête, la nuit pour vous recouvrir, les étoiles qui rayonnent doucement, comme vos yeux, pour vous regarder !

MME ROUSSELIN : La littérature vous emporte, Monsieur ! Quelle confiance une femme peut-elle accorder à un homme qui ne sait pas retenir ses métaphores, ou sa passion ? Je crois la vôtre sincère, pourtant. Mais vous êtes jeune, et vous ignorez trop ce qui est l'indispensable. D'autres, à ma place, auraient pris pour une injure la vivacité de vos sentiments. Il faudrait au moins promettre...

JULIEN : Voilà que vous tremblez aussi. Je le savais bien ! On ne repousse pas un tel amour !

MME ROUSSELIN : Ma hardiesse à vous écouter m'étonne moi-même. Les gens d'ici sont méchants, Monsieur. La moindre étourderie peut nous perdre !... le scandale...

JULIEN : Ne craignez rien ! Ma bouche se taira, mes yeux se détourneront, j'aurai l'air indifférent ; et si je me présente chez vous...

MME ROUSSELIN : Mais, mon mari... Monsieur.

JULIEN : Ne me parlez pas de cet homme !

MME ROUSSELIN : Je dois le défendre.

JULIEN : C'est ce que j'ai fait, - par amour pour vous !

MME ROUSSELIN : Il l'apprendra ; et vous n'aurez pas à vous repentir de votre générosité.

JULIEN : Laissez-moi me mettre à vos genoux, afin que je vous contemple de plus près. J'exécuterai, Madame, tout ce qu'il vous plaira ! et valeureusement, n'en doutez pas ; me voilà devenu fort ! Je voudrais épandre sur vous, avec les ivresses de la terre, tous les enchantements de l'Art, toutes les bénédictions du Ciel...

MISS ARABELLE, *cachée derrière un arbre : J'en étais sûre !

MME ROUSSELIN : J'attends de vous une preuve immédiate de complaisance, d'affection...

JULIEN : Oui, oui !

Scène XIV : les mêmes, Miss Arabelle, puis Murel et Gruchet, à la fin Rousselin

MME ROUSSELIN, *remontant : On vient ! il faut que je rentre.

JULIEN : Pas encore !

GRUCHET, *au fond, poursuivant Murel : Alors, rendez-moi mon argent !

MUREL, *continuant à marcher : Vous m'ennuyez !

GRUCHET : Polisson !

MUREL, lui donnant un soufflet : Voleur !

ROUSSELIN, en entrant, qui a entendu le bruit du soufflet : Qu'est-ce donc ?

JULIEN, à Mme Rousselin : Oh ! cela, seulement ! (Il lui applique sur la main un baiser sonore)

MISS ARABELLE reconnaît Julien : Ah !

ROUSSELIN : Que se passe-t-il ? (Apercevant miss Arabelle qui s'enfuit) Arabelle ! Demain, je la flanque à la porte !

ACTE TROIS

Au salon de Flore. L'intérieur d'un bastringue. En face, et occupant tout le fond, une estrade pour l'orchestre. Il y a dans le coin de gauche une contrebasse. Attachés au mur, des instruments de musique ; au milieu du mur, un trophée de drapeaux tricolores. Sur l'estrade, une table avec une chaise ; deux autres tables des deux côtés. Une petite estrade plus basse est au milieu, devant l'autre. Toute la scène est remplie de chaises. A une certaine hauteur, un balcon, où l'on peut circuler.

Scène I : Rousselin, seul, à l'avant-scène, puis un garçon de café

ROUSSELIN : Si je comparais l'Anarchie à un serpent, pour ne pas dire hydre ? Et le pouvoir... à un Vampire ? Non, c'est prétentieux ! Il faudrait cependant intercaler quelque phrase à effet, de ces traits qui enlèvent... comme : “fermer l'ère des révolutions, camarilla, droits imprescriptibles, virtuellement ;” et beaucoup de mots en isme : “parlementarisme, obscurantisme !...” Calmons-nous ! un peu d'ordre. Les électeurs vont venir, tout est prêt ; on a constitué le bureau, hier au soir. Le voilà, le bureau ! Ici la place du Président (il montre la table, au milieu) ; des deux côtés les deux secrétaires, et moi, au milieu, en face du public !... Mais sur quoi m'appuierai-je ? Il me faudrait un tribune ! Oh ! je l'aurai, la tribune ! En attendant... (Il va prendre une chaise et la pose devant lui, sur la petite estrade) Bien ! et je placerai le verre d'eau, - car je commence à avoir une soif abominable - je placerai le verre d'eau là ! (Il prend le verre d'eau qui se trouve sur la table du Président, et le met sur sa chaise). Aurai-je assez de sucre ? (Regardant le bocal qui en est plein) Oui ! Tout le monde est assis. Le Président ouvre la séance, et quelqu'un prend la parole. Il m'interpelle pour me demander... par exemple... Mais d'abord qui m'interpelle ? Où est l'individu ? A ma droite, je suppose ! Alors, je tourne la tête brusquement !... Il doit être moins loin ? (Il va déranger une chaise, puis remonte). Je conserve mon air tranquille, et tout en enfonçant la main dans mon gilet... Si j'avais pris mon habit ? C'est plus commode pour le bras ! Une redingote vaut mieux, à cause de la simplicité. Cependant, le peuple, on a beau dire, aime la tenue, le luxe. Voyons ma cravate ? (Il se regarde dans une petite glace à main qu'il tire de sa poche.) Le col un peu plus bas. Pas trop, cependant ; on ressemble à un chanteur de romances. Oh ! ça ira - avec un mot de Murel, de temps à autre, pour me soutenir ! C'est égal ! Voilà une peur qui m'empoigne, et j'éprouve à l'épigastre... (Il boit) Ce n'est rien. Tous les grands orateurs ont cela à leurs débuts ! Allons, pas de faiblesses, ventrebleu ! un homme en vaut un autre, et j'en vauds plusieurs ! Il me monte à la tête... comme des bouillons ! et je me sens, ma parole, un toupet infernal ! "Et c'est à moi que ceci s'adresse, Monsieur !" Celui-là est en face ; marquons-le ! (Il dérange une chaise et la pose au milieu.) "A moi que ceci s'adresse à moi !" Avec les deux mains sur la poitrine, en me baissant un peu. "A moi, qui, pendant quarante ans... à moi, dont le patriotisme... à moi que... à moi pour lequel..." puis, tout à coup : "Ah ! vous ne le croyez pas vous-même, monsieur !" Et on reste sans bouger ! Il réplique : "Vos preuves alors ! donnez vos preuves ! Ah ! prenez garde ! On ne se joue pas de la crédulité publique !" Il ne trouve rien. "Vous vous taisez ! ce silence vous condamne ! J'en prends acte !" Un peu d'ironie maintenant ! On lui lance quelque chose de caustique, avec un rire de supériorité. "Ah ! ah !" Essayons le rire de supériorité. "Ah ! ah ! ah ! je m'avoue vaincu, effectivement ! Parfait !" Mais deux autres qui sont là ! - je les reconnâitrai, - s'écrient que je m'insurge contre nos institutions, ou n'importe quoi. Alors, d'un ton furieux : "Mais vous niez le progrès !" Développement du mot progrès : "Depuis l'astronome avec son télescope qui pour le hardi nautonnier... jusqu'au modeste villageois baignant de ses sueurs... le prolétaire de nos villes... l'artiste dont l'inspiration..." Et je continue jusqu'à une phrase, où je trouve le moyen d'introduire le mot "bourgeoisie". Tout de suite, éloge de la bourgeoisie, le tiers Etat, les cahiers, 89, notre commerce, richesse nationale, développement du bien-être par l'ascension progressive des classes moyennes. Mais un ouvrier : "Eh bien ! et le peuple, qu'en faites-vous ?" Je pars : "Ah ! le peuple, il est grand !" ; et je le flagorne, je lui en fourre par-dessus les oreilles ! J'exalte Jean-Jacques Rousseau qui avait été domestique, Jacquart tisserand, Marceau tailleur ; tous les tisserands, tous les domestiques et tous les tailleurs seront flattés. Et, après que j'ai tonné contre la corruption des riches : "Que lui reproche-t-on, au peuple ? c'est d'être pauvre !" Tableau enragé de sa misère ; bravos ! "Ah ! pour qui connaît ses vertus, combien est douce la mission de celui qui peut devenir son mandataire ! Et ce sera toujours avec un noble orgueil que je sentirai dans ma main la main calleuse de l'ouvrier ! parce que son étrenne, pour être un peu rude, n'en est que plus sympathique ! parce que toutes les différences de rang, de titre et de fortune sont, Dieu merci ! surannés, et que rien n'est comparable à l'affection d'un homme de coeur !..." Et je me tape sur le coeur ! bravo ! bravo ! bravo !

UN GARÇON DE CAFE : M. Rousselin, ils arrivent !

ROUSSELIN : Retirons-nous, que je n'aie pas l'air... Aurai-je le temps d'aller chercher mon habit ? Oui ! - en courant (Il sort)

Scène II : tous les électeurs, Voinchet, Marchais, Hombourg, Heurtelot, Onésime, le garde champêtre, Beaumesnil, Ledru, Le Président, puis Rousselin, puis Murel

VOINCHET : Ah ! nous sommes nombreux . Ce sera drôle, à ce qu'il paraît.

LEDRU : Pour une réunion politique, on aurait dû choisir un endroit plus convenable que le Salon de Flore.

BEAUMESNIL : Puisqu'il n'y en a pas d'autres dans la localité ! Qui est-ce que vous nommerez, M. Marchais ?

MARCHAIS : Mon Dieu, Rousselin ! C'est encore lui, après tout...

LEDRU : Moi, j'ai résolu de faire un vacarme...

VOINCHET : Tiens ! le fils de Bouvigny.

BEAUMESNIL : Le père est plus finaud, il ne vient pas.

LE PRESIDENT : En séance !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : En séance !

LE PRESIDENT : Messieurs ! nous avons à discuter les mérites de nos deux candidats pour les élections de dimanche. Aujourd'hui, vous vous occuperez de l'honorable M. Rousselin, et demain soir, de l'honorable M. Gruchet. La séance est ouverte.

Rousselin, en habit noir, sort d'une petite porte derrière le président, fait des salutations, et reste debout au milieu de l'estrade.

VOINCHET : Je demande que le candidat nous parle des chemins de fer.

ROUSSELIN, après avoir toussé et pris un verre d'eau : Si on avait dit du temps de Charlemagne, ou même de Louis XIV, qu'un jour viendrait, où, en trois heures il serait possible d'aller...

VOINCHET : Ce n'est pas ça ! Etes vous d'avis qu'on donne une allocation au chemin de fer qui doit passer par Saint-Mathieu, ou bien à un autre qui couperait Bonneval - idée cent fois meilleure ?

UN ELECTEUR : Saint-Mathieu est plus à l'avantage des habitants ! Déclarez-vous pour celui-là, monsieur Rousselin !

ROUSSELIN : Comment ne serais-je pas pour le développement de ces gigantesques entreprises qui remuent des capitaux, prouvent le génie de l'homme, apportent le bien-être au sein des populations !...

HOMBOURG : Pas vrai, elles les ruinent !

ROUSSELIN : Vous niez donc le progrès, Monsieur ! le progrès, qui depuis l'astronomie...

HOMBOURG : Mais les voyageurs ?...

ROUSSELIN : Avec son télescope...

HOMBOURG : Ah ! si vous m'empêchez !...

LE PRESIDENT : La parole est à l'interpellant.

HOMBOURG : Les voyageurs ne s'arrêteront plus dans nos pays.

VOINCHET : C'est parce qu'il tient une auberge !

HOMBOURG : Elle est bonne, mon auberge !

TOUS : Assez ! assez !

LE PRESIDENT : Pas de violence, Messieurs !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Silence !

HOMBOURG : Voilà comme vous défendez nos intérêts !

ROUSSELIN : J'affirme...

HOMBOURG : Mais vous perdez le roulage !

UN ELECTEUR : Il soutiendra le libre échange !

ROUSSELIN : Sans doute ! Par la transmission des marchandises, un jour la fraternité des peuples...

UN ELECTEUR : Il faut admettre les laines anglaises ! Proclamez l'affranchissement de la bonneterie !

ROUSSELIN : Et tous les affranchissements !

LES ELECTEURS : (Côté droit ) Oui ! oui ! (Côté gauche) Non ! non ! à bas !

ROUSSELIN : Plût au ciel que nous puissions recevoir en abondance les céréales, les bestiaux !

UN AGRICULTEUR, en blouse : Eh bien, vous êtes gentils pour l'agriculture !

ROUSSELIN : Tout à l'heure, je répondrai sur le chapitre de l'agriculture. (Il se verse un verre d'eau. Silence)

HEURTELOT, apparaissant en haut, au balcon : Qu'est-ce que vous pensez des hannetons ?

TOUS, riant : Ah ! ah ! ah !

LE PRESIDENT : Un peu de gravité, Messieurs !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Silence ! Pas de désordre ! Au nom de la Loi, assis !

MARCHAIS : M. Rousselin, nous voudrions savoir votre idée sur les impôts.

ROUSSELIN : Les impôts, mon Dieu... certainement sont pénibles, mais indispensables... C'est une pompe, - si je puis m'exprimer ainsi, - qui aspire du sein de la terre un élément fertilisateur pour le répandre sur le sol. Reste à savoir si les moyens répondent au but... et si, en exagérant... on n'arriverait pas quelquefois à tarir...

LE PRESIDENT, se penchant vers lui : Charmante comparaison !

VOINCHET : La propriété foncière est surchargée !

HEURTELOT : On paie plus de trente sous de droits pour un litre de cognac !

LEDRU : La flotte nous dévore !

BEAUMESNIL : Est-ce qu'on a besoin d'un Jardin des Plantes !

ROUSSELIN : Sans doute ! sans doute ! sans doute ! Il faudrait apporter d'immenses, d'immenses économies...

TOUS : Très bien !

ROUSSELIN : D'autre part, le Gouvernement lésine, tandis qu'il devrait...

BEAUMESNIL : Elever les enfants pour rien !

MARCHAIS : Protéger le commerce !

L'AGRICULTEUR : Encourager l'agriculture !

ROUSSELIN : Bien sûr !

BEAUMESNIL : Fournir l'eau et la lumière gratuitement dans chaque maison !

ROUSSELIN : Peut-être, oui !

HOMBOURG : Vous oubliez le roulage dans tout ça !

ROUSSELIN : Oh ! non, non pas ! Et permettez-moi de résumer en un seul corps de doctrine, de prendre en faisceau...

LEDRU : On connaît votre manière d'enguirlander le monde ! Mais si vous aviez devant vous Gruchet...

ROUSSELIN : C'est à moi que vous comparez Gruchet ! à moi !... qu'on a vu pendant quarante ans... à moi dont le patriotisme... - Ah ! vous ne le croyez pas vous-même, Monsieur !

LEDRU : Oui, je le compare à vous !

ROUSSELIN : Ce Catalina de village !

HEURTELOT, *au balcon : Qu'est-ce que c'est, Catalina ?

ROUSSELIN : C'est un célèbre conspirateur qui, à Rome...

LEDRU : Mais Gruchet ne conspire pas !

HEURTELOT : Etes-vous de la police ?

TOUS, *à droite, ensemble, confusément : Il en est ! il en est !

TOUS, *à gauche, de même : Non, il n'en est pas ! (Vacarme)

ROUSSELIN : Citoyens ! de grâce ! Citoyens ! Je vous en prie ! de grâce ! écoutez-moi !

MARCHAIS : Nous écoutons !

Rousselin cherche à dire quelque chose, et reste muet. Rires de la foule.

TOUS, *riant : Ah ! ah ! ah !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Silence !

HEURTELOT : Il faut qu'il s'explique sur le droit au travail .

TOUS : Oui ! oui ! le droit au travail !

ROUSSELIN : On a écrit là-dessus des masses de livres. (Murmures)
Ah ! vous m'accorderez qu'on a écrit, à ce propos, énormément de livres. Les avez-vous lus ?

HEURTELOT : Non !

ROUSSELIN : Je les sais par coeur ! Et si, comme moi, vous aviez passé vos nuits dans le silence du cabinet, à...

HEURTELOT : Assez causé de vous ! Le droit au travail !

TOUS : Oui, oui, le droit au travail !

ROUSSELIN : Sans doute on doit travailler !

HEURTELOT : Et commander de l'ouvrage !

MARCHAIS : Mais si on n'en a pas besoin ?

ROUSSELIN : N'importe !

MARCHAIS : Vous attaquez la propriété !

ROUSSELIN : Et quand même ?

MARCHAIS, se précipitant sur l'estrade : Ah ! vous me faites sortir de mon caractère !

ELECTEURS, de droite : Descendez ! descendez !

ELECTEURS, de gauche : Non ! qu'il y reste !

ROUSSELIN : Oui ! qu'il demeure ! J'admets toutes les contradictions ! Je suis pour la liberté ! (Applaudissements à droite. Murmures à gauche ; il se retourne vers Marchais) Le mot vous choque, Monsieur ? c'est que vous n'en comprenez point le sens économique, la valeur... humanitaire ! La presse l'a élucidée, pourtant ! et la presse, - rappelons-le, citoyens, - est un flambeau, une sentinelle qui...

BEAUMESNIL : A la question !

MARCHAIS : Oui, la propriété !

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien ! je l'aime comme vous ; je suis propriétaire. Vous voyez donc que nous sommes d'accord.

MARCHAIS, embarrassé : Cependant... hum !... cependant !

LEDRU : Ah ! l'épicier ! (Tout le monde rit)

ROUSSELIN : Encore un mot ! je vais le convaincre ! (A Marchais) On doit, - n'est-il pas vrai, - on doit, autant que possible, démocratiser l'argent, républicaniser le numéraire. Plus il circule, plus il en tombe dans la poche du peuple, et par conséquent dans la vôtre. Pour cela, on a imaginé le crédit.

MARCHAIS : Il ne faut pas trop de crédit !

ROUSSELIN : Parfait ! Oh ! très bien !

LEDRU : Comment ! pas de crédit !

ROUSSELIN, à Ledru : Vous avez raison ; car si on ôte le crédit, plus d'argent ! et d'autre part, c'est l'argent qui fait la base du crédit ;

les deux termes sont corrélatifs ! (Secouant fortement Marchais)
Comprenez-vous que les deux termes soient corrélatifs ? Vous vous taisez ? ce silence vous condamne, j'en prends acte !

TOUS : Assez ! assez !

ROUSSELIN : Ainsi se trouve résolue, citoyens, l'immense question du travail ! En effet, sans propriété, pas de travail ! Vous faites travailler parce que vous êtes riche, et sans travail, pas de propriété. Vous travaillez, non seulement pour devenir propriétaires, mais parce que vous l'êtes ! Vos oeuvres font du capital, vous êtes capitalistes.

L'AGRICULTEUR : Drôles de capitalistes !

MARCHAIS : Vous embrouillez tout !

LEDRU : C'est se ficher du monde !

TOUS : Oui, la clôture ! à la porte ! la clôture !

LE PRESIDENT : Cela devient intolérable ! on ne peut plus...

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Je vais faire évacuer la salle !

ROUSSELIN à part, apercevant Murel qui entre : Murel !

LEDRU : Que le candidat justifie les éloges qu'il a donnés devant moi aux opinions du sieur Bouvigny ! (Aux ouvriers) Vous y étiez, vous autres !

ROUSSELIN : Mais... je... je...

LEDRU : Il est perdu !

HEURTELOT : Tendez la gaffe !

VOINCHET : Un médecin ! (Rire général)

MUREL : J'étais là aussi, moi ! L'honorable M. Rousselin a paru condescendre aux idées de Bouvigny. Il ne s'en cache pas, il s'en vante !

ROUSSELIN, fièrement : Ah !

MUREL : Et c'était précisément à cause des électeurs qui l'entouraient, pour affermir leurs convictions, en leur faisant voir jusqu'à quel point peut aller dans la tête de certaines personnes...

ROUSSELIN : l'obscurantisme !

MUREL : Effectivement ! C'était, dis-je un procédé de tactique parlementaire, une ruse... bien légitime, passez-moi l'expression, pour le faire tomber dans le panneau.

HEURTELOT : Oh ! oh ! trop malin !

LEDRU : Alors, il s'est conduit en saltimbanque.

MUREL : Mais je...

HEURTELOT : Ne le défendez plus !

LEDRU : Et voilà l'homme qui avait promis d'aller calotter le préfet !

ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi pas ?

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE, le frappant légèrement sur l'épaule :
Doucement, monsieur Rousselin !

TOUS : Assez ! assez ! la clôture ! la clôture !

Tout le monde se lève. Rousselin fait un geste désespéré, puis se retourne vers le président qui sort.

LE PRESIDENT : Une séance peu favorable, cher Monsieur ; espérons qu'une autre fois...

ROUSSELIN, observant Murel : Murel qui s'en va ! (A Marchais qui passe devant lui) Marchais ! ah ! c'est mal ! c'est mal !

MARCHAIS : Que voulez-vous, avec vos opinions !...

Scène III : Rousselin, Onésime, le garçon de café

ROUSSELIN, redescendant : Oh ! mes rêves !... - je n'ai plus qu'à m'enfuir, ou a me jeter à l'eau, maintenant. On va faire des gorges chaudes, me blaguer ! (Considérant les chaises) Ils étaient là... oui ! et au lieu de cette foule en délire dont j'écoutais d'avance les trépignements... (Le garçon de café entre, pour ranger les chaises) Ah ! fatale ambition, pernicieuse aux rois comme aux particuliers !...

et pas moyen de faire un discours ! tous mes mots ont raté ! Comme je souffre ! comme je souffre ! (Au garçon de café) Ah ! vous pouvez les prendre ! je n'en ai plus besoin ! (A part) Leur vue me tape sur les nerfs, maintenant !

LE GARÇON DE CAFE, à Onésime, sur l'estrade, et qui se trouve caché par la contrebasse : Restez-vous là ?

ONESIME, timidement : Monsieur Rousselin !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! Onésime !

ONESIME, s'avançant : Je voudrais trouver quelque chose de convenable... pour vous dire que je participe aux désagréments...

ROUSSELIN : Merci ! merci ! Car tout le monde m'abandonne !... jusqu'à Murel !

ONESIME : Il vient de sortir avec le clerc de Me Dodart !

ROUSSELIN : Si j'allais le trouver ? (Regardant dehors) Il y a encore trop de monde sur la place ; et le peuple est capable de se porter sur moi à des excès !...

ONESIME : Je ne crois pas !

ROUSSELIN : Cela s'est vu ! On peut être outragé, déchiré ! Ah ! la populace ! je comprends Néron !

ONESIME : Quand mon père a reçu cette lettre du préfet qui lui enlevait tout espoir, il a été comme vous, bien triste ! Cependant il a repris le dessus, à force de philosophie !

ROUSSELIN : Dites-moi, vous qui êtes excellent, vous n'allez pas me tromper ?

ONESIME : Oh !

ROUSSELIN : Est-ce que Monsieur votre père... (Se retournant vers le garçon qui remue les chaises) Il est irritant, ce garçon-là ! Laissez-nous tranquilles ! (Le garçon sort) Est-ce que votre père avait autant de voix qu'on le soutient ? Il m'a défilé une liste de communes !

ONESIME : Il est toujours sûr de soixante-quatre laboureurs. J'ai vu leurs noms.

ROUSSELIN, à part : C'est un chiffre, cela !

ONESIME : Mais... j'ai quelque chose pour vous. Une vieille femme, que je ne connais pas, m'a dit comme j'entrais à la séance : "Faites-moi le plaisir de remettre ce billet à M. Rousselin" (Il le lui donne)

ROUSSELIN : Une drôle de lettre ! Voyons un peu ! (Lisant) "Une personne qui s'intéresse à vous croit de son devoir de vous prévenir que Mme Rousselin..." (Il s'arrête bouleversé)

ONESIME : Dois-je porter la réponse ?

ROUSSELIN, ricanant convulsivement : La... la... la réponse ?

ONESIME : Oui, laquelle ?

ROUSSELIN, furieux : C'est un coup de pied pour l'imbécile qui fait de pareilles commissions ! (Onésime s'enfuit) Une lettre anonyme, après tout ! je suis bien sot de m'en tourmenter. (Il la froisse et la jette) La haine de mes ennemis n'aura donc pas de bornes ! Voilà une machination qui dépasse toutes les autres ! C'est pour me distraire de la vie politique, pour me gêner dans ma candidature ! et on m'attaque jusqu'au fond de l'honneur ! Cette infamie-là doit venir de Gruchet... Sa bonne est sans cesse à rôder autour de la maison... (Il ramasse la lettre, et lisant) "Que votre femme a un amant !" On n'est pas l'amant de ma femme ! - Quels sont les hommes qui peuvent être son amant ? Est-ce assez bête !... Cependant, l'autre soir, sous les quinconces, j'ai entendu un soufflet, presque aussitôt un baiser ! J'ai bien vu miss Arabelle, mais sûrement elle n'était pas seule, puisque d'autre part, un soufflet ? Est-ce qu'un insolent se serait permis envers Mme Rousselin ?... Oh ! elle me l'aurait dit ? Et puis, le baiser, dans ce cas-là, eût précédé le soufflet, tandis que j'ai fort bien entendu un soufflet d'abord, et un baiser, ensuite ! Bah ! n'y pensons plus ! j'ai bien d'autres choses ! Non ! non ! tout à mon affaire ! (Il va pour sortir)

Scène IV : Rousselin, Gruchet.

GRUCHET : Il n'est pas là, M. Murel ?

ROUSSELIN : Vous venez me narguer, sans doute, jouir de ma défaite, ajouter vos persiflages...

GRUCHET : Pas du tout !

ROUSSELIN : Au moins, faut-il se servir d'armes loyales, Monsieur !

GRUCHET : Le droit est de mon côté !

ROUSSELIN : Je sais bien qu'en politique...

GRUCHET : Ce n'est pas la politique qui me fait agir, mais des intérêts plus humbles... M. Murel ...

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! je me moque de Murel !

GRUCHET : Voilà huit jours qu'il m'échappe, malgré ses promesses. Et il se conduit d'une manière abominable ! Non content de s'être livré sur moi à des violences, - je pouvais le traduire en justice ; je n'ai pas voulu, par respect du monde et considération pour l'industrie...

ROUSSELIN : Plus vite, je vous prie !

GRUCHET : M. Murel s'est engagé, en arrivant ici, dans des opérations de bourse qui furent d'abord heureuses ; et il a si bien fait... que... une première fois, je lui ai prêté dix mille francs. Oh ! il me les a rendus, et même avec des bénéfices ! Deux mois plus tard, autre prêt de cinq mille ! Mais la chance avait tourné. Une troisième fois...

ROUSSELIN : Est-ce que ça me regarde ?

GRUCHET : Bref, il me doit actuellement trente mille deux cent vingt-six francs et quinze centimes !

ROUSSELIN, à part : Ah ! c'est bon à savoir !

GRUCHET : Ce jeune homme a abusé de ma candeur ! Il me leurrerait avec la perspective d'une belle affaire, un riche mariage.

ROUSSELIN, à part : Coquin !

GRUCHET : Par sa faute, je me trouve sans argent. Depuis quelque temps, j'en ai tellement dépensé ! (Il soupire) Et, puisque vous êtes son ami, arrangez-vous, priez-le, pour qu'il me rende ce qui m'appartient.

ROUSSELIN : Me demander cela, vous, mon rival

GRUCHET : Je n'ai pas fait le serment de l'être toujours ! J'ai du coeur, monsieur Rousselin ; je sais reconnaître les bons offices.

ROUSSELIN : Comment ! lorsque je possède une reconnaissance de six mille francs, prêtés autrefois pour commencer vos affaires, et dont les intérêts, depuis l'époque, montent à plus de vingt mille !

GRUCHET : C'est même là où je voulais en venir. Donnant, donnant !

ROUSSELIN : Je n'y suis plus du tout !

GRUCHET : Songez donc que beaucoup de personnes dépendent de moi, et que j'ai, sans qu'il y paraisse, pas mal d'influence ! Si vous me remettiez le papier en question, on pourrait s'entendre.

ROUSSELIN : Sur quoi ?

GRUCHET : Je lâcherais les électeurs.

ROUSSELIN : Et si je ne suis pas nommé ? Je perds mon argent !

GRUCHET : Vous êtes trop modeste !

ROUSSELIN : Hein ?

GRUCHET : A votre guise ! Jusqu'à la dernière minute, il sera temps ! Mais je vous répète que vous avez tort ! (Il se dirige vers la gauche)

ROUSSELIN : Où allez-vous donc par là ?

GRUCHET : Dans ce cabinet, où mon ami Julien doit être à travailler sur le procès-verbal de la séance. Je vous assure que vous avez tort !

(5)

Scène V : Rousselin, puis Murel

ROUSSELIN : Est-ce un piège, ou serait-ce la vérité ? Quant à Murel, c'est un sauteur qui faisait tout bonnement une spéculation. Oh ! je m'en doutais un peu ! Mais à présent, je ne vous pas pourquoi je me gênerais ; il a perdu son crédit sur le peuple, et ma foi ... (Il sort)

MUREL, entre joyeux : Pardon de vous avoir quitté si vite ! Je viens de chez Dodart. Quel événement, mon cher ! Un bonheur !...

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! vous en faites de belles ! Je suis obligé de recevoir vos créanciers. Gruchet exige trente mille francs !

MUREL : La semaine prochaine, il les aura !

ROUSSELIN : Encore vos forfanteries ! Jamais vous ne doutez de rien !... De même pour ma candidature ! On n'est pas en vérité moins habile ; et vous auriez dû plutôt...

MUREL : Soutenir Gruchet, n'est-ce pas ?

ROUSSELIN : C'est tout comme ! L'Impartial, depuis huit jours, n'a rien fait.

MUREL : J'étais en voyage ; et je suis revenu sans même attendre...

ROUSSELIN : Mauvaise excuse !

MUREL : La réclamation de Gruchet est une vengeance. Je me perds à cause de vous ; heureusement que...

ROUSSELIN : Quoi donc !

MUREL : Vous m'avez, en quelque sorte, promis la main de votre fille...

ROUSSELIN : Oh ! oh ! Entendons-nous !

MUREL : Mais vous ne savez peut-être pas que je viens d'hériter !

ROUSSELIN : De votre tante, peut-être ?

MUREL : Certainement !

ROUSSELIN : La plaisanterie est rebattue.

MUREL : Je vous jure que ma tante est morte !

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien, enterrez-la et ne me bernez pas avec vos histoires d'héritage.

MUREL : Rien de plus vrai ! Seulement, comme la pauvre femme a trépassé depuis mon départ, on cherche si quelquefois un autre testament...

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! il y a des si ! Eh bien, mon cher, moi, j'aime les gens sûrs des choses qu'ils disent et entreprennent.

MUREL : Monsieur Rousselin, vous oubliez trop ce que je peux faire pour vous !

ROUSSELIN : Pas grand'chose ! Les ouvriers ne vous écoutent plus !

MUREL : Vraiment ! Parce qu'il y a cinq ou six braillards, peut-être... des hommes que j'avais renvoyés de ma fabriques. Mais tous les autres !

ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi ne sont-ils pas venus ?

MUREL : Comment les amener, étant absent ?

ROUSSELIN, à part : Cela, c'est une raison.

MUREL : Vous ne connaissez pas leur humeur ; et je parie que d'ici à dimanche prochain, si je voulais, j'aurais le temps... Mais non, je ne m'en même plus... et... je recommanderai Gruchet.

ROUSSELIN, à part : Il me fait des menaces !... Est-ce que j'aurais encore des chances ? (Haut) Ainsi, vous croyez... que l'effet de la réunion... n'a pas été absolument mauvais ?

MUREL : Ah ! vous avez blessé le peuple !

ROUSSELIN : Mais j'en suis, du peuple ! Mon père était un modeste travailleur ! Voilà ce qu'il faut leur dire, mon bon Murel, et j'ai souffert pour eux, car le Gouvernement a mis la main sur moi, là, tout à l'heure ! Retournez à la filature.

MUREL : Mais écoutez !... j'apporte... - on n'attend plus que le certificat de décès de mon cousin...-

ROUSSELIN : Faites-leur comprendre !...

MUREL : Premièrement, une ferme !

Scène VI : les mêmes, Mme Rousselin, Louise

MADAME ROUSSELIN, à la cantonade : Louise, suis-moi donc !
Qu'as-tu à regarder partout ? (A son mari) Ah ! je te trouve enfin ; j'étais inquiète. S'il y a du bon sens !

ROUSSELIN : Je ne pouvais pas...

LOUISE, apercevant Murel : Mon ami !

MUREL : Louise !

MADAME ROUSSELIN, scandalisée : Que signifie ? Est-ce une tenue pour une jeune personne ? Et vous-même, Monsieur, une pareille familiarité !...

MUREL : Mon Dieu, Madame, M. Rousselin pourra vous dire :

MADAME ROUSSELIN : Je suis curieuse, en effet, de voir pour quelles raisons, ma fille...

ROUSSELIN : Ma chérie, d'abord tu comprendras...

LOUISE, à Murel, à part : C'est moi qui ai poussé ma mère à venir ; je ne vous savais pas ici ; pas d'autre moyen !...

MUREL, de même : Il faut brusquer tout ; je vous dirai pourquoi.
(S'avançant vers M. et Mme Rousselin) Madame, bien qu'on ait l'habitude d'employer pour de telles démarches des intermédiaires, je m'en passe forcément, et je vous prie de m'accorder en mariage Mlle Louise.

MADAME ROUSSELIN : Monsieur, mais Monsieur ! on ne prend pas les gens...

MUREL, vite : Ma nouvelle position de fortune me permet...

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! il faut voir !

MADAME ROUSSELIN : Cela est si en dehors des procédés ordinaires...

LOUISE, souriant : Oh ! maman !

MADAME ROUSSELIN : Et cette inconvenance, dans un endroit public !

Julien entre par la porte de gauche.

Scène VII : les mêmes, Julien.

JULIEN, à Rousselin : Je viens, Monsieur, me mettre à votre disposition.

ROUSSELIN : Vous ?

JULIEN : Oui, moi, absolument !

MUREL, à part : Qui l'amène ?

JULIEN : Mon journal ayant une autorité de vieille date dans le pays, je peux vous être utile.

ROUSSELIN, ébahi : Mais Murel ?

JULIEN : J'ai entendu à travers cette cloison tout ce qui s'est passé à la séance ; et il m'est facile d'en faire un compte-rendu favorable (désignant Murel), avec la permission, toutefois, de mon chef.

MUREL : Parbleu ! depuis assez longtemps...

ROUSSELIN : Comment vous exprimer...

MADAME ROUSSELIN, bas à son mari : Tu vois que j'ai réussi, hein ? (Bas à Julien) Je vous remercie.

JULIEN, de même : Vos yeux me soutenaient ! c'est fait !

ROUSSELIN, à sa femme : Il est charmant ! - Défendu par vous, qui êtes un polémiste !...

MUREL : Un talent flexible, clair, pittoresque !

ROUSSELIN : Je crois bien !

MUREL : Et d'une violence quand il veut s'en donner la peine. (Bas à Julien) Dites que l'idée vient de moi, vous m'obligerez.

JULIEN : Malgré les arguments de notre ami Murel, - car il vous prône avec une ardeur !... - je demeurais dans mon obstination (regardant Mme Rousselin) mais tout à coup, comme éclairé par une lumière, et obéissant à une voix, j'ai vu, j'ai compris.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! cher Monsieur, je suis pénétré de reconnaissance !

JULIEN, bas à Mme Rousselin : Quand vous reverrai-je ?

MADAME ROUSSELIN, de même : Je vous le ferai savoir.

ROUSSELIN, à Julien : Par exemple, je ne sais pas comment vous vous y prendrez !

JULIEN, gaiement : Ceci est mon affaire !

ROUSSELIN, à sa femme : Prie donc M. Julien de venir ce soir dîner chez nous, en famille.

MADAME ROUSSELIN, faisant une révérence : Mais certainement, avec le plus grand plaisir.

JULIEN, saluant : Madame !

ACTE QUATRE

Le cabinet de Rousselin. Au fond, une large ouverture avec la campagne à l'horizon. Plusieurs portes. A gauche, un bureau sur lequel se trouve une pendule.

Scène I : Pierre, puis le garde champêtre, puis Félicité.

PIERRE, à la cantonade, d'une voix très haute : François, allez prendre dans le char à bancs huit messieurs à Saint-Léonard, et vous ne refermerez pas la grille ! - Il faut qu'Elisabeth porte encore des bulletins. - Vous n'oublierez pas, en revenant, le papetier pour les cartes de visite. Entre un commissionnaire qui halète sous un ballot de journaux.

C'est lourd, hein ? mon brave... Mettez cela ici ; bon ! (L'homme dépose son ballot par terre, près d'un autre beaucoup plus grand) Et descendez vous rafraîchir à la cuisine. On y boit du champagne dans des pots à confiture ; rien ne coûte, vu la circonstance ! Ce soir, l'élection, et la semaine prochaine, Paris ! Voilà assez longtemps que j'en rêve le séjour, principalement pour les huîtres et le bal de l'Opéra ! (Considérant les deux tas de journaux) L'article de M. Julien, encore ! A qui en distribuer ? Tout le monde en a, sans exagération, au moins trois exemplaires ! Et il nous en reste !... N'importe, à l'ouvrage ! Il commence à diviser le tas par petits paquets. Entre le garde champêtre.

Ah ! père Morin, aujourd'hui vous êtes en retard !

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : C'est qu'il y a eu, chez M. Murel, une espèce d'émeute ; les ouvriers maintenant, sont contre lui [on parle même de faire venir la troupe]. Ah ! ça ne va pas ! ça ne va pas ! (Il se met à aider Pierre. Entre Félicité)

PIERRE : Tiens, Félicité ! Bonjour, madame Gruchet.

FELICITE : Malhonnête !

PIERRE : Je vous croyais fâchée depuis que votre maître nous fait concurrence ?

FELICITE, *sèchement : Ça ne me regarde pas !... J'ai une commission pour le vôtre.

PIERRE : Il est sorti.

FELICITE : Mais il rentrera pour déjeuner ?

PIERRE : Est-ce qu'on déjeune ? Est-ce qu'on a le temps ! Monsieur, du matin au soir, n'arrête pas, Madame porte des secours à domicile, et Mademoiselle, avec un grand tablier, distribue des potages aux pauvres !

FELICITE : Et l'institutrice ?

PIERRE : Oh ! plus gnian-gnian que jamais ! (Au garde champêtre) Non ! comme cela ! (Pliant un journal) C'est Monsieur qui m'a appris, de manière à ce que l'on voie, du premier coup d'oeil, l'article.

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE : Il cause dans l'arrondissement une agitation !...

PIERRE : Pour être tapé, il l'est.

FELICITE : En attendant, n'y aurait-il pas moyen de lui dire un mot, à votre Anglaise ?

PIERRE, désignant la porte de gauche : Sa chambre est par là, au fond du corridor, à droite.

FELICITE : Oh ! je sais. (Elle se dirige vers la porte)

PIERRE : Notre patron !

Scène II : les mêmes, Rousselin

ROUSSELIN, en entrant, presse chaleureusement la main de Pierre : Mon cher ami...

PIERRE, étonné : Mais, Monsieur ?...

ROUSSELIN : Une distraction, c'est vrai. L'habitude de donner au premier venu des poignées de main est plus forte que moi... J'en ai la paume enflée (Au garde champêtre) Ah ! très bien ! (Lui glissant de l'argent de manière discrète) Merci !... et... ne craignez pas... si jamais vous aviez besoin...

LE GARDE CHAMPETRE, avec un geste pour le rassurer : Oh !
(Il sort avec Pierre qui l'aide à porter les journaux)

ROUSSELIN : Il enfonce toutes les objections, l'article ! - démontrant, fort bien qu'il est absurde d'avoir des opinions arrêtées d'avance, et que ma conduite est par là plus sage et plus loyale. Il vante mes lumières administratives ; il dit même que j'ai fait mon droit. - J'ai poussé jusqu'au premier examen. - Et avec des tournures de style !... - C'est pourtant à ma femme que je dois cela !

FELICITE, s'avançant, et lui remettant une lettre : De la part de M.
Gruchet !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! (Lisant) "La quittance, et je me désiste. Vous pouvez la confier à ma bonne." Diable ! Voilà ce qu'on appelle vous mettre le couteau sous la gorge. Mais, s'il se retire, pas d'autre concurrent, et je suis nommé ! Mon Dieu, oui ! C'est bien clair ! La somme est lourde, cependant, et je n'aurai plus contre lui aucun moyen... Eh ! quand il sera élu, la belle avance ! Pour six mille francs, dont je ne parlais pas, que j'avais oubliés... A quoi me serviraient-ils ?
Bah ! on n'a rien sans sacrifice ! (Il ouvre son bureau) Tenez !
(Donnant un petit papier à Félicité) Dépêchez-vous ! votre maître attend !

FELICITE : Merci, Monsieur ! (Elle sort)

ROUSSELIN : La démission est tardive ! Bah ! le scrutin ne fait que d'ouvrir, et quand j'y perdrais quelques voix...

Scène III : Rousselin, Murel, Dodart

MUREL : Ah ! maintenant vous me croirez. Je vous amène le notaire avec toutes ses preuves.

DODART : Voici les actes de l'état civil, et l'extrait d'inventaire établissant les droits et qualités de mon client la succession de Mme veuve Murel de Montélimart, sa tante.

ROUSSELIN : Mes compliments !

MUREL : Ainsi, rien ne s'oppose plus à ce que...

ROUSSELIN : Quoi ? Qu'est-ce que vous dites ?

MUREL : Mon mariage ?

ROUSSELIN : Et comment voulez-vous que dans un jour pareil ?

MUREL : Sans doute ! Cependant, sans rien décider, on pourrait convenir...

ROUSSELIN, à Dodart : Savez-vous quelque chose de nouveau ? On ne vous a pas dit, par hasard, que Gruchet...

MUREL : Mon cher, il me semble que vous pourriez accorder plus d'attention...

ROUSSELIN : Non ! pas de bavardage ! Vous feriez mieux de ne pas quitter vos hommes ; le bruit court même qu'ils se disposent...

MUREL : Mais j'ai amené exprès Dodart !

ROUSSELIN : Allez-vous en ! Nous causerons ensemble de votre affaire !

MUREL : Vous consentez, alors ? c'est bien sûr ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, mais ne perdez pas votre temps !

MUREL, sortant vivement : Ah ! comptez sur moi ! Quand je devrais leur donner de ma bourse une augmentation !... (Il sort)

Scène IV : Rousselin, Dodart, puis Marchais, puis Pierre, puis Arabelle

ROUSSELIN : Un bon enfant, ce Murel !

DODART : Néanmoins, il se trompe ! Les ouvriers maintenant se moquent de lui ! Quant à sa fortune, par exemple...

MARCHAIS : Serviteur ! M. de Bouvigny m'envoie chercher votre réponse.

ROUSSELIN : Comment ?

MARCHAIS : La réponse à la chose que M. Dodart vous a communiquée ?

DODART, se frappant le front : Quelle étourderie ! la première peut-être, qui m'arrive dans la carrière du notariat !

MARCHAIS, à Rousselin : Et il demande un mot d'écrit.

ROUSSELIN : Mais ?...

DODART, à Rousselin : Je vais vous dire. (A Marchais) Patientez quelques minutes dans la cour, n'est-ce pas ? (Marchais sort) M. de Bouvigny est donc venu, il y a trois jours, m'affirmer encore une fois qu'il tenait à votre alliance...

ROUSSELIN : Je le sais.

DODART : Et que si vous vouliez, - dame ! on se sert des moyens que l'on a, on utilise les armes que l'on possède ! Ce n'est peut-être pas toujours extrêmement bien... mais...

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! vous avez une façon de parler !

DODART : Sans l'affaire de Murel, qui est tombée dans mon étude, et qui a pris tous mes instants, je serais vite accouru.

ROUSSELIN : Au fait, je vous prie !

DODART : Si vous accordez votre fille à son fils, il est sûr, entendez-vous, le comte m'a dit qu'il était sûr de vous faire élire, ne serait-ce qu'en amenant aux urnes soixante-quatre laboureurs.

ROUSSELIN : Cet envoi de Marchais est une sommation ?

DODART : Absolument.

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien ?... et Murel !

DODART : En effet, vous venez de lui promettre.

ROUSSELIN : Lui ai-je promis ?

DODART : Oh ! légèrement !

ROUSSELIN : Pour ainsi dire, presque pas !... Cependant... Enfin, que me conseillez-vous ?

DODART : C'est grave ! très grave ! Des liens d'amitiés, des rapports d'intérêt même m'attachent à M. de Bouvigny, et je serais enchanté pour moi... D'autre part, je ne vous cache pas que M. Murel, maintenant... (A part) Un contrat ! (Haut) C'est à vous de réfléchir, de voir, de peser les considérations ! D'un côté le nom, de l'autre, la fortune. Certainement, Murel devient un parti. Cependant, le jeune Onésime...

ROUSSELIN : Que faire ? Eh ! ma femme, que j'oubliais ! D'ailleurs, je ne peux pas agir sans sa volonté. (Il sonne) Tout le monde est donc mort, aujourd'hui ! (Il crie) Ma femme ! Pierre ! (A Pierre qui accourt) Dites à Madame que j'ai besoin d'elle !

PIERRE : Madame n'est pas dans la maison !

ROUSSELIN : Voyez au jardin ! (Pierre sort) Elle découvrira un expédient ; elle est quelquefois d'un tact...

DODART : En de certaines circonstances, je consulte, comme vous, mon épouse, et je dois lui rendre cette justice...

PIERRE *rentre : Monsieur, je n'ai pas vu Madame !

ROUSSELIN : N'importe ! trouvez-là !

PIERRE : La cuisinière suppose que Madame est sortie depuis longtemps.

ROUSSELIN : Pour où aller ?

PIERRE : Elle ne l'a pas dit !

ROUSSELIN : Vous en êtes sûr ?

PIERRE : Oh ! (il sort)

ROUSSELIN : C'est extraordinaire ! jamais de sa vie !...

ARABELLE, *entrant fort émue : Monsieur ! Monsieur ! Il faut que je vous parle ! écoutez-moi ! une chose importante ! oh ! très sérieuse, Monsieur !

DODART : Dois-je me retirer, Mademoiselle ? (Signe affirmatif d'Arabelle ; il sort)

Scène V : Rousselin, Miss Arabelle

ROUSSELIN : Que me voulez-vous ? dépêchons !

MISS ARABELLE : Mon Dieu, Monsieur, pardonnez-moi si j'ose... c'est dans votre intérêt ! L'absence de Madame paraît vous... contrarier ? et je crois pouvoir...

ROUSSELIN : Est-ce que par hasard ?...

MISS ARABELLE : Oui, Monsieur, le hasard précisément ! - Votre femme est avec M. Julien !

ROUSSELIN, *abasourdi : Comment ?... (Puis tout à coup) Sans doute ! pour mon élection !

MISS ARABELLE : Je ne crois pas ! car je les ai rencontrés à la Croix bleue, entrant dans le petit pavillon, - vous savez, le rendez-vous de chasse, - et j'ai entendu cette phrase de M. Julien, - sans la comprendre peut-être, malgré l'explication que cherchait à m'en donner M. Gruchet, à qui j'en parlais tout à l'heure, et qui, lui, avait l'air de comprendre mieux que moi : "J'en sortirai avant vous, et pour vous faire connaître si vous pouvez rentrer sans crainte, j'agiterai, derrière moi, mon mouchoir !"

ROUSSELIN : Impossible ! !... des preuves, miss Arabelle ! J'exige des preuves !

Scène VI : les mêmes, Dodart, puis Louise

DODART, *entre vivement : Marchais ne veut plus attendre ! Du haut de votre vignot dans le parc, il croit même apercevoir M. de Bouvigny qui descend la côte, au milieu d'une grande foule !

ROUSSELIN : Les soixante-quatre laboureurs !

DODART : Le comte peut les faire voter pour Gruchet !

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! non ! puisque Gruchet... après tout, ce misérable-là... on ne sait pas !

DODART : Ou mettre des bulletins blancs !

ROUSSELIN : C'est assez pour me perdre !

DODART : Et l'heure avance !

ROUSSELIN, regardant la pendule : D'un quart sur la Mairie, heureusement ! Que Marchais retourne vers le comte, le supplier, pour qu'il m'accorde au moins... Où est Louise ? Miss Arabelle, appelez Louise ! (Arabelle sort) Comment la convaincre ?

DODART : Si vous pensez que mon intervention...

ROUSSELIN : Non, ça la blesserait ! Tenez-vous en bas, et dès que j'aurai son consentement... Mais Bouvigny demande une lettre ! Est-ce que je pourrai jamais...

DODART : La parole d'honneur suffira. Et puis, je reviendrai vous dire...

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! vous n'aurez pas le temps ! A 4 heures, le scrutin ferme. Courez vite !

DODART : Alors, j'irai tout de suite à la Mairie...

ROUSSELIN : Que je voudrais y être, pour savoir plus tôt...

DODART : Ce sera vite fait !

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! avec votre lenteur...

DODART : En cas de succès, je vous ferai de loin un signal.

ROUSSELIN : Convenu !

LOUISE, entrant : Tu m'as fait demander ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, mon enfant (A Dodart) Allez vite, cher ami !

DODART, indiquant Louise : Il faut bien que j'attende la décision de Mademoiselle !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! c'est vrai ! (Dodart sort)

Scène VII : Rousselin, Louise

ROUSSELIN : Louise ! tu aimes ton père, n'est-ce pas ?

LOUISE : Oh, cette question !

ROUSSELIN : Et tu ferais tout pour lui...

LOUISE : Tout ce qu'on voudrait !

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien, écoute-moi. Dans les existences les plus tranquilles, des catastrophes surviennent. Un honnête homme, quelquefois, se laisse aller à des égarements. Supposons, par exemple, - c'est une supposition, pas autre chose, - que j'aie commis une de ces actions, et que pour me tirer de là...

LOUISE : Mais vous me faites peur !

ROUSSELIN : N'aie pas peur, ma mignonne ! C'est moins grave ! Enfin, si on te demandait un sacrifice, tu te résignerais !... ce n'est pas un sacrifice que je te demande, une concession seulement ! Elle te sera facile. Les rapports entre vous sont nouveaux ! Il faudrait donc, ma pauvre chérie, ne plus songer à Murel !

LOUISE : Mais je l'aime !

ROUSSELIN : Comment ! Tu t'es laissé prendre à ses manières, à tous les embarras qu'il fait ?

LOUISE : Moi, je lui trouve très bon genre !

ROUSSELIN : Et puis, je ne peux pas donner des détails, mais entre nous, il a des moeurs...

LOUISE : Ce n'est pas vrai !

ROUSSELIN : Cousu de dettes ! Au premier jour, on le verra décamper !

LOUISE : Pourquoi ? Maintenant il est riche !

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! si tu tiens à la fortune, je n'ai rien à dire. Je te croyais des sentiments plus nobles !

LOUISE : Mais le premier jour, je l'ai aimé !

ROUSSELIN : Tu as ton petit amour-propre aussi, toi ! avoue-le ! Tu ne dédaignes pas le flafla, tout ce qui brille, les titres ; et tu serais bien aise, à Paris, - quand je vais être député, - de faire partie du grand monde, de fréquenter le faubourg Saint-Germain... Veux-tu être comtesse ?

LOUISE : Moi ?

ROUSSELIN : Oui, en épousant Onésime.

LOUISE : Jamais de la vie ! un sot qui ne fait que regarder la pointe de ses bottines, [dont on ne voudrait pas pour valet de chambre], incapable de dire deux mots ! Et j'aurais de charmantes belles-soeurs ! [Elles ne savent pas l'orthographe !] et un joli beau-père ! qui ressemble à un fermier. Avec tout cela un orgueil, et une manière de s'habiller ! Elles portent des gants de bourre de soie !

ROUSSELIN : Tu es bien injuste ! Onésime, au fond, a beaucoup plus d'instruction que tu ne penses. Il a été élevé par un ecclésiastique éminent, et la famille remonte au XII<sup>e</sup> siècle. Tu peux voir dans le vestibule un arbre généalogique. Pour ces dames, parbleu, ce ne sont pas des lionnes... mais enfin !... et quant à M. Bouvigny, on n'a pas plus de loyauté, de...

LOUISE : Mais vous le déchiriez depuis la candidature ; et il vous le rendait. Ce n'est pas comme Murel, qui vous a défendu, celui-là ! Il vous défend encore ! Et c'est lui que vous me dites d'oublier ! Je n'y comprends rien ! Qu'est-ce qu'il y a ?

ROUSSELIN : Je ne peux pas t'expliquer ; mais pourquoi voudrais-je ton malheur ? Doutes-tu de ma tendresse, de mon bon sens, de mon esprit ? Je connais le monde, va ! Je sais ce qui te convient ! Tu ne nous quitteras pas ! Vous vivrez chez nous ! Rien ne sera changé ! Je t'en prie, ma Louise chérie, tâche !

LOUISE : Ah ! vous me torturez !

ROUSSELIN : Ce n'est pas un ordre, mais une supplication ! (Il se met à genoux) Sauve-moi !

LOUISE, la main sur son coeur : Non ! je ne peux pas !

ROUSSELIN, avec désespoir : Tu te reprocheras, bientôt, d'avoir tué ton père !

LOUISE, se levant : Ah ! faites comme vous voudrez, mon Dieu !
(Elle sort)

ROUSSELIN, courant au fond : Dodart, ma parole d'honneur, vivement ! (Il redescend) - Voilà de ces choses qui sont pénibles ! Pauvre petite ! Après tout, pourquoi n'aimerait-elle pas ce mari-là ? Il est aussi bien qu'un autre ! Il sera même plus facile à conduire que Murel. Non, je n'ai pas mal fait, tout le monde sera content, car il plait à ma femme !... Ma femme !... Ah ! encore ! C'est ce serpent d'Arabelle avec ses inventions !... Malgré moi... je...

Scène VIII : Rousselin, et successivement Voinchet, Hombourg, Beaumesnil, Ledru

ROUSSELIN, apercevant Voinchet : Vous n'êtes pas à voter, vous ?

VOINCHET : Tout à l'heure ! Nous sommes quinze de Bonneval qui s'attendent au Café Français, pour aller de là tous ensemble à la Mairie !

ROUSSELIN, d'un air gracieux : En quoi puis-je vous être utile ?

VOINCHET : L'ingénieur vient de m'apprendre que le chemin de fer passera décidément par Saint-Mathieu ! J'avais donc acheté, tout exprès, un terrain ; et pour en avoir une indemnité plus forte, j'avais même créé une pépinière ! Si bien que me voilà dans l'embarras. Je veux changer d'industrie ; et comment me défaire, tout de suite, d'environ cinq cents bergamottes, huit cents passe-colmar, trois cents empereurs de la Chine, plus de cent soixante pigeons ?

ROUSSELIN : Je n'y peux rien !

VOINCHET : Pardon ! Comme vous avez derrière votre parc un sol excellent, - rien d'autre que du terreau, - à raison de trente sous l'un dans l'autre, je vous céderais avec facilité...

ROUSSELIN, le reconduisant : Bien ! bien ! Nous verrons plus tard !

VOINCHET : Le marché est fait, n'est-ce pas ? Vous recevrez demain la première voiture ! Oh ! ça ira ! Je vais rejoindre les amis !
(Il sort par le fond)

HOMBOURG, *entrant par la gauche : Il n'y a pas à dire, monsieur Rousselin, il faut que vous me preniez...

ROUSSELIN : Mais je les ai, vos alezans ! Depuis trois jours ils sont dans mon écurie !

HOMBOURG : C'est leur place ! Mais pour les charrois, les gros ouvrages, M. Bouvigny (vous le battrez toujours, celui-là) m'avait refusé une forte jument ! qui n'est pas une affaire, - quarante pistoles !

ROUSSELIN : Vous voulez que je l'achète !

HOMBOURG : Ça me ferait plaisir !

ROUSSELIN : Eh bien, soit !

HOMBOURG : Faites excuse, Monsieur Rousselin, mais... est-ce trop vous demander que... un petit acompte sur les alezans, ou le reste, à votre idée ?...

ROUSSELIN : Non ! (Il ouvre son bureau, et en tirant à lui un des tiroirs) A la Mairie, où en sommes-nous ?

HOMBOURG : Oh ! ça va bien !

ROUSSELIN : Vous y avez été ?

HOMBOURG : Parbleu !

ROUSSELIN, *à part, en repoussant le tiroir : Alors, rien ne presse !

HOMBOURG, *qui a vu le mouvement : C'est-à-dire que j'y ai été... pour prendre ma carte. J'ai même le temps tout juste ! (Rousselin ouvre de nouveau son tiroir et donne de l'argent) Merci de votre obligeance ! (Fausse sortie) Vous devriez faire un coup, monsieur Rousselin ; j'ai un bidet cauchois...

ROUSSELIN : Oh ! assez !

HOMBOURG : Etant un peu rafraichi, ça ferait un poney pour Mademoiselle.

ROUSSELIN, *à part : Pauvre Louise !

HOMBOURG : Quelque chose de coquet, enfin, une distraction !

ROUSSELIN, *soupirant : Oui je prendrai le poney ! (Hombourg sort) par la gauche)

BEAUMESNIL, sur le seuil de la porte, à droite : Deux mots seulement ; je vous amène mon fils.

ROUSSELIN : Pourquoi faire ?

BEAUMESNIL : Il est dans la cour, où il s’amuse avec le chien. Voulez-vous le voir ? C’est celui dont je vous avais parlé, relativement à une bourse. Nous l’espérons, d’ici à peu.

ROUSSELIN : Je ferai tout mon possible, certainement !

BEAUMESNIL : Ces marmots-là coûtent si cher ! Et j’en ai sept, Monsieur, forts comme des Turcs !

ROUSSELIN, à part : Oh !

BEAUMESNIL : A preuve que son maître de pension me réclame deux trimestres ; ... et bien que la démarche... soit humiliante, si vous pouviez m’avancer...

ROUSSELIN, ouvrant le tiroir : Combien les trimestres ?

BEAUMESNIL exhibe un long papier : Voilà ! (Il en donne un autre) Il y a, de plus, quelques fournitures ! (Rousselin donne de l’argent) Je cours vite rapporter chez moi cette bonne nouvelle. Franchement, j’étais venu exprès.

ROUSSELIN : Comment ! et mon élection ?

BEAUMESNIL : Je croyais que c’était pour demain. Je vis tellement renfermé dans ma famille, dans mon petit cercle ! Mais je me rends à mes devoirs, tout de suite ! tout de suite ! (Il sort par la droite)

LEDRU, entrant par le fond : Fameux ! C’est comme si vous étiez nommé !

ROUSSELIN : Ah !

LEDRU : Gruchet se retire. On le sait depuis deux heures. Il a raison, c’est prudent ! Pour dire le vrai, je l’ai, en dessous, pas mal démoli ; et vous devriez reconnaître mon amitié, en tâchant de me faire avoir... (Il montre sa boutonnière)

ROUSSELIN, *bas : Le ruban ?

LEDRU, *très haut : Si je ne le méritais pas, je ne dirais rien ! mais nom d'un nom !... Ah ! je vous trouve assez froid, monsieur Rousselin !

ROUSSELIN : Mais, cher ami, je ne suis pas encore ministre !

LEDRU : N'importe ! J'ai derrière moi vingt-cinq hommes, des gaillards, - Heurtelot en tête, avec des ouvriers de Murel, - qui sont maintenant sous les halles à faire une partie de bouchon. Je leur ai dit que j'allais vous proposer un accommodement, et ils m'attendent pour se décider. Or, je vous préviens que si vous ne me jurez pas de m'obtenir la croix d'honneur !...

ROUSSELIN : Eh ! je vous en achèterai quatre d'étrangères !

LEDRU : AU pas de course, alors ! (Il sort vivement)

Scène IX : Rousselin, seul, regardant au fond

ROUSSELIN : Il aura le temps ! on a encore cinq minutes ! Dans cinq minutes le scrutin ferme, et alors ?... Je ne rêve donc pas ! C'est bien vrai ! je pourrais le devenir ! Oh ! circuler dans les bureaux, se dire membre d'une commission, être choisi quelquefois comme rapporteur, ne parler toujours que budget, amendements, sous-amendements, et participer à un tas de choses... d'une conséquence infinie ! Et chaque matin, je verrai mon nom imprimé dans tous les journaux, même dans ceux dont je ne connais pas la langue ! Le jeu ! la chasse ! les femmes ! est-ce qu'on aime quelque chose comme ça ? Mais pour l'obtenir, je donnerais ma fortune, mon sang, tout ! Oui ! j'ai bien donné ma fille ! ma pauvre fille ! (Il pleure) J'ai des remords maintenant ; car je ne saurai jamais si Bouvigny a tenu parole. On ne signe pas les votes ! Quatre heures sonnent. C'est fait ! On dépouille le scrutin ; ce sera vite fini ! A quoi vais-je m'occuper pendant ce temps-là ? Quelques intimes, quand ce ne serait que Murel qui est si actif, devraient être ici pour m'apprendre les premiers bulletins ! Oh ! les hommes ! dévouez-vous donc pour eux ! Si le pays ne me nomme pas... Eh bien, tant pis ! qu'il en trouve d'autres ! J'aurais fait mon devoir ! (Il trépigne) Mais arrivez donc ! arrivez donc ! Ils sont tous contre moi, les misérables ! C'est à en mourir ! Ma tête se prend, je n'y tiens plus ! J'ai envie de casser mes meubles !

Scène X : Rousselin, un mendiant aveugle, qui joue de la vielle.

ROUSSELIN : Ah ! ce n'est pas un électeur, celui-là ? On peut le bousculer ! Qui vous a permis...

LE MENDIANT : La maison est ouverte ; et des camarades m'ont dit qu'on y faisait du bien à tout le monde, mon cher monsieur Rousselin du bon Dieu ! On ne parle que de vous ! Donnez-moi quelque chose ? Ça vous portera bonheur !

ROUSSELIN, à lui-même : Ça me portera bonheur ! (Il met deux doigts dans la poche de son gilet, rêvant) L'aumône, faite en des circonstances suprêmes, a peut-être une puissance que l'on ne sait pas ? et j'aurais dû, ce matin, entrer dans une église...

LE MENDIANT, faisant aller la vielle : La charité, s'il vous plaît !

ROUSSELIN, ayant palpé ses poches : Eh ! je n'ai plus d'argent sur moi !

LE MENDIANT, jouant toujours : Quelque chose, s'il vous plaît !

ROUSSELIN, fouillant les tiroirs de son bureau : Non ! pas un sou ! pas un liard ! J'ai tant donné depuis ce matin ! Cet instrument m'agace ! Ah ! je trouverai bien un peu de monnaie qui traîne.

LE MENDIANT : La charité, s'il vous plaît ! Vous qu'on dit si riche ! C'est pour avoir du pain ! Ah ! que je suis si faible ! (Près de tomber, il se soutient à la porte)

ROUSSELIN, découragé : Je ne peux pas battre un aveugle !

LE MENDIANT : La moindre des choses ! je prierai le bon Dieu pour vous !

ROUSSELIN, arrachant sa montre de son gousset : Eh bien, prenez ça ! et le ciel sans doute aura pitié de moi ! (Le mendiant décampe vite, Rousselin regarde la pendule) On ne vient pas ! Il y a quelque malheur ! personne n'ose me le dire ! J'irais bien, mais les jambes...

Ah ! c'est trop... tout me semble tourner ! Je vais m'évanouir ! (Il s'affaisse sur le canapé)

Scène X : Rousselin, Miss Arabelle.

MISS ARABELLE, le touchant à l'épaule : Regardez ! (Du doigt, elle indique l'horizon ; Rousselin se penche pour voir) Au bas du sentier, en face l'école, au-dessus de la haie.

ROUSSELIN : Quelque chose de blanc qui s'agite ?

MISS ARABELLE : Le mouchoir !...

ROUSSELIN : Mais... je ne distingue pas... (Puis, tout à coup, poussant un cri) Ah ! que je suis bête ! c'est Dodart ! Victoire ! Oui, ma bonne Arabelle. Bien sûr ! tenez ! on accourt par ici !

MISS ARABELLE : Du monde sur les portes ! des hommes avec des fusils ! (Coups de feu)

ROUSSELIN : C'est pour me célébrer ! Bon ! encore ! toujours ! Pif ! Paf ! (Silence) Ecoutez-donc, mon Dieu ! (Bruits de pas rapides)

Scène XI : les mêmes, Gruchet, puis tout le monde.

ROUSSELIN, se précipitant vers Gruchet : Gruchet ! quoi ? parlez ! Eh bien ? - Je le suis ?

GRUCHET, le regarde des pieds à la tête, puis éclate de rire : Ah ! je vous en réponds !

TOUS, entrant à la fois, par tous les côtés : Vive notre député ! Vive notre député !

THE CASTLE OF HEARTS

A COMEDY OF FAIRYLAND

IN TEN TABLEAUX

in collaboration with

LOUIS BOUILHET CHARLES D'OSMOY

Trasnlated by M. Walter Dunne

This play never was produced on any stage. Flaubert worked on the piece for some time in collaboration with his friends, Louis Bouilhet and Charles d'Osmoy, but several years later he entirely recast and rewrote it. He did not decide to publish it until a few months before his death. After Flaubert's revisions had been made, it appeared in a review, La Vie Moderne, with the names of the three collaborators.

The Castle of Hearts is classed as being a féerie, which is a French genre of opera ballet based on fairy tales, often including elements of magic in the story.

Ladies, Gentlemen, Servants; Gnomes and Fairies (in various disguises.)

FIRST TABLEAU. THE FAIRIES' PERIL.

Scene: A cleared spot in a forest, by moonlight. Trees and shrubs here and there can be distinguished) with white figures dimly seen gliding among them. At the back of the stage, a little to the right, is a small pool. After the curtain rises there is a brief silence, then a sound of pattering footsteps is heard.

SCENE I.

(From the rear and from both sides of the stage groups of Fairies enter each holding a finger to her lips. Some are crowned with field-flowers; others with sea-weed and mosses; a few with gladioli and ears of corn. All represent in their costumes some attribute of the places whence they come — the woods, the streams, the mountains. They advance, looking over their shoulders as if fearing something, and call to one another in whispers)

FIRST FAIRY: Pstt! pstt! SECOND FAIRY: Here I am! THIRD FAIRY: Wait for me; my foot is caught in a ray of light. I "must get it out. [Springs up] There! it is out. Here I am.

FOURTH FAIRY: Are we all here?

ALL: Yes, we are all here!

FIFTH FAIRY: It is night; the earth sleeps. It is the hour that belongs to us. Come, let us dance and make merry.

(.Enormous moths with luminous wings appear among the branches of the trees, and begin to fly through the air. The Fairies dance, with a slow, rhythmic movement, to the music of a flute)

CHORUS: Since man drives us from his dwelling by day, let us play by night in the forest! Men are wicked, but nature is good. The stones of the street are hard, but the grassy fields are soft! We will soil our feet no more in the mud of the street, we will break our hearts no more against men's stony breasts.

A draught of euphorbia is less treacherous than their caresses; the withered leaf, blown by the autumn wind, is more constant than their vows.

Enough of weariness! All the worse for meri! Free from all human cares, we shall be always happy! We shall never leave our native haunts, the freedom of the air, the streams, and the forest.

Let us dance along the vines that cling to the trees, wet with the dews of the summer night; let us glide over the surface of the blue lakes, clinging to the fair shoulder of a pretty maid; let us fly towards the sun in the glittering dust of the rays that come through the cellar windows. Come! let us be gay! let us dance! Roses, shake your sweet petals! Waves, murmur your soft melody! Moon, rise and smile upon us!

(During the Chorus the moon has risen. At the end of the Chorus, it shines upon the pool and the Fairies dance with ecstatic fervour, when suddenly, from the midst of a large cluster of heather, in the centre of the stage, the Fairy Queen springs out. General surprise. The Fairies stop dancing)

ALL: The Queen!

SCENE II.

(The Queen, the Fairies)

QUEEN [in an angry tone]: What! Is this the way that you care for men?

FAIRIES [together]: We can do nothing for them! We have all tried!

QUEEN [vehemently]: Remember! only a few minutes must elapse before we fall again, for a thousand years, under the domination of the Gnomes, since this is the last night that remains to us in which to restore to mankind their stolen hearts.

A FAIRY: But they do not complain of the lack of hearts, O Queen. No man, up to this moment, has asked for the return of his heart. On the contrary, there are many parents, who teach their little ones —

QUEEN: What matter? Do you not know that the Gnomes cannot exist without the hearts of men? It is to nourish themselves that they steal these hearts, putting in their places [points to her breast] I know not what contrivance of their own invention, which imitates perfectly the movement of the human organ.

A FAIRY [laughs]: Truly, they deceive them well!

QUEEN: And the poor human beings allow the exchange to be made without repugnance. Some of them even find pleasure in it. Little by little, by mutual accord, the wicked Gnomes draw men's hearts away from them; and this is the reason why the whole human race — or almost the whole of it — has no kind sentiments nor generous thoughts!

A FAIRY: And you wish that we should vanquish the Gnomes?

QUEEN: Yes! Take up the battle again! A superior order of beings has divided between them and you the empire of the world. In former times we have been able to vanquish them, but for a thousand years they have been triumphant. Mankind, under their tyranny, has abandoned itself to material things; the spirit of the Gnomes has passed into the very marrow of their bones; it envelops them, prevents them from recognising us, and, like a fog, hides from them the splendour of truth, the sun of the ideal!

A FAIRY: The Gnomes can do nothing to injure us, however.

QUEEN: But in proportion to the increase of their power, your own becomes less. They laugh at our hopes, they foil our attempts at consolation, they even deny our existence; and after they have conquered the whole world, they will covet purer regions. Then they will throw themselves upon you with a force strengthened a thousandfold; and your hearts, like those of the unfortunate humans, will be devoured! [Fairies utter a cry of fear] But reassure yourselves! listen to me! [Fairies gather around the Queen] In order to save the human race first, and yourselves afterwards, you must attack the power of your enemies in their most secret retreat, — that is to say, in the hitherto inaccessible place where they hold in reserve the hearts of men —

FAIRIES [tumultuously]: Let us go there!

QUEEN: Wait! The enterprise cannot succeed except through the perfect union of two lovers.

FAIRIES: Oh, it is not difficult to find lovers, and as to the number —

QUEEN: I mean two lovers of an ardour and a purity more than human, either of whom would be willing to die for the other, without even the hope of having the loved one left behind shed a tear upon the tomb of the one that dies.

FAIRIES [loudly]: Oh! oh! And where can such lovers be found?

QUEEN: I do not know. They may be here, quite near us, or at the other end of the earth; wearing rags and tatters, or seated upon a throne. Search everywhere, — in cities, in deserts, in forests, by the sea-shore and on mountain summits. Neglect nothing! go! [Sound of footsteps heard] Some one comes; let us conceal ourselves! Mortal eyes must not behold us!

(The sun begins to rise, and at the right a cabin can be seen through the fog, standing under the shade of a large tree. As the sound of footsteps comes nearer, the Fairies disappear; some rush into the trunks of neighbouring trees; others plunge into the pool; others vanish in the rapidly clearing fog)

SCENE III.

(Father Thomas, Mother Thomas, peasants living in a suburb of Paris; Dominique, their son, wearing a shabby livery; Monsieur Paul de Damvilliers, in a worn travelling costume, with a band of crape on his hat. He seems overcome with melancholy)

FATHER T.: Have courage, my dear Monsieur Paul.

MOTHER T.: You know you must start soon for Paris, and should not neglect your business affairs. Why, it is only a few leagues away, — not such a terrible distance!

PAUL: Yes! I will be strong! I will go at once.

FATHER T.: Oh, there is no such great haste!

MOTHER T. [aside to Father T.]: Imbecile! Shut up!

PAUL: Thank you, my good friends, but I cannot trespass longer upon your hospitality.

FATHER T. [aside to Mother T.]: There, you see he understands the situation perfectly!

DOMINIQUE: Our hospitality was scarcely worthy of you, Monsieur, and I am surprised that you condescended to accept it. Since that rascally former steward of yours had not the decency or the courtesy to offer you an apartment in the castle, it was hardly worth while to come here only to listen to a string of his cursed accounts. I am sure, Monsieur, that you have been unhappy for some time.

PAUL [in a reverie]: Yes! All that has happened seems like the result of a conjurer's magic; like the wrath of an implacable Fate: the sudden death of my father, the old debts that came to light, followed by my total ruin, without my being able to discover the cause or to accuse anyone.

DOMINIQUE [affected]: What bad luck! We used to lead such a happy life together, travelling about.

PAUL: Calm yourself, my good Dominique, and speak no more of that time, so recent and yet so remote, when we journeyed only for pleasure through the Indies and the Orient. Let us have no more regrets! I must start afresh in the world to seek my fortune. [Appears lost in thought]

FATHER T.: The difficulty will be to catch it!

PAUL: It can be done, however, — with courage! [Turns to Dominique] And then, you have not abandoned me.

DOMINIQUE: NO, no! I have the utmost confidence in you, Monsieur; I have seen you work. Wouldn't it be a fine thing if we had at our command some of those good genii that interested you so much when we were in the East?

You remember, you consulted magicians who wore robes of all colours — green, yellow, blue — to say nothing of those who wore no shirts! And really, to look at you then, one would have thought you believed their idle tales.

PAUL: Perhaps I did. Why not? But I have delayed here too long. Adieu!

SCENE IV.

(Enter Jeanne)

MOTHER T.: What are you doing here, lazy girl?

PAUL [shocked]: Oh, how harsh you are!

MOTHER T.: And do you try to take her part against me, Monsieur Paul? Well, you were right just now — you'd better go away at once. She has. talked quite enough about you while you were abroad on your travels.

PAUL: What, little one, you did not forget me? You thought of me?

MOTHER T.: Thought of you, good heavens! For five years she has been continually talking about you. "Where is he? When will he come home?" She would ask for news of you from all the passing wagoners, and when the wind blew hard, she trembled for the safety of your ship.

FATHER T. [tries to drive Jeanne away]: Get along with you! This is none of your business. Go to your work!

PAUL [to Jeanne]: How you have grown! You have become quite a pretty girl. Will you allow me to kiss you? [Jeanne hangs her head]

DOMINIQUE: Come here, simpleton!

JEANNE [presents her forehead timidly; speaks in an agitated tone]: Are you going away?

PAUL: Yes, little one. I must. [Kisses her forehead]

JEANNE [approaches Dominique]: Good-bye, brother! [Turns to Father and Mother T.] He is going with Monsieur. He promised me he would go.

MOTHER T. [aside to Dominique]: And do you wish to go with him, now that he is ruined?

DOMINIQUE [aside]: Oh, we'll wait for some inheritance to turn up! And besides —

MOTHER T. [aside]: Well, I warn you, be careful!

DOMINIQUE [aside]: Besides, I say, I can come back again, if he does not succeed. Every one will be sure to speak of me as a model servitor, and that will sound very well! And if there should be a word or two about me in the newspapers — the sporting papers especially — so much the better. I have friends among the journalists!

FATHER T.: Well, at least, you will send us, from time to time —

DOMINIQUE: Impossible! my capital is — or will be — engaged. We know certain persons connected with the Bourse!

MOTHER T. [admiringly]: What a dashing fellow he is!

DOMINIQUE: But as soon as I obtain a responsible place —

FATHER T. [smilingly]: AH!

DOMINIQUE: I will let you know!

MOTHER T.: Well, take good care of yourself, at least.

DOMINIQUE: Never fear! Myself before all! That's one of my principles.

FATHER T.: And don't spend all your money in buying furbelows.

DOMINIQUE: Nonsense! I don't do that sort of thing any more. You may be sure I know too much for that.

MOTHER T.: Isn't he a clever boy?

DOMINIQUE: And now, old folks, good-night! Good appetite to you, and good health! You first. [Embraces his father] Now you. [Embraces his mother] That's done! Now let us be off!

PAUL: YOU see! In spite of my misfortune and distress he wishes to accompany me.

DOMINIQUE: SO long as you are willing, I am content.

“You could not get along without a valet, you know — it wouldn't be decent! I will have my livery turned and freshened up, put a new band on my hat, and we shall cut a great figure. Monsieur, at your service!

JEANNE [throws her arms around Dominique's neck]: Oh, my dear, good brother!

FATHER T. [to Dominique]: Be careful!

DOMINIQUE: Yes! yes!

MOTHER T.: Listen to me!

DOMINIQUE: Don't worry on my account. [Moves away]

FATHER T.: Come back to us again.

DOMINIQUE: Oh, we shall see each other, never fear.

MOTHER T.: My poor boy!

DOMINIQUE [runs off]: I will write to you.

PAUL [to Father and Mother T.]: I cannot prevent him from going. Farewell! farewell! Be comforted! We go to make our fortunes! [Exit.]

SCENE V.

FATHER T. [in a reverie]: To make their fortunes! To become a gentleman, sleek and well-fed; to own property, fields, woods, a mill; to put on a bold face to everyone — ah, that would be fine!

MOTHER T.: That it would! [To Jeanne] As for you, you can get out and go to digging, instead of spending hours staring at the sky.

JEANNE: But ever since daylight —

MOTHER T.: Bah! I've had enough of your laziness!

FATHER T.: Listen! I have an idea.

MOTHER T.: Well, has it anything to do with us?

FATHER T.: Perhaps. Suppose we send Jeanne to Paris?

JEANNE: Send me to Paris — all alone — in the great city! Oh!

MOTHER T.: Bless me! More than one girl has gone away from here in wooden shoes, and has come back wearing fine clothes. Who knows? [Looks sharply at Jeanne] She's not so ugly, after all. [Pause] Well, why not? I have decided. You shall start to-morrow morning.

JEANNE: Oh, I beg you —

MOTHER T.: We shall spare nothing to start you off well. Your father and I know how to make sacrifices, don't we, Thomas? First, you shall have my red cape, and with one of my old caps to go with it, you will look very well. You see, my Jeannette, you must learn how to use a little coquetry, but in the right way — so as to make the grass grow, you understand! — and so that you can help take care of your parents, your good, kind parents!

JEANNE: But what will become of me all alone in Paris? I shall not know how to find my way about in the streets.

MOTHER T.: Pshaw! There are plenty of people who will be kind enough to show you the way.

JEANNE: But I don't know any one there.

MOTHER T.: Isn't Dominique there? And he has many fine acquaintances — bankers, military men, all the government people.

JEANNE: No, no! I should never dare to go.

MOTHER T.: To say nothing of Monsieur Paul, who would be delighted to see you.

JEANNE: HE! Delighted to see a poor girl like me!

FATHER T.: But, you little idiot —

MOTHER T. [aside]: Shut up, will you! You don't know how to manage her! [To Jeanne] Take your choice: Paris, and my beautiful gold buckle, or stay at home and [makes gesture signifying a box on the ear]

JEANNE [resigned]: Very well! I will go.

MOTHER T.: That's right! But you needn't think you've nothing to do to-day but fold your hands. Go back to your work, and be quick about it. .

JEANNE: At once.

FATHER T.: Come this way.

MOTHER T.: No, go that way.

JEANNE [bewildered]: I don't know where you wish me to go!

MOTHER T. [gives Jeanne a slap]: There, that'll show you! [Jeanne weeps] FATHER T.: That's right! Whine, cry, bawl! [Exeunt, Father and Mother T. pushing Jeanne before them]

SCENE VI.

(The Fairies run lightly upon the stage)

A FAIRY: Ah, the cruel old man! Happily, the young are more kind and gentle, and among them we have discovered two pure hearts.

A FAIRY: That is true. But how will the youth ever learn to care for a little maid so simple, so poor, so ragged?

QUEEN: TO US is given the work of creating this love, and our fate depends upon our efforts. But how shall we give the key of the secret to only one of these two hearts? Hasten, my sisters! Let us decide. Which shall it be?

FAIRIES [together, confusedly]: He! She! No, no! She! He! He! She!

QUEEN: Silence! It shall be the youth, because Jeanne has her ignorance and her humble condition as a safeguard. Paul, on the contrary, is exposed every day to all the snares of the wicked Gnomes. It is he we should warn, at the proper time, and do our utmost to protect within the limit permitted to us. [Moves about among the Fairies, giving them instructions; then all sing] Sisters fair, be prudent, Our plan shall then succeed)

GNOMES (their voices come from under the stage): Ha! ha! ha!

FAIRIES [pause suddenly]: What was that? An echo, without doubt. [All sing.]

Sisters dear, be prudent, Our plan shall then succeed!

(The subterranean laughter increases to a burst of wild gaiety. Through a trap-door appears a throng of Gnomes, strange and ugly little men, with enormous heads. They laugh louder and dance around the Fairies, who flee from them in terror)

SECOND TABLEAU. THE MAGIC PUNCH-BOWL.

Scene: A wine shop in a suburb of Parts. Early morning.

SCENE I.

(The Innkeeper, Paul Dominique, weary and covered with dust, sit beside a table, on which stand a bottle of wine, two glasses, an inkstand and a packet of sealed letters. Several farmers are just leaving the room)

ARMERS: Good-bye, Father Michel!

INNKEEPER: Good luck, boys! [To Paul and Dominique.] And now, as you are served, gentlemen, and as it is still very early in the morning, you will excuse me if I leave you for awhile and try to catch another little nap. [Goes behind the counter, mounts a low platform and sits in a chair, leans his head on his arms and falls asleep]

PAUL [shows the packet of letters to Dominique]: You understand? As soon as we arrive in Paris, you are to distribute these letters.

DOMINIQUE [takes packet]: I understand. [Reads the superscriptions] "To Monsieur the Vicomte Alfred de Cisy." Good! There's a man whose debts you have often paid for him. But what is his address?

PAUL: YOU must inquire at his club.

DOMINIQUE [reads]: "To Monsieur Onésime Dubois, artist, Rue de l'Abbaye." Many a time have you bought bad pictures of him! [Reads] "To Professor Letourneux, member of several religious and philanthropic societies." I know him! It was your father who introduced him everywhere in Paris. [Reads] "To Doctor Colombel."

PAUL: He was our family physician, you remember.

DOMINIQUE [reads]: "To Monsieur Bou — Bou — Bouvignard."

PAUL: Yes, the amateur collector of faïence.

DOMINIQUE: TO be sure! That little man who always dropped in at breakfast time — I remember! [Reads] "To Monsieur Macaret, at his factory." Ha! that gentleman was very glad to be accommodated with the loan of a certain sum when he wanted to set himself up in business! [Shuffles the letters through his hands, muttering] Very well, very well! I know all those streets; I have been there. How many friends you have! Peers of France, bankers, professors, artists — all Paris!

PAUL [sighs]. After my five years' absence perhaps they have forgotten me. But there are some good fellows, I know, that will remember me. Here! [Points to letters] Divide them into two packets. Deliver these first, then the others.

INNKEEPER [suddenly awakes and falls off his chair]: Coming, gentlemen!

DOMINIQUE: NO one called you.

INNKEEPER [Jyawns]: A-h-h-h! (Returns to his chair and sleeps)

PAUL: Note especially any signs of apartments to let, and engage for me a small room that will not be too dear.

DOMINIQUE: Is it important which floor it may be on, Monsieur?

PAUL: NO. I do not care.

INNKEEPER [awakes and falls off his chair again]: Coming! coming!

DOMINIQUE [jumps up startled]: Our host has very busy dreams, evidently! [Sits] Oh, it's good to rest a bit! My knees feel as if they were broken and my head seems hollow.

PAUL [stands]: That is because we walked all night. Poor boy! Come, finish the bottle. [Dominique drinks] Drink to me, too, for my heart almost fails me. Just as I am about to enter upon a new life, I feel a vague trouble in my mind; it is as powerful as the malady that overcomes us when we set out on a long voyage. Come, let us go. Get up!

SCENE II.

(A Stranger enters very quietly; he wears the long frock-coat of a prosperous bourgeois, and a cap with the brim turned up. He wears a beard also, and carries a stick with a leather thong. Sits at one of the tables, observing Paul and Dominique with flaming eyes. Rain is heard falling without)

DOMINIQUE: There! it rains! We shall have to wait here now, since our equipage has not arrived in time to take us to Paris.

PAUL: DO you remember that the last time we drove together we were in a post-chaise with four horses?

DOMINIQUE: Yes, and I was on the box; I paid the postilions! And to-day we have to wait for an omnibus!

STRANGER [rises, with a polite salutation]: The omnibus from the suburbs does not start until half-past eight every morning, Monsieur. [Paul and Dominique turn and look at the Stranger] You are strangers, gentlemen, I think. Monsieur is travelling for pleasure, undoubtedly. If you require anyone to show you about the city, I could recommend to you some of my relatives. [Paul and Dominique continue to look at him without speaking] B-r-r-r! [Shivers] How cold it is! I should be glad to have something hot to drink. Hey, garçon!

Bring me some punch! [Innkeeper springs up clumsily, as before, and exit R. The Stranger calls after him] Plenty of sugar, lemon, and cognac, and be quick about it! If you gentlemen would do me the honour to join me —
(Enter Maid-servant carrying a bowl)

DOMINIQUE: With pleasure, Monsieur, — you are too kind! [The Maid has scarcely placed the bowl upon the table when a small flame springs up from its interior] But there was nothing in that bowl a moment ago! That's very queer! [To the Stranger] Aha! tell me, Monsieur, didn't you have it in your pocket all the time? You are a conjurer, a magician. This is great sport! Here's a chap that comes to an inn with ready-made punch in his pocket!

STRANGER: I do not understand a word you are saying, my dear fellow. [Gives money to Maid] Go and get me some cigars from the little shop in the second street from here; turn to the right as you enter the door and get them from the third shelf. I have a favourite box there, and the people of the shop know me. [Exit Maid] Now, Monsieur, to your good health!
(Paul has reseated himself; leans on his elbow, deep in thought)

STRANGER [points to the punch-bowl]: Well, Monsieur, is it because I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance that you will not drink?

DOMINIQUE [conciliatingly]: You see, my poor master is troubled; it is not that he is too proud —

PAUL [starts up]: No! Heaven knows I have nothing to boast of now! [Crosses to table where Dominique and the Stranger sit and sits beside them]

STRANGER: And so you have come to seek your fortune in the great city?

PAUL: Who told you that? .

STRANGER: YOU yourself, Monsieur.

PAUL: In what way?

STRANGER: Just now, when you were speaking to your servant.

PAUL: Well, really, it seems to me —

STRANGER: Pardon me, Monsieur, but — I know all! And as it is my business to keep a kind of bureau of general information, and to seek for customers in all classes of society, I thought it might be to my interest if I offered my services to you.

DOMINIQUE: You're refreshingly frank, at any rate!

STRANGER: Possibly Monsieur purposes to seek some employment under government?

PAUL [roughly]: No!

STRANGER: Or to interest himself in finance, diplomacy, or in railways?

PAUL: HOW do I know what I shall do?

STRANGER: In commerce, perhaps, or in art.

DOMINIQUE: That's it! My master is one of those men that can paint a picture in two hours, as large as that! [Makes gesture]

STRANGER [bows ironically]: Ah, Monsieur is an artist? And he expects to make his fortune! Let us respect his ambition!

PAUL [irritated]: Well, why not? When I think of the wretched daubers that are admired and applauded, the devil is in it if I cannot do as well! Besides, I have had the advantage of much study; and if I use all the skill I possess, I shall certainly win fame and perhaps wealth.

STRANGER: Very good, young man! But I hope you will not neglect the many things that are necessary to do in order to make your way as an artist. Steal some ideas from the old masters; disparage the moderns; exalt petty geniuses and show a sovereign contempt for great ones. That must be your first pose. Then you must paint shopkeepers as military heroes, on splendid chargers, and ladies of easy morals as Venus, engaged in the performance of some virtuous deed! Don't trouble about accurate drawing or colour, — they will say you lack ideas if you do that, so take care! Make a specialty of some particular style — Greek or Gothic, Pompadour or Chinese, immorality or virtue — never mind what, so long as it is the fad. But don't fail to court the dear public most assiduously, even servilely; and don't give them anything that is beyond their comprehension, too costly for their purses, or too large for their walls. Then you will see your works reproduced without end over all Europe! You will become the favourite of your generation. You will be hailed as a master, a glory, almost a religion. The despotism of your mediocrity shall stultify a whole people; it shall extend even to nature itself, because you, O master! shall cause it to be despised, since it will suggest your own daubs!

PAUL [indignant]: Never!

STRANGER: You are right! It is better and safer to get some kind of place first, some fixed appointment. First, I would recommend you to use the utmost exactness, not in your own work, but in criticising that of your fellow-workers. Just a word of disparagement here and there, you know — not a formal denunciation, for the interest of the brotherhood! Then circulate a clever bit of calumny — oh, don't be afraid of that! Show a certain arrogance towards humbler persons, but a becoming modesty before your chiefs; wear a starched cravat, but let your backbone be supple! Keep a cool head and give your conscience plenty of room. Give heed to abuse; promise much but fulfil little; bend your back to the storm, and in very difficult circumstances pretend to be dead! But, above all, try to discover the secret vice of your superior; if he takes snuff, present him with a handsome snuff-box; or if he likes pretty women, marry one!

PAUL: Horror!

STRANGER: AS to gaining an independence — I approve of that ambition. But fortunes are not made any more, Monsieur, except in trade. We have nowadays a system of honourable bankruptcies, and certain secrets regarding false weights and artificial colourings; but really, the quickest way for a young man to advance himself in a good house, is to make love to the wife of a wealthy bourgeois!

PAUL: Silence, villain!

STRANGER [calmly]: To be sure, it would be better to take his daughter, because then he would be compelled to give her to you in marriage. [Paul recoils in horror]

DOMINIQUE: There's some sense in what he says, after all.

STRANGER [still calmly]: Then, no matter what you may be, all obstacles will be removed; everyone will smile upon you; your health will be good; you will dine well; your face will be as rosy as that of a young girl. [His beard suddenly disappears; Paul is amazed] By degrees you will become rich, respected, happy. As you stroll along the boulevards, you will hear the creaking of your varnished shoes, as you twirl your gold-headed cane in your white-gloved hands. [As he speaks he is changed into the representation of such a figure as he describes. Paul utters a cry] You will be feared as well as loved; you can indulge all your caprices; wear a new coat every day, rings on all your fingers, watch-chains, trinkets, and fine linen. [His appearance now is that of a young "swell;" Paul and Dominique approach each other in terror] You will buy a country house, statuary, a city mansion, have friends, race-horses, everything that is most expensive. And in order to pull the wool over the eyes of future generations, you will found a hospital, and grow old gracefully, attended by a throng of servants, surrounded by your family, loaded with honours, with a fat paunch and the guise of an honest man! [His appearance changes to that of a substantial elderly bourgeois, with gold spectacles and a velvet waistcoat] PAUL [hides his face with his hands]: Is this an illusion? I hear a noise in my head like the rolling of cart-wheels! I see leaping flames!

(The punch-bowl, from which flames have been leaping during the dialogue, is now multiplied into several punch-bowls, placed on the various small tables. Tongues of flame dart here and there, like will-o'-the-wisps)

DOMINIQUE [walks around the Stranger in admiration]: What a wonderful man! What an extraordinary experience!

PAUL [resolutely]: No, I will not be tempted! Away! It is weakness even to listen to you. Away with you!

STRANGER: Just as you please! Play the virtuous, my fine fellow, and hug your empty stomach! Every door of fortune will be shut in your face. At first, of course, you will try to keep up appearances, but soon you will slip out at nine o'clock in the evening to get a bottle of milk and a roll of bread, which you will eat as you go along the street. Then you will become familiar with all the makeshifts of poverty — paper collars, inked seams, tight trouser-straps to hold on your old shoes, and a black coat buttoned up to the chin to hide the absence of linen. [He appears in the costume just described] But you will not weaken! You will struggle along. No one will care a rap about you, however. No one will seek you out — who bothers his head over a poor chap? And as a first fall is the forerunner of a second, you will find yourself sinking lower, little by little, my fine fellow! Your misery will increase until it becomes irremediable and constitutional. "Click! clack! get out of the way, stupid!" the coachmen will cry. And from the gutter, in the freezing nights of winter, you will raise your eyes and behold behind lace curtains at the windows the gay world whirling about in the light of the blazing lamps; you will see all that your heart now covets! [The right wall half opens, showing a scene representing a splendid ball-room full of dancers; the scene closes in] Then will begin for you those long wanderings of the poor about Paris, along the quays and the boulevards. More uncertain and fatalistic than a Bedouin in the desert, you will watch your chance to seize upon a lost umbrella, a dropped purse; and at midnight you will sleep side by side with old convicts, on a bench, your feet in the straw and your arms resting on a rope. [The left wall half opens, revealing a miserable lodging-house, filled with tramps, sleeping; the scene closes in] And even your shabby coat will then be gone. [His coat disappears] Instead of a hat you will wear an old cap without a brim. [His hat disappears] No waistcoat, and only a single suspender, and not even shoes and stockings. [Assumes a servile attitude] Shall I call a cab for you, Monsieur?

PAUL [wrings his hands]: Horrible! Horrible!

DOMINIQUE: Not a very inviting prospect, that's sure

PAUL [discouraged, falls on a stool and leans his elbows on the table]: What shall I do?

(At the close of the Stranger's last speech the Maid re-enters with a packet of cigars, which she puts on the table. The Stranger stands near Paul, R.; he takes a backward step, with a gesture of triumph, but at the same moment the Maid-Servant, who stands behind Dominique, facing the Stranger, changes into a Fairy, and extends her arm with an imperative gesture towards the Stranger, who changes into a Gnome. Dominique, astounded, utters a cry. Paul looks up, and he, too, cries out on perceiving the Fairy, who then disappears into the wall, L., while the Gnome vanishes into the wall, R.)

THIRD TABLEAU. SLAVES OF THE GNOMES.

Scene: Apartment in the house of the banker, Monsieur Kloekher; a boudoir, with doors R. and L. and C. During the action of the first scene, footmen and maids cross the stage, carrying jardinières, as final preparations for an evening reception.

SCENE I.

(Alfred de Cisy, Paul)

PAUL: My dear Alfred, have you brought me to Monsieur Kloekher's house on the night that he is giving a ball?

ALFRED: What does that matter?, Do you not feel yourself quite at home here? And then [with emphasis], as the ball has not begun yet, you may find an opportunity to havè a private chat with the illustrious financier!

PAUL: Ah, it is a real service that you have done me, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart, because without you I do not know what would have happened. Wherever I have called during the last month, the doors were closed upon me. Ah! one's friends! And the temptations I have had, the efforts I have made! [Bows his head]

ALFRED: Come, cheer up! You must not give way to these melancholy, romantic and poetic ideas. [Slaps Paul on the shoulder] Good old Paul! he hasn't changed a bit; ready to take fire at sight of a pretty woman, and to be dazzled by all sorts of illusions. I'm thinking of the little adventure in the wine-shop, of which you told me. [Laughs]

PAUL: But when I tell you that I really saw-

ALFRED: Nonsense! you were the dupe of some hallucination, or of some clever trickster. As if one ever saw celestial beings disappear through the walls of a dirty little road-house! It is of no use for you to protest that she was as beautiful as a fairy, and that she was dressed like one. Fairies do not dwell in the Chaussée d'Antin, dear boy! But very soon I am going to present you to one who is called in society Madame Kloekher, — and she is a fairy who is rather kind to me!

PAUL: Ah! [Bows]

ALFRED: Why — yes, — that is the situation! I find it very interesting.

PAUL: And the husband?

ALFRED: Oh, he is an old fellow from Auvergnat. He entertains himself With plenty of others! Besides, he is a miserly old boor.

PAUL: Really! My father told me quite the contrary.

ALFRED: Did your father know him?

PAUL: Very well indeed. And he often spoke to me of his disinterestedness. I never met Monsieur Kloekher because —

ALFRED [quickly]: But if your father knew him well, what need had you of my services? You could have introduced yourself.

PAUL [humbly]: Ah, my friend, when one is poor, he is timid!

ALFRED [aside]: Poor! I did not know that he was poor. That's bad!

SCENE II.

(Enter M. Kloekher)

KLOEKHER: Vicomte, I am glad to see you.

ALFRED: Good evening to the great financier! Permit me to present to you one of my intimate friends, Monsieur Paul de Damvilliers.

KLOEKHER [aside]: His son!

ALFRED: He wants something or other — I don't know exactly what. He wishes to talk to you about himself. He is a good fellow — oh, excellent! And I have another favour to ask. May I be permitted to pay my respects to Madame — that is, if she is disengaged?

KLOEKHER: Certainly. I think you will find her in that room. [Exit Alfred] I knew your father very well, Monsieur, and as I had great esteem for him, the suddenness of his death affected me more than it might have affected those persons who did not know him so well. And have you not been able, up to the present, to discover or to guess the cause of the catastrophe?

PAUL: Alas! no, Monsieur. I have at last even given up trying to discover the cause.

KLOEKHER [sighs deeply]: I think you act wisely. It would be only a loss of time to make further research. [Coolly] And you wish — ?

PAUL: To work, Monsieur! My expectations would be very modest.

KLOEKHER: How old are you, if you please?

PAUL: Twenty-five years old, Monsieur.

KLOEKHER: UM! Rather young! And what do you know of the accounting and banking business?

PAUL: Very little, it is true, but I should learn quickly.

KLOEKHER: Ah, you think so? And what have you done heretofore?

PAUL: I have travelled.

KLOEKHER: Where? And with what purpose?

PAUL: In the north of Africa and as far as China, to inform myself.

KLOEKHER: Or to amuse yourself more freely — come! own up to it! It is a very pretty way to spend one's fortune; you assume the polished air of a serious man, stare at the idlers as they stroll along, bring home long pipes for your friends and Turkish slippers for — the girls! Ah, young men! young men! They are very amusing, my word of honour!

PAUL [irritated]: Monsieur!

KLOEKHER: Say no more! I know all about that kind of study. I'll wager you can't tell me even the name of the principal banking-house of Macao, nor the rate of discount at Calcutta.

PAUL: But there are other things worth knowing!

KLOEKHER: That is possible. But why are you here? What do you wish?

PAUL: I desire a place, Monsieur, any kind of place. I can translate your correspondence, and make out your bills. One man is as good as another, if ' only he has strength and courage. I beg you to consider the situation, difficult as I find it to do so; and I venture, in order to strengthen my request, to remind you that my father was your friend.

KLOEKHER: Ah, your father, Monsieur, was a fine man, and if he had only followed my advice he would not have ended his career so disastrously. Instead of playing the grand seigneur and trying to dazzle beholders with ill-considered liberality, he would have guarded his capital, increased his fortune, made himself useful, in short. [In a tone of affected good fellowship] I have suffered enough from the affection that I bore him without your coming here, you his son, to give me the trouble of refusing you. A place, indeed! Do you think that I have one for you? My clerkships are all filled — I can't help that, can I? I am extremely sorry! [Sits. Paul goes up stage, about to exit C. Kloeher springs up] Oh, no! Wait! Come back!

PAUL [proudly]: Why, may I ask?

KLOEKHER: I wish to do something for you if I can. [Looks intently into Paul's face] If I am any judge of men, I think I can read you. Now, I trust that your intelligence will enable you to understand me; and, in case you refuse what I am about to propose, that you will keep silent regarding it PAUL: Be assured —

KLOEKHER: Until now I have always conducted my affairs on the Bourse in a strictly business-like and open manner; but after to-day — because of circumstances that would take too long to explain now, and which you would not understand — I shall be compelled to manage certain matters in a different way, — that is, through the hands of another person. [Silence]

PAUL [tries to comprehend]: That is to say —

KLOEKHER: That I need a trustworthy man — you understand! I should advise him about everything, of course, but I want a reliable young man, who will represent me absolutely, follow my orders, and act for me.

PAUL: Well?

KLOEKHER: But he must appear to the public as if he were acting only for himself, in his own name.

PAUL: But — the responsibility —

KLOEKHER: There is no chance of loss, I assure you. There will be little to do, and I shall give you ten per cent, of the profits. Now, as the profits in this kind of operations amount to at least a million francs annually, you will have a hundred thousand francs a year. An income of a hundred thousand francs, young man!

PAUL: A hundred thousand francs' income! [Ponders deeply; then aside] Impossible! There must be something mysterious under all this.

KLOEKHER [aside]: He hesitates! Is it from ignorance or from scruples?

PAUL: HOW can you tell beforehand that you will not lose in this scheme?

KLOEKHER: By a series of calculations, — of infallible combinations. I will explain to you —

PAUL: And why, then, do you need my name?

KLOEKHER: Why? [They looked fixedly at each other] I don't care to explain that now. But you understand me perfectly well. The affair is pressing.

PAUL: Enough, Monsieur, enough! I will spare you, through shame, from using the word to be found in the penal code that describes your "infallible combinations." You would borrow my name to use in your nefarious schemes, but as I do not wish to be either your accomplice or your victim, I will leave you!

KLOEKHER [turns his head]: Fool! Get out!

(As Paul is about to leave by door C. enter Monsieur Letourneux; they meet)

SCENE III.

LETOURNEUX [joyfully surprised]: Paul! What a pleasure!

KLOEKHER [aside]: They know each other!

LETOURNEUX: Let me embrace you, my dear boy! As soon as I knew you were in Paris, I came as quickly as possible from Guyenne, where I had gone to study agriculture a bit — and to have a little lark! Well, this is a lucky chance, indeed! [Aside, shakes his fist at Kloekher's back] I've caught you, you old rascal! [Aloud] We actually believed you were dead, do you know that? Isn't that so, Kloekher? Your enemies — because you have enemies, everyone has them — flattered themselves they never should see you again!

PAUL: And who can wish harm to me? I never have injured any one.

LETOURNEUX: What an interesting young man you are! The living image of that good Damvilliers, whose memory we cherish.

PAUL: I do not know how to thank you —

LETOURNEUX: This may certainly be called a lucky day; first I find the son of an old friend; then I intend to relieve some unfortunate persons, — and I shall owe that pleasure to you, Kloekher.

KLOEKHER: What?

LETOURNEUX: Yes, of course; haven't I come here to thank you for the twenty-five thousand francs you gave me for the poor of my parish?

KLOEKHER: Oh, indeed!

LETOURNEUX: That's the way with him; he likes to hide his charities. What a man! [Contemplates Paul] It is a pleasure to meet again, is it not? I hope you will tell me all about your travels. In running about the world you must have seen many strange characters and queer manners; and, as your observations are without doubt those of a serious mind, perceiving the moral of everything, I wish to ask you this: which do you believe to be the more common, trickery or ingratitude, rascality or stupidity?

PAUL: Why, really — these questions require deliberation.

LETOURNEUX: And you, Kloekher, — what is your opinion?

KLOEKHER: I do not understand you.

LETOURNEUX [approaches Kloekher and looks steadily in his face]: Ah, you do not understand. Are you quite sure? We will talk about that again. I wish to say now that I forgot to tell you that I desire to have immediately, in order to open a model farm, the one hundred and seventy-two shares of Mediterranean that I sold you the day before yesterday.

KLOEKHER: Is this one of your little jokes?

LETOURNEUX: Not at all, my dear fellow; no more so than is the little story I am about to relate. [To Paul] Do you know Cochin China?

PAUL: A little.

LETOURNEUX: Very well. Once, in that country — this occurred five years ago — lived two friends, a good Chinaman and a bad Chinaman. Now, the good Chinaman was so innocent that he trusted the bad one —

KLOEKHER [angrily]: I don't care about hearing your story!

LETOURNEUX: It is a true tale, however, and, I — can furnish the proofs! [Silence]

KLOEKHER [astonished]: Proofs?

LETOURNEUX [takes Kloekher by the elbow and speaks in his ear]: They are all in my hands — without exception. Do you understand?

KLOEKHER [aside]: Well, well, we can arrange all that. Keep quiet! [Turns to Paul and breaks into a hearty laugh] Ha! ha! Letourneux, the joke worked all right. He really believed I had no place for him! Ha! ha! Just imagine! I gave him a yarn about some private service that I required of him — a funny idea that I proposed — and he believed it! Ha! ha! He is a good fellow!

PAUL: I don't understand.

KLOEKHER: What I said was only to try you, dear boy! [Laughs; then seriously] I wished to learn, by that means, your real nature. Now I am satisfied with you, young man. Everything is all right. You have so much delicacy — such fine principles!

LETOURNEUX: And that means everything — to have good principles. It is the foundation of a good character. As soon as we know a man has sound principles, we trust him. I will guarantee Paul's principles to you, Monsieur.

KLOEKHER: The son of our best friend, — I should think so indeed! [Enter Madame Kloekher in ball costume] My wife! You must allow me to present you. Permit me! [Approaches Mme. Kloekher and speaks to her aside, quickly] Listen! This is something that affects the fate of both of us! That man there can ruin me, if he chooses. Be gracious to him; be wary — it is absolutely necessary. [Aloud] Madame Kloekher, Monsieur Paul de Damvilliers.

MME. KLOEKHER: Oh, I have known you by name a very long time, Monsieur.

PAUL [aside]: How beautiful she is!

MME. KLOEKHER: My husband and I have so often talked together of your poor father.

LETOURNEUX: Yes, we have all spoken of him.

PAUL [aside]: What eyes!

KLOEKHER: Poor boy! to come back after five years' absence and find his home gone! But I mean that mine shall take the place of it. Do not be troubled! Make use of me as a friend. Treat me with confidence.

PAUL: Oh, thank you, Monsieur! But as I fear I cannot altogether control my emotion, pray allow me to retire. [About to go]

KLOEKHER: NO, no! stay here! You are one of us now. Besides, you have only just arrived. Go on talking to Madame. Come, Letourneux, we'll take a turn through the large drawing-room; I wish to speak to you about one or two important matters. (Exit Kloekher and Letourneux.)

SCENE IV.

MME. KLOEKHER: There is no need of my repeating the intentions of my husband, Monsieur, but you will permit me to say that I share his feelings too much not to desire to be friendly to you, and even — pardon the word! — useful to you, if I can.

PAUL: Oh, Madame, you embarrass me!

MME. KLOEKHER: It would give us great pleasure to be able to make you forget your griefs, or at least to soften the memory of them.

PAUL: YOU have done that already, Madame, by your unexpected kindness.

MME. KLOEKHER: YOU must have suffered cruelly, Monsieur.

PAUL: Alas, yes!

MME. KLOEKHER: Why did you not come to us sooner?

PAUL: Ah, Madame, my excuse, though sincere, is a very bad one, but —

MME. KLOEKHER: But what?

PAUL: Pardon me! I dared not!

MME. KLOEKHER: Foolish boy! But there! you are to make up for all that — I insist upon it. We receive our friends every Thursday at seven o'clock, don't forget! I will introduce you to some of my friends, clever women who will please you. I hope you will often drop into my box at the opera for a little chat. And if you find time hangs heavy on your hands in the afternoons, I shall be glad to offer you a seat in my carriage, and we can take a turn through the Bois and around the lake. It is a dreadful bore to be compelled to go alone every day around that same old lake. But where else can one go? Since you draw, it would be charming if you would bring me your sketches of travel, and I will show you my own drawings, only I must first beg your indulgence before you examine my poor little water-colours. And we shall read together and have nice long talks, and be the best of friends. That is, I hope we shall!

PAUL: Oh, thank you, Madame! You are as kind as an angel. This is the first sympathy I have found since my misfortune came upon me. What have I done to merit such goodness? To whom do I owe it?

MME. KLOEKHER: TO the memory of your father, to the wish of my husband, to your position, and — a little — to yourself! [Extends her hand; Paul seizes and kisses it; she withdraws it quickly] Monsieur!

PAUL: Pardon me! I was too bold, I know. My impulsive gratitude seemed an impertinence to you, I fear.

MME. KLOEKHER: We will not speak of it again. Let us go to the ball-room. Come! PAUL: Before you have pardoned me? For heaven's sake, Madame, don't be vexed with me! Excuse my fault! One must have a little indulgence for a man who had been abandoned by all his former friends, who is weary of deceptions, embittered by unhappiness. MME. KLOEKHER [softly]: Unhappiness! Ah, there is one more bond of sympathy between us! [Paul shows surprise] Yes, alas! I have my own sufferings, and perhaps they are as deep as your own.

PAUL: You! How can that be? MME. KLOEKHER: Ah, Monsieur de Damvilliers, surely a man of your birth does not share the idea of the common people that one must be contented and have nothing more to ask of heaven simply because one is rich! No, no! you do not think that.

PAUL: Explain to me —

MME. KLOEKHER: I will later — my friend!
(The side scenes and back drop enclosing the boudoir slide out of sight, showing the full depth and breadth of the stage, arranged as a ball-room)

MME. KLOEKHER: Your arm, if you please.

PAUL [aside]: Her friend! She called me her friend!

(On each side of the stage are columns reaching to the flies, and ornamented with gilded caryatides; between the columns stand jardinières filled with flowers, leaving a space also for candelabra to stand between the columns. Three arches at the back reveal another apartment, where a buffet stands, covered with glass and silver)

SCENE V.

(Paul, Mme. Kloekher, Onésime Dubois, Macaret, Bouvignard, Alfred de Cisy, Doctor Colombel, Ladies and Gentlemen, Servants, etc. Mme. Kloekher walks up stage leaning on Paul's arm; several guests approach them)

GUESTS [salutes Mme. Kloekher]: What a delightful reception! Charming! Superb, indeed!

A LADY [to another lady]: Who is that young man? He is very pleasing.

SECOND LADY: I should not regard him as very pleasing, if I were the Vicomte Alfred de Cisy!

ONE OF KLOEKHER'S CLERKS [to a fellow-employé]: Just look at her mincing along! What grimaces! But there's no danger that we poor clerks shall be honoured by even a glance.

MME. KLOEKHER [admires the frock of a young lady]: Oh, ravishing! Who is your modiste, my dear? [To another lady] What, are you not dancing? [To an elderly gentleman] Good evening, General! [To Dr. Colombel.] It is very kind of you, Doctor Colombel, to leave your patients to come to us.

COLOMBEL: If my patients could only see our charming hostess, they would soon recover their health at the sight of so much grace and freshness! [A servant speaks to Mme. Kloekher]

MME. KLOEKHER: I will go directly. [Alfred de Cisy, who has been trying for some minutes to get to Mme. Kloekher, now approaches her, just as she reaches R. I. E. She smiles at Paul] I thank you, Monsieur. I will return immediately.
[Exit R.]

ALFRED [aside]: I've done a fine thing in introducing him here! I must act with prudence and shrewdness. [Exit after Mme. Kloekher]

SCENE VI.

ONESIME [approaches Paul and shakes both his hands cordially]: What a pleasure it is to see you! I hope we shall meet often. Where are you staying? I don't intend to lose sight of you.

PAUL: Thank you, old comrade. And how about that great picture? I hope you are still enthusiastic over it, and that you still cherish your high ideals, as well as your dislike of the bourgeois in art.

ONESIME: Oh, of course! But just at present I am painting small pictures, domestic subjects — there is a better market for them. Pray accept my congratulations. I am so glad to see you now on the road to prosperity. [Guests gather around Paul]

MACARET: My dear Monsieur de Damvilliers, I was quite sure I should meet you here, otherwise I should —

COLOMBEL [interrupts]: Thanks to the inconceivable stupidity of my valet, your two visiting-cards were thrown away, and only last night I —

BOUVIGNARD [interrupts]: I don't know how it was, but every day, just as I had made up my mind to go to see you, a crowd of visitors would come and prevent me from leaving the house; one wanted one thing; another demanded something else. I am simply harassed to death, and pulled this way and that by everybody. MACARET: Well, we all look to you for everything, you know, Monsieur. [Aside] He has the ear of the minister! COLOMBEL: You must name what day you will come to dine with me regularly once a week. BOUVIGNARD: And don't fail to tell me, my dear fellow, in what way I can be useful to you. [Guests clap Paul heartily on the shoulders] PAUL: Ah, my friends, you quite overcome me! [Aside] How kind-hearted they are, and how unjustly mankind has been calumniated.

SCENE VII.

(Enter Letourneux; crosses to Onésime, who stands near Paul)

LETOURNEUX: I am not pleased with you, Onésime.

ONESIME: Indeed! And why?

LETOURNEUX [hesitates]: Well — between intimate friends one need not mince matters. Every one here, except Paul, knows of your approaching marriage. It was I that arranged the matter for you, and presented you to an excellent family, pious, highly esteemed and wealthy; and here you run the risk of raising a scandal by allowing yourself to be seen in full daylight, with a decidedly shady young person on your arm!

ONESIME: I?

LETOURNEUX: Yes, you! I saw you myself, although you assured me that you had done with the young woman.

ONESIME: Wait a moment, Monsieur Letourneux. When you saw me with that little girl, I was making arrangements to send her away on a journey.

COLOMBEL: Oh, tell us about it! I like a good spicy story! [The men surround Onésime and Letourneux]

ONESIME: Well, you see, I had a letter sent to her from Marseilles — which is her home — urging her to go there immediately to attend to some important business. She has gone, and that gives me time to be married, besides making me quite easy in my mind, because Clémence has very little money, and in order to return here — [All laugh, with expressions of approval]

LETOURNEUX: Good! Now that's what I call a highly moral action, and at the same time very clever.

PAUL: What! Is this Clémence your old flame, the girl you took from her family when she was very young, — the one who, as you told me once, worked for you, after a fashion?

ONESIME: Yes, it is she. But — other times, other women! [To Letourneux] Where did you see me with her?

LETOURNEUX: In the Luxembourg, as I was passing through it on my way to help a very interesting family: three sons out of work, and their father and mother almost in the last stage of starvation. You ought to do something for them, Doctor.

COLOMBEL: Really? I ought to go and visit them perhaps?

LETOURNEUX: YOU are rich enough to allow yourself such a luxury, surely.

COLOMBEL: And you, the millionaire — what are you doing for them?

LETOURNEUX: I? Why, I do a few things. I console them and moralise to them — no more than that — and wherever I go I try to interest people in them, even Monsieur Macaret. [Turns to Macaret] You, Monsieur, are one of our great captains of industry, you might employ the sons; three more workmen would not matter to you.

MACARET: Impossible! I have no work to give them. You do not expect me to ruin myself, I suppose. [Colombel smiles, Letourneux joins his hands with a sanctimonious expression; Paul makes a gesture of indignation]

BOUVIGNARD [laughs bitterly]: Ha! ha! He is quite right. All the talk, all the assistance, and all the Utopian ideas in the world, do no good. The social machinery runs itself, and those that fall under the wheels — all the worse for them! We cannot help it, so let us resign ourselves. The only really serious thing in the world, the only thing that appeals to the higher intelligence, is the study of the fine arts.

ONESIME: YOU are right, Monsieur Bouvignard.

BOUVIGNARD: AS for me, my favourite diversion is the study of faience.

COLOMBEL: A charming taste! And the ladies —

BOUVIGNARD: Oh! we understand one another! My special fad is for old Nevers; and in order to obtain an authentic specimen of it I spare neither time, pains, nor money.

ONESIME [aside]: He would do much better if he would set aside a dot for his daughter!

BOUVIGNARD: Ah, yes, I economise; I deny myself; I bleed myself! And the anxieties I have! Just think! a slight awkwardness might reduce my whole collection to a thousand pieces. And it is unique, I assure you. It represents my whole fortune, and in order that it may remain intact, I have left it in my will to my native city.

PAUL [aside, stands a little apart]: What a sad sort of world is this!

SCENE VIII.

(Enter Kloekher)

KLOEKHER [to Letourneux]: Will you come along? Come, you serious ones! the green table is waiting for you. Who wishes to play whist? [All move up stage and exit R. and L., leaving Paul alone. As soon as the stage is clear of Guests, the King of the Gnomes appears between two of the caryatides; he is dressed like a Bourgeois, as in the wine-shop in Tableau II. With meaning gestures, he points out to Paul the beauty of the surroundings and the splendour of the ball. Mme. Kloekher passes slowly across the stage from R. to L., under the arches at the rear. The Gnome points at her and claps his hands together silently, with the gesture of one applauding; then slowly goes up stage. Mme. Kloekher disappears] PAUL [follows Gnome a few steps up stage]: Why, that is the mysterious being of the wine-shop I [Stares at him. Queen of the Fairies, in full fairy costume, glides upon the stage from L., and fixes her eyes upon the Gnome] And there is the other! [Queen and King vanish] Am I mad? My former illusion has returned; it is very strange. No doubt it is the result of — of trouble, and — and the enchantment that lovely woman has thrown around me. Ah, what eyes! What a smile! Is she only playing with me? Just now I felt her hand tremble upon my arm; her glance seemed to caress me; I could see that her heart throbbed! She — she loves me! [The lights in the candelabra near him suddenly go out] What is that? Is it midnight? Oh, no, nothing of the sort. [Paces to and fro] And it is I whom she distinguishes among all these men, illustrious, rich, and handsome! I am stronger than all of them; I dominate them; I am almost the king of the world, when only yesterday I was lost, struggling against fate. Ah, what happiness! How sweet these flowers are! [Bends over a jardiniere; the flowers fade and droop] What! Dead? [Two more candelabra are suddenly extinguished] The darkness increases! [Instead of the tinkle of the bell that has been audible without, marking the measure of a quadrille, a sound like a passing-bell is heard] . That sound — a funeral knell! I am alarmed! [Peers into the shadows and looks off up stage] But the lamps are burning and the dance is going on. That was only the bell that marks the quadrille. What is the matter with me? Ah, she is coming back! Yes, there she is. I must not appear to be different from any other guest at the ball; I must affect to listen indifferently to her charming voice murmuring in my ear. Everything belonging to her seems to me to radiate happiness; it is as if her spirit floated near me. Where is she? I long to see her again — to speak to her! [Paces to and fro]

SCENE IX.

(Enter Mme. Kloekher and Alfred, R.; she leans on his arm)

PAUL [aside]: Still with her! [Observes them]

MME. KLOEKHER: IS that a threat, then?

ALFRED: Just as you choose to understand it, my dear.

MME. KLOEKHER [disdainfully]: Do it, then! Do it!

ALFRED: Very well, since that is your decision. All is over between us. But — suppose I blow my brains out here — at your ball?

MME. KLOEKHER [laughs loudly]: OH! ha! ha! ha! That would be too absurd!

ALFRED [aside, puts on his hat]: Indeed! Well, we'll try another way! [Exit. Dance music stops; attendants begin to serve supper upon small round tables back of the arches C.]

SCENE X.

PAUL: So — that man loves you!

MME. KLOEKHER: He? Never!

PAUL: But —

MME. KLOEKHER: What I Reproaches already?

PAUL: Oh, I was wrong, — I know it. Pardon me! It is not my fault if —

MME. KLOEKHER: Speak lower. Some one may hear you.

PAUL [looks up stage]: No, until supper is over no one will come in here. Listen to me, Madame! In heaven's name, stay here with me!

MME. KLOEKHER: Well, I am here. What do you wish?

PAUL: I cannot tell you now; my head is in a whirl. I am so happy only to be able to look at you, face to face. Just now, when we were with the others and every one was pressing near you, I was delighted to observe the glances of admiration and homage that were cast upon you, and to listen to the murmurs of approval and envy. But soon it began to displease me — I hated it! Yes, because you gave back your smiles, your sweet words, which seem almost a part of yourself, of your very heart. These surroundings, the gilding on the walls, the silver ornaments, the servants, the music, even your diamonds, seem only so many things to disguise you the more, to hold you farther from me, to separate your heart from mine!

MME. KLOEKHER: What an impetuous boy you are! But you must know only too well — [Silence]

PAUL: What? Speak! speak!

MME. KLOEKHER: That — that one cannot help liking you!

PAUL [approaches her and takes her hand]: Is that true? Ah, speak the dear word I long to hear! I am not accustomed to happiness, Madame, and how do you think I can believe that if I do not hear the sweet assurance from your own lips? But no, — do not say it! If you really love me — which is the same as to say that heaven itself is about to open for me — make me only one little sign, give me one smile!

(Mme. Kloekher looks at Paul smilingly and makes a gentle inclination of her head. Paul seizes her hand, kisses it, and sinks on one knee before her)

MME. KLOEKHER: Take care! Some one will see us! [Aside] What fire! What passion! [Paul rises]

PAUL: Oh, this is torture! You do not realise that I love you to madness! I would destroy everything that keeps us from each other. What would it cost you to grant me, wherever you choose, one hour, where I might carry out my delusion and imagine you and myself the only beings in the world? Would it be too much for you to grant me this — tell me? MME. KLOEKHER: Some one comes! Retire for a moment. [Paul disappears R. between two caryatides]

SCENE XI.

(Enter Letourneux hastily)

LETOURNEUX: Well, Madame, your husband has given me a fine specimen of friendship!

MME. KLOEKHER: What is the matter with him?

LETOURNEUX: I am indignant!

MME. KLOEKHER: There! there! Calm yourself, I beg.

LETOURNEUX: But I shall be avenged! Oh, yes!

MME. KLOEKHER: What has he done to you?

LETOURNEUX: YOU ask me that? She asks me that! Ha! Well, Madame, we had agreed — your charming husband and I — upon a transaction regarding two hundred shares of Hanover, at the latest price quoted, the profit of which he was to give me and I was to pocket it. Is that clear? Now, when I bring him the papers of agreement and ask him to settle, he reluctantly hands over only half of what he ought to give me! But he cannot play that sort of trick on me. Where is Paul? I intend to tell him everything.

MME. KLOEKHER: Good heavens! what?

LETOURNEUX: I shall tell him what you know as well as I, Madame. I mean the fact that your husband has robbed him of his inheritance. And a lawsuit will make the affair talked of over all Europe.

MME. KLOEKHER: And you count upon Paul — as if it were possible!

LETOURNEUX: And why not, pray?

MME. KLOEKHER: YOU are too curious, my dear sir! However, to save you trouble, I will tell you that Paul is only a simple youth, a mere child, and that — he is in love with me!

LETOURNEUX: A fine reason!

MME. KLOEKHER: Excellent, I assure you. It is our family, it is I whom he will believe, and not you, important man though you are. Go elsewhere to find aid in your turpitude and your revenge. As to Paul, I repeat, he belongs to me. He is my thing, my slave, and at a sign from me he would gladly throw himself into a pit!

LETOURNEUX: We shall see, Madame, we shall see!
[Exit C.]

SCENE XII.

PAUL [re-enters slowly from behind the caryatid]: You are right, Madame; I am a mere child, your thing and your slave!

MME. KLOEKHER: Heavens! Do not believe —

PAUL: I have heard all! I was behind that statue, where I hid in order to listen to the confidences of perhaps another lover. Chance has punished me for my jealousy in cruelly undeceiving me.

MME. KLOEKHER: Oh, Paul, I swear to you —

PAUL: No vows, I beg of you! Fear nothing! Never shall I injure by the scandal of a lawsuit, the woman, whatever she may be, whom I have — honoured with my love! So calm yourself and permit me to retire.

MME. KLOEKHER: But you have not understood — I am not to blame — it is an odious plot — I will explain to you! Paul, I entreat you! Paul, I love you!

(Paul is about to go, L. with bent head and heavy step. At the door he pauses. Enter Letourneux hastily; he approaches Paul)

SCENE XIII.

(During the following dialogue the other guests enter in small groups, and listen to the conversation)

LETOURNEUX: At last I have found you again. Listen to me! [Paul stands motionless, lost in thought] Paul! [Taps Paul on the shoulder] My friend! Paul, my dear boy!

PAUL [turns his head slowly]: What do you wish?

LETOURNEUX [raises his voice]: I wish to inform you, as well as everyone present — in your own interest as well as for the sake of public morality, in order to bring about at the same time a reparation and a just punishment — I wish, I say, to reveal to you an infamous plot of which you are the victim. I possess authentic proofs — written documents! You have been shamefully cheated by that man — Kloekher, the banker! [Sensation; murmurs of surprise and indignation]

PAUL [tears off his white glove]: Monsieur, you are an impudent liar!

LETOURNEUX: I!

PAUL: Yes, you, villain! and as an emphasis to what I have said, I insult you to your face! [Throws his glove in Letourneux' face]

LETOURNEUX: Ah!

PAUL [bows]: I am at your service, Monsieur!

GUESTS: Separate them! They will fight!

LETOURNEUX: A duel! A man of my character is not ruled by such means. True strength lies rather in enduring physical injury and in seeking revenge by a legal process. I have plenty of civil courage!
[Exit proudly.]

PAUL [in suppressed rage]: Infamous rascal!

KLOEKHER [tries to take Paul's hand]: Ah, my dear fellow, how wisely you have acted! You have shown yourself a true friend. My gratitude —

PAUL: DO not speak to me again, Monsieur! [Exit.]

KLOEKHER: What is the matter with him?

GUESTS: What a queer fellow! Did you see him?

GUESTS: Such a scandal to happen at a ball! Dear! dear! one never knows what will happen!

(Guests depart. After they have gone and the stage is clear, the lights burn brighter, with pink, green, and blue tints. The flowers in the jardinières revive and bloom anew. The caryatides R. and L. move and express pleasure in gestures. They are the Fairies, who rejoice at the evidence of Paul's virtue)

FOURTH TABLEAU. PAUL THE DELIVERER.

Scene: A miserably furnished apartment. Small windows R. and L. At the back, C. a chimney with a dying charcoal fire. A door L. of chimney. On the mantelpiece is a box containing pistols. Near L. I. E. is a rough table and two cane-seated chairs. Near R. I. E. a pair of varnished boots on a boot-tree. Close beside these is a bed, and at L. I. E. there is a small closet. Day is breaking; a dim light comes through the curtainless windows.

SCENE I.

(Enter Dominique; he is dressed in shirt and trousers, without a waistcoat, and has a Madras handkerchief bound around his head. Approaches the fireplace; his teeth chatter)

OMINIQUE: Heavens! how cold it is! When Monsieur Paul returns he will be half frozen. [Laughs ironically] Ah, Monsieur! Well, and how about me? Am I not frozen? Don't I suffer? What kind of life is this miserable existence? Let him do as he pleases, if it amuses him, but as for me — a man born to shine in the ante-chambers of ambassadors, at the very least — this sort of life is a humiliation. [Searches about the room] And not a stick of wood in this infernal garret, full of draughts! [Still searching] No, not one! It is four months now that I have been cooped up here, trying to pass away the time while he was making his applications. First, he was after a place in the diplomatic service; then a scientific mission; next an inspectorship of I don't know what; and this evening he said he would surely return from the house of the banker Kloeckher with full hands and his future provided for. I begin to have some doubts of our future myself! I have wished to separate mine from his and to present him squarely with my bill. Monsieur is a fine young man, that's certain. But [taps his forehead] a little bit touched! The devil! my hands are numb with cold! [Looks at pistols on the mantelpiece] There is a box that tempts me very much. But no! our means do not allow us to indulge in a mahogany case! No, indeed! [In backing away from the chimney he stumbles upon a straw mat] Stupid! what am I about? Wait a bit! [Picks up the mat, throws it on the fire and watches it burn] To be reduced to this! But our bad luck cannot last much longer — it is too wretched. However, if it doesn't change within a week I shall say goodbye! [The fire flames up; he rubs his hands over it] Ah, that feels good! That was decidedly a bright idea of mine. What's the use of bothering oneself to keep things? Pity we haven't a good substantial sofa to toast our toes by while poking the fire. What a miserable little chair that is! Since my master is out all day running about, I don't see why I shouldn't — [Throws a small chair into the fire] There you go! Any one would say that I am a simpleton to devote myself to him. There never was such a valet as I. Great heavens! how cold it is! That chair burns like a match. And, after all his promises, what do I get? How am I benefited? He will only laugh at me in the end, and while I stay here, dancing attendance on him and freezing to death, he is playing the gallant in the drawing-rooms of charming ladies! Suppose I break up the table to keep the fire going? No, it would soon be gone. [Sees boots] Ah, the boots! [Pulls them off the boot-tree] Why not? [Throws them in the fire] Burn, then! Perhaps he'll be angry. Ah, well, so much the worse!

SCENE II.

(Enter Paul, in evening dress, without an overcoat; his clothes are damp; there is a little snow on his shoulders; he carries his hands tucked under his arms)

PAUL: What are you doing there? I did not tell you to wait for me. Go to bed!

DOMINIQUE: But —

PAUL [brutally]: Get along with you! Get out! Leave me!

DOMINIQUE: Oho! He is very proud and touchy. a Something good must have happened at last.

[Exit.

SCENE III.

PAUL [remains for some time with his head resting in his hands, then sighs deeply]: Ah! [Throws his hat on the Bed] What a night! [Looks slowly around the room] And what a place! [Glances at window] Why, day is breaking, and it is still snowing. But nothing will fall from heaven to blot out all my misery. [Weeps] Ah, how weary I am! [Stands in front of the fireplace, his arm leaning on the mantel-piece] They are all cowards, egoists, cruel, ingrates and hypocrites! And with what smiles, sweet words, affectionate embraces, and even, O sacrilege! professions of love! And I hoped to find in this arid desert something to quench the thirst of my heart! In how many countries have I dreamed my dreams? And everywhere, among masks and brazen vice, have I met the same ignominious deceptions. And now they seek me out; they attack me. Enough, enough! I'll have no more of it. Why should I continue to live, since I cannot change the world? If I could only find one single soul that would really love me! [Walks about] Come! no more weakness! I will leave all at once, before my resolution weakens, before I feel the first blush of shame, in all the integrity of my pride and honour, like the Ancient Oriental kings, who killed themselves in the midst of their riches. It needs only strong resolution for a moment. That should not be difficult. Everything urges me to it. [Sees the box of pistols] Ah, even chance itself! [Takes pistols from box and examines them] The man that sold them to me laid particular stress upon the length of their range. But at the distance I shall require, they need not be anything out of the common! That would be quite superfluous. Let us try. [Snaps the hammer] Good! Where is my powder? [Takes box of powder and pours a little into his hand, then puts it into the pistol, throwing the rest into the fire, which springs up into bright flames. He continues to load the pistol] Now the bullet, next the cap; and now I have only to give myself a sign, to make a single gesture, to be free! [Six o'clock strikes from a neighbouring clock] Six o'clock! At the first stroke of the half hour, all will be over! [Looks around the room and sees a box full of letters on the table] Oh — those! I had forgotten them. Nothing of myself or of my past must remain. All letters must be burned. [Throws letters into the fire and sinks into a chair] Ah, the flames warm me again. I do not suffer now. No, quite the contrary. To think that perhaps those ashes will still be warm after my body is cold in death! Then, — everything belonging to me will be scattered, dispersed. My life will have passed, like the fading figures that trace themselves in the coals. [Stares at the fire] It seems to me I can see among the embers purple shores along a lake of fire. Beyond that are shadowy buildings, the spires of a cathedral, the masts of vessels. They fade — then reappear, like my former dreams. I fancy I hear the wind among the sails, and the walls of my cabin creaking in the night watches! Ha! that is strange! There is one letter that refuses to burn. It even grows whiter in the flames. What is that? [Picks the letter from the fire] It is not even hot! What is the meaning of this? [The fireplace, little by little, is enlarged, growing higher and wider, and back of the flames appear the scenes of which Paul has just spoken. At last a castle of strange architecture is visible, having small windows, like those of a fort] Is that a fortress? I never saw it before. [The letter glows with a soft radiance. Paul reads] "Behold the castle wherein the wicked Gnomes hold captive the hearts of men. We depend upon thee to deliver them. Thy reward shall be a love surpassing all thy dreams. Thou wilt meet often the one whom we have chosen for thee; try to recognise her, else thou wilt be irrevocably lost. Art thou ready? The Queen of the Fairies." I? But how am I to know?

(Chorus of Fairies encourages him)

PAUL [remains for some moments a prey to terrible anxiety; then with a gesture of heroic resolution]: I accept! I will go! [Two knocks on the door are heard]

VOICE [without]: Open, Dominique! [Knock]

PAUL: Who is there? [Opens the door]

SCENE IV.

(Enter Jeanne, carrying a large basket on each arm)

JEANNE [surprised]: Monsieur Paul!

PAUL: Jeannette! What does this mean? [Jeanne puts her baskets on the table with an air of fatigue] What has brought you to Paris?
[Silence]

JEANNE: TO — to sell milk, Monsieur!

PAUL: Milk! With those two baskets — and at my rooms? [Jeanne hangs her head] You are hiding something from me, Jeannette.

JEANNE [shields with her arm the basket near her]: No, Monsieur, I declare to you —

PAUL [observes her gesture]: There is something inside of that basket. [Lifts the lid] My silk handkerchiefs, my shirts — all my linen!
[Looks sternly at Jeanne]

JEANNE [quickly]: Oh, don't, be angry! If they are not well done, I will do them all over again. [Silence. Jeanne hangs her head]

PAUL: SO! — it is Mademoiselle Jeannette who is my laundress! Why did you not let me know of this before?

JEANNE [embarrassed]: Because — because —

PAUL: Well? [Silence; aside] How is this? Dominique told me —
[Aloud] Let me see the other basket.

JEANNE [seizes his hand]: Take care! You will break them!

PAUL: Break what?

JEANNE: The eggs.

PAUL [looks into second basket]: Fruit, rolls, — yes, even a little pot of cream! And it was for me? [Looks at Jeanne; she nods] Well, to tell the truth, my child, just at present I cannot pay you for these things. [Silence] Ah, I see! The friendship of my servant has reduced me to receiving charity from a peasant! [Roughly] Take away all that stuff, Jeanne! I won't have it! Go away!

JEANNE [weeps]: If I had known you would be angry, I should not have done it!

PAUL [aside]: She weeps! And in my idiotic pride and vanity I have wounded her. Where else have I ever found such devotion? [Aloud] No, remain here! Pardon me. I have not been well for some time. Tell me — how long have you been coming here like this every day?

JEANNE: Almost a month.

PAUL: And you never boasted of it! You did it simply, kindly, in the candour and naïveté of your sweet soul! [Takes her hands] I can see that your little heart is throbbing fast! You have lovely eyes, my Jeannette. [Aside] I never looked at them before, blind fool that I was! [Aloud] And these poor little hands! Do you know, if they were covered with fine gloves, more than one fashionable lady would envy you their grace and smallness?

JEANNE: YOU are very kind, Monsieur!

PAUL [moves away from Jeanne; regards her attentively; aside]: I must find something to give her. She is charming! Aside from her simple garb, there is something about her — I know not what — of distinction, purity, refinement, that I never have seen equalled. And the modest grace of her attitude, the brightness of her glance! Can she be — why not? [Aloud] Jeannette!

JEANNE: Monsieur!

PAUL: YOU must be weary of your present lot. Have you never had thoughts and ideas that surprised yourself? Have you never heard in your inmost soul something that whispered to you of a higher destiny? Have you not had a desire to flee — somewhere — far away?

JEANNE: I! Run away! But where? I do not know the way.

PAUL [makes gesture of annoyance; then aside]: It is my language that she does not understand. [Aloud] Tell me, when you are all by yourself in the fields, what do you think about?

JEANNE: Why — nothing, Monsieur!

PAUL: Try to remember.

JEANNE: Ah, if — ! Well, I think of the cows, — most of all of the black one, which follows me like a dog. Then I notice how the grass is growing, and count how many apples there are on the trees.

PAUL: But — at night? Of what do you dream?

JEANNE [laughs]: Dream! I don't dream. I sleep too sound.

PAUL: What books have you read?

JEANNE: I don't know how to read — when have I had time to learn? — and I cannot write either. And oh! how sorry I am that I cannot! It would be so useful to me in keeping the accounts.

PAUL [aside]: That is enough! This is the end of my fancy! She does not lack in grace and sweetness, but it would take a long time to cultivate her mind. I must give it up. [Laughs bitterly] I, who for a moment believed that — [Stands lost in thought]

JEANNE: What is the matter, Monsieur Paul? Why do you not speak to me? Just now your voice was as sweet as music. I did not understand what you said, but it pleased me.

PAUL [brusquely]: Well, well! [Calls] Dominique! I thank you, Jeannette! Later — as soon as I am able — I will show you how grateful I am for your kindness; and when you marry —

SCENE V.

(Enter Dominique)

DOMINIQUE: What do you wish, Monsieur?

PAUL [indicates Jeanne]: Say good-bye to her, for we are going away.

DOMINIQUE: TO travel again?

PAUL: Yes, we are going on a long journey.

DOMINIQUE: But, Monsieur, you seem to forget the state of our wardrobe.

PAUL [looks about anxiously]: True! [Sees a superb fur coat lying on the bed] But look! Heaven has had a hand in this! This is a warning, a command!

DOMINIQUE: What splendid fur! [Takes coat on his arm and examines it] You never told me you had such a coat. With that on your back you can laugh at the thermometer! If I only had one like it! [About to lay the coat on the bed, he perceives a second similar garment] What, another!

PAUL: It is for you! Take it!

DOMINIQUE [puts on the coat quickly, turns up the collar, and crosses his hands inside the sleeves]: I shall be warm enough in this. Ha! I look like a Russian ambassador!

PAUL [taps his foot impatiently]: Come, come, hasten! I wish to start at once, to follow my purpose until it is attained! Come!

DOMINIQUE: Oh, it won't take me long to get our things together. Just watch me! Good-bye, little sister!

JEANNE [stifling a sob]: Good-bye!

PAUL [with hat on his head and fur coat over his arm, stops at the door on hearing Jeanne sob]: Ah, she has more feeling and sensibility than I thought. Well, — of course, it is on her brother's account! [Exit Paul and Dominique.]

SCENE VI.

JEANNE: They have gone, and this time I don't know where. Very far away, no doubt! I thought for a moment that he was going to offer to take me with them. But no, since he leaves me like this, he must look down upon me. It is because I am not a fine lady, brought up in the city; because I have no trailing gowns, no laces, nor cashmeres, nor jewels, because I am a stupid little peasant, and don't know how to do anything to please him! I cannot dance nor play on the piano; I have no manners and no pretty clothes! Oh, if I only had all those things! [Goes to fireplace and leans on the mantel-piece] If I had them perhaps he would love me! How shall I manage to get a pretty gown — only a pretty gown? [King of the Gnomes glides from the half open closet]

KING: Good! She begins by making a most stupid wish! All the better! It is impossible to stop it, but we can arrange matters so that we never shall be recognised! Begin!

(The scenery changes slowly in semi-darkness)

FIFTH TABLEAU. THE ISLAND OF THE TOILETTE.

Scene: At the back of the stage are small hillocks, covered with strips of different-coloured cloths. At R. beside a stream composed of milk of almonds, grow, like reeds, slender sticks of cosmetic. A little in front of these a fountain of eau de Cologne springs out of a rock made of toilette rouge. In the centre of the stage is a grass-plot, with spangles on the blades of grass; here and there are bushes made of brushes, and stones are represented by cakes of soap of various colours. A tree resembling a tamarisk stands L. with clusters of marabout feathers growing on it; another tree, shaped like a palm, bears open fans. There is a small patch of razors; a little in the rear is a tree full of mirrors, another of wigs, a third of powder-puffs, a fourth of combs, and costumes of different styles hang from the branches of larger trees. Bright-coloured flies dart about, and fly in the faces of the women.

Jeanne [discovered in the same attitude as when the last scene changed; her head is bent, and one arm rests upon the rock of rouge. After a moment's silence she lifts her head and looks around with amazement]: Why, how pretty it is here! And how sweet the air is! It smells exactly like eau de Cologne! Where does it come from? From this fountain, I do believe! How nice it would be to wash my hands in it! [Plunges in her arms up to the elbows] One isn't afraid of spilling this. I will put some on my head, too. [Sprinkles some drops on the top of her head; they change to diamonds without her perceiving it. She washes her face, and as she leans over the fountain, a branch from the comb-bearing tree behind her bends down and gently arranges her hair in a graceful knot. She rises, surprised, with her hand on her right cheek] Who touched my head? Go on, go on! I liked that very much! [The powder-puff tree lowers one of its branches and lightly powders her face] Oh, how soft and nice that feels! [Turns her left cheek to the puff] Again! Oh, but that tickles! That's enough; it makes me want to laugh! Ha! ha! ha! [The branch returns to its position] Is that done? I thank you very much! [Jumps up] What! No one here? [Looks at all the strange objects about her and walks to and fro] What a queer country this is! Combs growing on trees! And there's a tree with wigs on it! And just see all those clothes and things on the ground, lying there like dead leaves! Oh, what pretty grass, with great dew-drops! No, they are silver spangles! [Sees herself in one of the mirrors hanging on the tree] And there — that is I! With diamonds in my hair! I shine like the sun! [Her gown suddenly loosens itself and flies away in the air] The wind! Ah! [Cries out in terror at seeing herself in chemise and petticoat; crosses her hands on her breast] What is going to happen? I am ashamed! [A band of drapery wound around one of the hillocks in the rear, now undulates towards Jeanne and drapes itself around her in a sort of tunic] Well, well! I am all dressed now! [A tree full of bracelets catches her by the arm] What am I caught upon? What holds me? Ah! let me — [Draws a bracelet off the tree and clasps it on her arm] How well that looks against my skin! [A tree like a mountain ash drops a coral necklace around her neck] What is this? A necklace! Oh, how pretty I look! How happy I am! I love myself! I should like to kiss myself! But of course this is only a dream. Such things cannot possibly happen. I shall wake up in a minute. But where am I really? What country is this?

CHORUS [without]:

Tis the country of toilettes,
'Tis the land of gay coquettes;
Little packets,
Little rackets!

With us, to charm is all our duty;
E'en the ugly seek for beauty!

JEANNE: I do not comprehend!

CHORUS [without]:

Tis the land of La Toilette! We triumph, and we never fret! All is sweet; All is neat; Our perfumes are of violet; Our sighings do not mean regret!

(Noise of tambourines, flutes, and Chinese music heard)

JEANNE [goes up stage and looks off]: What a crowd of people!

CHORUS [without]:

Silence! Silence! Silence! Make way for the King's advance) Like the stars, to which we sing, Comes Couturin, our Fashion's king; The only being here who can Rule th' inconstant taste of man!

JEANNE: Oh, they are coming this way! I am afraid! Where shall I hide? [Runs behind the tree of mirrors]

SCENE II.

(Enter King Couturin, Queen Couturine, Graisse-d'Ours, Prime Minister, and Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court. The King and Queen are dressed in the latest fashion, greatly exaggerated. Graisse-d'Ours wears a round jacket and a large apron; he has a bristling beard and an uncouth aspect. All the personages of the Court wear emblems of their various Occupations. The King, carried by four men, is seated on a sort of portable throne, which has plumes waving over his head and mirrors set in the back. The Queen occupies a lower seat, R. The Prime Minister has a similar seat, L. The porters gently lower the King's throne to the ground, C.)

KING C.: That will do! Hold! Now, since we are installed in the place three times chosen for royal conclaves, with our dear spouse, the lovely Couturine —

QUEEN C. [looks fondly at King; takes his hand and kisses it]:
Always my tender Couturin!

KING C.: And having at our left our Prime Minister, the indispensable Graisse-d'Ours —

GRAISSE-D'OURS: Your Majesty is too kind!

KING C.: And near us also the high dignitaries of our crown: the arch-tailor, the arch-bootmaker, the Prince of Coldcream, the Duke of Caoutchouc, and others —

DIGNITARIES [bow low]: At your service, O sovereign!

KING C.: Also the ladies of our Court, of which they are the brightest ornament —

LADIES: Ah, delicious!

KING C.: And having behind us the imbecile people —

CROWD: Long live the King!

KING C.: It is necessary, according to custom, that we now proceed to establish the modes for the season.

ALL [gesticulate excitedly]: Yes, yes! Tell us! What colours? How many yards?

KING C.: One moment! First, I must recall to you the great principles.

GRAISSE-D'OURS: Recall them!

KING C. [to the ladies]: It is a well-recognised truth, my doves, that naturally you are all hideous!

LADIES [scandalised]: Ah! Oh! How abominable!

KING C.: Certainly, — very ugly indeed! You do not doubt for a moment, I hope, the superiority of the artificial over the real. It is art alone, my goddesses, that furnishes you with all your charms. Oh, fear nothing! I am discreet! But you know it is the robe we fall in love with, not the woman; the shoe, not the foot; and if you do not possess silks, laces, velvets, patchouli, kid gloves, sparkling jewels, and colours wherewith to paint your faces, even the wild savages would have nothing to do with you, since they like their women tattooed!

[Sits]

LADIES: That is a little hard! Rather too severe!

GRAISSE-D'OURS [rises]: Besides, dress is a sign of chastity, forms a part of virtue, and may even be considered virtue itself. [Sits]

KING C. [rises]: Then, the more extraordinary a costume is — that is, the more unnatural, inconvenient, and ugly — the more striking and desirable it is! [Sits]

GRAISSE-D'OURS [rises]: And distingué besides. [Sits]

ALL: Ah, distingué! That is the principal thing!

KING C.: Tis well! Now to work!

ALL: We will look! We will search! [Silence; then a sound of broken glass]

KING C.: What is that? [Looks off R.; makes a sign to an Official to seek the cause of the noise. Exit Official] Ah, the mirror-tree is broken! The mirrors were too ripe, no doubt, and some marauder has shaken the tree.

OFFICIAL [re-enters]: We found behind the mirror-tree a strange monster.

KING C.: A monster?

OFFICIAL: Yes, your Majesty, a being green and unfashionable in appearance.

KING C.: Bring her hither! ALL: What courage!

SCENE III.

(Enter Jeanne, wearing green empire gloves reaching to her elbows and lying in deep wrinkles on her arms; her hair is dressed very high; she wears a yellow shawl over her tunic and carries a reticule in her hand. As she enters King Couturin utters a sharp cry and staggers back; Graisse-d'Ours supports him. The Queen, with a gesture of terror, falls upon her throne; the Ladies snatch fans off the fan-tree and hide their faces behind them. General excitement)

MEN:

Back!

Go away!

Hide yourself!

WOMEN:

What a horror!

Such boldness!

How old-fashioned!

KING C. [extends his sceptre — a stick covered with curl-papers — to command silence]: Keep cool your heads, excited by too much curling! Approach, young girl — because you have the appearance of being one, although you possess no graces. Explain yourself, and justify, if you can, the wearing of that extraordinary costume.

JEANNE: I found it lying there on the ground, by chance, and picked it up — I thought I must; and in rising I broke the mirrors —

KING C.: Never mind them — that is not the important question. [Rapidly] But to have disobeyed the laws of our empire, to have shown disregard of the cult of the shoes, the delicacy of the lingerie, and the elegance of the coiffure; to muffle yourself up in such frightful old clothes, which carry one back to the days of Corinne and the fashion of egg cameos, — all this deserves torture!

ALL: Yes! Yes! the most terrible!

KING C.: You should be condemned to wear shoes too tight, combs too hard, unlaceable corsets!

ALL: Bravo!

KING C.: To carry a work-bag!

JEANNE: Mercy!

KING C.: And to wear a turban, with bunches of feathers on it!

JEANNE: But I did not know the fashion! I was not able to follow it. Is that a crime?

KING C.: There is none greater, woman! for the fashion, mark you, is the law, fancy, tradition, and progress. It is nothing unless it governs, produces, and overthrows. Colossal idol set up by all the world, it drapes the cradle of the newly-born and ornaments the tomb of the dead; it raises its head to heaven above all philosophies, and penetrates, with the tip of its dainty foot, to eternity itself! Take off those green gloves!

JEANNE [humbly]: I ask nothing better. I will do whatever you wish.

QUEEN C.: Ah, have pity on her, great King!

KING C.: Be it so! I pardon you, in consideration of your ignorance. [To the Officers] And you, — I desire you to set about attiring her in the very latest mode.

JEANNE [Jumps about joyfully]: Oh, thanks, thanks! your Majesty! What happiness! Then shall I be pretty and well dressed?

KING C: We hope so!

(At a sign from King C. the Officers of his Court move quickly to R. and L.; some among the larger trees bearing costumes, others towards the stuffs on the hillocks in the rear; a few among the trees with the marabout flumes, and some towards the comb-tree. They crowd around Jeanne, putting various articles of dress upon her. Meanwhile the back drop and side scenes change so that the entire stage represents a large dry-goods and costume shop, full of clerks serving fashionable ladies. King C. is seated R. I. E. on a small couch; he assumes a meditative pose, and has an open book ready to take notes. The clerks try cloaks, shawls, hats, etc., upon the ladies. Several of them address King C., who replies three times)

Leave me! I am composing!

(Queen C. serves tea from a small tea-table placed near King C. At times the action stops, and there is a general silence. Then the King, with a monocle in his eye, passes all the women in review, readjusts details of their costume, lowers or pulls up the fronts of their corsages with an abrupt gesture; then shrugs his shoulders and cries):

No, not that! That is too old! Something else! Quick!

(Jeanne is in the centre of every group as it forms. Finally all the Ladies, including the Queen, who has followed the successive changes, are dressed like Jeanne in an extremely rich and extravagant fashion)

KING C.: Remain where you are half an hour. That effect is very fine! (General satisfaction expressed by sighs from all the Ladies; but suddenly King C. considers Jeanne attentively, then quickly removing some of her costume, he cries):

No, that does not please me at all — nor that either! Bring something else. Come! Be quick!

(At last Jeanne is attired in a costume of simple and exquisite taste)

KING C.: Now, my lords and ladies, perfumers and embroiderers, shirt-makers and dressmakers, retire to your respective cabinets; we desire to be alone. Remain here, my Couturine! [Exit all except King and Queen and Jeanne]

KING C.: Well, young woman, the elegant and luxurious toilette you longed for so much — behold yourself in it!

JEANNE: It is true, then. I am not dreaming?

KING C.: Not a doubt of it. No one, thanks to our efforts, will be more fascinating than yourself.

JEANNE: Oh, thanks, thanks again, your Majesty! Perhaps he will love me now!

KING C.: Perhaps! In order to attain to the dignity of the modern woman (a thing difficult to comprehend!), and to become that charming, incomprehensible, and fateful being, begun by God and finished by the poets and the hair-dressers, who took sixty centuries to appear in the form of the perfect Parisienne, — there are many things that you must learn, little girl, of which at present you are ignorant.

JEANNE: What are they?

KING C.: What are they? You do not know how to bow, to smile, to purse up your lips, to give a saucy wink, nor to babble about your trials while taking a melancholy pose on a sofa, like a flower broken in the wind. What would you do, now, if your lover sighed his passion in your ear? What would you say if he should ask, Dost thou love me?

JEANNE: I should answer yes, your Majesty!

KING C.: But one does not say that sort of thing, girl! That word is natural, popular, and therefore indecent.

JEANNE: Alas! What should I say? Teach me!

KING C.: Ah, behold approaching us two types of perfect taste! Come hither!

SCENE IV.

(Enter two clerks, carrying two life-size manikins, a man and a woman. Both are dressed in the latest fashion. The man has a distinct parting made in the back of the hair on his head, which continues through the fur collar of his coat and extends down the back of the rough cloth of the coat itself, as far as the waist-line. His trousers are carefully creased, and he wears an English monocle)

KING C.: Consider these two virtuous manikins, which resemble human beings perfectly. Try to reproduce their movements, if you wish to have fine manners. Remember their discourse, and hereafter, no matter where you may find yourself, — in the country, making a call, at an evening reception, at dinner or at the play, — you may chatter freely about nature, literature, blond-haired children, the ideal life, the turf, and other things. The key, Couturine. [Winds up the two figures in their chests] Let us begin. By listening to this one, you will learn what is necessary to say in the country, if there is fine scenery. [Takes the male manikin and shakes it to the right and the left, as one shakes a clock that has run down. The Queen does the same to the other figure] Go!

THE MAN [makes little rapid gestures with the right hand with a brisk lively manner]: Good-day, my dear!

THE WOMAN [with the same manner]: Good-day, my friend! [They approach each other from opposite sides of the stage, rolling on little wheels. When they meet they shake hands stiffly and sneer at each other]

THE MAN [looks around with jerky movements of the head]: Well! well! Where are we now?

THE WOMAN [mincingly, and speaking in detached phrases]: Ah! the delicious country! A most picturesque situation! Pretty little flowers! So poetic — and useless! Poetic because they are useless — useless because they are poetic!

THE MAN [peevishly]: For my part, I find it as commonplace as a cabbage, your beautiful country! As for sentiment, away with it! And elegies, ha! ha! ha! And poetry — ha! ha! ha! — I have gone a long way beyond that sort of thing. Ha! ha! ha!

THE WOMAN [with many gestures]: But really, permit me to say, that if one grouped a number of these trees, putting those large ones in the background, and bringing forward that fine old oak, and had some picturesquely dressed peasants in the foreground, and a railway running along at one side, it would be, you must allow, a very attractive subject for one to make a drawing of.

THE MAN [gallantly]: As for attractions, I prefer yours, dear lady!

THE WOMAN: Where did you learn to talk like that? At the houses of some of your gay young friends, I have no doubt. Do you know, I should like — if I could do it without anyone being the wiser — to go to one of their houses, — just to see their furniture and how they live!

MAN: I am at your service! [Aside] What an imagination! She positively sparkles! [Aloud] But, allow me a word of advice with regard to your investments. I will take charge of them.

WOMAN [quickly]: And of the reports also?

MAN [quickly]: Certainly! I have my note-books.

WOMAN [quickly]: Let us not say, then —

QUEEN C. [stops the machinery]: That is enough. They will never stop if we let them go on like that.

JEANNE: I was getting rather tired of it.

KING C.: Oh, they were doing very well. But now let us hear them talk about the news of the day. [Winds springs in another place on the manikins]

WOMAN [slowly, with a sad tone]: Dear! dear! it appears that they have massacred twelve thousand of those poor wretches!

MAN [sings]: Broum! broum! broum! What does that matter to us? I don't give a — thought to trouble! Life is short; let us amuse ourselves! Tourlarou! tourlarou!

WOMAN [gaily]: You belong to the days of the Regency — when they wore red heels!

MAN [hand within his waistcoat, speaks gravely]: Yes, but with liberal ideas! A mingling of the old French aristocracy and American industrialism. What is that?

WOMAN [speaks quickly in a supplicating tone, offering a handful of small papers]: They are lottery tickets for my poor!

MAN: Only too happy, Madame! [Aside] Pinched! [Lightly] And the newest novel — have you read it?

WOMAN [gushingly]: Oh, yes! Is it not fine? The author is indeed a great man.

MAN [naturally]: Not at all; he is quite an idiot, or so they say.

WOMAN: DO they? Well, of course it must be true, then. I believe you.

MAN [looks at her tenderly and sighs]: If you would only believe all that I — [Stops abruptly]

KING C.: Oh, I forgot to give them the two half-turns.

JEANNE: But those two do not really like each other at all, do they?

KING C. [winds up the manikins again]: Yes, that is the way these affairs begin; and after he has said enough impertinent things to her to make her weep, there will be so good an understanding between them that they will be invited to all the best houses.

[During this speech, the manikins have been making tender demonstrations, growing more and more expressive] No! No! not that! Waltz, now! waltz! [Starts them off in a waltz, and as they dance Jeanne tries to imitate their movements] That's right! See, his chin is up and his elbow is in the air, while she is as straight as a reed and keeps her face lowered; both cutting angles in space, like a true geometrical figure in a fine humour! Enough! Let them be taken away. And Couturine, see that the attendants put them in the right boxes. [Servants carry away the manikins. Exit Queen Couturine]

SCENE V.

KING C.: There! Now you know enough of society manners to enable you to appear in the polite world.

JEANNE: Ah, it is not the world that troubles me — it is he! Where is he? I long so much to see him.

KING C.: It might be possible for me to grant your wish.

JEANNE [delighted]: Oh!

KING C.: On one condition, however.

JEANNE: Name it! Whatever it is, I yield to it. Tell me!

KING C.: It is that you will not allow either himself or his companion to recognise you.

JEANNE: But why?

KING C.: Because he repelled you when you were a peasant — have you forgotten that? Now, listen to me well. You cannot doubt my power, for have I not given you more robes than you ever had pins, and more beautiful pearls than you ever put grains of bran into the hog-trough? Well, I swear to you by that same power that if you betray your name to him, at that very instant, as suddenly as if by a stroke of lightning, you shall die!

JEANNE [hangs her head, while King C. observes her closely; then slowly]: It matters not under what name or what disguise I meet him, if he will only love me; that is all I wish. Shall we go?

KING C.: That is not necessary. Here he comes now, to make purchases for his long journey. [Dominique's voice heard without]

SCENE VI.

(During the preceding dialogue the scene has gradually changed to an immense shop, filled with articles for travelling: trunks, bags, etc. The back of the stage is occupied by tailors and dressmakers)
(Enter Paul and Dominique)

DOMINIQUE: Make way there! We must have two night valises, an alms-bag, and some rugs.

FIRST CLERK: At your service, Monsieur!

SECOND CLERK: Immediately, Monsieur!

THIRD CLERK: Eighth floor, fifteenth shelf!

FOURTH CLERK: No, here!

DOMINIQUE: Ah, I shall lose my head! [Paul and Dominique stand C.]

JEANNE [R., hand on her heart]: It is he!

PAUL [sees Jeanne]: What a beautiful girl!

DOMINIQUE: It seems to me she has a look — [Laughs] I am "a fool! As if it were possible —

PAUL: But I have certainly seen her somewhere. Where? Ah — in my dreams, no doubt!

JEANNE [quickly]: He does not know me! Good! It is because this toilette disguises me so well.

KING C.: YOU certainly have a better chance of pleasing him in it. But do not forget my instructions.

JEANNE: No, no! Oh, I feel myself quite equal to appearing well before him. You shall see.

PAUL [bows to Jeanne]: Madame! [Speaks low] That so lovely a being should be here, where I may meet her, is no doubt the will of heaven! Can it be, by chance —

JEANNE [imitates the lady manikin]: Good-day, good day, my friend!

PAUL [aside]: What familiarity! Perhaps it is a sign, an indication —

JEANNE [approaches Paul]: Of sadness, it seems to me. And the cause?

PAUL: I am just about to set out on a long voyage, but a moment ago I asked myself whether I should not do better to —

JEANNE: A journey! That would suit me! The madder one is, the more one laughs! Ha! ha! ha! Give me your arm. Now let us see! Presto!

PAUL: She is mad!

JEANNE: Listen! I have ninety-two boxes full of frocks, head-ornaments by the dozen, quantities of embroidered handkerchiefs, the finest laces, gloves with twenty-six buttons, and such loves of little shoes! [Shows her feet] See my beautiful little shoes!

PAUL: Enough! Enough!

JEANNE: My little châlet of mahogany can, in the twinkling of an eye, transport itself to the most picturesque situations, and with a piano [Paul makes a gesture of disgust], a good piano, I play polkas on the mountains. I know how to give excellent imitations — listen!

PAUL: In heaven's name, stop!

JEANNE [vivaciously]: The reflection of our elegance will embellish the whole world. We shall give routs in our pagodas; we shall dress up the savages; our face powder shall be wafted on every breeze! I am for chic — chic forever! From morning till night we shall make jokes. We shall write our names on all the monuments; we shall visit all the ruins and tell great stories about them! We shall lean over steep precipices. You will not be bored. Thanks to the post nowadays, the newspapers can reach us everywhere. If an occasion should arise for an affair — you know! — a lake of burning petroleum —

PAUL [recoils]: Horror!

JEANNE: Come, let us love!

PAUL: Not in that fashion! [Going]

JEANNE: Come back!

PAUL: Never! [Exit.]

DOMINIQUE [looks about R. and L.]: What! Gone? But she seems to be a very amiable young person!

[Exit.]

SCENE VII.

JEANNE [throws herself upon the Queen's chair]: Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

KING C: What is the matter?

JEANNE [sobs and leans upon King C.]: Oh, I am horribly unhappy!

(Chorus of tailors and dressmakers offer consolation as they pursue their occupations)

JEANNE [listens to them awhile without seeming to understand; then suddenly]: Miserable people! you are the cause of my unhappiness, with your foolish tricks. Get away from me, liars and cheats! with your hypocrisies, false sentiment, false hair, padded bosoms, narrow souls! I hate you all! No, no, I will have no more of it! [Pulls off her fine clothes] Where is he? I must see him and tell him how I have deceived him. Paul! Paul! [Runs this way and that, frightened, breathless, upsetting everything in her way. Tailors and dressmakers exit hastily] Paul! Wait for me! Answer! I am coming! Do you see me? Paul! [Comes to front of stage, stands near Couturin, who is in reality the King of the Gnomes.] Ah, I have lost him forever!

KING C.: It is your own fault. You did not manage right.

JEANNE: That is true. I should have told him who I am.

KING C.: But then you would have been killed — have you forgotten that?

JEANNE: What should I have done, then? It was I that drove him away. Instead of trying to display myself by those artificial manners that stifle the heart, I should have told him simply who I am, and not have tried to dazzle him with my awkward attempts at elegance. If I had appeared different perhaps I might have pleased him. He would like some one with less rouge on her cheeks, less folly on her lips, and less affectation in her manners; a woman who would win him by modesty and tenderness — a good wife — a simple bourgeoise.

KING C.: And do you wish to be a simple bourgeoise?

JEANNE: Do you think he would love me then?

KING C.: I think so.

JEANNE: How shall I become one?

KING C.: That is very easy.

JEANNE: Make, me one, then!

KING C.: You really wish it?

JEANNE: Yes! Yes! Where shall I find him?

KING C. [takes her hand with authority, leads her away]: Come with me! This way! Follow me!

SIXTH TABLEAU. THE KINGDOM OF THE STOCK-POT.

Scene: The scene represents a public place in the form of a half circle. Several streets lead away from the centre, in such a way that the whole town can be seen at a glance. The houses, all alike, are of a poor and commonplace aspect, painted brown, set off with white. In the middle of the stage, placed upon a tripod over burning coals, is an enormous Stock-Pot, with its contents boiling furiously.

Around the Stock-Pot, arranged in a semi-circle, are large mohogany armchairs, in which sit several grocers and other tradesmen, wearing frock-coats and otter caps. Behind them, on each side of the stage, stand representatives of the different occupations of the town, carrying banners, on which appear the words "Bureaucracy," "Sciences," "Literature," etc. The professors wear caps and green shades over their eyes; the literary men carry pipes and have inkstands slung upon their hips; the clerks wear great sleeves of black percale and have pens stuck over their ears. All the men wear their beards in collar-like form, and have long coats like tradesmen, and wear tall hats. The Grand Pontiff stands C. behind the Stock-Pot; he faces the audience, mounted on a stool so that he can look over the heads of the people. Groups of collegians stand R. and L. down front; they wear mortar-board caps; and several play upon accordions. At the windows of the houses sit women in brown gowns and wearing funnel-shaped caps. Cats are sitting on the red-tiled roofs. A dull grey sky.

SCENE I.

(The curtain rises to the plaintive sound of accordions played by the collegians; the music lasts a moment or two after the curtain is up. Then silence. The boiling of the Pot is audible. The Grand Pontiff addresses the people)

PONTIFF [holds a skimmer in his hand]: Citizens and bourgeois! On this solemn day, when we have assembled to adore the thrice-blessèd

Saint Stock-Pot, emblem of material interests — the dearest of all, so much so that, thanks to you, it has become almost a divinity! — it is my office, as Grand Pontiff of this wise cult, to remind you of your duties and to bring you together, by a common act, to join in the veneration, the love, and the frenzy of adoration we owe to the Stock-Pot!

Your duties, O Bourgeoisie! I declare it, have never been neglected; never have you transgressed! You have remained within your houses thinking of nothing but your own affairs, and you have been careful not to go star-gazing, knowing that that would cause you to fall into a pit! Continue on your safe and narrow path, which eventually will lead you to repose, to riches, and to high consideration. Do not fail to despise whatever seems extraordinary or heroic; above all, have no enthusiasm! Change nothing from its present type, neither your ideas nor your garments, since personal happiness, as well as public safety, is found only in a moderate amount of brains, immutability of customs, and the bubbling of the Stock-Pot! [Accordions play] And, now, pillars of the nation, exemplars to all trades, foundation of morality, protectors of the arts — the grocers! [Grocers rise and come forward] Do you swear that you will always put chicory in the coffee?

GROCERS: Yes!

PONTIFF: And that you will never leave your counters, except, of course, to go to the door to drive away idlers; and that, finally, you will mingle your ideas with those of everyone else, by all sorts of means, alliances, and propaganda, so that your principles shall prevail, and that you may remain, as you are now, the kings of humanity, and dominators of the world?

GROCERS [with hands extended towards the Stock-Pot]: We swear it!

PONTIFF: NOW you, O clerks!

CLERKS: Present!

PONTIFF: Do you resolve to work as little as possible, and to think of nothing but your own promotion?

CLERKS: We do!

PONTIFF: DO you swear always to burn as much fuel as you can in your offices, to be uncivil, to curse your chiefs and to complain of your lot; to spend a hundred crowns' worth of writing on business worth only twenty-five centimes, of which you will delay the settlement fifteen years?

CLERKS: We swear it!

PONTIFF: Messieurs the Professors, light of the country! your turn!
[Professors advance, with stooping shoulders and senile trembling]

PONTIFF [in a familiar tone]: You bind yourselves, do you not, as in the past, to make only innocent and harmless researches, that will trouble no one's peace of mind?

PROFESSORS [raise their hands]: Yes! yes! Have no fear! We swear it!

PONTIFF: That is sufficient! Come forward, you, with your charming talents that give us happy evenings at home. As art was made to amuse, you shall make us laugh. Advance!

(The Comic Poets extend their arms towards the Stock-Pot, crying):
Cocorico! [Sneering laughter from the spectators]

PONTIFF [smiles upon the Grocers, who surround him]: A little eccentric in manner, but their intentions are pure! [Knocks on the Stock-Pot to obtain silence] A last word to our youth, to those in the springtime of life! [Makes a sign to the Collegians, who approach with accordions under their arms] Approach, sweet youths! Young men, hope of our people, you are about to enter upon the age of the passions. Take care! it is as if you played with gunpowder; the least spark falling upon your heads may blow them off. True, we have been careful to remove all torches from your pathway, but what matters that? It is none the less necessary to guard against the ardour of the blood and of the imagination. They produce only crime and folly. I should say, rather, utilise your vices; employ your bad instincts to advantage. For instance, let those who know how to win at play bring home their gains and invest them wisely. Amuse yourselves discreetly — and economically! Choose a good profession, and do not stay out later than ten o'clock at night! That is the whole secret of success. Do you swear to observe it?

COLLEGIANS: We swear it! (Return to their places)

PONTIFF: I am moved, gentlemen! So much good sense in these days touches me deeply, and if the festival were not ended I should succumb to my emotion. It is ended, however, for it is not necessary to exact vows from you [Speaks to the women at the windows], cause and guardians of our felicity, our spouses, housewives, and little mistresses of the Stock-Pot! It is because of your care that the Pot simmers! Persevere, then, in your two cherished occupations, first: mend your husbands' stockings, and, second, be always on your guard against the temptation to indulge in broad jokes. Fix your minds on those two rules, continually, exclusively. In short, do not forget that the most becoming attitude for a woman, her ideal position, if I may dare thus to express it, is a half-kneeling pose, holding a skimmer in one hand, and having a woollen stocking slipped upon her left arm; her back turned upon Cupid, and her head half lost in the steam of the Stock-Pot!

And you, O cats, inconstant quadrupeds, Bohemians of the roofs! If you employed not your time and the strength of your jaws in catching mice, we should muzzle you and impale you on a rod; but nature has created you to be useful to us. However, if you will stay at home and serve us zealously, we will leave some drops of soup for you in the bottom of the plate!

And thou, O Sun! Mayst thou, shining with gentle moderation, transform thyself into a gigantic mass of candles, in order to economise light; and may thy rays cause to fall into the depths of the sea a shower of fat, which shall heat itself to a pleasant tepidity, so that the waters of the entire globe shall be turned into an immense Stock-Pot! ALL: Long live the Stock-Pot! [As they remove their hats, their heads are seen to be shaped like pieces of loaf sugar]

WOMEN [at the windows]: How handsome our husbands are!

(Representatives of the various occupations that have not been named now crowd around the Stock-Pot, and the Grand Pontiff, describing a mysterious circle in the air, sprinkles them with his skimmer. Then the meeting breaks up informally; the men leave their places and walk about and all talk animatedly)

THE BOURGEOIS: A delightful occasion! A remarkable discourse! And what charming music! We have certainly made great progress in the fine arts, — there's no denying it!

(The confusion gradually grows less, and the men stand with their eyes fixed upon clocks placed over the door of each house. All the hands point to 5.55. The men wait in silence, their heads raised, and the instant six o'clock strikes, all cry):

Six o'clock! Time for dinner!

[Exeunt into houses.]

SCENE II.

(The stage is clear. After a moment a sound of loud kisses is heard; then the shoving of chairs; then a clattering of knives and forks and dishes)

VOICES: Ah, that is good! [Clatter of knives and forks]

VOICES: This is better than one finds it at a restaurant. [Popping of corks heard]

VOICES: We are between the dessert and the cheese! [Laughter]

MAN: Give us a glass of liqueur, will you? WOMAN: But you will make yourself ill, my darling! MAN: Just a little for my stomach's sake, and besides, is it not the custom?

(Sound of moving chairs heard; then all the Bourgeois appear at their windows; they hold out their hands and say):

It is very warm!

WOMEN [appear at windows]: Yes, but there is a cool breeze.

BOURGEOIS: True! [They lean out of windows and tap barometers that are nailed up outside of each house] How is the weather now?

[After a moment] Yes it will be safe to sit out of doors.

(The windows close, and all the Bourgeois come out of their houses and sit in chairs before their doors; each family has one small boy, dressed like a Turk, and a little girl in Swiss costume)

BOURGEOIS: It is very pleasant out here.

(Women come out and sit, with knitting. Men read newspapers. Jeanne appears, dressed in an exaggerated bourgeoise costume. She sits in front of a house R. I. E.)

SCENE III.

(As soon as Jeanne is seated, the King of the Gnomes, having removed some parts of his costume as the Grand Pontiff, appears behind her and leans over her shoulder)

KING: YOU see! Everything yields to me, everything serves me! I had only to show myself here to be elected burgomaster of the town and pontiff of their religion. [Aside] Nothing easier! It is in mediocrity that the spirit of evil triumphs!

JEANNE [sighs]: But think how many days I have been seeking him, how long I have waited! Do you think he will come?

KING: I am quite sure of it. Be patient! MOTHERS: There, run along, my angels! This is the hour for children to play and amuse themselves! (Girls and boys jump down from the doorways and run to C., join hands and dance around the Stock-Pot, singing a stanza in imitation of the Song of the Spartans):

My grandfather was a beast;
My father still more wild!
I am worse than they,
And worse will be my child!

(Some of the children lose their hats in dancing, and their heads are seen to be pointed)

JEANNE: They are very pretty, those children. Happy mothers!

FIRST WOMAN [sitting near Jeanne]: No doubt! You are very frank, Mademoiselle; but my child, although younger than they, is most promising. [Calls] Nurse!

SECOND WOMAN: And my two angels also! [Calls] Nurse!
(Several nurses appear, dandling plump babies in their arms. Mothers crowd around them, each trying to show off her own child!)

FIRST WOMAN: Throw a kiss to the pretty young lady and the nice gentleman! SECOND WOMAN [pulls up baby's clothes]: Just look at those legs!

THIRD WOMAN [takes cap off baby's head]: Look at his head!

ALL THE MOTHERS: Mine is far more beautiful! the most beautiful in the world! [They pull caps off all the babies' heads which are seen to be extraordinarily pointed]

KING [examines the heads']: Very fine! Better than their fathers'. This generation distinguishes itself phrenologically!

ALL THE MOTHERS: Recite your little fable! Sing your pretty song! Smile for the lady! Ah, how sweet she is! He shall have some candy!

(The children throw kisses to Jeanne and recite little verses in a rapid mumble, while the Mothers all talk at once, the babies cry, and the nurses sing to them. Outside a murmur of men's voices grows louder each moment. Paul and Dominique appear C. D. The children, alarmed, run into the houses, followed by nurses carrying the babies. Many of the Bourgeois and their wives go into their houses; others remain, crying):

Go away, rascals! Brigands! Strange beings!

SCENE IV.

(Paul and Dominique, in disordered travelling costumes, come down, C.)

DOMINIQUE: What ails you, idiots? Are you making all this fuss about our appearance? [Exit all the Bourgeois, making signs of mutual intelligence] JEANNE [rushes to Paul]: Paul! At last! KING [aside to Jeanne]: Dissimulate! Remember to assume the utmost simplicity!

DOMINIQUE: It seems to me these folks have a very inhospitable way with them.

PAUL: Never mind! Perhaps I shall find here the well-beloved, still unknown to me!

DOMINIQUE: Ah, talking about her again! Now, really, what do you wish? What are you seeking? What object have you in view? Ever since we began this crazy journey you have talked of nothing but "the unknown."

PAUL: Why, the object is easily understood. Somewhere I am to meet a young girl with a pure soul and of absolute disinterestedness. I shall recognise her; we shall love, and, strong in her love, I shall take possession of the Castle of Hearts!

DOMINIQUE: Very fine! A girl who doesn't exist and an imaginary castle! Come, now, what is supposed to be in this wonderful castle? Treasures?

PAUL: NO, but a fortune so extraordinary that you could not even conceive of it!

DOMINIQUE: Oho! that remains to be seen. Now, Monsieur, I have a good idea. Let us go back to Paris —

PAUL: Leave me here for awhile, Dominique. I am overcome with weariness and discouragement. And besides, I find in this village, in spite of its common and vulgar appearance, something indescribably interesting.

JEANNE [offers Paul a chair near her]: Yes, Monsieur, remain here! [Paul hesitates] Will you not sit down?

PAUL [aside]: She is very graceful, upon my word! [Looks at Jeanne, who lowers her eyes] What charming modesty! [Silence. They look at each other]

JEANNE: It is easy to see that you are a stranger here, Monsieur. That eccentric costume — [With slight disdain]

PAUL: Good heavens! Mademoiselle., in travelling surely one need not dress with the most extreme care!

JEANNE [drily]: All the same, one ought to follow the custom.

DOMINIQUE [aside]: What a bore she is! It must be great fun to talk to her! I should like to get out and see whether I can find anything more amusing. [Aloud] Will you excuse me for a short time, Monsieur?

PAUL: Yes. But return soon.

SCENE V.

(The King of the Gnomes hides behind the Pontiff's throne, which has been wheeled down to R. I. E. near Jeanne)

JEANNE: YOU do not wish to go with him? All the better!

PAUL [aside]: She softens a little!

JEANNE: TO remain with us — [Silence]

PAUL: Well?

JEANNE [timidly]: You must — oh, do not be angry! — do nothing, say nothing, and even think nothing, that differs from the actions, the words, and the ideas of everyone else.

PAUL: Indeed! And why? Where is the harm in obeying the voice of the heart, if one is sure that its promptings are worthy? As for myself, whatever comes, I despise evil. I shun that which is ugly and reverence that which is good!

JEANNE: Ah, that is right!

KING [behind Jeanne]: Beware!

JEANNE: But for a man weary of the world, it would be pleasant and restful to live in one of these houses. [Paul looks around with an expression of disgust] Oh, they are much nicer inside! And if you only knew how each wife loves her husband! She surrounds him with tender care, cooks for him, embroiders his slippers, nurses him, pets him, helps him to dress, and even puts on his coat for him. [Offers Paul a coat like those worn by the Bourgeois] Put this on!

PAUL [surprised]: What for?

JEANNE: YOU will be so comfortable in it. I beg you!

PAUL [puts on the coat; speaks aside]: She is rather stupid, although charming in a way. [Aloud] No doubt this quiet life has its advantages. But do you not believe — you, whose voice is as sweet as the song of a bird, and whose glance is as cordial as the clasp of a hand! — do you not feel that it is possible to find a more complete union than any you have seen, — a felicity of such warmth and power that its effect would spread like the sun's rays? The enchantment that one being possesses for another in such a love, amid all the gloom and sadness of the world, makes life a continual poem; the more one loves the better it makes him; the mere habit of tenderness enables him to understand all persons better; and that which appears to be virtue is only a proof of the purest happiness!

JEANNE: Yes, yes! I understand you!

KING [behind her]: Unhappy one! You are lost!

JEANNE [troubled]: That is — I comprehend your meaning, but — without banishing a certain ideal, one might find a way to live a quiet, peaceful life and yet not concern oneself too much with the affairs of others. Why should we waste the best of ourselves in sympathy, tender emotions, and taking trouble for other persons, instead of keeping all these fine sentiments for ourselves?

KING [aside]: Bravo!

JEANNE: If others are stronger than we, let us submit to them, so that they will respect us and serve us. Oh, it is very easy, — with certain exterior concessions, and provided one shows nothing extravagant in his person or his speech!

(Enter a Barber, carrying the utensils of his trade)

PAUL [surprised]: What do you wish here?

BARBER [in a hollow voice]: To cut your beard in the form of a collar, as everyone else wears his.

PAUL: Well, that is a cool proposition!

JEANNE: Oh, let him do it — to please me! [Fastens a towel around his neck. Barber cuts Paul's beard] A little patience! it's almost finished. One more cut! Ah, how well that becomes you, and what delightful evenings we shall have this winter, in the little parlour, with the Persian curtains and the family photographs! We shall sit beside the fire, near my piano! In the faubourg there are pretty gardens with little arbours made of green sticks. We will go there on Sundays, and, walking arm-in-arm, we will talk of our happiness and look over the wall at the vegetables growing!

(The Barber finishes his work and departs)

PAUL [aside]: Perhaps she is right. There is good sense, after all, in what she says. Besides, if she were once my wife, I should educate her.

JEANNE: NOW turn your head about so that I can see you. Ah, charming! Thank you! I am very much pleased! And you will never leave me now? [Takes his hand]

PAUL: Ah, my little dear! No, no! I swear it!

JEANNE [delighted, looks at him]: Can it be possible? But yes! You lack nothing now!

KING [holds a high hat towards Paul]: Except this!

JEANNE [puts the hat on Paul's head]: Oh, yes, that! Now! Come! Come! everyone! It is finished!

(The Bourgeois rush on, followed by Dominique)

SCENE VI.

BOURGEOIS [applaud and embrace Paul]: Good! Good! Very becoming! Our congratulations! My dear fellow-citizen, I am delighted!

PAUL: One moment! Permit me! What does this mean? A short time ago you wished to stone me, and now —

BOURGEOIS: Well, you see, you have now become one of us.

KING [presents a mirror]: There! Look at yourself!

PAUL [looks at himself for some moments in the mirror; then, as if awakening from a dream]: What! The collar-like beard, the ugly tall hat of a bourgeois on me! [Throws the hat on the ground. Cries of indignation from the Bourgeois] And a coat like that! [Tears off the coat] I never shall wear such garments — clothes for Idiots! Never! never! [Tramples on the hat and coat]

JEANNE: Unhappy one! Cease!

BOURGEOIS: He is mad! Beware of him!

JEANNE [distractedly]: Calm him! Soothe him! Oh! what shall I do?

A VOICE: Seize him, some one! The soup! Put him to the test of the soup!

JEANNE: Bring him here, quick! There! that's right! Take it, my friend!

(Bourgeois surround Paul, take him up by the arms and legs and bring him to the Stock-Pot. Some one hands a cup of soup to Jeanne; she presents it at Paul's lips.)

JEANNE: Drink this slowly!

PAUL [dashes away the cup with the back of his hand]:
I will have none of your stuff!

ALL: Sacrilege! sacrilege! To jail with him! Put him into the strongest cell! [Men rush at Paul and strike him with their fists]

PAUL: Yes, beat me, if you like. I like your blows better than your applause, and your cruelty more than your favours! I despise you, with your hearts of slaves, heads like sugar-loaves, grotesque costume, hideous houses, your mean occupations and your beast-like ferocity —

ALL: He is mad! He raves!

PAUL [raises his hands, which have been chained]: Ah, if I could only summon a bolt from heaven to exterminate you!

MEN: He becomes dangerous! Bring a gag! [They gag Paul]
A MAN: And his servant!

ALL: Yes, yes! his servant!

DOMINIQUE [comes forward with the coat and hat, which he has picked up]: But I have the coat and I have the hat, and I ask nothing better than to be allowed to wear them.

BOURGEOIS: That will do no good. As a matter of principle —

DOMINIQUE: I will take the soup!

BOURGEOIS: Silence!

DOMINIQUE: In fact, I need it!

BOURGEOIS: Insolent! [They gag Dominique, and drag him and Paul to a prison R. I. E. and throw them in. They can be seen through the barred windows]

ALL [with sighs of relief]: Now the proper thing to do is to moralise with them and catechise them a little!
(Enter the Grand Pontiff)

PONTIFF: That is my business! That is a part of my sacerdotal duty. Let us begin. Unfortunate man! you are accused of scorning the frock-coat and the Stock-Pot!

BOURGEOIS [sneering]: These fine gentlemen did not like them!

PONTIFF: Of harbouring disdain for trade, of having unusual sentiments, ideas, words, manners and customs, — in one word, of eccentricity! A VOICE: The guillotine!

PONTIFF: No, gentlemen! thank heaven, our ways are not so severe! We demand, wretched men! only that you be chastened by confinement, purified by remorse, and perhaps later, by good conduct, you will re-establish yourselves in our esteem. The soup you rejected, you shall be forced to swallow, only it will be stronger; the walls of your cell shall be embellished by moral inscriptions, and will form, instead of the study of spiders, your sole distraction! [Paul and Dominique become excited and try to thrust their arms through the bars] I have not finished! The just anger of the people wills, since at present you can do no more harm, that I should lecture you on many points. Then they will make certain experiments upon you!

(A slight rattling sound is heard, and then the clocks strike eight. At the first stroke all the Bourgeois draw cotton night-caps from their pockets and put them on their heads. The Pontiff does the same)

PONTIFF: It is now time to go to bed! Until tomorrow! [Exit Bourgeois into various houses.]

SCENE VII.

JEANNE [to King of the Gnomes, as the Pontiff]: Save him! save him! or I shall go myself — KING: Beware!

JEANNE: But it is your fault that he is there and that I have lost him again.

KING: NO, it is your own fault.

JEANNE: Not content with having deceived me you —

KING: I did not deceive you! I gave you all that you asked, but it is impossible for me to grant his wishes as well as yours: you must choose more wisely. At your first request, I gave you worldly luxuries and the foolish fripperies that belong to the gay world; at the second, I granted you the simplicity of the bourgeois, with its accompaniment of ugly commonplaces. Now, of what do you complain? What do you really wish?

JEANNE [after a silence]: I will tell you! I could see, when he was surrounded by those men that put chains upon him, that the desire of his heart was revealed in his proud words. You ask what I wish! Listen! I would possess a power so great that it shall dazzle him. I ask for a palace of basalt with steps of crystal, where he shall sit beside me upon a throne of gold, so that he may look out over the heads of all the people, my slaves, who shall prostrate themselves in the dust before him!

KING: Very good! Excellent! But not so loud, my princess, for fear of disturbing these worthy people! [Draws a cotton cap from his pocket and puts it on his head, and takes off his blue spectacles. His face is very ugly; he has yellow teeth and great eyes which run back almost to his ears, and his red side-whiskers look like wings. A button on top of the cap glows like fire. He disappears with Jeanne]

SCENE VIII.

(The Stock-Pot, the handles of which have been transformed into wings, rises into the air and turns itself over, and while it increases in size so that it appears to hover over the whole town, the vegetables, — carrots, turnips, and leeks — that come out of it, remain suspended in the air and turn into luminous constellations. As soon as the darkness is complete, a sound of loud snoring is heard issuing from the houses. There is a noise of something breaking; then from the prison steal two figures, pressing close to the wall and walking softly. Paul appears first, then Dominique, with the tall hat and frock-coat, and carrying his shoes under his arm. He is terrified at sight of the vegetable-constellations. The snoring continues as the curtain slowly falls)

SEVENTH TABLEAU. THE KINGDOM OF PIPEMPOHE.

Scene: A vast hall, of Indo-Moorish architecture, having a practicable gallery across the back, and three arches beneath it, sustained by columns. The middle arch, used as an entrance, shows a low flight of steps, which entrance is made upon the scene. The ceiling has beams of blue-and-gold enamel. The columns are of ebony incrustated with mother-of-pearl, and the two side arches have hanging blinds of gilded bamboo.

In the plinth that supports the gallery, as well as the walls, blue and red lozenges are set.

A large cashmere portière hangs R. At L., seated on a throne ornamented with gold and surmounted by a baldaquin with waving plumes, sits Jeanne, dressed as a queen and sparkling with jewels. She assumes an imperious attitude.

Near her stands her Prime Minister (the King of the Gnomes). Behind her stand negro slaves, waving fans made of peacock feathers, and in front of her bearded dwarfs, attired in red, are squatting upon their heels on the steps of the throne. The two at the foot of the throne blow perfume out of bottles larger than themselves.

In the centre of the stage Bayaderes are performing a dance as the curtain rises. At the back, two giants, robed in black, stand in front of the gilded bamboo blinds.

The murmur of a languorous melody is heard, clouds of perfume rise slowly; the sunlight falling through the windows, sheds an amber light upon the scene.

SCENE I.

King [whispers to Jeanne]: And now are you happy?

JEANNE [smiles]: I hope to be so soon.

(Bayadères finish their dance, and before beginning another, they bow before the throne)

KING: You see, all goes well. Everyone takes you for the Queen. She died last night, and the error of the people will continue. You have only to hold him when he comes, but do not let him recognise you; remember the terrible consequences! JEANNE: I know! Thanks, good Fairy, for having pity on my love; and as you are now my Prime Minister, of course you will not leave me any more.

KING: If sometimes I am compelled to do so, a blast upon this will recall me. [Hands Jeanne a golden whistle on a cord, which he takes from his neck. She puts it around her own neck. The cashmere portière opposite the throne half opens, and a hideous Dwarf enters. He wears an aigrette in his turban, long moustaches, and carries an ivory bâton in his hand. He leads a procession of six Giants, loaded with arms. As the Dwarf advances to bow before the throne, the Giants form a line against the wall and stand motionless]

SCENE II.

DWARF [bows to Jeanne and returns to the Giants] Higher, stupids, higher! Chin raised! Who ever saw such drilling? [Giants tremble with fear before him] Make way for the messenger of the sovereign! [The Giants make way R. and L. Enter an Officer in a pink turban, with trousers of white muslin, a blue waistcoat, and a large sword hanging at his side]

OFFICER [salutes profoundly] Acting upon the command of your Sublime Majesty, we have just cut into small pieces the twelve wretches who failed to prostrate themselves quickly enough last night, when your Majesty passed the silk-bazaar upon your Majesty's white elephant.

JEANNE: My orders! Cut into pieces — my elephants!

OFFICER [smiles]: I do not speak of your thrice divine white elephant, your Majesty, — only of the men.

JEANNE: Wretch! [Officer stares at Jeanne astonished]

KING [aside]: You will betray yourself by showing this indignation. Think only of him you love, and reward this good servitor for his faithfulness.

JEANNE: I never could do it!

KING: But you must!

JEANNE [hesitates]: Very well. We are satisfied. Go! [Exit Officer]
Ah, heavens! who would have thought that I should have had the courage?

KING [aside]: She begins well!

(Enter the Chancellor, dressed in a long robe bordered with fur, and an astrachan cap; he carries an inkstand in his girdle and long strips of paper in his left hand)

CHANCELLOR: I venture to come within your powerful rays, light of the stars! to call attention to the fact that this document lacks your Majesty's august seal.

JEANNE: What is it?

CHANCELLOR: NO doubt your Majesty recalls the insolence of the man who dared to weep in your presence, under the pretext that he was dying of hunger?

JEANNE: No — I do not remember!

KING [aside]: On the contrary, you do remember quite well!

CHANCELLOR: This is an order for his immediate execution.

JEANNE: Horror! Give me that paper!

KING [to Chancellor]: Give it rather to me, — I will take charge of the matter. Go, all of you! JEANNE: Yes, go! go!

(Exit Dwarf, followed by the six Giants, whose heads touch the top of the gallery arches; also the Bayadères, and the Dwarfs from the steps of the throne, except one who remains half hidden)

KING [points to the two Giants standing in front of the arches]: They may remain, being mutes.

SCENE III.

JEANNE [descends from throne]: For what reason do you demand this man's death?

KING: I? Oh, I haven't the least notion!

JEANNE: Then, as I have the right to pardon him —

KING: Pardon him! If you do that the people will not believe that you are the Queen.

JEANNE: TO be killed because he wept — what a crime! The former Queen was very cruel, then?

KING: She was strong. Imitate her!

JEANNE: But it is impossible for me —

KING: Will you ruin yourself for a mere scruple, then, and lose this power so long hoped for, when you should show yourself stronger than ever?

JEANNE: What do you mean?

KING: I mean that soon — almost immediately, perhaps — you will be called upon to save from mortal peril your brother and your lover!

JEANNE [after a silence]: And do you believe that the signing of this paper —

KING: It is only a matter of blowing upon that whistle and pressing your thumb upon this red seal. [Presents the paper]

JEANNE: Oh, no! It is too horrible!

KING: But suppose the people revolt and drive you away? I have no power over the multitude. They are accustomed to witnessing tortures every day. You will deprive them of their amusement and they will doubt their Queen. [Cries without] Do you hear that?

JEANNE [listens]: It is true!

VOICES [without]: Vengeance! Death!

KING [to the Giants]: Raise the blinds!

(The Giants push up the bamboo blinds, disclosing a view of a city of Oriental aspect, with minarets and cupolas)

JEANNE [slowly mounts the steps and leans out to look]: What a crowd! And they all have picks, hatchets, and swords! They are beating upon the gates of the palace!

KING: Hasten, then, unhappy one! to save those you love!

JEANNE: Give it to me! [Thrusts away the paper] No! No!

KING: At least reserve the power to have him executed some time, if it be only one day hence, and let this torture show —

JEANNE [overcome]: Let it take place, then, when I shall be no more!

KING [servilely]: To-morrow, if you wish. Your wishes are our commands, your Majesty! Here it is!

JEANNE [presses the seal quickly]: Yes, to-morrow!

KING [hands paper to Dwarf]: Run! [Dwarf runs off R. laughing] He is in a mad mood, that buffoon!

JEANNE [wrings her hands]: Heaven have mercy on me! If I had only known that —

KING [aside]: She is ours! First she was coquettish, then stupid, now cruel! [Cries of joy without] Your people thank you, O Queen!

JEANNE: I hear a sound of many footsteps.

VOICES [nearer]: Death! Death!

KING [mounts steps and looks out from the balcony]: They are coming here, to assist at the execution, and to bask in your thrice-blessed presence! [They come down stage]
(From the gallery enters, first, the Chief Dwarf; behind him come several negroes bearing on their shoulders an enormous chain, which binds Paul and Dominique together. A throng follows them. They descend the steps and scatter R. and L. leaving Paul and Dominique at R. L E. They are pale and haggard. The King of the Gnomes stands at the foot of the lowest step looking at Paul and Dominique, and the Giants resume their former position)

SCENE IV.

JEANNE [sees Paul]: He! [Strives to command herself; mounts the throne, and when Paul is before her, she addresses the Dwarf] These prisoners are in chains. Why?

DWARF: They crossed the borders and entered your kingdom, your Majesty.

JEANNE: Well?

KING [approaches Jeanne from L.]: Is not that the greatest of crimes, O light of the stars?

JEANNE [comprehends]: Of course — certainly! You have done well, General, and your blacks also, — and you, my people! But because of their excessive audacity, we desire to interrogate the two guilty ones — alone [to the King], without even our Prime Minister! [King bows] If we need you [shows whistle] we will call you, you understand. [King disappears suddenly inside of the throne, through a trap-door at the Back] What! Is he gone already? I did not see him go. All the better — he would have importuned us.

SCENE V.

JEANNE [after the multitude has departed]: Although I am Queen, I am compelled to submit to the laws of the country. It was in obedience to those laws that my people arrested you. I am obliged to give them a reason for what I do, but — I pardon you! You are free!

DOMINIQUE: What a good woman!

JEANNE: I wish first to remove your chains, but no one must know it except my Prime Minister. Where is he? Ah, the whistle! [Blows whistle; instantly the King appears beside her]

DOMINIQUE [aside]: Where did he come from? I don't like this abrupt style of entering. Just when our affairs were going on so well, too!

PAUL [looks at the King]: This is strange! I have already seen this man somewhere. At the ball? No, is it not the man of the wine-shop? There is some trap here!

SCENE VI.

JEANNE [to King]: Take away those chains! [Aside] I need the secret — you will excuse me!

KING: Without doubt! [Aloud] Immediately, your Majesty!
[Advances gravely towards the prisoners, and without effort, by merely touching the chains, he breaks them, ring by ring, with his fingers. The links fall to the floor with a crash]

DOMINIQUE: Ye gods! What a fist!

PAUL: It is he! [Leans over to study the King's face; the King disappears]

JEANNE [aside]: He is as discreet as he is devoted, that good Fairy!
[Aloud] Now, you are free; the gates are open to you. Have you nothing to say to me?

PAUL [coldly]: We offer our thanks!

JEANNE [piqued]: Is that all?

PAUL [slowly]: What more do you wish? How do I know what motive —

DOMINIQUE [aside]: What imprudence! [Aloud] Ah, your Majesty, Queen, goddess, reflection of the moon! our hearts swell with gratitude!

JEANNE: Good! Would it not be better, rather than to continue on your dangerous way, to remain here in my kingdom?

DOMINIQUE: Certainly! For my part, I am willing.

JEANNE [aside]: He does not reply! [Aloud] I tell you, that in this city, at my Court, I will give you some high function.

PAUL [brusquely]: I refuse!

JEANNE: Even that of Prime Minister?

PAUL: Yes!

JEANNE [aside]: What does he wish, then? [Points to the middle arch at the back] Behold the capital of my kingdom, the great city of Pipempohé. It is twenty-five leagues in circumference, has three million inhabitants, six rivers, palaces of gold, houses of silver, and shops so numerous that a guide is necessary to conduct one through their maze of columns. I give it to you!

PAUL: I do not need it!

JEANNE: Ah, what pride! [To the Giant standing at blind R.] Raise the curtain!

(The Giant raises the gilt blind; a bay filled with vessels is seen in the distance, and in the rear a forest)

JEANNE: You shall have my port, my navy, my vessels, the whole sea, with its islands and its yet undiscovered countries.

PAUL: TO what purpose?

JEANNE: YOU will accept this, I hope! [To the Giant at L. arch] Raise the curtain!

(The Giant raises the blind and discloses a view of forbidding rocks, in the midst of which is a large block of dazzling whiteness)

JEANNE: That mountain is filled with diamonds. The magicians at my service shall procure them, and I will give you elephants with which to bring them away.

PAUL: That would be somewhat too heavy a burden, your Majesty!

JEANNE: IS it my throne that you desire? I can give you the right to occupy it beside me! [Tenderly] I would even descend from it, that you might occupy it alone, if you wish.

PAUL: My place is far distant from here. I have a great task to perform.

JEANNE: Ah! And what if I prevent you?

PAUL: It is something quite above your power to control.

JEANNE: But if I force you to remain here?

PAUL: I should still have the liberty to hate you!

JEANNE: Hate me! And you refuse my throne? What is this extraordinary mission?

PAUL: NO one may know that.

JEANNE: But I!

PAUL: YOU less than any other.

JEANNE: What audacity!

DOMINIQUE [aside]: Master! master! No more of such folly! With a single word she can order our heads off! If you do not want her throne, at least refuse it politely! Be calm! Be astute!

PAUL:" I fear nothing! The nearer I approach to the end of my quest, the clearer my mind becomes. And you, who now appear to me as a queen, surrounded by awe-inspiring grandeur, you are the same woman that tried to attract me with absurd affectations of elegance, and later attempted to win me with the charms of a vulgar happiness! I know you!

JEANNE [aside]: Unhappy that I am! Now he execrates me!

PAUL: Woman, you are — admit it! — only the instrument of evil spirits. But I shall not succumb to your power any more than I have been vanquished by other temptations. Accumulate obstacles, if you wish! My will is stronger than your citadel, and prouder than your armies!

JEANNE: Insensate fool! [Calls] Send my negro slaves! [Enter four negroes, armed with daggers. Jeanne addresses the first two] Approach, you two! Draw your daggers! [They draw their daggers and approach Paul and Dominique. Paul is perfectly cool, but Dominique is almost fainting with terror. Jeanne speaks coldly] Kill yourselves! [The two negroes tremble and hesitate] Did you hear? [They plunge their daggers into their breasts and fall dead] Carry them out! [Exit the two remaining negroes, carrying the corpses] Now do you doubt my power?

DOMINIQUE [kneels]: No! No! But I didn't say anything, your Majesty!

JEANNE: Think you that with such a people I should lack for means to compel you to do my will? I have an iron tower built on a rock of brass in a lake of sulphur, and above it, in order to prevent prisoners from escaping, four griffins continually hover. Beneath it is a marble pit, narrower than a coffin, where the stones crush the captives and they can do nothing but die! I can, if I please, have you thrown under the wheels of my chariot, burned in my porcelain ovens, devoured by my tigers, or forced to drink a poison that will cause you to disappear from the earth, leaving not so much as a drop of blood behind! Well — go! You are free!

PAUL [crosses his arms]: In what way?

JEANNE: YOU are free to leave my kingdom. [Paul makes a gesture of doubt] Yes, — without any one to stop you.

PAUL: HOW can I be sure of that?

JEANNE [tears a bit off her scarf and impresses her seal upon it]: My seal on this scrap of satin will be sufficient to take you safely to the frontier; and perhaps some day, if you keep it, you will reproach yourself for having replied with ingratitude and insult to the most tender and magnificent offers ever received by a man from a queen! [Gives the satin to Dominique] Here, take it! Go! [They go out by way of_ the gallery. Jeanne follows them with her eyes]

SCENE VII.

JEANNE: What have I done that he should always fly from me? It was impossible to dazzle him with my power, and my generosity did not touch him. [Paces to and fro; looks about her] What need have I now of all this, since he refuses me? I will abandon this kingdom and follow him — everywhere — far away! [Sinks on the steps of the throne] Oh, I was happier formerly when I was only a poor milkmaid. I remember one day, when I went to the garret, he praised my pretty face and my hands, which he almost kissed. And now he has not only forgotten all that, but he hates me! By what ill luck has this come about? And why is he so bitter against these good fairies, when they are only working for our happiness? [A burst of sneering laughter comes from behind the throne] That must be my buffoons in the great saloon, who are amusing themselves. [Sounds of laughter] What gaiety!

SCENE VIII.

(Enter the King of the Gnomes in his Gnome costume)

JEANNE [alarmed]: What is this?

KING: Nothing! We are amusing ourselves very well — you have said it.

JEANNE: Those voices I heard — this strange appearance — what does it mean?

KING: Those who are laughing within there are genii who are infuriated at losing you, as well as your lover. I, who guided you everywhere, counselled you, and seemed to serve you, am their master, the King of the Gnomes!

JEANNE [terrified]: The King of the Gnomes!

KING: It is. my will that he shall never love you, and as soon as he sets foot on our grounds he is lost!

JEANNE: Impossible! I will run after him!

KING: TOO late! And even should he return, I am sure of his undoing.

JEANNE [impatiently]: No! No! No! I shall give orders —

KING: Oh, as many as you please!

JEANNE: You will oppose them, perhaps.

KING: On the contrary, you shall be punctually obeyed. Try it!

(Exit King, laughing; noise of laughter increases without)

SCENE IX.

JEANNE: Why are they so opposed to him, and with what object? What matters it? A peril threatens him. Perhaps he will fall! He may be lost! Ah, he must return! What shall I do? I do not know! Shall we fly?

[Calls] General! [Enter the Chief Dwarf] Oh, not you! I want some one else. Call the others — the chief of my guard, the Chancellor, soldiers, some one! Quick! Quick!

SCENE X.

(Enter an Officer, with soldiers, and the Chancellor)

JEANNE: Do you know why I called you? You must have in your possession the order for the torture of that man — you know, the man who wept the other day.

CHANCELLOR [produces paper with a deep bow]: Behold it, gracious Majesty!

JEANNE: Give it to me! [Tears paper into bits] I pardon him!
[Chancellor looks at her amazed] Yes, a full pardon. Go and free him yourself, and see that he receives, so that he shall not suffer want in the future, three tons of silver and four camel-loads of corn. [Chancellor is about to go] Wait! There must be many slaves in my garden. Break their chains and send them all away in ships to their native country.
Then you will search throughout the palace for all the vestments and draperies that are kept here: fur dolmans, coats brocaded with gold, robes of tissue embroidered with pearls; and you will distribute these among the inhabitants of my city, beginning with the poorest. Wait! I have not finished. Remove all the arms from the arsenals, and plant there instead flowering shrubs that will cheer the hearts of the widows.
As I have too many perfumes, throw them out of the windows that they may wash the streets! I order the abolishing of all laws except those that I make this day. It is my will that there shall not be a single sorrowful soul in my kingdom, but that a universal smile shall shine on all faces! I will have no tears save those of joy, and blessings shall fall upon my head! [Re-enter Paul and Dominique R. with the Officer and soldiers] Ah! [To Officer] It is well! Leave us!
[Exit Officer and soldiers.]

SCENE XI.

PAUL [ironically]: I suspected the sincerity of your clemency, O Queen!

JEANNE: Unhappy man, do you calumniate me still? Listen! this is a matter that concerns your welfare.

DOMINIQUE: And not mine? Have mercy!

JEANNE: Yes, even your life.

PAUL: What matters it? [Silence]

JEANNE: And you ask me that, — you, Paul de Damvilliers!

PAUL: Who told you my name?

JEANNE [proudly]: Ah! What matters that to you?

PAUL: Oh, I understand. You are assisted by the magic of the Gnomes; but I have the protection of the Fairies, and I defy you!

JEANNE: Ah, yes! insult me, despise me, execrate me! But, in the name of that which you hold most sacred, by the souls of those most dear to you, have pity on me, I implore you, and remain here!

PAUL: I shall go at once!

JEANNE: Why do you persist in doubting me?

PAUL: Because you have already deceived me under so many guises. A short time ago you overwhelmed me with offers and protestations, and then, for no reason whatever, you deprive me of that liberty which you were so reluctant to grant.

JEANNE: But you did not know that you were going to meet certain death, because I did not know it myself. Until now I have been the victim of evil spirits whose designs I did not suspect.

PAUL: Ah, is this another trick?

JEANNE: NO! NO! I swear it! Do not go!

PAUL: Any risk is less perilous than your vows!

JEANNE: Look at me! Have I the appearance of a liar?

PAUL: This is only a new snare. I say this because the more I look at you and study your face, the more it calls up memories of the past, and reminds me of another — a young girl! —

JEANNE: Go on!

PAUL: She was worth all the queens in the world; and I Should have done well to turn backward in my life, rather than press forward to discover the future.

JEANNE: Ah, heaven! What punishment!

PAUL: Nothing but justice.

JEANNE: But this is terrible! You do not recognise me, then, when I tell you — when you know —

KING [suddenly appears]: Beware!

PAUL [aside]: Again that man!

JEANNE: I did not summon you.

KING [salutes]: All the more reason that I should come, O Queen!

JEANNE: GO! Leave me! I will save him alone.

KING: But do you not see that the wretch does not wish your aid?

JEANNE [to Paul, who has gone up stage]: In heaven's name, return!

PAUL: Never! [Drags Dominique with him up C.]

JEANNE: In the name of the memory of which you spoke just now!
Ah, must I give my life in order to convince you?

PAUL: I want none of your gifts!

JEANNE: Listen! I am — [Exit Paul and Dominique. The King extends his hand towards Jeanne, who cries in a half-choked voice] Jeanne, the milkmaid! [She falls as if by a stroke. Enter Gnomes and Dwarfs; they rush on and dance around her, singing]:

GNOMES: She is dead! She is dead! At last we triumph! None shall thwart us henceforth. Ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha!

QUEEN OF THE FAIRIES [appears upon the throne]: No, she is not dead! [Descends the steps of the throne slowly and spreads her mantle over Jeanne as if to defend her] Her self-sacrifice has saved her!

(The Gnomes, recoiling, form a circle around Jeanne and the Queen)

EIGHTH TABLEAU. THE ENCHANTED WOOD.

SCENE I.

DOMINIQUE [enters R.; takes short steps and looks about]: Lost! Just because I left my master one minute! Where is he, then? [Calls] Monsieur! Monsieur! Not here! Well, then, it's his own fault. What the devil put it into his head to bother himself with the Gnomes and the Castle of Hearts? I must look for him, however. Monsieur! Oh, that's right — run after him! I can see eyes shining among the leaves! No, it's only the way the sun strikes them. Curious effects one sees in the woods! I will go on. Forward! March! There's a bird flying away! Am I an idiot? That's what he'd do, in order to get away from here. I will try. [A branch touches him] Ah! [Turns] No one there. Heaven be praised! Rascally thorns, get out! Devilish branches, the thicker you grow, the faster I shall break you! [Trees strike him with their branches] But — but — it seems that I have the whole forest on my shoulders. Never mind! I shall get out. I say that I will get out! [Thrusts away a branch with each hand and breaks them. At that moment the forest opens before him, like the parting of curtains, forming a pretty green lane, with symmetrical rows of trees on each side. At the back, standing black and distinct against a rosy sunset sky, is the Castle of Hearts, so placed that only the - upper stories can be seen; its three slender towers have small windows, through which shines a red light. Dominique remains for some time silent and motionless with surprise]

A castle! The Castle of Hearts! It must be! It looks exactly as it was described. No, no, I am dreaming! It is impossible! [Pinches himself] No, I am awake! That black roof, those red lights — they suggest a monster staring at one. I must be calm. There is nothing to be afraid of — on the contrary, it is a great chance. I am the first to discover it. What joy it will be to Monsieur to know of it! But — since I am first to get here, the glory belongs to me! Why not? [Laughs wildly] The reward, the lady, the beautiful woman! The mansion appears seigneurial, and the land surrounding it makes quite a domain. This forest belongs to it, no doubt. How I shall cut into it! What swinging blows my men shall make — because I shall have servants. [Walks about, growing enthusiastic] I am a servant no longer! Good! I will have footmen like those of Sardanapalus; they shall have a red and gold livery with snug stockings, by Jove! and feathers on their hats and buttons as large as plates; and in the vestibule, at the foot of the stairs, they will play all kinds of games with cards and dominoes; they will put on great style, and if they do not drive well — [Makes a gesture as if kicking some one]

Well, no one comes! That's bad luck. I've done all I can. However, I'll try once more. [Cries feebly] Monsieur! Monsieur! He cannot say I haven't called him! I'm done! Since he goes and hides himself in this way! — But I wish I had some witnesses here to testify how long I have been calling him. [All the trees on the side where he called feebly, bend their branches low; those on the other side shake their leaves in sign of denial] Ha! that's very odd! They move, although there is no wind; they move, like human beings! You do not comprehend me, surely? [Trees bend their branches, in a movement of assent] Horror! My marrow freezes in my bones! I am going mad! Am I about to die? Decidedly, there are things above human knowledge, and I have been wrong always to deny it. [Sits on the ground, appearing faint] I wish Monsieur would come now. I will wait for him. It was not a delicate thing that I meant to do — to rob him of his glory, poor fellow! after all that he has gone through. It is true that I have endured hardships with him, and until now I could always get out of any scrapes. Why should I fear that this may be any worse? That was only a little giddiness I felt just now — nothing more! [Looks at the Castle] That Castle seems very much like any other castle, I think; it looks rather rugged at this distance, but it has an air! It is not deserted, evidently. There is movement within. I can smell the odours of the kitchen; yes, and I can hear the rattling of dishes. They are expecting their master, no doubt. But I am their master! [Looks at the trees apprehensively] No, they do not move! Courage, Dominique! Forward! One gains nothing without assurance. [Springs up, but his legs are turned into the trunk of a tree, covered with bark, which spreads upward over his body] Ah! Oh! [Arriving at his arms, the bark covers them also and they turn into branches, covered with leaves; the head remains intact] Master! My master! Come to me, master! I — [He is completely metamorphosed into a tree]

SCENE II.

THE TREES: He is caught! Another one!

DOMINIQUE [changed into a plum-tree]: Help! help!

TREES: Impossible!

DOMINIQUE: Who spoke?

TREES: An oak — an elm — a linden — a spruce — an ebony-tree!

DOMINIQUE: This is a joke!

TREES: YOU speak very well yourself. We were all men once!

TREES: All! All!

A LINDEN: We have had adventures like yours, and now our only amusement is to talk among ourselves. But when a being of a superior order arrives, we become as silent as ordinary trees.

DOMINIQUE: Who is speaking to me at present?

A LINDEN: A linden.

DOMINIQUE: And I — what am I, then?

A LINDEN: You are too far away; I cannot see you distinctly.

DOMINIQUE: I feel myself — stupid! I should not be surprised if I were a plum-tree!

TREES: You are right! You are a wild plum-tree!

DOMINIQUE: What a shame that I am forced to stand here all by myself, like an exile; I can't even give you a shake of the branch!

AN ELM: Imitate us! resign yourself!

DOMINIQUE: But I shall be bored to death here, — I, who set out in search of a wife! When spring comes and I find myself full of nests, I shall be in a frightful position! It will be as bad as the tortures of Tantalus! You haven't any nice climbing plant that would come and cling to me awhile, have you?

TREES: NO!

DOMINIQUE: Not even a pretty little weed, or a vine — some wild vine? That would suit me! Come, now! I would give her back to you!

TREES: Plum-tree, you are most immoral!
(Chorus of Breezes among the Trees)

Awake, woodland trees!
Tremble in the breeze!
And, hidden from the night,
Take kisses soft and light!
Give us love!
Give us song,
O pines and holly!

Let us glide,
Let us dance
In sport and folly!
Now with joyous sighs,
We come from azure skies;
A leafy tree we capture,
Embracing it with rapture!

Tender songs
Of pretty birds
Fill the air;
Within the nests,
Each fond pair rests,
Free from care!

(Towards the end of the chorus the Trees lower their voices more and more, and leaning against each other, whisper):

TREES: A man! A man! A man! DOMINIQUE: It is my master, my friends, my —

SCENE III.

PAUL [enters, overcome with fatigue]: I shall never find it, then, this infernal castle of the Gnomes! And Dominique has disappeared! There never was such an idiot as that boy! I should have forbidden him to stir a step away from me, since I have lost two hours in searching for him. [Stops in front of the green lane, amazed] Ah, at last! [Dominique shakes his branches to attract Paul's attention] Here I am at last at the end of all my wanderings and all my fatigues! Thanks, good Fairy, for sustaining my courage through so many perils, where others before me have faltered! [A burst of laughter comes from the Castle] That was surely laughter. But all the windows are closed — what was it, then? Pshaw! the emotion of finding myself here has made me tremble like a woman at the cry of some bird or a wild beast. But where can Dominique be? [Dominique shakes his leaves], I have done more than my duty in seeking him throughout this forest. He has been a regular nuisance, besides, on this journey, and I am too good to him! I have no doubt he has fallen into some trap, where, in spite of my warnings, his curiosity or his folly has led him. [Dominique shakes his branches harder] Well, forward! In such an enterprise, the existence of one man is nothing, since the welfare of all mankind is concerned!

(Suddenly there is a great burst of laughter and a sound of many voices. All the doors and windows of the Castle are opened violently. Twelve windows are seen, and in each sits a Gnome. On a balcony sits the King, crowned, with a sceptre in his hand. From each door springs a Gnome, laughing, shouting, and jumping about. The trees lean over, trembling violently. Paul, astonished, stands facing the Castle)

SCENE IV.

KING [speaks from the balcony, in a high and nasal tone]: Ah, my sensible young master! O heart exempt from all corruption! You, who abandon your servant and yet believe yourself called upon to save the human race, — you have tripped twice in two minutes, through egoism and through pride! Now you belong to us!

PAUL [disdainfully]: I?

KING: Behold that tree! It is your servant himself! PAUL: Ye gods!

KING: Beneath the bark that hides him he still has his human feelings and his memory. You are about to become like him! PAUL [in a terrible tone, addressing the Gnomes that press around him]: Not while this sword —

KING: Draw it, then!

(Paul, who has his hand on his sword, is suddenly paralysed. His arms and legs preserve the attitude he took when last speaking. He becomes rigid and white, like a statue, and a ring shines on his marble hand)

KING [from the balcony, waves a golden sceptre]: Now we have made your shoulders solid enough to bear the destiny of the world! What do you say to it? Keep, as a spur to remorse, the memory of the past. Remain forever in your attitude of impotent menace. Your lidless eyes shall have the gift of seeing us, and your ears of hearing us, after you have been carried to our festal hall! Under your appearance of insensibility you shall live to suffer an eternal torture!

(All the Gnomes, joining hands, with great bursts of laughter and to the sound of infernal music, dance around the motionless statue)

NINTH TABLEAU. THE GREAT BANQUET.

Scene: An immense dining-hall. Many lamps are suspended from the ceiling by long chains, as in a church. At each side of the stage, at regular distances, are iron columns with Corinthian capitals, with heavy chains swinging between them, to which are suspended red hearts, as if for decoration. At the back, occupying the full width of the stage, a staircase with black steps leading to a gallery above, where the same arrangement of columns is repeated. These columns have no chains nor hearts, but have palm-leaves made of amethysts in their decorations, glimpses of the evening sky can be seen between them. table stands C., covered with golden dishes. The cloth is of purple, with a gold fringe. Twelve Gnomes of the first rank sit at the table, 0» each side. The King, a somewhat higher than those of the others, facing the audience, wears a crown ornamented with little diamond hearts. At R. I. E. Paul, as a marble statue, wearing the same costume as in the Eighth Tableau, preserves absolute immobility.

(Chorus of Gnomes celebrate their victory in a song, while little pages come forward on the gallery hearing dishes in their hands. They descend the steps and hand the dishes to the servants attending on the Gnomes. These servants place the dishes on the table, and as they pass before the statue, each makes an ironical salutation)

SCENE I.

FIRST GNOME [R. of King, looks at Paul]: Well, my heroic simpleton, how do you like your position now?

SECOND GNOME: Behold! now you are indeed above us!

THIRD GNOME: But always despising the little Gnomes!

ALL: Ha! Ha! Ha!

FOURTH GNOME: YOU wished to change the world, did you?

FIFTH GNOME: Change your attitude instead.

ALL: Ha! Ha! Ha!

SIXTH GNOME: Insult us to revenge yourself!

SEVENTH GNOME: Just to make us laugh!

ALL: Ha! Ha! Ha!

KING: Good! Amuse yourselves, worthy Gnomes, my faithful subjects! Let us feast royally to celebrate our victory over mankind! At present their hearts belong to us, and we have no need to be sparing of them. Our caves, our walls, our palaces, are bursting with them. Look around you! We procure them from every part of the world; there are some from Timbuctoo and many from Paris. We have the hearts of negroes and the hearts of duchesses; some that have palpitated from the effects of opium, under the Great Wall of China, and others that have grown a little rancid from being kept too long behind a London shop-counter!

(A long branch from a tree projects itself from the right and leans close to the statue)

Six GNOMES [L.] Look! Look there!

KING: Ah, it is only that idiot who was changed into a plum-tree standing near the wall of the Castle. [A second branch appears]

FIRST GNOME: NOW there, are two branches! They surround the statue, they embrace it!

KING: Pure sentimentality! It bores me! Cut them off! [A servant cuts off the two branches with a single blow of the knife to each. A terrible cry is heard. The branches bleed against the base of the pedestal]

SECOND GNOME: Delicate and sensitive to a degree! For a plum-tree, it is rather funny!

GNOMES: Ha! Ha! Ha!

FIRST GNOME [looks at the statue]: He is not at all moved, the wretch!

SECOND GNOME: Defend yourself, then! Animate yourself!

THIRD GNOME: YOU, too, wished to take your little share of hearts, eh?

FOURTH GNOME: Did you think that we must give them to you?

FIFTH GNOME: I should like to throw one in your face!

SIXTH GNOME: I should like to make him eat them all!

KING: Yes, and drink their blood! [Throws the contents of his cup at the statue. The red liquid dries and clings here and there to its face and its draperies]

SEVENTH GNOME: Answer us, coward!

EIGHTH GNOME: DO you hear? We scoff at your folly, your illusions, your courage!

NINTH GNOME: And that immaculate heart, where is it?

TENTH GNOME: You met some other nice hearts, did you not?

ELEVENTH GNOME: And some that loved you well!

TWELFTH GNOME: All the way from queens to the wives of bankers!

PAUL [immovable, repeats slowly]: Jeanne! Jeanne! Jeanne!

(The Gnomes, startled, spring from their chairs)

KING: Ah! Curse him!

(Jeanne appears, in the dress of a milkmaid, beside the pedestal of the statue. She climbs up and clasps Paul in her arms)

GNOMES: Look! Look!

KING: Hither! my grooms, soldiers, executioners, everyone! Come hither! Help!

(Gnomes rush on from all sides. The statue has gradually changed to lifelike hues, while the pedestal is lowered until Paul and Jeanne are on a level with the stage)

PAUL [holds Jeanne on his left arm and draws his sword]: Wretches, you are vanquished!

(A broad flash of lightning pierces the sky at the hack; thunder rolls; the Gnomes utter a loud cry, and they and the table disappear through a trap-door. Lights go down. The suspended hearts glow like little red lamps; the columns at the rear turn half way around, and the staircase appears as a heap of ruins)

SCENE II.

PAUL: IS it you? Is it indeed you? And have you pardoned me?

JEANNE: Monsieur Paul!

PAUL: Oh, do not speak to me like that any more! Lift your head, you who I have come to my aid before and have now delivered me, sweet angel of my life, my poor misunderstood love! And I, like a blind fool, sought others! How ungrateful I was for the past, how blind towards the future! I allowed myself to be led away by vain illusions, all the more irresistible because I found that each one of these unexpected monsters, in order to confuse me, assumed something of your ways, your image. But you, all the time, were far away!

JEANNE: Not so far as you think!

PAUL: What!

JEANNE: I, too, was blind.

PAUL: What do you mean?

JEANNE: DO you remember that Parisian coquette who disgusted you with her silly ways and her foolish talk?

PAUL [laughs]: Yes!

JEANNE [naively]: That was I!

PAUL: But —

JEANNE: DO you remember the stupid little bourgeoise in that hideous village?

PAUL: Don't speak to me of that little idiot!

JEANNE [piteously]: That was I!

PAUL: Impossible!

JEANNE: Have you forgotten that queen of infinite splendour, who, with a single gesture, caused men to die?

PAUL: Enough! Do not go on!

JEANNE [hides her face in her hands]: That, too, was I!

PAUL [recoils]: You!

JEANNE [throws her arms around his neck]: Yes, I! I did all that to find you again, to please you, to make you love me! I dare say it to you now! My love was so strong that, in order to reach you, I have passed through all the madness and the cruelty of the world. And as you never have understood this love, as you never have even perceived it — although it only increased at every repulse — to-day, in order to save you, I have descended from heaven!

PAUL: From heaven!

JEANNE: Ah, yes, you did not know? Listen! I died! Yes, the Gnomes deceived me! The Fairies have brought me to life only to save you. You must follow me now. Your hour has struck! Come! Come!

PAUL: Oh, yes, I believe you! I knew well what destiny was promised to me. In spite of all obstacles, I never have doubted it. And just now, while enclosed within the marble, I suffered untold impatience and anguish. Let us go! Lead me! The Gnomes are vanquished, let us leave the earth!

JEANNE: I shall take you to a land where the sky is always blue, where the flowers, like love, are eternal and immeasurable. There, my beloved, the storms never come; we shall have all space to hold our hearts; and our eyes, ever gazing upon each other, will have the brightness and steadfastness of the stars!

PAUL [embraces Jeanne]: Ah, delight of my soul, already the eternity of our happiness begins!

SCENE III.

(The Queen of the Fairies, who, during the latter part of this dialogue, has descended at the back, now comes forward and steps between Paul and Jeanne)

QUEEN: NO, not yet!

PAUL [indignant]: Thou, the Queen of the Fairies!
But thou didst promise me —

QUEEN: Hast thou forgotten our agreement? Thou hast accomplished only half of thy duty. The second half is more difficult, perhaps.
[Points to Jeanne] Before attaining to the felicity of your perpetual union, you must give back to mankind the hearts liberated by your bravery.

PAUL: But how can I do it by myself?

QUEEN [smiles]: Oh, we shall be there! The Fairies shall aid thee.
Thou hast to concern thyself only with those persons that are known to thee.

Try to convince them! Make them take back their hearts! In order that thou mayst become immortal, first perform the act of a god!

[Paul hides his face in his hands. Chorus of joyous voices is heard without]

PAUL [raises his face]: Those voices?

QUEEN: They come from the trees of the enchanted forest — the liberated beings who are now returning to their human forms.

SCENE IV.

(Enter Dominique R. with a bird's nest on his head. Instead of arms he has two branches covered with fruit. His arms stand out horizontally)

JEANNE [moved]: My brother! To see him like that!

DOMINIQUE [weeps]: My poor master! At last I find you again. My tears fall like rain along my trunk — my body, I mean! I cannot clasp you in my arms — they even cut off some of my branches! I should like so much to embrace you! Cursed gluttony! you are to blame for all this! [Bends his head and bites off a plum near his face; weeps again] Ah, great heavens, what unhappiness!

JEANNE: Have pity on him, good fairy!

QUEEN [to Paul]: Since thou lovest him, be it so!

(The branches drop off Dominique and his arms appear. At a movement of his head the nest falls off, and eggs roll out of it; one of them breaks, and a bird flies out and disappears)

QUEEN [to Dominique]: But thou wilt go —

DOMINIQUE: Oh, anywhere, everywhere! Since I have pulled up the roots, I ask nothing better than to do something to take off the numbness!

QUEEN [points to columns]: Thou wilt go with thy master in order to help him return the hearts to those that lack them.

DOMINIQUE: Willingly! [Looks at the suspended hearts and scratches his ear] But — see what a quantity there is! I shall have a pretty heavy cargo!

QUEEN: NO. Look! [The hearts diminish to the size of nuts and assume a golden hue] DOMINIQUE: Oh, that is odd! that is certainly very queer! They won't be very heavy now. Let's try them! [Attempts to climb the column L. E.]

QUEEN: No; get down! [The capitals of the columns at R. and L. half open, letting fall a shower of hearts]

DOMINIQUE [gathers them up]: One would think they were only sugared bonbons.

QUEEN: They will be all the easier to take. [To Paul, who has remained motionless beside the column R.] What dost thou there? Why dost thou remain silent?

PAUL [aside]: I lose her at the very moment of victory, when all seemed finished, and I thought she was mine forever!

JEANNE [entreatingly]: Oh, do not despair! Go! Go! if you love me! You know not what destiny awaits you! Do as she commands, at once!

DOMINIQUE: Come, my poor master! We must make one more journey — the last! [Paul extends his mantle to receive some of the hearts, while Dominique puts others in his pockets]

QUEEN [points to horizon]: Go, now!

PAUL [turns to Jeanne and embraces her]: Jeanne!

QUEEN [waves him away]: No! to thy duty! Hers is already accomplished on the earth. I will transport her back to the happy regions where she will await thee, where thou shalt find her when thy virtue has made thee worthy of her love!

(Paul and Dominique go up stage and begin to climb the ruined staircase, stumbling among the stones)

JEANNE: Farewell!

PAUL [from a distance]: Farewell!

(Dominique turns to throw a kiss. The capitals of all the columns half open and allow a stream of little golden hearts to fall. At the same moment the Fairies glide upon the stage and begin to gather up the hearts in their robes. Jeanne stands, much moved, R. I, E. near the Queen, who holds her hand. Paul and Dominique can be seen far off on the horizon)

TENTH TABLEAU. THE VILLAGE FETE.

Scene: A fine park near Paris, the property of the banker, Kloecker. At each side of the stage are large trees and flowering shrubs. A low wall runs across the back, with steps C., forming an entrance. On each side of the steps are tall vases full of flowers. Other vases are placed at regular distances along the wall. Beyond, the open country can be seen, with a view of Paris in the distance. In the centre of the stage is a small grass-plot.

SCENE I.

(Monsieur and Madame Kloecker, Letourneux, Alfred de Cisy, Onésime Dubois, Macaret, Dr. Colombel, Bouvignard, Guests, etc., all in fashionable summer attire. It is evening. As the curtain rises, Guests are arriving from L. and scattering about in various directions. Mme. Kloecker leans on the arm of Alfred de Cisy. Bouvignard hastens on alone, stands still, R., and draws a flask of faience from his pocket, wrapped in a handkerchief. Unfolds it carefully and contemplates it with delight)

MME. KLOEKHER [draws a deep breath] At last we can find a little relief out here, from the village festival, with its noises of horns and drums — most annoying while we were dining!

KLOEKHER: You are right. So tiresome that the very day one chooses to receive his friends, the common people must take that time to have one of their noisy festivals!

LETOURNEUX: Ah, if in their diversions they would only respect morality!

MACARET: Pshaw! They would only come to our doors and cry about their miseries.

COLOMBEL: And we should have to receive them into the hospitals, where we spend altogether too much time on them as it is. [Exit LETOURNEUX gaily]: To think, that two such good friends as we should ever have been so near a falling-out, my good Kloekher!

KLOEKHER: SO near it! Why we were furious at each other!
[Laughs]

LETOURNEUX [laughs]: And what about, I ask? All on account of that little Monsieur Payl!

KLOEKHER [angrily]: That rascally intriguer!

ALFRED [shrugs his shoulders]: A lunatic!

MME. KLOEKHER: A very queer fellow! [sits on a bench L. Alfred sits beside her]

KLOEKHER: DO you know what has become of him?

ALFRED: No. Awfully sorry!

MME. KLOEKHER: YOU are not weeping over it, are you, Onésime, — you who were his friend?

ONESIME: I, Madame? Never in the world, I assure you!

MME. KLOEKHER [laughs]: Wouldn't it be amusing if he could only be here next week, to be one of the ushers at your marriage?

KLOEKHER: Good heavens! don't let us talk any more about that fellow! Suppose we discuss the first plan of action in that new operation of ours, Letourneux?

LETOURNEUX: With pleasure. [They talk together as they pace slowly to and fro up stage]

MME. KLOEKHER [to Onésime]: They say your fiancée is a very sweet girl.

ONESIME: Well, she is certainly not remarkably beautiful! But — there are other advantages!

MACARET: What's the matter with Bouvignard? He seems to be very much engrossed with that thing he's looking at. [Macaret and Onésime approach Bouvignard]

BOUVIGNARD [to Onésime]: You are an artist — look at that! What a design! What an enamel! [Onésime puts out his hand to take the vase] Take care! No, I will point out its beauties to you myself. [Shows it to them from every point of view]

MME. KLOEKHER [in low tones]: Is it all understood, then? I shall receive for next Saturday my invitation to go to the house of Madame the Countess de Trémanville?

ALFRED: And for all the following Saturdays. [Kloekher and Letourneux pass before them, talking and gesticulating] My aunt begs that you will come.

You will find a great difference in the people and the surroundings, I assure you. [Aside] Caught, my little bourgeoise!

MME. KLOEKHER: Oh, thank you! And I shall run no risk of being alarmed as I was the other day, shall I?

ALFRED: NO, no! be sure of that! The fact is, I lost my head, all about nothing; but everything is perfectly arranged now. I adore you, Ernestine! [Indicates Kloekher] You must speak to him of me as a man entirely devoted to his interests, ready to follow his lead, to whom he may safely entrust his most confidential affairs.

MME. KLOEKHER: Oh, certainly, my friend!

ALFRED [aside]: If she doesn't do that, I shall have to fly to Belgium in a week!

MACARET: And have you bought it?

BOUVIGNARD: Yes, for eighty francs — not a sou more — in a wine-shop not far from here.

(Noise of horns and firing of guns heard without)

MME. KLOEKHER [rises]. More noise! This is intolerable! Really, we must complain to the authorities!

(Noise increases; cries of enthusiasm and the movement of a large crowd are heard)

SCENE II.

COLOMBEL [re-enters]: Do you know that out there in the square, among the shops, something very original, extraordinary, and amusing is going on? I have seen many mountebanks in my day, but never one like that! A man out there is selling hearts for a sou apiece.

ALFRED: That is not dear!

A LADY: NO, but very curious!

A GENTLEMAN: It might be worth while to see him. What say you?

ANOTHER GUEST: We should only be compelled to listen to his impertinences.

MACARET: Sometimes these rascals are very amusing, however.
[Guests surround Mme. Kloekher]

MME. KLOEKHER: I don't know whether I ought or not — Is he a person one could ask to come in here, Doctor?

COLOMBEL: Oh, for yourself — certainly not, fair lady! You have no need of him. But [To the other Ladies] as for us, from whom you have stolen all our hearts —

KLOEKHER [about to go]: Bah! A truce to your flattery! I am going to call him.

GUESTS: Bravo! Good! Capital idea!

COLOMBEL [goes up stage, makes a sign off R.]: Come here! I shall take the liberty, in my character of a physician, to give you a little surprise, ladies!

SCENE III.

(Enter Paul, wearing long white hair and beard and a large velvet cloak that covers his figure completely. Dominique follows him, dressed as a Chinaman, carrying on his back a large box and a red leather bag, and in his hand a small folding-chair. They halt upon the grass-plot C. Dominique puts the bag upon the chair)

A LADY: Oh, this is going to be very nice! It amuses me already. I love conjurers.

MME. KLOEKHER: DO you need a table to assist you in performing your tricks?

PAUL: Thank you, Madame. I do not perform tricks. My mission is a higher one. It is to bring about your moral health and amelioration that I am here. I am charged by the Fairies to give you back your stolen hearts!

MEN: What! Our hearts!

ALFRED: He is very polite, your Nostradamus!

PAUL: It is not a matter of politeness. I speak seriously, believe me!

MEN: How funny! How very amusing! [Laughter]

COLOMBEL [to Mme. Kloekher]: Did I not tell you his manner was perfect?

DOMINIQUE [pours a quantity of gilded bonbons from the bag upon the folding-chair] Now, gentlemen, who forbids you? Come, ladies, a little courage! They are pretty, sweet as sugar, and very wholesome!

COLOMBEL: He expresses himself well, this Chinaman from Paris!

DOMINIQUE: NO, Monsieur, we have just arrived from Pipempohé [strokes his moustache], where the Sultan made us the most flattering offers!

GUESTS [laugh]: Pipempohé! The Sultan!

PAUL: And after that I captured them in the fortress of the Gnomes!

GUESTS: The Gnomes! How seriously he speaks!

ONESIME: Let him go on.

PAUL: But I have finished. I tell you once more that, acting upon the commands of the Fairies, I must return to you your hearts.

DOMINIQUE [taps the box on his back]: Hearts! hearts! hearts I Come and get your hearts!

PAUL [checks him]: Be quiet! [Clasps his hands entreatingly] Ah, it is for your sakes that I come! Take them! Hasten, I beg of you!

A LADY: Does one eat them?

MME. KLOEKHER: DO not touch the things! Perhaps they are drugged.

ONESIME: All the same, I am going to risk it! Come on, Bouvignard, I'll buy one for you. Do as I do! [Hands a piece of money to Paul, and begins to crunch a bonbon heart. Bouvignard does the same]

A LADY [speaks low]: Very singular people, these artists!

COLOMBEL [gives money to Paul and takes a bonbon]: Well, of course I must follow Onésime's example, seeing that I brought this funny fellow here.

ONESIME [suddenly strikes his forehead with his hand]: Unhappy that I am! Where is she?

MME. KLOEKHER: Of whom are you speaking?

ONESIME: Clémence!

MME. KLOEKHER [aside]: What are you thinking of, to say that before every one? Remember your approaching marriage!

ONESIME: Never mind my marriage! [Exit calling loudly] Clémence! Clémence!

BOUVIGNARD [raises his voice]: What stupidity to waste money on such trifles as that! [Throws his vase on the floor; it breaks] That's a good thing! Now I will sell my whole collection to obtain a dowry for my poor daughter.

COLOMBEL [.speaks to himself pacing to and fro]: To buy the land, say, a million francs! I'll do it! As to the rest, what with private subscriptions and an appeal to the government, I shall be able to found my great hospital! [Sees that the others are observing him] Yes, gentlemen, I intend to consecrate my future, my time, my science, and all my efforts, to this great work! The practice shall be directed by noted specialists; the halls shall be hung with tapestry; the beds shall be of mahogany. Devil take me if I don't do it!

GUESTS [surprised]: What does this mean?

LETOURNEUX: That stuff contains something that affects the brain.

PAUL: Take one! I do not sell them; I give them freely.

MACARET: Well, at that price — Besides, I don't see what interest he would have in doing any harm! [Eats a bonbon]

PAUL [to Alfred]: And you, Monsieur, surely you are not afraid to try one, when so many others have tasted them?

ALFRED: I! Afraid! The idea! I will take two of them. [Takes two bonbons and eats one]

MME. KLOEKHER: YOU, too?

ALFRED [aside to Mme. Kloekher]: But, it is really excellent — sweeter than honey and soft as a kiss! Share with me the passion that tortures me! Although I have said before that I loved you, what I feel now is a new love. Let us quit this horrible existence! Let us fly far away to some unknown shore, to the depths of a forest or to a desert! It matters not where if we are only together, that I may have the bliss of cherishing you forever! [Puts a bonbon to the lips of Mme. Kloekher; she eats it]

MME. KLOEKHER [drops her veil and takes her husband's arm affectionately]: Alphonse, my dear!

KLOEKHER: Hey? What?

MME. KLOEKHER: These people bore me! We used to be so cosy together in our pretty home! I love thee!

KLOEKHER [aside]: Now my wife says she loves me! She has lost her head!

MACARET [sobs in a corner, R.]: Oh! oh! Good heavens! Oh!

KLOEKHER: What is the matter with you?

MACARET [takes no notice of him]: Oh! oh! So many precious days lost! Oh! I am like Titus!

(The Guests, who have all taken the bonbons, now press near Paul)

DOMINIQUE [aside to Paul]: This is going well!

PAUL [aside]: No, we still have some left. Dominique! [Dominique knocks on the box]

PAUL [impatiently]: Come! Come, then!

KLOEKHER [irritated]: This farce is played out! Every one has had enough of it. Get out, now!

PAUL: You have not had one, — you, Alphonse-Jean-Baptiste-Isidore Kloekher!

KLOEKHER: Insolent! Who told you my names?

PAUL: I know them!

KLOEKHER and LETOURNEUX: Get out! Be off!

PAUL: Not until you have taken this heart!

KLOEKHER: I?

PAUL: I conjure you!

KLOEKHER: But this is an outrage!

PAUL: I command you!

KLOEKHER [remains silent with anger a moment, then takes a majestic pose]: By what right? [Paul, without replying, takes off with a single movement, his wig and beard and the velvet robe. Kloekher raises his hands, amazed and shocked as if at the sight of a spectre]
He!

MME. KLOEKHER [takes his arm gently, points to Paul, and speaks softly]: Monsieur Paul!

LETOURNEUX [bites his thumb and turns his back]: Paul de Damvilliers!

A LADY: What a delightful surprise!

COLOMBEL: That excellent young man!

ALFRED [presses Paul's hand]: Dear friend! [Guests surround Paul and shake hands with him]

KLOEKHER: Good heavens! is every one his friend? Suppose he should tell! [Suddenly extends his hand] I will have one! [Eats a bonbon]

DOMINIQUE [aside]: That's what we wanted!

KLOEKHER [in a half choked voice]: AH! Wait! Oh, what have I done? I forgot! Those poor men that I caused to be sent away to the prison at Clichy the day before yesterday! [Addresses a Lady] Call François! [To a Gentleman] Pierre! Set them free! Send some one to their assistance!

LETOURNEUX [approaches Kloekher anxiously]: My friend!

KLOEKHER: And that worthy fellow, the inventor, to whom I refused twenty thousand francs. I must see about him! Where is my strong-box?

LETOURNEUX: But you are not serious, Kloekher?

KLOEKHER: Leave me, you! [Letourneux recoils with a gesture of astonishment and pity] I am happy! Yes! Do you hear, all of you? Happy that you are here to witness an act of — of — justice, — no. an act of confidence. It is a matter of restitution — what did I say? — rather, of a sacred trust! [Strikes his breast with both hands] Fool that I am! Yes, I repeat, a sacred trust!

PAUL [proudly]: I did not come here for that, Monsieur!

KLOEKHER: That does not matter, young man! I shall profit by the occasion. I feel a great burden lifted from my heart, and not later than this very night I shall make restitution. [Presses Paul's hand. Sound heard of villagers rejoicing] How pleasant it is to hear the gaiety of the people! It doubles our own happiness to know that they are happy too. Poor people! they have none too many holidays throughout the long year. [Calls loudly] Open the champagne! Call them all in! Open the gates! Ah, what a glorious day! [Posy light thrown on the stage] I see life through rose-coloured spectacles to-day!

SCENE IV.

(Enter a throng of Villagers, also Father and Mother Thomas and the proprietor of the wine-shop)

THE PEOPLE: Long live Kloekher! Long live Monsieur Kloekher!

KLOEKHER: My heart swells!

MACARET [sobs in his corner]: Ah, how touching! DOMINIQUE [taps his box]: Hasten, hasten! Follow the crowd! Come, take the rest of the hearts!

(The people surround Paul and Dominique. Three servants in livery carry around baskets filled with bottles of champagne. Kloekher pulls out the corks, and, followed by a servant, mingles with the people and presses them to drink)

KLOEKHER: Drink it down! Toss it off, boys! (The rosy light deepens gradually until the end of the Tableau. Luminous tulips and sunflowers bloom among the trees. The grapes on a vine clinging around an oak-tree are turned into garnets; the leaves change to silver; and the leaves on all the other trees and shrubs turn to precious stones. The People embrace one another and dance about with joy. Father and Mother Thomas throw kisses to their son)

DOMINIQUE [to Paul]: Well, all is finished, my good master! there is nothing more in the bag. Let us amuse ourselves like the rest.

PAUL [takes a bonbon from the chair, holds it between his fingers and speaks slowly]: There is still one left!

DOMINIQUE [takes bonbon quickly]: Well, there won't be long! I'll fix that! [To a Gentleman] You, Monsieur?

GENTLEMAN: I have had one.

DOMINIQUE [to a Lady]: You, Madame.

LADY: I, too, have had one.

DOMINIQUE: Here it is! The last one!

LADIES: We have all had one!

ALL: All! All!

PAUL [speaks low]: But that would be terrible! It is impossible!

DOMINIQUE [speaks low, terrified, still holding the heart, which grows larger each moment]: Master! Look! It grows! It swells!

LETOURNEUX [comes up behind Paul and slaps his shoulder]: You would like very much to have me swallow that, wouldn't you?

PAUL: Yes! Yes! Pardon me for that which I did to you! [Shows the heart] Take it! It will bring you peace of mind, the power to do good, appreciation of all that is beautiful, the ability to comprehend, simultaneously, humanity, nature and God! [Letourneux smiles ironically, without moving] But who are you, then, to remain insensible in the face of the happiness of all? From what stone were you quarried? Have you never loved anything, any one? Have you never dreamed of possessing happiness, or grieved to lose it? Ah, if it is necessary, in order to convince you, let me pour out my blood, go to the ends of the earth, serve you as a slave! Have pity! I beseech you! Yield to my entreaties! Take the heart!

LETOURNEUX: Thanks! It would bore me too much!

PAUL: Farewell, then, Jeanne! I am accursed! I have lost thee! (The low wall at the back rises in height, and the flight of steps, now turned to silver, is lengthened. From each of the large vases of flowers emerges a woman. Each extends her arms so that they rest on the shoulders of her next neighbour, forming a long file. They are in white garments, decorated with pearls. Among the clouds above them at the back, the lower part of the Palace of the Fairies can be seen, with moonlight shining upon it, making it look like mother-of-pearl. Jeanne is seen standing in front of it at the top of the flight of steps. Paul, turning to follow the glance of Letourneux, perceives her and calls her name loudly. He runs up the steps. As he goes his dress changes to a costume appropriate to an apotheosis, — white with a flowing mantle. At every step he takes, a melodious strain issues from the stairs, following all the notes of the scale. When he reaches Jeanne he opens his arms to embrace her; at that instant the Queen of the Fairies appears at Jeanne's side while the other Fairies group themselves in the rear and at R. and L. On the peristyle of the Palace, which now shines clear and white Paul stops and draws back)

PAUL: I dare not advance, O Queen! My mission is not finished. I have left evil still upon the earth!

QUEEN: There must always be evil upon earth! Thou hast not the less merited thy reward! Be happy in immortality!

DOMINIQUE [with one foot on the lowest step, and holding the heart in his hand]: And I, O Queen! What must I do with this heart?

QUEEN: Be thou the Guardian of Hearts! Keep a watch over those that cheat; console those that lose!

(Dominique is changed into the Guardian of Hearts. The heart in his hand flies into the air at his left and rests upon a white square, which is of a proper size to hold it and serves as a foundation for it. A long narrow banner unfolds itself in the air, displaying in luminous letters these words):

VIRTUE BEING REWARDED, THERE IS NOTHING MORE TO SAY!

Une clairière dans les bois. Il fait nuit complète. A la lueur exagérée des vers luisants, on distingue çà et là de grandes masses de verdure et parmi elles des blancheurs qui circulent. Au fond, à droite, un petit lac. Le rideau se lève. Silence. On n'entend qu'un bruit de pas.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

Du fond et des deux côtes de la scène débouchent des Fées, un doigt sur les lèvres. Elles sont coiffées de fleurs rustiques et de fleurs marines avec des roseaux, des épis de blé et des glaïeuls sur la tête, avec toutes les couleurs et tous les attributs des milieux où elles vivent : fées des bois, des fleuves, des montagnes. Elles se détournent pour regarder derrière elles, comme si elles avaient peur de quelque chose, se cherchent et s'appellent à voix basse dans les ténèbres.

PREMIERE FEE.

Pstt ! pstt !

DEUXIEME FEE.

Par ici !

TROISIEME FEE. Attendez-moi : mon pied s'est pris dans un rayon de lumière. Un effort ! Elle bondit. Et me voilà !

QUATRIEME FEE. Sommes-nous toutes réunies ?

TOUTES LN CHOEUR. Oui. Toutes, toutes !

CINQUIEME FEE. Il Tait nuit, la terre dort ! C'est notre heure ! Allons, sautez, papillons !

D'énormes phalènes lumineuses, s'élançant des arbres, se mettent a voler dans l'air en même temps que' les Fées à danser, sur un rythme lent, avec un bourdonnement de fuie.

CHOEUR DES FEES. Puisqu'on nous chasse de partout, dans le jour* chez les hommes, prenons nos ébats en liberté, pendant la nuit, dans les bois.

Les hommes sont méchant-, mais la nature est bonne. Le pavé des villes est dur, mais l'herbe des prairies est douce.

Ne souillons plus nos pieds dans leur fange, ne brisons plus nos coeurs contre leur poitrine.

Le suc de l'euphorbe est moins perfide que leurs tendresses, la feuille desséchée qui roule au vent d'automne plus constante que leurs serments...

Assez de fatigue ! Tant pis pour eux ! Débarrasses de tout soin humain, nous n'en serons que plus heureuses.

Nous ne quitterons plus nos régions natales, la liberté de l'air, dis eaux et des bois.

Balançons-nous, suspendues aux lianes des arbres avec la roîée des nuits d'été ; courons sur la surface des lacs bleus, cramponnées au dos des demoiselles ; remontons vers le soleil, dans les rayons poussiéreux qui passent par le soupirail des celliers ! Allons ! vive la joie ! en avant ! Pétales des roses, palpitez ! Ondes, murmurez ! Lune, lève-toi !

La lune peu à peu s'est levée pendant le chœur des Fées. Elle brille maintenant sur le lac, et les Fées se livrent à une joie extravagante, quand tout à coup, au milieu d'elles, et du sein d'une grosse touffe de bruyères sauvages, occupant le milieu de la scène, apparaît la Reine des Fées. Stupéfaction générale. Toutes s'écrient : "La Reine !" et s'arrêtent.

SCÈNE II

LA REINE, LES FÉES.

LA REINE, d'un ton courroucé.

Comment ! voilà le soin que vous prenez des hommes !

LES FÉES, se récriant.

Eh ! nous n'y pouvons rien. Nous avons tout essayé.

LA REINE, avec véhémence.

Mais quelques minutes encore, songez-y ! et nous retombons pendant mille ans sous la domination des Gnômes, puisque cette nuit est la dernière qui nous reste pour rendre aux hommes leurs cœurs volés.

UNE FEE.

Ils ne se plaignent pas d'en manquer, ô Reine ! Personne, jusqu'à présent, n'a redemandé le sien. Au contraire, il y a des parents qui enseignent à leurs petits...

LA REINE.

Qu'importe ! Ignorez-vous donc que les Gnômes ne peuvent vivre sans les cœurs des hommes, car c'est pour s'en nourrir qu'ils les dérobent en leur mettant à la place, là, Elle désigne sa poitrine.

je ne sais quel rouage de leur invention, lequel imite parfaitement bien les mouvements de la nature.

UNE FEE, riant.

En vérité, on s'y trompe !

LA REINE.

Et les pauvres humains se laissent faire sans répugnance. Quelques-uns même y trouvent du plaisir. Petit à petit, et par l'effet d'un accord mutuel, pendant que le cœur sort du dedans, les génies du mal le tirent du dehors ; et c'est ainsi que leur race entière, ou presque entière, est vide de bons sentiments et de pensées généreuses.

UNE FEE.

Et tu veux que nous vainquions les Gnômes ?

LA REINE.

Oui, recommencez la lutte. Un ordre supérieur a partagé entre eux et vous l'empire du monde. Nous les avons vaincus autrefois ; mais, depuis mille ans, ils triomphent. Les hommes, tyrannisés par eux, s'abandonnent aux exigences de la matière. L'esprit des Gnômes a pénétré dans la moelle de leurs os ; il les enveloppe, les empêche de nous reconnaître et leur cache comme un brouillard la splendeur de la vérité, le soleil de l'idéal.

LES FEES.

Eh ! tant pis, les Gnomes ne peuvent rien contre nous.

LA REINE.

Mais à mesure qu'ils étendent leur pouvoir, le vôtre se rétrécit. On repousse vos consolations, on se moque de nos espoirs, on nie même notre existence, et quand ils auront conquis toute la terre, ils convoiteront des régions plus pures ; ils se jetteront sur vous avec mille forces accrues, et vos cœurs, comme ceux des autres, seront dévorés !

Les Fées poussent un cri d'épouvante.

Rassurez-vous, écoutez-moi !

Elles se rassemblent autour d'elle.

Tout pour sauver le genre humain d'abord, et vous ensuite, il faut attaquer la puissance de vos ennemis dans son repaire, c'est-à-dire dans l'endroit inaccessible où ils tiennent en réserve les cœurs des hommes.

LES FEES, tumultueusement.

Allons-y !

LA REINE.

Restez ! L'entreprise ne peut réussir que par le complet accord de deux amants.

LES FEES.

Oh ! ce n'est pas rare, cela ; et sur la quantité...

LA REINE.

Je veux dire deux amants d'une ardeur et d'une pureté plus qu'humaine, et dont l'un soit capable de mourir pour l'autre, sans avoir même l'espérance d'une larme sur sa tombe.

LES FEES, se récriant. Oh ! oh ! oh ! Où les trouver ?

LA REINE.

Je l'ignore. Ils peuvent être là, tout près, comme à l'autre bout du monde, sous des haillons ou sur un trône. Fouillez partout, dans les villes, les déserts et les bois, et, du bord des plages au sommet des monts, ne négligez rien ; allez !

Bruit de pas dans la coulisse.

On vient, cachons-nous ! Des yeux mortels ne doivent pas nous voir.

Le soleil peu à peu s'est levé et, à travers le brouillard, il laisse voir à droite une cabane, au fond d'un massif d'arbres. Au bruit des pas qui se rapprochent, les Fées disparaissent, les unes dans les troncs des arbres voisins, d'autres plongent da-is le laci d'autres s'évanouissent dans le brouillards

SCÈNE ///

LE PÈRE THOMAS, LA MÈRE THOMAS, paysans des environs de Paris ; DOMI- NIQ.UE, leur fils, avec vue vieille livrée ; M. PAUL, en costume de voyage fané, un crêpe à son chapeau ; il a l'air fort accablé.

LE PERE THOMAS. Du courage, mon bon monsieur Paul !

LA MERE THOMAS. Allons, il faut vous mettre en route pour Paris et ne pas négliger vos affaires ; quelques lieues de marche, ce n'est pas le diable !

PAUL.

Oui, je serai fort, je vais partir.

LE PERE THOMAS. Oh ! rien ne presse.

LA MERE THOMAS, à part, désignant son mari. Imbécile, va !

PAUL.

Merci, mes braves gens ; mais quant à abuser plus longtemps de votre hospitalité...

LE PERE THOMAS, à part.

Ah ! enfin, il comprend !

DOMINIQUE.

Elle n'était pas digne de vous, c'est vrai ! et je m'étonne que Monsieur ait consenti à la subir. Puisque l'ancien régisseur de Monsieur, ce misérable, n'a pas eu le cœur de vous offrir un appartement dans le château, c'était bien la peine de venir ici pour écouter la kyrielle de ces maudits comptes. En vérité, Monsieur n'est pas heureux depuis quelque temps.

PAUL, rêvant.

Oui, c'a été comme une conjuration... un acharnement du hasard ; la mort subite de mon père, des dettes anciennes qui se présentent, une ruine complète enfin, sans qu'on puisse en saisir la cause ni accuser personne.

DOMINIQUE.

Quel guignon ! Nous menions une si belle vie à voyager ensemble tous les deux !

PAUL.

Calme-toi, bon Dominique, et 11e parle plus du temps récent et déjà loin où nous vagabondions pour mon plaisir à travers les Indes et l'Orient. Plus de regrets ! Il va encore falloir se lancer dans le monde, mais pour y chercher fortune.

Il rêve.

LE PERE THOMAS.

Le difficile, c'est de l'attraper.

PAUL.

Bah ! avec du courage !

Se tournant vers Dominique.

Et puis, tu ne m'abandonnes pas.

DOMINIQUE.

Oh ! non, non ! J'ai confiance en Monsieur ; je l'ai vu à l'œuvre. N'importe ! Ce serait le cas, si Monsieur veut le permettre, d'avoir à notre service quelques-uns de ces génies bienfaisants dont vous étiez si curieux là-bas ! En avez vous consulté de CvS magiciens de toutes les couleurs, en robe verte, en robe jaune, en robe bleue, en manteau bariolé, sans compter ceux qui n'avaient pas de chemine ! Et on aurait dit, vraiment, que vous croyiez à toutes leur fariboles.

PAUL.

Peut-être ! pourquoi pas ?... Mais je n'ai que trop tardé, adieu !...

SCÈ^CE IV

LES PRECEDEXTS, JEANNE ;

LA MERE THOMAS.

Qu'est-ce que tu viens faire ici, toi, fainéante ?

PAUL, affligé.

Oh ! comme vous la traitez !

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

N'allez-vous pas la défendre, monsieur Paul ? Après tout, vous avez raison, allez : elle a assez parlé de vous pendant votre voyage.

PAUL.

Comment, ma mignonne, tu ne m'avais pas oublié ! Tu pensais a moi ?

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Si elle y pensait, bonté divine ! Figurez-vous que depuis cinq ans elle parlait de vous continuellement : "Où est-il ? Quand reviendra-t-il ?" Elle demandait de vos nouvelles à tous les rou- liers qui passaient, et quand le vent soufflait sur le lac, elle avait peur pour votre navire.

LE PÈRE THOMAS, voulant chasser Jeanne qui s'est rapprochée.

Ça ne te regarde pas. A l'ouvrage !...

PA UL.

Comme tu as grandi ! Te voilà une belle fille, maintenant ! Veux-tu que je t'embrasse ?

Elle baisse la tête.

DOMINIQUE.

Avance donc, nigaude !

J EANNE, présentant son front timidement, et d'une voix émue.

Vous allez partir ?

PAUL.

Oui, chère petite. Il le faut !

Il l'embrasse.

JEANNE, s'avançant vers son frère.

Adieu aussi, toi !

Se tournant vers le père et la mère.

Car il suit Monsieur ! Il me l'a promis !

LA MÈRE THOMAS, à part, à Dominique.

Tout ruiné qu'il est ?

DOMINIQUE, à part.

Nous attendons des héritages !... Et puis... et puis...

LA MÈRE THOMAS, à part.

Défie-toi !

DOMINIQUE, à part.

D'ailleurs, il sera toujours temps de le planter là, s'il ne réussit pas. On parlera de moi comme d'un serviteur modèle. Ça pose !... Et avec une ou deux réclames dans les journaux... de sport... J'ai pour amis des auteurs !

LE PÈRE THOMAS. Au moins, envoie-nous de temps en temps...

DOMINIQUE.

Impossible ! Mes capitaux sont... seront engagés. Nous connaissons des gens de Bourse !

LA MÈRE THOMAS, avec admiration. Quel gaillard !

DOMINIQUE. Mais dès que j'aurai une position sérieuse...

LE PÈRE THOMAS, s'épanouissant.

Ah !

DOMINIQUE.

Je vous donnerai de mes nouvelles !

LA MÈRE THOMAS. Soigne-toi bien, au moins !

DOMINIQUE. Moi avant tout ! C'est un principe !

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Et ne te ruine pas le tempérament avec les particulières en falbalas.

DOMINIQUE.

Allons donc ! On est revenu de ces folichonne-ries. Le positif ! Je ne sors pas de là !

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

A-t-il de l'esprit !

DOMINIQUE.

Et maintenant, les anciens, bonsoir, bon appétit et bonne santé !

Il embrasse le père.

Et d'une !

Il embrasse la mère.

Et de deux ! C'est fini ! Embarqué !

PAUL.

Malgré ma détresse, il veut me suivre : vous le voyez !

DOMINIQUE.

Oh ! tant qu'il y en aura pour vous, je me contente ! Vous ne pouvez pas vivre sans valet de chambre ! C'est indécent ! Je ferai retourner ma livrée, mettre un galon neuf à mon chapeau, et nous ferons encore belle figure, saperlotte ! Monsieur, à vos ordres !

JEANNE, sautant au cou de son frère.

Oh ! mon bon frère !

LE PERE THOMAS, a Dominique. Prends garde !

DOMINIQUE.

Oui ! oui !

LA MÈRE THOMAS. Écoute donc !

DOMINIQUE, s'éloignant. N'ayez pas peur.

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Reviens !

DOMINIQUE.

On se reverra !

LA MÈRE THOMAS. Mon pauvre fils !

DOMINIQUE. Je vous écrirai !

lia disparu.

PAUL, au père et à la mère.

Je ne puis le retenir. Adieu ! Adieu ! Rassurez- vous. Nous allons faire fortune.

Il sort.

SCÈPCE V

LE PÈRE THOMAS, LA MÈRE THOMAS, JEANNE.

LE PÈRE THOMAS, rêvant.

Faire fortune !... devenir un gros monsieur... avoir de bons morceaux de terre... des prés... des bois... un moulin... et marcher sur le ventre à tout le monde... c'est ça qui est beau !

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Je crois bien !

A Jeanne.

Aussi, tu entends, toi, tu vas piocher, je t'en réponds, au lieu de passer des heures entières à regarder comme tu fais dans le blanc des nuages.

JEANNE.

Cependant, dès le petit matin...

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Bah ! tout ça c'est de la paresse...

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Écoute, il me vient une idée.

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Ça rapportera-t-il ?

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Peut-être. Si nous envoyions Jeannette à Paris ?

JEANNE.

Aller toute seule... là-bas... dans la grande ville...

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Dame ! il y en a plus d'une qui est partie en sabots de son village... et qu'on a vue revenir... Qui sait !

Regardant Jeanne.

Pas déjà si chiffonnée, la Jeannette !... Eh ! pourquoi pas ? C'est décidé. A partir de demain...

JEANNE.

Je vous en supplie...

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Oh ! nous n'épargnerons rien. Ton père et moi nous saurons faire des sacrifices. N'est-ce pas, Thomas ? Et pour commencer, je te donne ma capeline rouge... Avec mes vieilles coiffes nous trouverons bien moyen... Seras-tu assez gentille !... Ah ! vois-tu, Jeannette, il faut de la coquetterie... mais de la bonne, de la vraie... de celle qui fait pousser des gros sous... et assure l'existence des parents... des bons parents.

JEANNE.

Que devenir à Paris, toute seule ?... Je ne saurai seulement pas me retrouver dans les rues...

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Bah ! il y a des gens polis... qui vous enseignent...

JEANNE.

Je n'y connais personne.

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Eh bien ! et Dominique ? Il a de si belles connaissances ! Des banquiers, des militaires... tout le gouvernement, quoi !

JEANNE.

Non, je n'oserai jamais !

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Sans compter monsieur Paul qui se fera un plaisir...

JEANNE.

Lui !... Une pauvre fille comme moi !

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Mais saperlipopette !...

LA MÈRE THOMAS, au père.

Tais-toi. Tu ne sais pas la prendre.

A Jeanne.

Paris et ma belle agrafe d'or... ou bien la maison et...

Elle fait signe de lui donner des giffes. JEANNE, avec résignation.

Eh bien ! j'irai.

LA MERE THOMAS.

Enfin ! Mai ; d'ici là tu ne vas pas te croiser les bras. A l'ouvrage, et vivement !

JEANNE.

Tout de suite.

LE PÈRE THOMAS.

Par ici.

LA MÈRE THOMAS.

Par là.

JEANNE.

Je ne sais plus...

LA MÈRE THOMAS, lui donnant un soufflet. Voilà pour t'apprendre.

LE PERE THOMAS. Piaule, sanglote, file !

Ils sortent en poussant Jeanne devant eux.

SCÈ&CE VI

LES FÉES reparaissent.

TOUTES LES FÉES.

Ah ! les sales vieux ! Heureusement les jeunes sont meilleurs, ce qui nous fait déjà deux cœurs purs.

UNE DES FÉES.

Sans doute. Mais lui, comment pourra-t-il jamais s'éprendre d'une fillette aussi simple, aussi pauvre, aussi sale ?

LA REINE.

Ah ! il faudra bien que nous fassions naître cet amour, puisque notre succès en dépend. Mais comme nous ne pouvons avertir que l'un des deux, voyons, mes sœurs, décidez-vous, hâtez-vous !

LES FÉES, tumultueusement.

— Lui !

— Elle !

— Non ! non !

— Elle ! lui !

— Lui !

— Elle !

LA REINE.

Allons ! c'est le jeune homme, car Jeanne a pour sauvegarde son ignorance et l'humilité de sa condition. Paul, au contraire, est exposé chaque jour à toutes les embûches des Gnomes. Donc c'est lui que nous devons avertir quand il en sera temps, seulement, et protéger dans les limites permises.

Conseils et exhortations de la Reine aux Fées pour protéger Paul.

Allons, mes sœurs, de la prudence Et notre plan réussira.

On entend des voix souterraines répéter :

Ah ! ah ! ah !

LES FÉES s'arrêtent. Qu'est-ce donc ? L'écho, sans doute.

Elles reprennent le chant.

Allons, mes sœurs, de la prudence Et notre plan réussira.

Les voix souterraines vont crescendo de force et de gaieté, et l'on voit sortir de dessous terre des petits êtres avec des têtes énormes, les Gnomes ; ils crient plus fort et tournent autour des Fées, qui s'enfuient prises de terreur.

DEUXIÈME TABLEAU

Un cabaret aux environs de Paris. Il fait petit jour.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

LE CABARETIER ; PAUL, DOMINIQUE, couverts de poussière, fatigues et assis devant une table où sont une bouteille de vin, deux verres, un encrier et un paquet de lettres cachetées.

DES MARAICHERS, pariant pour la halle.

Adieu, père Michel !

LE CABARETIER. Bonne chance, les enfants !

A Paul et à Dominique. Et à présent que vous êtes servis, Messieurs, vous excuserez, mais comme il est encore grand matin et que je n'attends plus de monde, je reprends mon somme.

Il monte dans son comptoir, appuie sa tête sur ses deux mains et s'endort.

PAUL, montrant à Dominique le paquet de lettres.

Ainsi, tu comprends : à peine arrivé, tu les distribueras !

DOMINIQUE, prenant les lettres.

Entendu !

// lit au fur et à mesure.

A monsieur le vicomte Alfred de Cisy !... Bon ! en voilà un dont vous avez souvent payé les dettes ! Mais son adresse ?

PAUL.

Tu la demanderas au Club !

DOMINIQUE, continuant.

A monsieur Onésime Dubois, peintre, rue de l'Abbaye ! Lui en avez-vous acheté de ces croûtes, à celui-là !... Au professeur Letoumeux, membre de plusieurs sociétés religieuses et philanthropiques. Connu ! c'est votre père qui l'a présenté partout à Paris !... Au docteur...

Colombel.

PAUL.

Le médecin de la famille, tu sais !

DOMINIQUE.

A monsieur Bou... Bou... Bouvignard...

PAUL.

Eh ! oui ! l'amateur de vieilles faïences !

DOMINIQUE.

Ah ! ce petit maigre qui venait toujours à l'heure du déjeuner, suffit !...
A monsieur Maca- ret, en son usine ; il a été bien heureux de trouver certains écus, quand il s'est établi !

Il feuillette le paquet en marmottant.

Bien ! bien ! je connais les rues, je vois ça !... Ah ! comme vous en avez de ces amis, des pairs de France, des banquiers, des savants, des artistes, Paris entier !

PAUL, soupirant.

Après cinq ans d'absence, ils m'auront oublié peut-être !...
Heureusement qu'il y a des bons !... Aussi...

Désignant les lettres. fais-en deux parts. Celles-là d'abord, les autres ensuite !

LE CABARETIER, se réveillant en sursaut.

Voilà, Messieurs !

DOMINIQUE.

Ou ne vous demande rien.

LE CABARETIER.

Ah !

Il bâille et reprend sa position.

PAUL.

Et tu auras sijn de lire les écriteaux des appartements à louer ; tu ma prendras un cabinet qui ne soit pas cher !

DOMINIQUE.

L'étage est indifférent à Monsieur ?

PAUL.

Oui, indifférent !

LE C ABARETI ER, eveillant en sursaut.

Voilà !

Paul lui fait un signe de tête négatif.

DOMINIQUE, qui s'est levé d'effroi'tout à coup.

Ah ! il a le sommeil occupé, décidément.

Il se rassoit.

Ouf ! on est bien !... J'ai les genoux rompus de fatigue, avec la tête d'un crcux...

PAUL, debout.

C'est d'avoir marché toute la nuit ! Pauvre garçon ! finis la bouteille, va !

Dominique boit.

Et à moi aussi, le cœur défaille ! Au moment de me jeter dans une existence nouvelle, je ne sais quel trouble m'envahit ; c'e. t comme le malaise qui nous survient quand on va partir pour les longs voyages ! Allons, lève-toi !

SCÈNEII

PAUL, DOMINIQUE ; UN BOURGEOIS, vêtu d'une longue redingote, chapeau à bords retroussés, favoris, canne à lanière de cuir, entre tout doucement, et s'assoit à une des tables, observant Paul et Dominique avec des yeux flamboyants. La pluie se met à tomber au dehors.

DOMINIQUE. Bon ! la pluie ! Il nous faut attendra, puisqu'un équipage nous manque pour faire notre entrée à Paris.

PAUL.

Quand nous en sommes sortis, la dernière fois, c'était dans une chaise de poste à quatre chevaux.

DOMINIQUE. Moi, j'étais ^ur le siège ; je payais les postillons ! et, aujourd'hui, nous voila à guetter l'omnibus.

L'INCONNU, je levant poliment* Les omnibus de la banlieue, Monsieur, ne se mettent en marche qu'à huic heures et demie du matin.

Faul et Dominique te retournent et examinent l'inconnu.

L'INCONNU.

Ces Messieurs sont étrangers ?... Monsieur voyage pour son plaisir, sans doute ? Si Monsieur avait besoin de quelques renseignements dans la capitale, je pourrais... vu mes relations nombreuses...

Faul et Dominique ne répondint pas.

Brounn... brounn... il fait un froid !... Je prendrais volontiers quelque chose de chaud ! Hé ! garçon, un punch !

Le cabaretier se lève en sursaut et sort par la droite.

Du sucre, un citron, du cognac ! vivement !... et si ces Messieurs veulent me faire l'honneur...

Une serrante, arrivant par la gauche, apporte un bol.

DOMINIQUE.

Avec plaisir, Monsieur ; vous êtes trop bon !

La servante n'a eu que le temps de poser le bol sur la table ; une flamme paraît dessus.

Mais il n'y avait rien là-dedans tout à l'heure... voilà qui est drôle !

A l'inconnu.

Ah ! ça, dites donc, vous l'aviez dans votre poche, celui-là... vous êtes un physicien, un grec !... Ah ! elle est forte ! il vient au cabaret avec des punchs bi/eautés !

L'INCONNU.

Je ne comprends pas un mot, cher Monsieur, de ce que vous dites.

A la servante, en lui remettant de l'argent.

Faites-moi le plaisir d'aller me chercher des panntellas dans la boutique de la deuxième rue, à droite, le troisième casier en haut ; j'ai ma boîte, on me connaît !

Elle sort.

A nous deux, maintenant !

SCÈNE III

PAUL, DOMINIQUE, L'INCONNU.

(Paul est resté accoudé, rêvant.)

L'INCONNU, montrant le punch.

Vraiment, Monsieur, est-ce que je n'aurai point l'avantage...

DOMINIQUE, d'un ton engageant.

Voyons, mon pauvre maître... pas de fierté !...

PAUL se lève.

Il n'en faut plus avoir, c'est vrai ! Il s'assoit à la petite table près de l'inconnu et de Dominique.

L'INCONNU.

Ainsi, vous venez chercher forlune dans la grande ville ?...

PAUL.

Qui vous l'a dît ?

L'INCONNU.

Vous-même !

PAUL.

Comment cela ?

L'INCONNU.

Tout à l'heure, quand vous causiez avec votre domestique !...

PAUL.

Il me semblait cependant...

L'INCONNU.

Pardonnez ! je sais tout !... et comme mon industrie, Monsieur, consiste à tenir un bureau de renseignements universels et à faire un vaste courtage dans les différentes classes de la société, il y va de mon intérêt de vous servir.

DOMINIQUE.

Voilà de la franchise au moins !

L'INCONNU.

Monsieur se propose de chercher un emploi dans ? une administration quelconque ?...

PAUL, brutalement.

Non !

L'INCONNU.

De prendre les finances, la diplomatie ou les chemins de fer ?

PAUL.

Eh ! qu'en sais-je moi-même ?

L'INCONNU.

Le commerce, peut-être ?

DOMINIQUE.

Ah ! bien oui ! un homme qui en deux heures de temps vous couvre de peinture une toile plus haute que ça !

L'INCONNU, saluant ironiquement.

Ah ! Monsieur est artiste !... ah ! et il compte faire fortune ; respectons-le !

PAUL, irrité.

Eh bien ! pourquoi pas ? Quand je vois tant de barbouilleurs que l'on applaudit, ce serait bien le diable... D'ailleurs j'ai de. longues études derrière moi et en employant toutes mes forces, la gloire viendra... peut-être, la richesse ensuite.

L'INCONNU.

Très bien, jeune homme ! Mais j'espère que vous allez, pour parvenir, ne rien négliger de tout ce qu'il vous faut : pille/-moi les anciens, dénigre/ les modernes, exaltez les petits génies et conspuez les grands ; ça pose, premier pas ! Vous peindrez ensuite les boutiquiers en artilleurs et les lorcttes en Vénus, avec les chevaux célèbres et les actions vertueuses, sans nul souci du dessin ni de la couleur ; ou dirait que vous manquez d'idées, prenez garde ! Il faudra ensuite adopter le grec ou le gothique, le pompadour ou le chinois, l'obscénité ou la vertu, la chose à la mode, peu importe ! Mais agenouillez-vous devant le public, servilement, et ne lui donnez rien qui dépasse la force de son esprit, les facultés de sa bourse, la largeur de son mur ! Alors vos œuvres, reproduites à l'infini, couvriront l'Europe. Vous entrerez dans la cervelle de votre siècle. Vous serez un maître, une gloire, presque une religion. Le despotisme de votre médiocrité pourra abêtir toute une race ; il s'étendra même sur la Nature, car vous la ferez haïr, ô grand homme, car elle rappellera de loin vos barbouillages.

PAUL, indigne.

Jamais !

L'INCONNU.

Vous avez raison ! une place, des appointements fixes, c'est plus sur. Je vous recommande avant tout l'exactitude, non pour travailler, mais pour surveiller vos confrères. D'abord une petite médisance çà et là, puis une dénonciation formel'.e — dans l'intérêt du service ; enfin une bonne calomnie, n'ayez pag peur ! De l'arrogance envers les humbles, de la bassesse devant les chefs, cravate empesée et souple échine, morbleu ! cervelle étroite et conscience large ; respectez les abus, promettez beaucoup, tenez rarement, courbez- vous sous l'orage et, dans les circonstances difficiles, faites le mort ! Mais tâchez de connaître le vice de votre supérieur ; s'il prise, achetez une tabatière, et s'il aime les jolies femmes, mariez- vous !

PAUL.

Horreur !

L'INCONNU.

De l'indépendance !... j'aime ça ! On ne la trouve plus, Monsieur, que dans une fortune acquise par le commerce. Nous avons le système des faillites honorables, les secrets des faux poids et du bon teint ; mais rappelez-vous que le moyen d'avancement le plus rapide pour un jeune homme, dans une grande maison, c'est de séduire la femme du bourgeois.

PAUL.

Tais-toi donc, misérable !

L'INCONNU.

Oui, la fille vaut mieux, parce qu'il est forcé de vous la donner en mariage !

Paul recule tpouva-ité.

DOMINIQUE.

Il y a au Fond de bonnes idées dans ce qu'il dit.

L'INCONNU, toujours impassible.

Et alors, quoi que vous soyez, les obstacles s'aplaniront, chacun vous sourira ; la santé sera bonne, vous dînez bien, vous aurez la face rose comme une jeune fille.

Sa barbe disparaît j surprise de Paul.

Peu à peu vous deviendrez riche, considéré, heureux, vous ferez craquer sur l'asphalte vos bottes vernies, en roulant dans vos gants blancs le pommeau d'or de votre bambou.

Ce qu'il dit s'exécute ; Paul pousse un cri.

On vous craindra, on vous aimera ; vous vous repasserez vos caprices : habits neufs tous les jours, bagues à tous les doigts, chaînes de montre, breloques et linge fin.

Il apparaît vêtu en dandy ; Paul et Dominique se rapprochent.

Vous achèterez une maison de campagne, des statues, des hôtels, des amis, et des chevaux de race, ce qui est plus cher. Pour duper les générations futures, vous pourrez même fonder un hôpital ; et vous vieillirez tout doucement, servi par un peuple de valets, entouré de famille, lourd d'honneurs, avec une grosse bedaine et l'aspect d'un honnête homme.

Il apparaît en vieux bourgeois cossu, lunettes d'or, gilet de velours, etc.

PAUL, se passant les mains sur la figure.

Est-ce une illusion ? J'ai dans la tête comme des chars cjuï roulent, et des flammes qui voltigent.

Le punch, qui a continué de brûler, se multiplie sur les autres tables, et les flammes sautillent çà et là dans l'air comme des feux follets.

DOMINIQUE tourne avec admiration autour de l'inconnu.

Quel particulier ! quelle expérience !

PAUL, résolument.

Non ! je ne veux pas ! arrière ! C'est même une faiblesse de t'écouter. Va-t'en !

L'INCONNU.

A votre aise ! Faites le vertueux, mon gaillard, et serrez-vous le ventre ! Toutes les portes de la fortune, on les refermera sur vous, en vous écrasant la face ! D'abord, cela va sans dire. Monsieur gardera les apparences. Vous irez jusqu'à neuf heures du soir avec deux sous de lait et un petit pain rond qu'on mange dans la poche de sa redingote, tout en trotinant sur le pavé ! Ah ! vous les connaître/, les mystères de la toilette, les faux- cols de papier, l'encre que l'on repasse sur les coutures blanchies, les sous-pieds tendus pour retenir 1ns semelles trop vieilles, et l'habit noir boutonné jusqu'au menton, pour cacher l'absence du linge.

Il apparaîtrait dans le costume décrit.

Vous ne faiblirez pas ! vous lutterez ! Mais personne ne voudra de vous !... On ne va pas chercher ceux qui se cachent ! qui donc s'inquiète des pauvres ? et comme une première chute est la cause naturelle d'une seconde, peu à peu vous dégringolerez, mon bon homme ; la misère augmentera, elle deviendra irrémédiable et constitutionnelle ! a Clic ! clac ! clac ! gare-toi de là, manant !..." et du fond de votre ruisseau, par un temps de verglas, en plein hiver, vous distinguerez à des hauteurs vertigineuses, derrière la mousseline des larges croisées, tourner sous des lustres, dans le flamboiement des festins, toutes les convoitises de votre cœur.

Le côté droit de la muraille s'entr'ouvre et laisse voir un bal splendide, puis se referme.

Alors commenceront pour vous, dans Paris, ces longues promenades du pauvre le long des quais et des boulevards. Plus vague et funeste que le Bédouin dans le désert, vous chercherez quelque bonne occasion, un parapluie perdu, une bourse tombée, en marchant jusqu'au milieu de la nuit, où vous irez dormir côte à côte avec des forçats, les pieds dans la paille, assis sur un banc, et les deux bras contre une corde !

Le côté gauche de la muraille s'entr'ouvre et laisse voir l'intérieur abject d'un logeur, rempli de monde, puis se referme.

Et l'habit râpé, depuis longtemps, sera parti.

Son habit disparaît.

A la place du chapeau, une casquette sans visière.

Même jeu.

Plus de gilet, une seule bretelle ! et pas même de souliers... des chaussons !

Avec une pose ignoble.

Faut-il un fiacre, mon bourgeois ?

PAUL, se tordant les mains.

Horrible ! horrible !

DOMINIQUE. Mais ce n'est pas gai du tout, cet avenir-là !

PAUL, découragé, tombe sur un tabouret, le coude sur la table.

Que faire ?

A la fin de la tirade de l'Inconnu, la servante est rentrée avec un paquet de cigares, qu'elle a déposé sur la table. L'Inconnu, qui est près de Paul, debout à droite, fait un pas à reculons avec un geste d'espoir ; mais aussitôt, en face de lui et derrière Dominique, la servante, se transmuant en fée, allonge le bras impérativement vers l'Inconnu qui se change en gnome.

Dominique, stupéfait, pousse un cri. Paul relève-la tête et en pousse un autre, en apercevant la Fée, qui disparaît dans la muraille à droite en même temps que le Gnome disparaît à gauche.

TROISIÈME TABLEAU

Chez le banquier Kloekher : un boudoir, portes des deux côtés et au fond. Pendant la première scène, des valets traversent le théâtre, portant des jardinières et des meubles, pour les derniers préparatifs d'un bal.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

ALFRED, PAUL. PAUL.

Comment, mon cher Alfred, vous m'amenez chez monsieur Kloekher, le soir même d'un bal ?

ALFRED.

Qu'importe ! n'êtes-vous pas en tenue ? Et puisque

Emphatiquement.

la fête n'est pas encore commencée, vous aurez bien le temps de dire un mot à notre illustre financier.

PAUL.

C'est là un vrai service que vous me rendez ! Merci du fond de l'âme, car sans vous je ne savais que devenir. Partout où je me suis présenté, depuis un mois bientôt, porte close ! Ah ! les amis ! Et que de tentatives, d'efforts !

Il baisse la tête.

ALFRED.

Allons, bien ! vous voilà retombé dans vos idées mélancoliques, romantiques et poétiques !

Lui tapant sur l'épaule.

Ce bon Paul ! il n'a pas changé : prompt à s'enflammer toujours pour toutes les femmes et à donner dans toutes les illusions. C'est comme votre histoire du cabare :

Il rit.

Ah ! ah ! ah !

PAUL.

Mais quand je vous dis que j'ai vu...

ALFRED.

Bah ! vous aurez été la dupe de quelque hallucination ou d'un faiseur de tours ! Comme si l'on rencontrait dans les bouges de la banlieue des créatures célestes disparaissant à travers les murailles ! Vous avez beau soutenir qu'elle est belle comme une fée, et même qu'elle en portait le costume, les fées, mon cher, ne sortent plus de la Chaussée d'Antin ; et je compte, tout à l'heure, vous en faire voir une. qu'on appelle dans le monde madame Kloecker... et qui a pour nous quelque indulgence.

PAUL, saluant.

Ah !

ALFRED.

Mais oui ! on est posé. Moi, je m'amuse énormément.

PAUL.

Et le mari ?

ALFRED.

Un ancien Auvergnat ! Il en a porté bien d'autres ! Un rustre, d'ailleurs, un avare.

PAUL.

Comment !... Mon père, au contraire, m'avait dit...

ALFRED.

Votre père le connaissait ?

PAUL.

Beaucoup ! Et il m'avait vanté toujours son dé. intéressément. Moi, je ne l'ai jamais vu, car...

ALFRED, vivement.

Mais si votre père le connaissait, qu'aviez-vous besoin de moi alors ?
Vous pouviez vous recommander tout seul.

PAUL, humblement.

Ah ! mon ami, on est timide quand on est pauvre !

ALFRED, à part.

Pauvre ! pauvre ! Moi, je ne savais pas qu'il fût pauvre !... sans cela !...

SCÈNE II KLOEKHER, PAUL, ALFRED.

KLOEKHER.

Salut, vicomte !

ALFRED.

Bonjour, grand financier ! Permettez que je vous présente un de mes intimes, monsieur Paul de Damvillie :s.

KLOEKHER, à part.

Son fils !

ALFRED.

Il a besoin de je ne sais quoi ; il va vous expliquer son histoire. Oh ! bon garçon ! excellent ! Et j'ai une autre grâce à réclamer : puis-je présenter mes respects à Madame, si toutefois... ?

KLOEKHER.

Certes ; comment donc !

SCÈNE III KLOEKHER, PAUL.

KLOEKHER.

J'ai beaucoup connu monsieur votre père, Monsieur, et, comme je l'estimais infiniment, la soudaineté de sa catastrophe m'a affligé plus qu'un autre. Et vous n'avez pas, jusqu'à présent, trouvé, deviné de quelle manière elle a pu survenir ?

PAUL.

Hélas ! non, Monsieur ! J'ai même renoncé à en chercher la cause.

KLOEKHER, après avoir soupiré largement.

C'est plus sage ! Ne perdez pas votre temps à cela, croyez-moi !

Avec hauteur.

Et vous demandez... ?

PAUL.

Du travail, iMonsieur ! Oh ! mes exigences seront modestes !

KLOEKHER.

Quel âge avez-vous, s'il vous plaît ?

PAUL.

Vingt-cinq ans.

KLOEKHER.

Euh ! euh ! un peu jeune ! Et, en fait de comptabilité, de banque, que savez-vous ?

PAUL.

Peu de choses, c'est vrai ; mais j'apprendrai vite !

KLOEKHER.

Ah ! vous croyez ?... Et qu'avez-vous fait jusqu'à présent ?

PAUL.

J'ai voyagé.

KLOEKHER.

Où cela ?... Dans quel but ?

PAUL.

Dans le nord de l'Afrique, et jusqu'en Chine, pour m'instruire.

KLOEKHER.

Ou vous amuser plus librement, avouez-le J C'est une jolie manière de manger sa fortune ; on se donne par-là le vernis d'un homme sérieux ; et l'on se fait regarder des badauds en rapportant de longues pipes pour les amis et des babouches pour les petites dames. Ah ! ces bons jeunes gens ! ils sont drôles, parole d'honneur !

PAUL, i.rîtè.

Monsieur !...

KLOEKHER.

Laissez donc ! je les connais, vos études ! Parions que vous ne sauriez pas seulement me dire le nom des principaux comptoirs de Macao, ni le taux de l'escompte à Calcutta.

PAUL.

Et il y a d'autres choses !

KLOEKHER.

C'est possible ! Mais alors que venez-vous faire ici ? Que voulez-vous ?

PAUL.

Une place, Monsieur, une place ! Je puis traduire vos correspondances, rédiger vos mémoires ! Un homme en vaut un autre, avec de la force et du courage. Je vous prie de considérer la situation... pénible où je me trouve ; et j'ose, pour appuyer ma requête, vous faire souvenir que mon père fut votre ami.

KLOEKHER.

Eh ! votre père, Monsieur, était un fort galant homme ; mais, s'il avait suivi mes conseils, il n'aurait pas fini d'une façon désastreuse ! Au lieu de singer le grand seigneur et de vouloir éblouir par une libéralité intempestive, il aurait dû surveiller ses capitaux, augmenter sa fortune, se rendre utile enfin.

D'un ton de fausse bonhomie.

Il m'a bien assez fait souffrir par l'affection que je lui portais, sans que vous veniez ici, vous, son fils, me donner la peine de vous désobliger ! Une place ! Est-ce que j'en ai, moi ? Tous mes emplois sont pris ; ce n'est pas ma faute. Mille excuses !

Paul est remonte au haut de la scène et va pour sortir par le fond.
Kloekher se lève.

Eh bien, non !... Revenez !.

PAUL, fièrement.

Pourquoi, je vous prie ?

KLOEKHER.

Je peux, je veux vous faire du bien.

Le regardant en face.

Si je sais me connaître en hommes, je crois vous avoir deviné. Or, je me fie à votre intelligence pour me comprendre, et, en cas de refus, à votre discrétion, pour vous taire !

PAUL.

Soyez convaincu...

KLOEKHER.

Jusqu'à présent, j'ai fait toutes mes affaires à la Bourse d'une façon officielle ; mais, à partir d'aujourd'hui, des circonstances trop longues à vous expliquer, au-dessus de votre compétence, cher Monsieur, me forcent à opérer d'une façon détournée... par les mains d'un autre...

Si h nce.

PAUL, cherchant à comprendre.

C'est-à-dire... ?

KLOEKHER.

Qu'il me faut un homme sur... Je le conseillerai ; je serai là... Un garçon solide qui me représente complètement, surveille mes ordres, agisse pour moi !

PAUL.

Bien !

KLOEKHER.

Et qui passe près du public pour n'agir que par lui-même, en son nom.

PAUL.

Cependant... la responsabilité... ?

KLOEKHER.

Aucune chance de pertes, rassurez-vous ! Peu de choses à faire, et je vous donne dix pour cent. Or, comme les bénéfices de ce genre d'opérations doivent s'élever annuellement à un million, pour le moins, c'est cent mille francs que vous toucherez par an, cent mille francs de rente, jeune homme !

PAUL.

Cent mille francs de rente.

Il tombe en rêverie. Bas.

Impossible ! Il faut qu'il y ait là-dessous...

KLOEKHER, à part.

Il hésite ! Est-ce ignorance ou scrupule ?

PAUL.

Mais comment êtes vous sûr d'avance de ne jamais perdre ?

KLOEKHER.

Par une série de calculs... des combinaisons infaillibles. Je vous expliquerai...

PAUL.

Et pourquoi alors avez-vous besoin de mon nom ?

KLOEKHER.

Pourquoi ?...

Silence. Ils se considèrent ; puis, brusquement.

Mais ça ne se dit pas ! Vous comprenez bien... C'est impatientant !

PAUL.

Assez, Monsieur, assez ! Je vous épargne, par pudeur, le mot propre dont on appelle, dans le code pénal, vos combinaisons infaillibles. Vous prêter mon nom pour elles serait y participer ; et comme je ne veux pas être votre complice ni votre victime, je me retire.

KLOEKHER, détournant la tête, à part.

Imbécile, va !

Au moment où Paul est sur le seuil de la porte, au fond, entre M. Letourneux ; ils se trouvent face à face.

SCÈU^E IV

PAUL, KLOEKHER, LETOURNEUX.

LETOURNEUX, avec stupéfaction et joie.

Paul ! Ah ! quel bonheur !

KLOEKHER, à part.

Ils se connaissent !

LETOURNEUX.

Que je l'embrasse, ce cher garçon ! Quand j'ai su que vous étiez à Paris, je suis vite accouru du fond de la Guyenne, où j'étais parti pour inspecter un peu l'agriculture et les bonnes mœurs ! Ah ! voilà une chance ! une chance !...

A part, montrant le poing à Kloekher, qui tourne le dos.

Je te tiens, vieux drôle !

Haut.

On vous avait cru mort, savez-vous ?... N'est-ce pas, Kloekher, vos ennemis, — car vous en avez, chacun en a, — vos ennemis se flattaient même qu'on ne vous reverrait plus !

PAUL.

Qui donc peut m'en vouloir à moi ? Je ne gêne personne.

LETOURNEUX.

Quel intéressant jeune homme, hein ? Tout le portrait de ce bon Damvilliers, que nous chérissions.

PAUL.

Je ne sais comment reconnaître...

LETOURNEUX.

Voilà ce qui s'appelle une bonne journée : d'abord, je retrouve le fils d'un vieil ami : puis, je soulage bien des infortunes, et cela, grâce à vous, Kloekher.

KLOEKHER.

Hein ?

LETOURNEUX.

Mais oui, puisque je venais vous remercier des vingt-cinq mille francs que vous m'avez donnés pour les pauvres de ma paroisse.

KLOEKHER.

Ah ! par exemple !...

LETOURNEUX.

Allons ! il cache ses bienfaits. Quel homme !

Contemplant Paul.

Cela fait plaisir de le revoir, n'est-ce pas ?... J'espère que vous me conterez vos voyages. Vous avez dû rencontrer, en courant le monde, des mœurs bizarres, des caractères vraiment particuliers ; et comme vos observations, sans doute, ainsi qu'il convient à un esprit sérieux, se sont dirigées sur la morale, que croyez-vous qui soit plus commun de la ruse ou de l'ingratitude, de la scélératesse ou de la sottise ?

PAUL.

Ces questions... demanderaient...

LETOURNEUX.

Et vous, Kloekher, votre opinion ?

KLOEKHER.

Je ne comprends pas...

LETOURNEUX, se rapprochant de lui et le regardant en face.

Ah ! vous ne comprenez pas ! Bien sur ?... Nous en recauserons. J'ai oublié de vous dire que je désirais toucher immédiatement, pour la formation d'une ferme modèle, les cent soixante-douze Méditerranée que je vous ai vendus avant-hier.

KLOEKHER.

Quand donc aurez-vous fini cette plaisanterie ?

LETOURNEUX.

Ce n'est pas une plaisanterie, mon cher, pas plus que l'histoire suivante...

A Paul.

Connaissez-vous la Cochinchine ?

PAUL.

Un peu.

LETOURNEUX.

LE11 bien, il y avait là, une fois, — l'anecdote remonte à cinq ans, — deux amis : un bon Chinois et un mauvais Chinois. Or, le bon était si bon, qu'il confia au mauvais...

KLOEKHER, avec emportement.

Oh ! je ne me moque pas mal de vos histoires. .. !

LETOURNEUX. Elles sont vraies cependant ; j'en peux fournir les preuves.

Silenie.

KLOEKHER, étonné. Des preuves ?

LETOURNEUX, lui saisissant le bras, à l'oreille. Dans mes mains, d'irrécusables, songez-y !...

KLOEKHER, bas. Nous nous arrangerons. Taisez vous !...

Il se tourne vers Paul, en éclatant de rire.

Eh bien, Letourneux, il y est tombé ! Il a cru que je n'avais pas de place pour lui !... Hé ! hé ! Imaginez-vous une histoire inventée à plaisir ! Ah ! ah ! Une chose un peu légère que je lui proposais ! Ah ! ah ! ce bon garçon !

PAUL.

Comment ?

KLOEKHER.

Mais oui, pour vous éprouver, mon cher. Ah ! ah ! ah !...

D'un ton sérieux. J'ai voulu voir, par là, le fond de votre nature. Maintenant je suis content de vous, jeune homme ! C'est très bien ! très bien !... De la délicatesse, des principes.

LETOURNEUX.

Il n'y a que ça, voyez-vous, les principes !... c'est une base ! Du moment qu'un homme a des principes, on peut compter dessus ! Or, je vous réponds de celui-là, moi !

KLOEKHER.

Le fils de notre meilleur ami, je crois bien !

Madame Kloekher entre en toilette de bal.

Ma femme ! Il faut que je vous présente. Permettez

Il remonte la scène vivement jusqu'à elle.

SCÈ^CE V

PAUL, LETOURNEUX, MONSIEUR ET MADAME KLOEKHER.

KLOEKHER, bas à sa femme.

Écoutez bien, il y va de ma fortune, de la vôtre : cet homme peut nous perdre. Soyez adroite ! il le faut !

Vaut.

Madame Kloekher, monsieur Paul de Damvil- liers.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Oh ! je vous connais de nom, depuis longtemps, Monsieur !

PAUL, à part.

Qu'elle est belle !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Nous avons si souvent causé de votre père ensemble...

LETOURNEUX.

Nous trois.

PAUL, à part.

Quel regard !...

KLOEKHER.

Pauvre garçon ! Au retour, après cinq ans d'absence, plus de foyer !
Mais j'entends que le mien remplace le vôtre ! Ne vous gênez pas !
Usez de moi... De la franchise !...

PAUL.

Oh ! merci !... Mais comme j'ai peur d'être indiscret...

Il va pour sortir.

KLOEKHER.

Restez donc, vous êtes des nôtres, parbleu ! On arrive à peine, continuez votre visite près de Madame. Allons, Letourneux, un petit tour dans le grand salon ; nous penserons ensuite aux choses sérieuses.

SCÈ&CE VI PAUL, MADAME KLOEKHER.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Soyez convaincu, Monsieur, que les intentions de mon mari n'avaient pas besoin d'être exprimées. Je partage trop tous ses sentiments pour ne pas désirer comme lui vous être agréable, et même, pardon du mot... utile, si nous le pouvons.

PAUL.

Oh ! je suis confus, vraiment !...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Il nous sera bien doux de faire en sorte que vos chagrins soient sinon oubliés... du moins adoucis.

PAUL.

Mais ils le sont déjà, Madame, par cette manière inattendue... !

MADAME KLOEKHER. Comme vous avez dû souffrir, n'est-ce pas ?

PAUL.

Oui, oui !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Pourquoi n'êtes-vous pas venu à nous, d'abord ?

PAUL.

Eh ! mon Dieu, Madame, mon excuse, quoique sincère, est mauvaise, mais...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Mais quoi ?

PAUL.

Pardon ! je n'osais...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Enfant ! Allons, vous réparerez cela, je l'exige !... Nous recevons nos intimes tous les mercredis à sept heures, n'oubliez pas ! Je vous ferai connaître quelques-unes de mes amies, des femmes intelligentes qui vous plairont. J'espère que vous viendrez de temps à autre bavarder dans ma loge aux Italiens. Si vos après-midi vous pèsent trop, il y a une place en face de moi dans ma voiture pour faire le tour du lac, au Bois. C'est si ennuyeux d'être seule à revoir tous les jours cette éternelle pièce d'eau ! Mais où aller ? Puisque vous dessinez, il faudra m'apporter, la prochaine fois, vos albums de voyage. Je vous montrerai les miens ; d'avance, je réclame un peu d'indulgence pour mes pauvres aquarelles. Enfin, nous lirons, nous causerons. Nous deviendrons de vrais amis. J'y compte, du moins.

PAUL.

Oh ! merci. Vous êtes bonne comme un ange. Voilà les premières marques de sympathie que l'on m'adresse. Qu'ai-je donc fait pour en mériter une si gracieuse ?... A qui la dois-je ?

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Mais à la mémoire de votre père, au désir de mon mari, à votre position, et un peu... à vous- même.

Elle lui tend la main ; Paul la saisit et la baise.

MADAME KLOEKHER, la retirant vivement.

Monsieur !...

PAUL.

Pardon ! c'est une faute, je conçois ! L'élan irréfléchi de ma gratitude vous semble une grossièreté.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

N'en parlons plus. Entrons dans le bal. Sortons.

PAUL.

Sans m'avoir pardonné ? Au nom du ciel, ne m'en voulez pas ! Excusez-moi ! il faut bien avoir un peu d'indulgence pour un homme abandonné de tous, fatigué par les déceptions, aigri par le malheur.

MADAME KLOEKHER, à demi-voix. C'est une sympathie de plus entre nous deux !

Geste de Paul.

Oui, j'ai mes souffrances, et aussi profondes que les vôtres, peut-être !

PAUL.

Vous ! Comment ?

MADAME KLOEKHER. Ah ! monsieur de Damvilliers, un homme de votre condition peut-il avoir des préjugés du peuple et s'imaginer comme lui que le cœur soit content et qu'on n'ait plus rien à demander au ciel, du moment qu'on est riche ! Oh ! non, non !

PAUL.

Expliquez-moi...

MADAME KLOEKHER. Plus tard, mon ami

Les panneaux qui fermaient le boudoir à droite, à gauche et au fond s'enlèvent et laissent voir le bal.

Voire bras, s'il vous plaît ?

PAUL, à part.

Son ami... son ami !...

De chaque côté de la scène, il y a des cariatides dorées contre des piliers qui montent jusqu'au plafond j tides, des jardinières remplies de fleurs, espacées par des candélabres. Au fond, trois arcades ouvertes laissent voir d'autres salons, avec des buffets chargés d'argenteries et de flacons.

SCÈNE VU

PAUL, MADAME KLOEKHER, ONÉSIME DUBOIS, MACARET, BOUVI- GNARD, ALFRED DE CISY, LE DR COLOMBEL, INVITES, MESSIEURS ET DAMES, DOMESTIQUES.

(Madame Kloekher remonte la scène au bras de Paul, eu même temps qu'on s'avance vers elle,)

LES INVITÉS, saluant. Une fête splendide, éblouissante, délicieuse !

UNE DAME, à une autre. Quel est donc ce jeune homme ? Il est fort bien.

LA DEUXIÈME DAME. Je le trouverais même trop bien, si j'étais le Vicomte Alfred de Cisy.

UN EMPLOYÉ DE LA MAISON, à son voisin. Regarde/, donc comme elle minaude ! Que de grimaces ! Mais pour nous, pauvres commis, il n'y a pas de danger qu'elle nous honore seulement d'un coup d'œil.

MADAME KLOEKHER, à une jeune femme, lui désignant sa robe.

Oh ! ravissant ! Où donc vous habillez-vous, ma chérie ?

A une autre. Comment, on ne danse pas ?...

A un vieux Monsieur.

Bonjour, général.

Au docteur Colombet.

Ah ! c'est fort aimable à vous, docteur Colom- bel, d'avoir abandonné vos malades.

DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Ils recouvreraient la santé en vous voyant, belle dame : l'aspect de tant de fraîcheur, de grâces... Un domestique vient parler bas à Madame Kloekher.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

J'y vais !

Alfred, depuis le commencement de la scène, s'est rapproché d'elle. Quand elle est arrivée au bas, à droite, elle salue Paul.

Je vous remercie. A tout à l'heure !

ALFRED, à part. J'ai fait une jolie affaire en l'introduisant ici. Soyons prudent et vif.

Il sort précipitamment derrière elle.

SCÈVCE VIII

LES PRECEDENTS, moins MADAME KLOEKHER ET ALFRED.

ONÉSIME s'avance vers Paul en lui secouant Us deux mains fortement.

Ali ! quel plaisir !... on va donc se revoir ! Où loges-tu ? Je ne te quitte pas !

PAUL.

Merci, vieux camarade... Et “cette peinture, toujours enthousiaste d’elle, j’espère, et portant haut l’amour du grand art avec la haine du bourgeois ?

ONÊSIME.

Sans doute. Cependant je fais à présent de petits tableaux, des sujets domestiques ; c’est d’un débit plus facile. Mais reçois mes félicitations, te voilà en joli chemin, diable !

Tous s’empressent autour de Paul. Eh ! cher monsieur de Damvilliers, j’étais bien sûr de vous rencontrer ici ; sans cela...

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL, lui coupant la parole.

Grâce à la bêtise inconcevable de mon valet de chambre, vos deux cartes de visite ont été égarées, et hier au soir seulement...

BOUVIGNARD, l’interrompant.

Comment se fait-il, je vous le demande, que tous les matins je veux aller vous voir ? Mais on vient chez moi pour un tas de choses, pour ceci, pour cela ; je suis harcelé, tirillé...

MACARET.

Tout à vos ordres, vous savez !...

Bat.

On a l’oreille du ministre !

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Il faut que vous preniez un jour par semaine pour venir dîner chez moi régu’ièrement.

BOUVIGNARD.

Dites donc, cher Monsieur, de quelle façon je puis vous être utile !

Tout lui donnent des poignées de mains énergiques.

PAUL.

Ah ! mes amis ! je suis attendri vraiment...

A part.

Quels cœurs excellents, et comme on calomnie les hommes !

SCÈNE IX

LES PRECEDENTS, LETOURNEUX.

LETOURNEUX marche droit à Onésime, qui est le plus près de Paul.

Je ne suis pas content de vous !

ONÉSIME.

Pourquoi ?

LETOURNEUX.

Parbleu, entre intimes on ne se gêne pas. Or, chacun ici, excepté Paul, connaît votre prochain mariage. C'est moi qui vous procure cette affaire, une famille excellente, pieuse, considérée, riche, et vous vous exposez au scandale d'être rencontré en plein jour, donnant le bras à une créature !

ONÉSIME.

Moi ?

LETOURNEUX.

Je vous ai vu, et pourtant vous m'aviez juré que tout était fini !

ONÉSIME.

Ah ! monsieur Letourneux, un moment ! Si je me trouvais avec cette fillette, c'est que je lui préparais un petit tour.

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Voyons, voyons, j'adore ce genre d'anecdotes.

Tous se rapprochent.

ONÉSIME.

Je lui ait fait écrire de iMarseille, son pays, une lettre qui l'appelle pour les affaires les plus pressées. Elle est partie ; j'ai donc tout le temps de me marier, et ça ma débarrasse d'autant mieux, que Clémence a la bourse légère, et que pour revenir...

Hilarité générale et approbation.

LETOURNEUX.

Très bien ! voilà ce que j'appelle un acte à la fois d'adresse et de haute moralité.

PAUL.

Comment, Clémence, ta vieille passion, celle que tu avais prise toute jeune à sa famille, et qui, disais-tu toi-même, te faisait travailler d'une façon... ?

ONÉSIME.

C'esl comme ça ! Autre temps, autres femmes !

A Letourneux.

Où donc m'avcz-vous rencontré, vous ?

LETOURNEUX.

Dans le Luxembourg, comme je le traversais pour aller secourir une famille bien intéressante : trois fils sans ouvrage, le père et la mère presque à l'agonie. Vous devriez même, docteur, faire quelque chose pour eux.

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Que j'aille les voir, peut-être !

LETOURNEUX.

Vous êtes assez riche pour vous passer ce luxe !

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Et vous donc, le millionnaire, que faites-vous pour eux ?

LETOURNEUX.

Oh ! peu de choses, je les console et les moralise, rien que cela ! et partout, comme maintenant, je fais de la propagande à leur profit, jusqu'auprès de monsieur Macaret.

S'adrestant à M. Macaret.

Voyons, vous êtes un de nos grands industriels, et trois ouvriers de plus ne vous importent guère.

MACARET.

Impossible ! je n'ai pas d'ouvrage à leur donner. Vous n'exigerez pas que je me ruine...

Colombel sourit ; Letourneux joint les mains d'un air beat.

Mouvement de Paul indigne.

BOUVIGNARD, avec un petit rire aiglet.

Hé ! hé ! il a raison. Les discours, les secours et les utopies ne servent à rien. La machine est ainsi réglée. Tant pis pour ceux qu'elle écrase ! résignons-nous ! Il n'y a de sérieux au monde que les choses de l'intelligence, les beaux-arts !

ONÉSIME.

Vous êtes dans le vrai, monsieur Bouvignard.

BOUVIGNARD.

Aussi moi, je ne m'occupe que des vieilles faïences.

LE DOCTEUR COLOMBEL.

Un joli goût ! Et toutes nos dame ? ?

BOUVIGNARD.

Entendons-nous ! Permettez ! je ne prise que les vieux Nevers, et, pour en posséder un authentique, je n'épargne ni temps, ni soins, ni argent.

ONÉSIME, à part.

Il ferait mieux de doter sa fille.

BOUVIGNARD.

Ah ! j'économise, je me prive, je me sangle ! Et combien d'inquiétudes ! Songer qu'une maladresse peut tout réduire en mille morceaux. Aussi ma collection est-elle unique. C'est ma fortune entière, et, afin qu'elle demeure éternellement intacte, je la lègue par testament à ma ville natale.

PAUL, à part, mélancoliquement.

Quel triste monde !

SCÈNE X LES PRECEDENTS, KLOEKHER.

KLOEKHER, à Letourneux. Venez-vous ? Allons, les hommes sérieux, il y a là des tapis verts qui vous réclament ! Un whist ?

Tout disparaissent par le fond.

SCÈNE XI

PAUL, seul.

Dès que Paul est resté seul, du côté droit, entre les cariatides, débouche le Roi des Gnomes, dans le costume du bourgeois cossu du cabaret. Avec un geste emphatique, il lui montre le bal et toutes les splendeurs qui l'entourent.

Il se penche sur une des jardinières, les fleurs se fanent.

Mortes !

Deux candélabres s'éteignent. Et l'obscurité redouble !

Au lieu d'un bruit de clochette qui accentuait la mesure dans la contredanse, on entend une cloche funèbre.

Ces sons ! le glas d'un enterrement. J'ai peur !

Il regarde au fond. Cependant les flambeaux resplendissent, les danses tourbillonnent. Eh ! c'est la clochette qui tinte dans les quadrilles. Qu'avais-je donc ? Elle va revenir !... oui !... là !... et, fendant pas à pas les flots du bal, j'écouterai d'un air indifférent ses paroles charmantes murmurées à mon oreille. Toutes ces choses qui lui appartiennent ont l'air de sourire, c'est comme si son âme flottait autour de moi. Où est-elle ? Je veux la retrouver, la revoir.

Il remonte la scène.

SCÈNE XII

PAUL, MADAME KLOEKHER, ALFRED.

(Madame Kloekher entre par le côté droit au bras d'Alfred).

PAUL, à part.

Encore lui !

Il s'arrête et l'observe.

MADAME KLOEKHER, à demi-voix. Est-ce une menace ?

ALFRED.

Comme il vous plaira de le comprendre, ma chère !

MADAME KLOEKHER, dédaigneusement.

Faites donc ! faites donc !

ALFRED.

Ainsi, vous êtes bien décidée ?... Tout est rompu. Mais si je m2 brûlais la cervelle au milieu de votre bal ?

MADAME KLOEKHER, éclatant de rire. Ah ! ah !

ALFRED, à part, remettant son chapeau sur sa tête.

Allons, tournons-nous d'un autre côté.

Les danses ont fini ; on sert le souper au fond, sur des petites tables rondes.

SCÈJCE XIII

PAUL, MADAME KLOEKHER.

PAUL. Cet homme vous aime ?

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Lui, jamais !

PAUL.

Cependant !...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Des reproches, déjà ?

PAUL.

Oh ! j'ai tort, je le sais, pardonnez-moi ! Ce n'est pas ma faute, si...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Plus bas !... on peut nous entendre !

PAUL, regardant au fond.

Non, jusqu'à la fin du souper, personne ici ne viendra ! Nous sommes libres ! Écoutez-moi : au nom du ciel, restez !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Mais je reste ! Que voulez-vous ?

PAUL.

Ah ! je ne me rappelle plus ! ma tête s'égaré ! Je suis si heureux de vous contempler ainsi, face à face ! Tout à l'heure, quand nous étions avec les autres et que l'on s'empressait autour de vous, je me délectais à saisir ces regards, ces hommages, cette rumeur d'admiration et d'envie ; et puis, voilà qu'à présent la même foule me déplaît ! je la hais ! Vous lui donnez en passant un coup d'œil, des sourires, des paroles, presque une partie de votre personne, de votre cœur. Il me semble que la dorure de ces murailles, les argenteries, les valets, la musique, vos diamants même, sont autant de choses qui vous déguisent, vous reculent plus loin, vous séparent de moi.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Enfant que vous êtes ! Vous savez bien, pourtant...

Silence.

PAUL.

Quoi ?... Parlez !... parlez !...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Mais... que l'on vous préfère !

PAUL, se rapprochant et lui prenant la main.

Est-ce vrai ? Dites-le donc, ce mot que j'attends. Ah ! je ne suis pas accoutumé au bonheur, moi ! Et comment voulez-vous que je croie à celui-là, si je ne le vois moi-même tomber de vos lèvres ? Ou plutôt non... ne parlez pas... et pour savoir si vous m'aimez, si les cieux vont s'ouvrir... rien qu'un signe... un regard...

Elle le regarde, et lui répond oui par un signe de tête très lent et très doux. Il lui prend la main et la porte à ses lèvres en pliant le genou.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Prenez garde ! on peut nous voir !

A part.

Du feu... de la passion !...

Paul se relève.

PAUL.

Ali ! quel supplice ! Vous ne comprenez donc pas que je vous aime éperdûment ! Je voudrais que tout ce qui nous écarte l'un de l'autre disparût ! Qu'est-ce que cela vous coûterait de m'accorder où il vous plaira, quelquefois, pour me faire illusion, pour m'imaginer que nous sommes seuls sur la terre ? Est-ce que cela vous chagrine, dites, de me donner... ?

MADAME KLOEKHER.

On vient ! Retirez-vous !

Paul disparaît à droite.

SCÈ^CE XIV MADAME KLOEKHER, LETOURNEUX.

LETOURNEUX, entrant rapidement.

Ah ! votre mari est un fier drôle !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Qu'y a-t-il ?

LETOURNEUX.

Je suis indigné !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Là ! là ! calmez-vous !

LETOURNEUX.

Mais je me vengerai ! Oh !...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Que vous a-t-il fait ?

LETOURNEUX.

Vous le demandez ! Elle le demande ! Eh bien, nous étions convenus, votre charmant époux et moi, de deux cents Hanovre au dernier courant qu'il devait, lui, me donner et que je devais, moi, palper : est-ce clair ? Or, quand j'apporte les papiers convenus, il ne m'en livre que la moitié à grand'peine. Mais ça ne se passera pas comme ça ! Où est Paul ? Je vais tout lui dire !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Quoi donc !

LETOURNEUX.

Lui apprendre ce que vous savez aussi bien que moi, parbleu ! la manière dont votre mari a volé son héritage ! Et un bon procès fera savoir à toute l'Europe...

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Et vous comptez sur Paul, comme si c'était possible !...

LETOURNEUX.

Pourquoi non ?

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Vous êtes trop curieux, mon cher. Cependant, pour épargner vos démarches, apprenez que Paul est un simple enfant, et qu'il m'aime !

LETOURNEUX.

Beau motif !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Excellent, au contraire ! C'est nous, c'est moi qu'il croira et non pas vous, l'homme de bien. Allez chercher ailleurs des auxiliaires à vos turpitudes et à vos vengeances ! Quant à celui-là, je vous le répète, il m'appartient ! C'est ma chose, mon esclave ! et je pourrais, sur un signe, le faire se jeter dans un puits qu'il m'en remercierait.

LETOURNEUX, sortant par le fond. Nous verrons ! nous verrons !

SCÈVCE XV PAUL, MADAME KLOEKHER.

PAUL entre lentement à droite, de derrière une cariatide.

Vous avez raison. Madame : je suis un enfant, votre chose et votre esclave.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Ciel ! ne croyez pas !...

PAUL.

J'ai tout entendu, j'étais là derrière cette statue, où je m'étais mis pour épier les confidences d'un autre. Le hasard m'a puni de ma jalousie, en me détrompant amèrement.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Oh ! Paul !... je vous jure...

PAUL.

Pas de serments, ne craignez rien ; jamais je ne salirai par le scandale d'un procès la femme, quelle qu'elle soit, que j'ai... honorée de mon amour. Donc soyez tranquille, je me retire !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Mais vous n'avez pu comprendre, je n'y suis pour rien, c'est une trame odieuse. Je vous expliquerai... Paul ! je vous en supplie !... Paul ! Paul ! je t'aime !

Paul s'en va par la gauche, la tête basse et lentement ; arrivé sur le seuil, il s'arrête. Letourneux sort du fond et marche vers lui.

SCÈ^CE XVI

MADAME KLOEKHER, PAUL, LETOURNEUX, puis lons les personnages précédents.

LETOURNEUX. Ah ! enfin ! je vous trouve ! Écoutez-moi !

Paul, absorbé, reste immobile.

Paul ! Eh bien !

Il lui tape sur l'épaule.

Mon ami ! mon cher ami ! ‘

PAUL, tournant la tête lentement. .

Que voulez-vous ?

LETOURNEUX, élevant la voix. Je veux vous apprendre, à vous et à tout le monde ici, dans votre intérêt personnel comme dans celui de la moralité publique, et afin qu'il en résulte à la fois une réparation et un châtiment ; je veux, dis-je, vous dénoncer une infâme machination. J'en possède les témoignages authentiques, écrits ! Vous avez été indignement spolié par l'homme que voici : le banquier Kloecker !

Murmures. Marques de surprise et d'indignation.

PAUL, arrachant son gant blanc.

Vous mentez impudemment, Monsieur !

LETOURNEUX.

Moi ?

PAUL.

Oui, vous misérable ! et comme gage de ce que j'affirme, je vous soufflète à la face !

Il lui jette son gant à la face.

LETOURNEUX.

Ah !

PAUL.

Je suis à vos ordres, Monsieur !

LES INVITÉS.

Séparez-les ! Ils vont se battre !

LETOURNEUX, dignement.

Un duel, non ! Un homme de mon caractère n'obéit pas à de pareils préjugés. La vraie force consiste plutôt à supporter les injures et à s'en venger par les voies légales. J'ai le courage civil, moi !

Il sort fièrement.

PAUL, à demi-voix.

Infâme coquin !

KLOEKHER, essayant de prendre la main de Paul.

Ah ! c'est très bien ce que vous avez fait ! Voilà qui est d'un bon ami !... Ma reconnaissance... !

PAUL, fièrement.

Ne me parlez plus, Monsieur !

Il sort.

KLOEKHER.

Ou'est-ce qu'il a donc ?

LES INVITÉS.

Quel original ! — Avez-vous vu ? — Un scandale pareil pour finir une si belle fête !... — Ah ! mon Dieu ! à quoi se trouve-t-on exposé !...

Quand les invités sont partis, les lustres, les girandoles et les candélabres se mettent à brûler plus fort, donnant une lumière rose, verte et bleue ; les bouquets, tombés par terre, se relèvent d'eux-mêmes et vont se placer dans les jardinières. Les fleurs fanées s'entr'ouvrent, les meubles çà et là se replacent en ordre. Les cariatides des deux côtés de la scène se meuvent et s'avancent. Ce sont les fées elles-mêmes qui se réjouissent de la vertu de Paul.

QUATRIÈME TABLEAU

Une chambre d'aspect misérable. A droite et à gauche, une fenêtre en tabatière. Au fond, une cheminée de plâtre, où brûlent quelques charbons à demi éteints. A côté de la cheminée, une porte. Sur la cheminée, une boîte de pistolets. A gauche, au premier plan, une table et une chaise de paille. A droite, une paire de bottes vernies dans leurs embouchoirs. Auprès des bottes, contre le mur, un lit de sangle, et, sur le premier plan, à côté, un placard. — Le jour commence à paraître par les vitres sans rideaux.

SCÈNE PREMIMÈRE

DOMINIQUE, seul.

Il arrive sur la scène en manches de chemise, en pantalon avec un madras autour de la tête, et il s'avance vers la cheminée en grelottant.

Quel froid, miséricorde ! Quand Monsieur va revenir, il est capable de geler.

Riant ironiquement. Ah I Monsieur !... Eh bien, et moi ? Est-ce que je ne gèle pas ? Est-ce que je ne souffre pas ? Est-ce une existence que de traîner une misère pareille ! Qu'il s'en arrange, puisque ça l'amuse ; mais moi, un homme fait tout au moins pour l'antichambre des ambassadeurs, quelle humiliation !

Il cherche de droite et de gauche dans l'appartement.

Et pas un cotret dans cette infernale mansarde, où il vous tombe des vents coulis...

Il regarde encore.

Non !... — Et voilà quatre mois que j'attends ! et qu'il est à me lanterner avec toutes ses démarches ! — D'abord, c'a été une place dans la diplomatie, puis une mission scientifique, puis un poste d'inspecteur de je ne sais quoi, puis un emploi dans une colonisation, je ne sais où ; et ce soir, enfin, il doit revenir de chez le banquier Klockher les mains pleines, ou l'avenir assuré. — Je commence à n'y plus croire, à notre avenir ! J'ai bien envie de séparer le mien du sien et de lui donner mon compte, carrément. Monsieur est un brave jeune homme, c'est vrai ! Mais

Se touchant le front.

toqué ! toqué ! — Sapcrlotte ! j'ai l'onglée !

Ses yeux rencontrent la botte de pistolets sur la cheminée.

Tiens !... voilà une boîte qui me donne une tentation !... Ah ! doucement !... nos moyens ne nous permettent pas une flambée en acajou. Oh ! non !

En se reculant, il trébuché contre le paillason.

— Eh ! tu m'embêtes, toi ! — Attends un peu...

Il jette le paillason dans le feu ; puis, le regardant brûler — En être réduit là ! Mais ça ne peut pas durer plus longtemps ! c'est trop bête ! Et si notre sort ne change pas avant huit jours, bonsoir !

Le feu flambe. Il se chauffe.

Ah ! ça fait du bien ! C'est une bonne idée que j'ai eue, décidément ! Comme on a tort de se gêner ! — Et pas un bon fauteuil pour se rôtir les tibias en tisonnant. C'est honteux, un aussi piètre escabeau ! — Et puisque mon maître est en courses toute la journée, je ne vois pas pourquoi...

Il jette dans le feu la petite chaise.

Allons donc !

Tout en remuant les charbons.

Il faut convenir que je suis un véritable nigaud, avec mon dévouement ! On n'a jamais vu un domestique comme moi ! Nom d'un chien ! quelle gelée ! Ça disparaît comme une allumette ! — Car, enfin, de toutes ses promesses, qu'ai-je attrapé, moi ? Qu'est-ce que je gagne ? Il se moque de moi, à la fin ! Car, pendant que je suis là, à me morfondre en l'attendant, il fait le joli coco, dans les salons, près les belles dames. — Si je flanquais la table pour soutenir l'attisée ? — Non ! Ça ne durerait pas !

Il aperçoit une paire de bottes dans leurs embouchoirs

Ah ! les bottes !

Il les retire des embouchoirs.

Pourquoi pas ?

Les lançant dans le feu.

Aïe donc ! — Et s'il se fâche, tant pis !

SCÈNE II

DOMINIQUE, PAUL, en habit noir, sans paletot, mouillé, les mains sous les aisselles, avec un peu de tteigc sur ses vêtements.

PAUL.

Que fais-tu là, toi ? Je ne t'avais pas dit de m'attendre ! Va te coucher !

DOMINIQUE.

Mais...

PAUL, brutalement.

Va-t'en donc ! Va-t'en ! Laisse-moi !

DOMINIQUE, à part.

Oh ! oh ! il est bien fier ! — Y aurait-il pas quelque chose de bon, enfin ?

SCÈNE III

PAUL, seul.

Après être resté longtemps les bras croisés, avec un grand soupir.

Ah !...

Il jette son chapeau sur le lit de sangle.

Quelle nuit !...

Il regarde les murs lentement.

et quelle chambre !...

Puis la fenêtre.

Tiens ! le jour qui se lève ; et la neige, encore !... iMais il ne tombera donc pas du ciel quelque chose pour les écraser tous !

Il pleure.

Ah ! comme je suis fatigué !...

Il s'assoit près de la cheminée, un bras sur le chambranle.

Sont-ils assez lâches, égoïstes, ingrats, hypocrites et cruels !... Par-dessus tout cela, des sourires, des phrases, des étreintes affectueuses, et même, ô sacrilège, des offres d'amour !... Et je prétendais trouver dans ce néant quelque chose qui désaltérât mon cœur ! — Dans combien de pays n'ai-je pas traîné mes rêves !... Partout, avec des masques et des impudeurs différentes, j'ai rencontré les mêmes ignominies ! A présent, voilà qu'elles viennent jusqu'à moi, elles m'attaquent. Assez, assez ! je n'en veux plus ! — Pourquoi vivre alors, puisque je ne peux pas changer le monde ? Ah ! si j'avais eu pourtant quelqu'un qui m'eût aimé !...

Il se lève.

Allons, pas de faiblesse ! Disparaissions tout de suite, pour prévenir peut-être les défaillances, avant la première rougeur de honte et dans l'intégrité de mon orgueil, comme ces vieux rois d'Orient qui se faisaient mourir avec toutes leurs richesses !... Il ne faut que la résolution d'une minute. Ce ne doit pas être difficile ? D'ailleurs, tout m'y engage, tout m'y pousse...

Apercevant la boîte de pistolets ouverte.

Ah !... et jusqu'au hasard lui-même !

Il retire les pistolets et les manie.

L'armurier qui me les a vendus me faisait valoir, pour ma sécurité personnelle, la longueur de leur portée. A cette distance, je n'ai pas besoin qu'ils soient si merveilleux ! C'est une superfluité. Essayons.

Il fait jouer la batterie.

Bien !... Ma poudrière, où est-elle ?

Il verse de la poudre dans le fond de sa main, puis dans le pistolet, et jette le reste dans la cheminée. Le feu je ranime, et flambe extraordinairement. Paul continue à charger son pistolet.

La balle, une capsule, maintenant ; et je n'ai plus qu'un geste, presque un signe pour être libre !...

Six heures sonnent à une horloge voisine.

Au premier coup de la demie, tout sera dit !

U promène ses yeux tout à l'entour, tt aperçoit la table où sont des papiers et une cassette pleine de lettres.

Ah ! ceci que j'oubliais ! Non ! que rien de moi, ni de mon passé, ne subsiste ! Au feu, au feu, toutes mes lettres !

Il les jette dans la cheminée. Il se rassoit.

Ah ! que cette flamme me réchauffe ! Je ne souffre plus. Non, au contraire ! Et penser que ces cendres peut-être seront encore tièdes quand mon cadavre sera froid ! et puis tout se confondra, dispersé ! Ma vie aura passé comme ces formes fugaces, qui se dessinent sur les charbons. Tiens ! il me semble voir dans la braise des plages de pourpre s'étalant près d'un lac de feu. On dirait, à présent, de vagues édifices, des aiguilles de cathédrale, un navire. Il s'enfonce et reparaît, comme le mien autrefois. J'entends encore le vent dans les manœuvres, et les bois de ma cabine qui craquent au milieu de la nuit. — Tiens !... c'est étrange, voilà une lettre qui s'obstine à ne pas brûler ! Elle blanchit même dans la flamme. — Pourquoi ?...

Paul la reprend.

Elle est froide !... Comment se fait-il ?

La cheminée, peu à peu, s'est haussée et élargie, laissant voir, au milieu des flammes, les choses mêmes que Paul rêvait, Le bord supérieur, montant toujours, a presque disparu dans les frises ; et l'on aperçoit un château tout noir, d'une architecture farouche, avec des meurtrières embrasées.

Une forteresse ! Laquelle donc ? Je ne l'ai jamais vue.

Le château disparaît. La lettre qu'il tient devient lumineuse. Paul lit :
"C'est l'endroit où les Gnomes détiennent captifs les coeurs des hommes. Nous comptons sur toi pour les délivrer. — Ta récompense sera un amour au-dessus même de tes rêves. Tu rencontreras souvent celle que nous te destinons ; tâche de la reconnaître, ou sinon tu es irrévocablement perdu. — Es-tu prêt ? — LA REINE DES FEES." —
Moi !... Mais comment me guider ?

Choeur des Fées l'encourageant.

PAUL reste pendant quelques minutes en proie à une anxiété terrible ; puis, avec un geste de résolution héroïque.

J'accepte ! partons !

Deux coups frappés à la porte, l'un après l'autre.

UNE VOIX, du dehors. Ouvre, Dominique !

Troisième coup.

PAUL.

Qui est-ce ?

Il va ouvrir.

SCÈNE IV

PAUL, JEANNETTE portant à chaque bras un gros panier.

JEANNETTE, toute surprise. Monsieur Paul !...

PAUL.

Jeannette !... Comment se fait-il ?

Elle dépose sur la table ses deux paniers, d'un air accablé. Que viens-tu faire à Paris ?

JEANNETTE, après un silence. Mais... vendre mon lait, Monsieur.

PAUL.

Avec ces deux paniers-là !... et chez moi !

Elle baisse la tête sans répondre.

Tu me caches quelque chose, Jeannette ?

JEANNETTE, de/endant de la main u'i des paniers près d'elle.

Non, Monsieur, je vous jure !...

PAUL, éclairé par le geste de Jeannette.

C'est là-dedans, alors ? Qu'y a-t-il ?

Il relève la toile couvrant le panier.

Des foulards, mes chemises, tout mon linge !

Il la regarde d'une façon sévère.

JEANNETTE, vivement. Oh ! ne vous fâchez pas !... Si vous le trouvez trop mal, je recommencerai. Silence. Elle baisse la tête.

PAUL.

Ainsi, c'est Mademoiselle Jeannette qui était ma blanchisseuse !... Pourquoi ne pas l'avouer ?

JEANNETTE, embarrassée. C'est que...

PAUL.

Eh bien ?

Même silence. A part. Comment ?... Quand Dominique m'avait dit... Voyons l'autre ?

JEANNETTE, l'arrêtant par le bras. Prenez garde de les casser !

PAUL.

Quoi donc ?

JEANNETTE.

Les œufs !

PAUL, examinant l'intérieur du panier.

Des fruits... une galette... jusqu'à des petits pots de crème !... Et c'était...

Il l'interroge du regard ; elle lui répond par un signe de tête affirmatif.

pour moi ! Jusqu'à présent, en effet, je n'ai rien payé de ces choses !
— Ah ! je devine !... l'amitié de mon domestique me réduit aux charités d'une paysanne !

Brutalement.

Remporte tout cela, Jeannette ! Je n'en veux plus ! Va-t'en !

JEANNETTE, pleurant.

Si j'avais su vous fâcher, je ne l'aurais pas fait !

PAUL, à part.

Elle pleure !... Et dans ma vanité imbécile, je la repousse !... Combien donc y en a-t-il d'un dévouement pareil ? Haut.

Non, reste ! Pardonne-moi ! C'est que je suis malade, quelquefois !...
Et il y a longtemps que IU viens ainsi tous les jours ?

JEANNETTE.

Depuis un mois, bientôt !

PAUL.

Et tu ne t'en vantes pas, toi !... Tu faisais le bien naïvement, dans la candeur de ton âme !

Il lui prend les mains.

Mais comme ta poitrine bat vite ! Tu as de beaux yeux, ma Jeannette !...

A part.

Je ne l'avais pas seulement regardée, sot que j'étais ! Et ces pauvres petites mains, sais-tu qu'enfermées dans des gants de peau fine, plus d'une belle dame les envierait !

JEANNETTE.

Vous êtes bien bon, Monsieur.

PAUL, s'écartant d'elle. A part.

Il faut pourtant que je trouve quelque chose à lui donner.

La contemplant de loin.

Mais elle est charmante !... Il y a sous ces simples vêtements une distinction, je ne sais quoi de pur, de fin... que je n'ai jamais vu !... Et cette douceur des attitudes, ce rayonnement dans leregard ! Serait-ce... ? Pourquoi pas ?... Jeannette ?

JEANNETTE.

Monsieur ?

PAUL.

Tu dois être lasse de ta condition ? N'arrive- t-il jamais dans ton esprit des pensées qui te surprennent ? iNe sens-tu pas au fond de toi-même comme une sollicitation vers des destinées plus hautes ? une envie de t'enfuir... quelque part... bien loin ?

JEANNETTE.

M enfuir !... Et où ça ?... Je ne connais pas les routes.

PAUL, avec un geste de dépit. A part.

Eh ! c'est mon langage qu'elle n'entend pas !

Haut.

Dis-moi, quand tu es toute seule, dans les champs, à quoi penses-tu ?

JEANNETTE.

Dame ! à rien.

PAUL.

Cherche un peu.

JEANNETTE.

Ah ! si... Je pense aux vaches !... à la noire, surtout, qui me suit comme un caniche. Et puis je regarde si les avoines poussent, et combien il y aura de boisseaux de pommes aux arbres.

PAUL.

Mais... la nuit... dans tes rêves ?...

JEANNETTE, riant.

Mes rêves ?... Ah ! bien oui. Je dors trop fort !

PAUL.

Quels livres as-tu donc lus jusqu'à présent ?

JEANNETTE.

Je ne sais pas lire !... est-ce que j'ai eu le temps d'apprendre !... ni écrire non plus. Et je le regrette, allez ! Ça me serait si utile pour tenir les comptes !

PAUL, à part.

Voilà tout !... c'est le fond. Certes, il ne manque pas de gentillesse ; mais ce serait si long à cultiver, que j'y renonce.

Riant amèrement.

Moi, qui avais cru un instant...

Il reste perdu dans des réflexions.

JEANNETTE.

Qu'avez-vous donc, monsieur Paul, que vous ne dites plus rien ? Tout à l'heure vous parliez comme une musique. Je ne comprenais pas ; mais c'e t égal, ça me plaisait, ça me plaisait...

PAUL, brusquement.

Bien, bien !

Appelant.

Dominique !... Je te remercie, Jeannette... Plus tard, dès que je pourrai, je reconnaîtrai tes bons offices... et quand tu te marieras...

SCE^CE V Les PRECEDENTS, DOMINIQUE.

DOMINIQUE. Que désire Monsieur ?

PAUL, montrant Jeanne. Fais-lui tes adieux. Nous partons.

DOMINIQUE. En voyage encore ?

PAUL.

Oui, pour un long voyage.

DOMINIQUE. Mais Monsieur, sans doute, n'a pas réfléchi que notre garde-robe...

PAUL, tournant autour de lui des yeux inquiets.

En effet !

Il aperçoit sur le lit une superbe pelisse de fourrure. Ah ! mais non ! Tu vois bien ! le riel ïVnmèlc. C'est un avertissement, un ordre !

DOMINIQUE.

La belle fourrure !

Il lève la fourrure d'un bras, et l'examine.

Vous ne m'en aviez pas parlé. Avec ça sur le dos, on doit se moquer joliment du thermomètre ! Si j'en avais une pareille !

Il la remet sur le lit, et en voit une seconde à côte.

Une autre !...

PAUL.

C'est pour toi alors ?... Prends-la !

DOMINIQUE endosse vivement sa pelisse, en relève le collet et croise ses mains sous les manches. A part.

Je serai un peu calé là-dedans ! Hein ? on aura l'air d'un ambassadeur russe !

PAUL, frappant du pied.

Allons, hâte-toi ! Je veux m'élancer par le monde, courir au but, l'atteindre. Viens ! viens !

DOMINIQUE.

Oh ! nos paquets ne sont pas longs à faire. Me voilà !... Adieu, petite sœur !

JEANNETTE, d'une voix entrecoupée par un sanglot.

Adieu !

PAUL, qui a mis son chapeau sur sa tête et sa pelisse SUT son bras, s'arrête sur le seuil, au bruit d'un grand sanglot de Jeannette.

Ah ! de la sensibilité, plus que je ne croyais. Eh ! c'est pour son frère.

Ils sortent.

SCÈNE VI JEANNETTE, seule.

Partis !... Et je ne sais plus où, cette fois !... Très loin !... Il me semble pourtant que, pendant un moment, il m'a offert d'aller avec lui, là-bas ! Mais non, puisqu'il m'abandonne, qu'il me dédaigne !... Ah ! c'est parce que je ne suis pas une belle dame de la ville !... parce que je n'ai pas de robes à volants... de la dentelle, des cachemires et des bijoux. !... parce que je suis une bête de paysanne ! parce que je ne sais rien de ce qui lui plairait : la danse, les bonnes manières, la parure et le piano !... Oh ! si j'avais tout cela !...

Elle se rapproche de la cheminée et se met à rêver, tout debout, le coude appuyé sur le chambranle.

Voilà ce qu'il lui faut, sans doute ! Alors il m'aimerait. Mais comment faire pour avoir une belle toilette... une belle toilette...

Le Roi des Gnomes sort du placard resté entr'ouvert.

LE ROI.

Très bien !... elle débute par un souhait des plus stupides. Tant mieux !... Il nous est impossible de l'arrêter ; mais nous allons nous arranger si bien, que jamais il ne la reconnaîtra. — Commençons...

Changement de décor à vue.

CINQUIEME TABLEAU

L'ILE DE LA TOILETTE

Les collines du fond, figurant des carrés de culture différente, sont couvertes par de longues bandes d'étoffes. A droite, au bord d'un ruisseau de lait d'amandes, poussent, comme des roseaux, des bâtons de cosmétique. Un peu plus en avant, une fontaine d'eau de Cologne sort d'un gros rocher de fard rouge. Au milieu, sur le gazon, des paillettes brillent ; les buissons, çà et là, se trouvent représentés par des brosse de chiendent, et les cailloux par des savons de toutes couleurs. A gauche, un arbre, semblable à un tamaris, porte des marabouts, et un autre, pareil à un palmier, offre des éventails. Il y a un champ de rasoirs ; plus loin, l'arbre à miroirs, l'arbre à perruques, l'arbre à houppes, l'arbre à peignes, et des costumes bariolés pendent à de grands champignons. Des mouches voltigeant dans l'air iront se coller d'elles-mêmes sur le visage des femmes : la mouche assassine, la capricieuse, la provocante, etc.

SCÈNE PREMIMÈRE

JEANNE, seule.

Dans la même attitude qu'elle avait à la fin du tableau précédent : la tête baissée et le coude gauche appuyé contre le rocher de fard, au bord de la fontaine. Après un instant de silence, elle lève les yeux et regarde autour d'elle avec ébahissement.

Comme c'est joli !... et comme ça sent bon !... Mais on dirait l'odeur de l'eau de Cologne ?... D'où vient-elle ?... De cette fontaine !... Ah ! si je me lavais les mains.

Elle y plonge ses bras jusqu'au coude.

On n'a pas peur d'en perdre !... Je puis bien m'en mettre dans les cheveux !

Elle s'en jette sur la tête quelques gouttes, qui deviennent aussitôt des diamants, sans qu'elle s'en aperçoive. Puis elle se lave le visage avec les mains ; et, pendant qu'elle est ainsi penchée sur la fontaine, une branche de l'arbre à peignes, derrière elle, s'abaisse tout doucement pour dé* mêler ses cheveux au chignon. Elle se retourne, surprise, en tendant la joue droite.

Qui donc me prend là, par derrière ?... Con* tinuez ! vous ne me faites pas mal.

L'arbre à houppes abaisse un de ses rameaux et la caresse de ta poudre de riz.

Oh ! comme c'est doux !... comme c'est doux !...

Elle tend la joue gauche. Même jeu de l'arbre à houppes.

Encore !... Mais ça me chatouille !... Assez !... J'ai envie de rire !... Ah ! ah ! ah ! L'arbre s'arrête.

C'est fini ?... Je vous remercie bien !...

Elle se lève.

Comment ?... Personne !...

Elle considère tous les objets autour d'elle, en marchant lentement.

La drôle de campagne !... Des peignes qui tiennent aux arbres ! En voilà un où poussent des perruques, et tous ces vêtements par terre, comme des feuilles mortes !... Ah ! la belle herbe, avec ces grosses gouttes de rosée. Mais non, ce sont des paillettes d'argent.

S'apercevant dans une des glaces de l'arbre à miroirs.

Et cela ?... C'est moi !... en diamants !... JV l'air d'un soleil !

Sa robe, arrachée, disparaît dans l'air.

Le vent !... Ah !...

Elle pousse un cri de terreur en s'apercevant en chemise et en jupon, et croise ses bras sur sa poitrine.

Que devenir !... J'ai honte !...

Aussitôt, une des bandes d'étoffe, posées sur les collines du fond, arrive en ondoyant comme une rivière, et, se drapant autour d'elle, lui fait une sorte de tunique.

Eh bien ! eh bien !... me voilà tout habillée maintenant.

Un arbre à bracelets d'or l'accroche par le bras.

Qu'est-ce qui me retient ? Pourquoi ? Laissez- moi !...

Elle tire à elle : le'braceht viitit.

Ah ! cela fait bien sur ma peau.

D'une espèce de sorbier tombe un collier de corail autour de son cou.

Qu'e ;t-cc ?... Un collier !... Ah ! comme je suis belle !... Quel bonheur !... Je m'aime ! Je voudrais m'embrasser. Mais je rêve sans doute ?... Ce n'est pas possible ! Je vais me réveiller tout à l'heure. — Où suis-je donc ?... dans quel pays ?

CHOEUR, dans la coulisse.

C'est le pays de la toilette, C'est l'empire des affiquets, Des paquets 1
Des caquets 1 Chez nous la beauté se complète, La laideur prend des airs coquets.

JEANNE. Jâ ne comprends pas !...

C H O E U R.

C'est le pays de la toilette, C'est le triomphe, sans un pli, Du poli, Du joli. Nos fleurs sont à la violette, Et nos soupirs au patchouli.

Rasoirs, il faut en découdre ! Allons ! peignes nouveau-nés, Cascade aux flots safranés, Tombe ici comme la foudre ! Poudre les airs, arbre à poudre ; Savonnette, savonnez !

Un grand, bruit de tambours, dejlûtes et de chapeau chinois

JEANNE remonte la scène. Quelle quantité de monde !...

CHOEUR.

Silence ! silence ! silence ! C'est le monarque qui s'avance ! Pareil aux astres éclatants, C'est Couturin, roi de la mode, Le seul qui sache, avec méthode, Diriger nos goûts inconstants.

JEANNE.

Mais ils viennent par ici !... J'ai peur. Où me cacher ?... Ah !...

Elle s'enfonce sous l'arbre à miroirs. Toute la cour de Couturin, en arrivant, chante :

Mortels, que sa faveur inonde De l'un à l'autre bout du monde,
Marchez où sa main vous conduit. Tous ses ordres sont chose grave ;
On est perdu quand on les brave, On est sauvé dès qu'on les suit.

SCÈNE II

LE ROI COUTURIN, LA REINE COUTURINE, avec toute la cour (hommes et femmes) ; GRAISSE-D'OURS, premier ministre.

Couturin et Couturine sont habillés à la dernière mode du jour, exagérée. Graisse-d'Ours, en veste, toute la barbe hérissée, l'air farouche, un tablier. — Tous les personnages de la cour représentent les divers métiers relatifs à la toilette. — Le Roi arrive au milieu d'une estrade portée à bras, et assis dans une sorte de fauteuil ayant des compartiments sur les côtés, deux plumes d'autruche au haut des montants et un miroir dans le dossier. A droite et sur un siège plus bas, la Reine ; à sa gauche, sur un autre siège, le premier ministre. — Les porteurs abaissent le trône-estrade, tout doucement, jusqu'à terre.

LE ROI COUTURIN.

C'est bien ! Arrêtez-vous ! Et puisque nous voilà installés dans l'endroit trois fois coquet des séances royales, ayant à notre droite notre clière épouse, la sémillante Couturine...

COUTURINE, avec un regard langoureux, lui prend la main et la baise.

Toujours tendre, Couturin !

LE ROI COUTURIN. A notre gauche, notre premier ministre, l'indispensable Graisse-d'Ours.

GRAISSE-D'OURS. Vous êtes trop bon, Majesté !

COUTURIN. Autour de nous, les hauts dignitaires de notre bonnet : l'archi-tailleur, l'archi-bottier, le prince du Cold-Cream, le duc du Caoutchouc, et autres.

LES GRANDS DIGNITAIRES, l'inclinant. Pour vous servir, ô Souverain !

COUTURIN.

Avec les dames de notre cour, Il salue.

lesquelles en font l'ornement.

LES DAME<sup>3</sup>.

Ah ! délicieux !

COUTURIN. Ei derrière nous, le peuple imbécile !

LA FOULE.

Vive le Roi !

COUTURIN. Il nous faut, suivant l'usage, établir les modes de la saison.

TOUS, avec vivacité et se démenant.

Voyons ! quelles couleurs ? combien de mètres ?

COUTURIN. Un instant ! Il est d'abord indispensable de rappeler les principes.

CRAISSE-D'OURS.

Rappelez !

COUTURIN. Or, c'est une vérité reconnue, mes colombes, que vous êtes naturellement hideuses !.

LES DAMES, scandalisées. Ah ! ah ! l'abomination !

COUTURIN. Oui, fort laides !... Silence ! Vous ne mettrez pas en doute, j'imagine, la supériorité du factice sur le réel ? C'est l'Art seul, déesses, qui vous fournittous vos charmes. — Ne craigne/ rien, je suis discret. — Mais vou> conviendrez que l'on est amoureux d2 la robê et non de la femme, de la bottine et non du pied ; et si vous ne possédiez pas la soie, la dentelle et le velour. », le patchouli et le chevreau, des pierres qui brillent et des couleurs pour vous peindre, les Sauvages mêmes ne voudraient pas de vous, puisqu'ils ont des épouses tatouées !

Il se rassoit.

LES DAMES.

C'est un peu dur ! un peu vif !

GRAISSE-D'OURS se lève.

D'ailleurs, le vêtement, étant le signe manifeste de la chasteté, fait partie de la vertu et est une vertu lui-même !

Il se rassoit.

COUTURIN.

Donc, plus le costume sera costumant, c'est-à-dire antinaturel, inconmode et laid, plus il sera beau !

Il se rassoit.

GRAISSE-D'OURS se lève.

Et distingué surtout !

Il se rassoit.

TOUS.

Ah ! distingué ! le distingué, c'est le principal.

COUTURIN se lève.

Eh bien ! travaillez maintenant. Il se rassoit.

TOUS. Voyons ! cherchons !

Un moment de silence, puis on entend tout à coup un grand fracas de miroirs cassés.

COUTURIN.

Qu'est-ce ?

Il fait à un officier signe de sortir ; après avoir regardé à droite.

Ah ! l'arbre aux miroirs, cassé ! Ils étaient trop mûrs sans doute, et quelque maraudeur en l'ébranlant...

L'OFFICIER, rentrant. Nous avons trouvé dessous un monstre !

COUTURIN »

Un monstre ?

L'OFFICIER. Oui, 6 Souverain, un être vert et démodé.

COUTURIN.

Qu'on l'amène !

TOUS.

Quelle bravoure !

SCÈNE III

LE.S PRECEDENTS, JEANNE.

Elle entre avec des gants verts Empire qui lui montent jusqu'aux coudes, et faisant beaucoup de plis sur les bras ; uue coiffure à la girafe, un châle jaune par-dessus sa tunique et un ridicule à la main. A son aspect, Couturine pousse un cri aigu et tombe à la renverse. Graisse-d'Ours se lève indigne ; Couturin, avec un petit mouvement d'effroi, se recule sur son trône ; les dames arrachent vivement les feuilles de l'arbre à éventails et se cachent le visage dessous. Brouhaha général.

LES HOMMES s'écrient :

— Arrière !

— Va-t'en !

— Cache-toi !

LES DAMES.

— C'est une horreur !

— Une turpitude !

— Une antiquité... !

COUTURIN, pour commander le silence, étend son sceptre, un fer à papillotes.

Du calme, têtes exallées par la frisure ! Approche, jeune fille, — car tu as l'air d'en être une, à tes attributs naturels, bien que tu n'en possèdes point les grâces. Explique-nous, justifie ton accoutrement !

JEANNE.

Je l'ai pris là, par terre, au hasard... croyant qu'il le fallait ; et, en me relevant, tous les miroirs...

COUTURIN.

Assez ! Ce n'est pas d'eux qu'il s'agit.

Rapidement.

Mais, pour avoir désobéi aux lois de notre Empire, pour avoir méprisé le culte de la chaussure, les délicatesses de la lingerie et l'élégance du cheveu ; pour t'être affublée d'une aussi infâme défroque, qui fait remonter l'imagination jusqu'au temps de Corinne et du cirage à l'œuf, tu mériterais les supplices...

TOUS.

Oui, oui ! les plus terribles !

COUTURIN.

D'être condamnée à des bottines trop étroites, à des peignes trop durs, à des corsets indélaçables !

TOUS.

Bravo !

COUTURIN.

A porter un cabas !

JEANNE.

Grâce !

C O U T U R I N .

Et un turban., avec panaches !

JEANNE.

Mais je ne connaissais pas la mode ! Je n'ai pu la suivre. Est-ce un crime ?

C O U T U R I N .

Il n'y en a pas de plus grand, être femelle ! car la Mode, sais-tu bien, c'est la loi, la fantaisie, la tradition et le progrès ; il n'est rien qu'elle ne gouverne, ne produise et ne renverse. Colosse folâtre établi sur le monde, elle drape la couche des nouveau-nés, tandis qu'elle ornemente des tombeaux, levant -a tête au ciel vers> les philosophie » et pénétrant ainsi, du bout de son pied mignon, jusque dans l'éternité. Retire tes gants verts !

JEANNE, humblement.

Je ne demande pas mieux, nui. Je ferai ce qui vous plaira.

C O U T U R I N E.

Ah ! pitié pour elle, grand roi !

COUTURIN.

Soit ! je te pardonne, en considération de ton ignorance.

Aux grands officiers.

Et vous autres, occupez-vous de la façonner congrûment, de la vêtir dans le dernier genre.

JEANNE, sautant de joie.

Oh ! merci. Quel bonheur ! Je serai donc jolie, bien habillée !

COUTURIN.

Espérons-le !

'BALLET

Sur un signe que fait Couturin, les officiers de sa cour se précipitent de droite et de gauche : les uns vers les champignons qui portent des costumes, les autres vers les étoffes du fond, ceux-ci vers les marabouts, ceux-là vers l'arbre à peignes, etc. ; et ils s'empressent d'habiller Jeanne et de la maquiller. Cependant le fond et les deux côtés du théâtre changent, et représentent du haut en bas les rayons d'un gigantesque magasin de nouveautés, plein de garçons servant des dames. Couturin est placé au premier plan à droite, étalé, seul, sur une petite causeuse dans une pose méditative et en train de prendre des notes. Les garçons de magasin habillent des dames du monde.

Quelques-unes viennent s'adresser à Couturin, qui leur répond, par trois fois :

Laissez-moi ! je compose !

Couturine leur sert du thé, sur un petit guéridon, place près de Couturin.

A de certains moments, le mouvement s'arrête et il se fait un grand silence. Alors Ccwturin, un lorgnon dans l'œil, passe toutes les femmes en revue et les rajuste, abaisse ou rehausse leur décolletage d'un geste brusque, puis lève les épaules et crie :

Non, pas ça, c'est vieux ; autre chose ! vivement !

Jeanne doit toujours former le centre du groupe principal. A la fin, toutes les dames, y compris la Heine, qui ont suivi progressivement les mêmes changements, se trouvent ha~ billées comme elle, d'une façon riche et extravagante.

COUTURIN.

Restons-y au moins une demi-heure ! C'est très beau !

Satisfaction générale exprimée par des soupirs / mais tout à coup Couturin considère Jeanne, et, défaisant avec rapidité sa toilette :

Oui ! décidément, ceci me déplaît, et cela aussi !... Autre chose... Allons ! vite !

Jear.ne se trouve dans un costume d'un goût simple et exquis.

Maintenant, seigneurs et seigneure-ses, parfumeurs et brodeuses, chemisiers et couturières, retirez-vous dans vos cabinets artistiques, nous souhaitons être seuls ! Demeurez, Couturine !

SCÈ^CE IV JEANNE, COUTURIN, COUTURINE.

C O U T U R I N.

Eh bien ! jeune fille, ce luxe de la toilette que tu désirais si fort, le voilà !

JEANNE.

C'est donc vrai ! Je ne rêve pas !

COUTURIN.

« Non, les génies supérieurs te protègent.

JEANNE.

Moi !

COUTURIN.

N'en doute plus ! Aucune, grâce à nous, ne sera aussi séduisante.

JEANNE.

Oh ! merci. Il va donc m'aimer.

COUTURIN.

Peut-être ? Pour atteindre à la moderne dignité de femme, — tâche de comprendre. — pour devenir tout à fait cet être charmant, inextricable et funeste commencé par Dieu et achevé par les poètes et les coiffeurs, si bien qu'il a fallu soixante siècles au monde avant de produire la Parisienne, il le manque enrore, o petite fille, bien des choses.

JEANNE.

Lesquelles ?

COUTURIN.

Eh ! tu ne sais pas saluer, sourire, pincer la bouche, cligner des yeux, ni débiter des mélancolies en prenant sur un sofa des poses de fleur battue par la brise. Comment ferais-tu, voyons, en l'entendant soupirer ? et quelle serait ta réponse s'il te demandait : "M'aimes-tu ?"

JEANNE.

Eh bien, je répondrais : Oui.

COUTURINE, impérieusement.

Ça ne se dit pas, jeune fille ! C'est un mot indécent, naturel et populaire !

JEANNE.

Mais comment parler ? Enseigne moi !

COUTURIN. Holà ! les deux types du bon goût ! Arrive/ !

SCÈVE V

LES PRECEDENTS, DEUX MANNEQUINS.

Monsieur et dame que l'on apporte. La dame est vêtue à la dernière mode. Le monsieur a une raie derrière la tête qui se continue, par les poils de son paletot systématiquement divisés, jusqu'au bas des reins ; elle se reproduit sur chaque jambe du pantalon ; lorgnon dans l'ail, chic anglais, etc.

COUTURIN.

Considère ces deux honnêtes mannequins qui ressemblent à des humains : tâche de reproduire leurs mouvements, si tu veux avoir de belles manières. Rappelle-toi leurs discours, et, en quelque lieu que tu te trouves, à la campagne, en visite, en soirée, dans un dîner ou au spectacle, tu pourras jacasser hardiment sur la nature, la littérature, les enfants aux têtes blondes, l'idéal, le turf, et autres choses. La clef, Couturine ?

Il remonte les deux automates à la poitrine.

Commençons. En appuyant ici, on obtient ce qu'il faut dire devant un beau paysage.

En prenant le monsieur sous les aisselles, il le penche de droite et de gauche, comme on fait à une pendule dont le balancier est arrêté, Couturine fait de même à la dame, Partez !

LE MONSIEUR, atec de petits gestes rapides de la main droite et l'air guilleret.

Bonjour, chère !

LA DAME, même jeu.

Bonjour, bonjour, mon bon !

Ils se rapprochent ainsi des deux côtés de la scène, en roulant sur leurs roulettes, et quand ils sont arrivés face à face, ils se secouent les mains pendant une minute avec violence, en ricanant.

LE MONSIEUR, regardant autour de lui, avec des mouvements de tête saccadés.

Tiens ! tiens ! tiens ! où sommes-nous donc ?

LA DAME, minaudant et en détachant ses phrases.

Ah ! la délicieuse campagne !... un site pittoresque !... et des petites fleurs ! — si poétiques ! — et inutiles !... poétiques parce qu'elles sont inutiles. — inutiles parce qu'elles sont poétiques !

LE MONSIEUR, d'un ton bourru.

Moi... je la trouve bête comme chou... votre campagne ! — Du sentiment, allons donc ! — de l'élégie, ha ! ha ! ha ! — la poésie, ha ! ha ! ha ! — Je suis revenu de tout ça... ha ! ha ! ha !

LA DAME, avec beaucoup de gestes.

Mais cependant, permettez, si l'on taillait ces arbres... si l'on reculait ces massifs, en faisant avancer le vieux chêne, avec quelques mines, des paysans bien habillés et un chemin de fer pour être à proximité, on aurait là, avouez-le, un beau sujet artistique, de quoi faire une jolie mine de plomb.

LE MONSIEUR, gaillardement.

En fait de mine, je préfère la vôtre.

LA DAME.

Où donc prenez-vous ce ton-là ? Chez vos petites dames ? Je voudrais bien, sans qu'on le sache, y aller un peu... pour voir leur mobilier.

LE MONSIEUR.

A vos ordres !

A part.

Une imagination !... elle pétille !

Haut.

Mais, permettez, un conseil : pour vos placements, je m'en chargerais.

LA DAME, vite.

Et des reports aussi ?

LE MONSIEUR, vite.

Ça va ! J'ai mon carnet.

LA DAME, vite.

Nous disons donc... ?

COUTURINE, arrêtaït ressort.

Assez ! assez ! ils n^ s'arrêteraient plu ?.

JEANNE.

J'aurai bien du mal à retenir...

COUTURIN.

Ah bah ! avec de la bonne volonté ! Écoute-les plutôt sur les nouvelles du jour.

// touche un ressort des mannequins à une autre place.

LA DAME, lentement et d'un air affligé.

Eh bien, — à ce qu'il paraît, — on a encore massacré, là-bas, douze mille de ces pauvres diables.

LE MONSIEUR, chantonnant.

Broum ! broum ! broum ! Qu'est-ce que ça nous fait ? Je ne donne plus là-dedans ! La vie est courte, turlurette ! Amusons-nous !

LA DAME, d'un ton gai.

Vous avez le genre Régence, tout à fait talon rouge.

LE MONSIEUR, gravement, la main dans son gilet.

Oui, avec des idées libérales. Un mélange de l'ancienne aristocratie française et de l'industrialisme américain Qu'est-ce que ça ?

LA DAME, vite, et d'un ton suppliant, en lui offraü une liasse de petits papiers.

Des billets de loterie, pour mes pauvres !

LE MONSIEUR, avec un grand salut. Trop heureux, Madame ! A part.

Pincé !

Légèrement.

Et le nouveau livre de chose, l'avez-vous lu ?

LA DAME, admirativement.

Oh ! très beau ! Vrai ! c'est un grand homme !

LE MONSIEUR, naturellement. Eh ! non, un crétin. Du moins on le dit. LA DAME.

On le dit. Ah ! alors ça se peut. Je vous crois.

LE MONSIEUR, avec un regard amoureux et soupirant. Si vous pouviez croire tout ce que je vous...

Il s'arrête brusquement.

COUTURIN. Ah ! j'ai oublié deux demi-tours !

JEANNE.

Mais ils ne s'aiment pas du tout, ceux-là !

COUTURIN, en remontant les mannequins.

C'est ainsi que cela commence ; et quand il lui aura dit, en face, assez d'impertinences pour la faire pleurer, ce sera une union si intime et tellement reconnue, que l'on ne manquera pas dans les meilleures maisons de les inviter ensemble.

Les deux mannequins, pendant qu'il les remontait, ont échangé des gestes tendres qui deviennent de plus en plus expressifs.

Non ! non ! à la valse ! à la valse !

Ils se mettent à valser, et, pendant qu'ils valsent, Jeanne répète du mieux qu'elle peut tous leurs mouvements.

C'est cela ! lui, menton levé et coude e.i l'air ; — elle, droite comme un I et nez baissé ; tous deux piquant leurs angles dans l'espace, une vraie figure de géométrie en belle humeur. Assez : qu'on les remmène ! Et vous, Couturine, veillez bien à ce qu'on les remette dans leurs boîtes.

On les emporte.

SCÈ^CE VI

COUTURIN, JEANNE.

COUTURIN. Voilà ! Tu en sais suffisamment pour te produire dans le monde.

JEANNE.

Eh ! ce n'est pas le monde qui m'inquiète, mais Lui. Où est-il ? Je veux le voir.

COUTURIN, lentement.

Il me serait possible de satisfaire ton désir.

JEANNE, ravie.

Oh !...

COUTURIN.

A une condition, cependant.

JEANNE.

Dis-la ! et quelle qu'elle soit, d'avance... Réponds donc...

COUTURIN.

C'est que jamais tu ne te feras reconnaître, ni à lui, ni à son compagnon.

JEANNE.

Pourquoi ?

COUTURIN.

Parce qu'il t'a déjà repoussée quand tu étais une paysanne : l'oublies-tu ? Et, surtout, écoute bien, tu ne doutes pas de mon pouvoir : n'est-ce pas moi qui t'ai donné plus de robes que tu ne possédais d'épingles et plus de perles fines qu'il n'y avait de grains de son dans l'auge de tes pourceaux ? Eh bien, je te jure, par cette même puissance, que si tu viens à lui dire ton nom, à l'instant même, et comme d'un coup de foudre, tu mourras.

JEANNE baisse la tête, tandis que Couturier l'obsède avec anxiété ; puis lentement :

N'importe sous quel nom et sous quelle figure : pourvu qu'il m'aime, c'est tout ce que je veux ! Partons-nous ?

COUTURIER.

Oh ! inutile ! Le voilà qui vient pour des emplettes indispensables à son voyage !

On entend la voix de Dominique dans la coulisse.

SCÈNE VU

LES PRÉCÉDENTS, PAUL, DOMINIQUE,

COMMIS.

Dans la scène précédente, le décor peu à peu s'est changé en un bal immense où il y a beaucoup d'articles de voyage. Le fond de la scène se trouve occupé par les couturiers et les modistes.

DOMINIQUE, criant. Place ! place ! Il nous faut deux sacs de nuit, une aumônière, des couvertures.

PREMIER COMMIS. A vos ordres !

DEUXIÈME COMMIS. Tout de suite, Monsieur !

TROISIÈME COMMIS. Huitième étage ! quinzième rayon !

QUATRIÈME COMMIS. Non ! par ici !

DOMINIQUE. Ah ! j'en perds la boule !

Paul et Dominique sont arrivés au milieu de la scène. JEANNE, la main sur son cœur.

C'est lui !

PAUL » apercevant Jeanne » Quelle beauté !

DOMINIQUE. Je trouve qu'elle a un faux air. Riant.

Suls-je bête !... Comme si c'était possible !... PAUL.

Mais je l'ai déjà vue !... Où donc ? Ah !... dans mes rêves, sans doute...

JEANNE, vivement.

Il ne me reconnaît pas ? Bien ! D'autant plus que déguisée par cette toilette...

COUTURIN.

Tu as meilleure chance de lui plaire, certainement ! Mais n'oublie pas mes leçons !

JEANNE.

Non ! non ! Oh ! je me fends de l'esprit ! tu vas voir.

PAUL, saluant.

Madame !...

A part.

Pour qu'un être tellement merveilleux se rencontre ici, avec moi, c'est que le ciel, sans doute, l'a voulu ? Serait-ce par hasard... ?

JEANNE, imitant les gestes du mannequin.

Bonjour ! bonjour, mon bon !

PAUL.

Quelle familiarité ! C'est un indice, un signe, peut-être ?...

JEANNE, se rapprochant de lui.

De la tristesse, il me semble ? Et la cause ?

PAUL.

Prêt à partir pour un long voyage, je me demandais, tout à l'heure, si je ne ferais pas mieux ..

JEANNE.

Un voyage ? ça me va ! Plus on e*t de fous, plus on rit ! Votre bra*, voyons ! Presto !

PAUL.

Elle est folle !

JEANNE.

Mais regarde/ ! J'ai trois cent quatre-vingt-douze caisses pleines de robes, des coiffures par douzaine, des serviettes brodées, des torchons à dentelles, des gants à vingt-six boutons et des amours de petites bottes. Oh ! mes petites bottes !

Elle montre son pied.

Bottes ! bottes ! bottes !

PAUL.

Assez ! assez !

JEANNE.

Mon chalet d'acajou peut, en un clin d'œil, se poser sur les sites les plus pittoresques, et avec un piano...

Geste de dégoût de Paul.

un bon piano pour jouer des polkas sur les montagnes... Je sais faire des imitations. Écoute !

PAUL.

Grâce !

JEANNE, vivement.

Le reflet de nos élégances embellira le monde entier. Nous donnerons des raouts dans les pagodes, nous friserons les sauvages ; notre poudre de riz se mêlera à tous les vents ! Tout pour le chic ! chic for ever ! Du matin au soir nous ferons des mots ! — Nous écrirons noire nom sur tous ks monuments ! nous blaguerons toutes les ruines, nous cracherons dans tous les précipices ! Tu ne t'ennuieras pas ! Grâce à la poste, maintenant, on reçoit n'importe où les journaux. Si l'occasion se présente de faire une affaire, un lac de pélo're, quelque gisement de houille...

PAUL, s'enfuyant.

Horreur :

JEANNE.

Aimons-nous.

PAUL.

Pas de cette façon-là !

JEANNE.

Reviens !

PAUL.

Jamais !

Il disparaît.

DOMINIQUE, regardant de droite et de gauche.

Comment ? décampé ! File était bien aimable pourtant !

Il sort.

SCÉ&CE VIII

JEANNE, COUTURIN.

JEANNE, atterrée et considérant Couturin. Eli bien ? eh bien ?

COUTURIN. Qu'as-tu donc ?

JEANNE éclate e i sanglots, et s'appuyant sur l'épaule de Couturin :

Ah ! je suis horriblement malheureuse !

CHOEUR DE COUTURIERS ET MODISTES

offrant les consolations puisées dans les douceurs de leur art.

JEANNE les regarde quelque temps sans comprendre ; puis tout à coup :

Misérables ! c'est vous qui en êtes cause avec vos fadeurs imbéciles.
Allez-vous-en, mensonges du cœur et de la joue, hypocrisies, maquillages, faux sentiments, faux chignons, poitrines débraillées, âmes étroites ! Je liais tout cela ! Non ! non ! plus de tout cela !

EU ; déchiré ses vêtements

Où est-il ?... Je veux lui dire que je le trompais !... Paul ! Pau » !

Elle court de côté et d'autre, éperdue, haletante, renversée tout devant elle. — Les couturiers et les modistes s'enfuient.

Attends-moi ! réponds ! Je vais venir ! Me vois-tu ? Écoute ! Paul !

Elle revient sur le devant de la scène, près de Couturin, qui est le Hci des Gnômes.

Ah ! je l'ai perdu pour toujours !

LE ROI.

Par ta faute ! Tu t'y es mal prise !

JEANNE.

N'est-ce pas ? j'aurais dû me nommer ! LÈ ROI.

Tu en serais morte, l'oublies-tu ?

JeanNE.
